
SIGILL. SCHOLÆ RELIGIONIS PACIFICÆ
COND. A.D. 1866
PRO
VERITATE
ET REGNO
DEI
CHARLES HOLBROOK LIBRARY
Pacific School of Religion

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2023 with funding from Kahle/Austin Foundation

https://archive.org/details/gtu_32400002520751_13

V. 13
80480 1915

INDEX

VOLUME XIII—APRIL 17 TO OCTOBER 9, 1915, INCLUSIVE

ABSENCE, The Advantages of..... 481
Agreeing to Differ (Ed.)..... 180
All Souls' Day Masses..... 556
American "Punch" (Ed.)..... 154
America's Vocation (Ed.)..... 99
An Angry Old Girl (Ed.)..... 425
Ancient Carrion (Ed.)..... 179
Anglican Misrepresentations, More..... 172
Animal "Intelligence"..... 341
Answer, An..... 10
Anthony Comstock (Ed.)..... 280
Arizona (Constitution) (Ed.)..... 544
Artist Priest and Exile..... 197
"Assumpta Est Maria"..... 442
Athletics and Character, 195; Competitive, 586; and Health, 169; in Our Schools, 142; and Scholarships, 245; Why Have Competitive? 293
Atrocities (Ed.)..... 447
Australia: Catholic Press of..... 632
Austria-Hungary: Catholic Awakening, 315; Economic Relations With Germany, 458; New Triple Bond, 53; Peace Rumors, 2; Proposed Tariff Union, 314; Red Book, 362; Religion and German Alliance, 82; Russian Persecution, 26; Thanksgiving for Lemberg, 387; U. S. Reply to, 357; Renascent Galicia 626
Ave Maria's Fiftieth Year, The (Ed.)..... 233

BAGOT and Blackwood's (Ed.)..... 402
Baiting the Pope (Ed.)..... 374
Bearing Witness (Ed.)..... 127
Because! (Ed.)..... 281
Belgium: Answer to the White Book, 243; Bishop Heylen Protests, 338; Scattered People, 506; Missions..... 479
Benedict XV and the Secular Press (Ed.)... 302
Benson, Mgr., Father Vaughan on..... 237
Bibles Here and There (Ed.)..... 154
Birth Restriction, What They Said (Ed.)..... 567
Blind Eyes (Ed.)..... 202
Boys, Our (Ed.), 178; Our Lost (Ed.)..... 254
Brandi, Father (Ed.)..... 616
Breaking Point, The (Ed.)..... 328
Brothers-in-Arms (Failure of Socialism) (Ed.) 519

CAESARISM (Ed.)..... 375
Call to the Faithful, A (Indian Tribal Funds, (Ed.)..... 303
Canada, Catholics in Journalism..... 560
Capital Punishment..... 171
Carrying His Point (Ed.)..... 44
Castellane Case 479
Catholic, Conventions, A Month of (Ed.), 446; Educational Convention, (Ed.), 278; Landmarks of San Francisco, 147; Press, How to Improve the, 511; Another View, 486; Defects of the, 462; Ass'n Convention, 504; of Ireland, The, 585; in England, 609; Weeklies, A Century of, 537; Good Qualities of the,..... 415
Catholics and the Constitution (Ed.), 495; Will They Remain (Ed.)..... 566
Catholic Women's War Day, 479; Summer Camps 198
Cause, The, Again: (Materialism) (Ed.)..... 543
Censorship and the Movies (Ed.)..... 303
Cheap and Precious (Ed.)..... 231
Children, of France and the War, The, 418; Why are Our Children Different?..... 465
China: Is Monarchy Coming..... 626
Chinese Misrepresented..... 480
Christ and Woman..... 247
Christian or Pagan? (Ed.)..... 590
Christopher, St., The Cult of, (Ed.)..... 496
Church, The, and Socialism, 559; Constitution, and Flag (Ed.), 374; and Mexico, The 490; Music, Our Discarded, 369; of the Revolution, The, 33; The Civilizing (Ed.), 447; The Immigrant and the..... 629
Circus, The..... 119
Citizens, Training New..... 528
Clean-up Week (Ed.)..... 179
Coeducation and the Race (Ed.)..... 203
College Courses, A Graduate's Confession.... 485
College President's Reading, A (Ed.)..... 15
Columbia's Mother-Trainers (Ed.)..... 640
Commission, A Rash (Ed.)..... 518
Common School Education in the Middle Ages 58
Comparisons Are—(Ed.)..... 128
Comstock, Anthony (Ed.)..... 614
Confession and "Economic Progress"..... 639
Constitution and the Status Quo, The (Ed.). 543
Convent Girl and the Paris Fashions, A (Ed.) 178
Converts' Leagues..... 147
Corpus Christi..... 175
Count Zeppelin Awakens London's Conscience 418
Crime at Marietta, The (Frank Case)..... 535
Crying to Heaven (Ed.)..... 422
Cuckoo Controversy, The (Ed.)..... 179

DAILY Paper, The 35, 90 (Ed.)..... 126
Darwin, By Order of..... 414
Dead, The Thought of the (Ed.)..... 520
Deaf Mutes, Catholic..... 479
Difficulties of Aliens, The (Ed.)..... 233
Dodos and Mothers (Ed.)..... 204
Does It Pay? (Ed.)..... ,16
Dog or the Baby, The..... 223
Douay Bible, The..... 9
Drama, Comtemporary, The..... 512
Dunne, Governor, Philosophizes (Ed.)..... 542
Dutch Embassy at the Vatican, The..... 392
Dynamite, Christian Science and Lourdes (Ed.) 99

EASTLAND Investigation, The (Ed.)..... 448
"Ecclesia Anglicana Libera Sit" (Ed.). 278
End of Socialism, The..... 222
Entanglement (Ed.)..... 303
Ethical Societies, The God of the..... 489
Episcopalianism (Why Complain?)..... 561
Ethical Society Religion..... 322
Eugenics—A New Aristocracy (Ed.), 470; Folly of the Eugenists, the..... 272
Euntes Ibant et Flebant (Prison Discipline), (Ed.) 127
Euripides in New York..... 224
European Alcoholism..... 118
Every Woman..... 218
Evidence? May Lawyers Withold..... 115
Evil, At the Root of the (Ed.)..... 376

FAITH: The Propagation of the..... 632
Felician, The Simoniac..... 394
Florida, An Incident (Ed.)..... 616
Food for Thought (Ed.)..... 154
Fool and His Money, The (Ed.)..... 327
France: Catholic Committee Manifesto on War, 530; Catholic Medical Gild, 578; Catholic Study of Birth Rate, 54; Class of 1917, The, 26; Falling Birth Rate, 314; Financial Readjustment, 110; Jesuits in the French Army, 2; Lenfant, Bishop of Digne, 602; Loyalty and Bigotry, 82; Munitions, 315; Munition Workers, 243; Munitions and Other Problems, 266; Young France, (Ed.), 615; New War Credit, 290; The Pope's Answer, 54; René Bazin's Appeal, 387; Revival of Religion, 266; Sister Barbara, 290; Workmen and the War, 214; The Church and the War in, 558; Wounded Soldiers:.. 434
Frank Case, 423; Crime at Marietta, 535; and Liberty of the Press (Ed.)..... 494
"Freebooting Pirates" (Ed.)..... 204
Freeman of the Universe (Ed.)..... 155
French Soldiers on Leave..... 633

GARY Plan? Who Invented the..... 639
Genesis and Woman's Rights..... 416
Georgia, Oh! (Ed.)..... 423
Germany: American Note, Bryce Commission, 139; Belgian Outrages on the German Soldiery, 362; Catholic Defense Committee, 338; Catholics and Protestants, 315; Commerce During the War, 167; Detention Camps, 290; Emperor's Declaration, The, 410; Brest-Litovsk Captured, 505; English Officers Ill-Treated, 110; Expansion of the German Empire, 243; Financial and Industrial Conditions, 339; Food Supplies Ample, 167; Chancellor's Speech on Italy and Poland, 482; Sinking of the Arabic, 418; Frye Case, U. S. Note in the, 481; German Jesuits in the War, 111; Germany and the Pope, 27; Internal Condition of, 3; Lissauer's "Chant of Hate" Repudiated, 458; National Confidence, 214; No Fear of Starvation, 267; Peace Rumors Denied, 290; Press Censorship, 290; Prosperity of War, 434; Sinking the Steamer Lusitania 111; Socialists, Patriotic Citizens, 82; Territorial Expansion, 266; Treatment of Prisoners, 83; A Third War Loan, 603; A White Book, 190; Munitions, American, 554; Two National Demonstrations..... 626
God, Freedom, the Constitution, (Ed.)..... 566
Godless Science (Ed.)..... 353
Governors' Annual Conference (Ed.)..... 567
Great Britain: Anglo-German Negotiations, 1912, 531; The American Note, 27; Anniversary Day, 435; Bristol Convention, 554; Bryce Commission, 139; The Budget, 111; Censorship, 83; The Coalition Cabinet, 190; Conscription, 482, 579; Conscription Plans, 458; Conservatism and the Munitions Bill, 267; "Deadly Complacency," 215; Dissatisfaction with the Cabinet, 167; Germany and the Lusitania, 111; Intervention of the Holy See, 55; Marquis of Lansdowne's Speech, 363; Income Tax, 602; Mortality Among the Officers, 139; The Munitions Bill, 244, 291; Munition Workers, 315; National Anger, Aroused, 139; Opinions on the New Cabinet, 191; Organizing the Workers, 215; Parliament Opened, 579; Recruiting, 111, 244; Recruiting Laborers, 168; Sir Ed. Grey's Reply to German Chancellor, 506; Science in Warfare, 339; Times, The, on Christian Doctrine, 27; War Babies, 83, 191, 267; Vote of Credit, 337; War Casualties, April-June, 315; Women Workers, 339; War Finance 627
Great Task: The 1863-1915, (Ed.)..... 302

HAZARDING a Heritage (Ed.)..... 400
Healer's Hand, The (Ed.)..... 447
Hearn, Lafcadio..... 73
Hell, Bombardment of..... 144
"Hideous Self-Immolation" (Ed.)..... 328
High Schools, Catholic; We Need (Ed.)..... 590
Holding the Mirror up to Nature (Novels) (Ed.) 543
Holland, Papal Ambassador, 506; Neutrality. 62
Holy Father's Congratulations, The (Ed.).... 14
Homes, Our..... 607
Homesickness of the Soul, The (Ed.)..... 448
Howells and the Jesuits (Ed.)..... 70
Huss, John, "Martyrdom" of..... 370

I HAVE Been Dead (Ed.)..... 304
I Know Just How You Feel (Ed.)..... 256
Immigration Problem, The (Ed.)..... 542
Immortality, Annihilation or (Ed.)..... 71
Impediment, the One (Ed.)..... 230
Indecency vs. Good Taste (Ed.)..... 14
India: Indian Tribal Funds, 303; German Jesuits Interned, 507..... 531
International Law, A New Basis for..... 510
In the Midst of Life..... 174
Ireland: Agricultural Laborers, 603; Agriculture, 363; Coalition Cabinet Unpopular, 316; Bishop O'Dwyer and Mr. Redmond, 531; Col. Lynch and the Freeman's Journal, 28; Dillon on Recruiting, 482; Discontent with the Government, 244, 268; Emigration Statistics, 112; The French Government and Irish Sympathy, 83; Golden Jubilee of Brother O'Mahoney, 55; Home Rule Bill, 555; Home Rule Imperiled, 191; Industrial Development, 435; Industrial Progress, 388; The Irish and Enlisting, 215; Irish Martyrs' Decree, 3; Irish Organizations, 192; Liquor Taxation, 139; Minor Industrial Conditions, 410; The National Volunteers, 28; Nationalist Grievances, 579; Taxes, 604; The New Viceroy, '55; National Aspirations, 507; Political Discontent, 291; Population, Trade, Finance, 339; "Ireland, Nurse of Heroes," 6; War Prices and Trade..... 627
Irish in Argentina, The..... 146
Italia Æterna..... 274
Italy: Bari, Dominican Friars of, 483; Declares War on Turkey, 482; Press and the Pope, 507; War Agitation..... 140

JESUIT Alumni in the War..... 479
July 4, 1776, What Happened on..... 299

KILMER, JOYCE; Lecture Tour..... 452

LADIES and the Law Court, The (Ed.),180;
Wept, Ladies, The (Ed.)..... 155
Lambs, Protect the (Ed.)..... 617

PAGE

"Lascivious Fictions" Spreading (Ed.) 495
Last Stand, The (Ed.) 255
Liberty, Its Use and Abuse (Ed.) 472
Lifting the Standards (Ed.) 401
Lodge, Hyslop and Telepathy 87
Looking Forward (Catholic College Graduates) 143
Louisiana Leper Home, The 250
Lovest Thou Me? (Ed.) 203
Lying Witness, (Ed.) 254

MAGAZINES, Our Sublimated 114
Magna Charta's Seventh Centenary (Ed.), 230; "Month's Mind," of 344
Make-Ups (Ed.) 73
Marquette "The Imposter" 346
Marriages, Catholic, The Living Church on 464
Masons, American and Latin Lodges 504
"Mayo," God Help Us!" 323
Mayor and the Stage, A (Ed.) 232
Men, Our Young, 219 249
Methodist Quarterly, A, and the Ne Temere, 60; Making Italian Methodists (Ed.) 353
Mexico: The Blood Line, 411; Anti-U. S. Proceedings of Revolutionary Convention, 507; American's Appeal, 459; Plunder and Violence, 459; Pan-American Note, 460; Carranza, Recognition of, 604; Carranza and A. B. C. Republics, 555; Carranza's Proclamation, 244; Chaos and Famine, 216; Contemporary News-Letter, 84; Corolla Letter, 484; Disagreements Among the Revolutionaries, 140; Famine, 84; Famine and Chaos, 291; Famine in, 340; Food Riots, 168; General Devol's Report, 388; Huerta Complicates the Situation, 316; Important Conference, 436; Masonic Hostility, 28; The McManus Murder, 83; Mexican Ladies Protest, 113; Mexico's Salvation, 112; Pan American Conference, 580; Revolution Made to Order, 534; Suffrage and Revolutionists, 532; Mr. Bryan and Dr. Kelley, 55; Starvation in, 192; State of the Country, 4; Villa and Carranza Confer, 268; Villa's Note, 244; War, Hunger and Chicanery, 364; Witnesses to Atrocities, 4; Mexico of Today, 30; A Sad Letter, 628; Recognition of Carranza 628
Micrometor or Megaphone, Which? (Ed.) 100
Mistaken "Broadmindedness" (Ed.) 326
Modernism in England 366
Morality of the Songs we Sing, The 320
Mother Goose and "Efficiency" (Ed.) 353
Motherhood (Ed.) 127
"Movies," The Village (Ed.) 638
Moving Picture Censorship (Ed.), 98; Menace, The 582
Murder and Sentimentality, 171; and Tooth Brushes, (Materialistic Sociology) (Ed.) 519
Mystic, A Modern 563

NERVES, Our Natural 5
Netherlands, Resuming Relations with the Vatican 168
Neutrality, Cowardly (Ed.) 472
Newspapers—A Children's Text-Book (Ed.) 470
Newman and Gladstone 294
New Woman after God's Heart, The 91
New Zealand, Catholic Press of Australia and 632
Nickleby, Mrs., and the Crozer Professor 141

OFFER, A Thousand-Dollar (Ed.) 615
Official Bulletin Writer, The (Ed.) 519

PAN-AMERICANISM and the Church 413
Pankhurst, Mrs. in Paris (Ed.) 280
Pantaloon and Slapstick Legislation (Ed.) 72
Patrick's, Old St., New York 62
Patriots Again, The (Ed.) 14
Pauline Privilege, The 367
Peace by Constitution 390
Peace, Hatred, Arms (Ed.), 43; A New Plea for (Ed.) 422
Periodic Drunkenness and Tobacco 59
Poor, Large Families of the 299, 493 557
Poland's Great Sorrow (Ed.), 126: The Plight of, 514; Dirge of the Dolls (Ed.) 544
Pope and the Press, The (Ed.), 471; and Allies, (Groundless Fear) (Ed.), 568; and the War, The (Ed.), 202; Letter on Mexico, (Ed.), 42; and the Kaiser, (Ed.), 494; Outlook and the 479
Popular Song, A 342
Portugal, The New Revolt 140
Post-Impressionism 347
Praying, Is Ill-Bred? (Ed.) 591
Present-Day Fiction 8
Press, Catholic in England, 609; of Ireland, 585; Catholic, Defects of, 462; How to Improve, 511; Another View, 486; Century of Weeklies, 537; Catholic, of Australia and New Zealand 632
Prisoner and You, The 471
Prisons, Are Penal Institutions? (Ed.) 327
Problems About War (Ed.) 352
Professors and Spooks 640
Proofs of the Past, The 438
Proselyting the Filipinos 504
Protestantism, Limitations of 480
Protestant Tradition, The 297

PAGE

Providence in Persecution 271
Purity Congress, International 528

RACE and Religion (Ed.) 592
Radicalism 638
Rational Treatment of Criminals 528
Reading, What Are Our Children? 592
Real Menace, The 89
Religion of the Future, The, 217; New Theory of 113
Religions, American 583
"Religious but Creedless"! (Ed.) 71
Reno's Joy (Ed.) 43
Rescue the Kittens and Cats! (Ed.) 566
Revolution Made to Order(Mexico) 534
Right to Live, Her 515
Rights of the Child, The 437
Rome: The Pope and La Liberté, 316; The Pope's Letter on the Anniversary of the War, 411; The Pope and Peace, 56; The Pope and the War 392

SAINT FRANCIS and His City (Ed.) 98
"Save Us, We Perish" (Ed.) 70
Saving Up (Ed.) 376
Scandalized Contemporary, A 464
Scientific Faith, Reign of 538
Sentimentalism towards Crime 480
Serra, Father, The Influence of 605
Signs of Superior Civilization (Ed.) 100
Silence, Compulsory 441
Simplicity, Sociology and Religion 57
Sir Edward Grey and the German Chancellor 530
Social Uplift (Ed.) 423
Socialism, Battling With, 581; Collapse of, 461; The Church and 559
"Society's" Conversation (Ed.) 100
Songs We Sing, The 296
Sowers of Discord (Ed.) 402
South America, Dollars and Diplomacy 488
"Soyons Distingués" (Ed.) 231
Spain: Features of Conscription, 340; Anticlerical Agitation, 556; Attitude on the War, 484; Liturgical Congress, 436; Attitude on War, 532; Moroccan Question 628
Spreading Catholic Books (Ed.) 43
Starving Nations (Ed.) 279
State Socialism and Europe 533
String-Pulling Jesuit, A (Ed.) 42

TACK, Augustus V., The Art of 32
Taxing Education and Charity (Ed.) 255
That Blessed Word Automatic (Ed.) 205
Teaching Kine, The (Ed.) 520
Theaters Old and New (Ed.) 255
Thoughts on Heredity, 221, 246 270
Times and the Belgian Priests, The (Ed.) 204
Tolerance Today and Long Ago (Ed.) 375
Tremendousness of Trifles (Ed.) 354
Tribune and the Jesuit General, The (Ed.) 279
Twilight Sleep, The Ethics of 193

VACATION Time (Ed.) 401
Veneration of Relics, The (Ed.) 72
Viscount Bryce and the War (Ed.) 279

WAR: Advance on Warsaw, 409; Air Raids in England, 26; Arabic, German Note on, 553; The Argonne, 313, 361; Austro-Hungarian Protest on Ammunition, 361; American Note to Germany, 138; Armenian Torpedoed by German Submarine, 314; Austro-German Victory in Galicia, 137; British Note on Blockade, 433; British Victory in German West Africa, 337; Bulgaria Mobilizes, 602; Campaign in Galicia, 313; Carpathians and the Dardanelles, 53; China and Japan, 110; Cushing and Gulflight Cases, 214; Deadlock in the Carpathians, 25; Dumba Case, 554; Dumba's Explanation, 577; Eastern Theater of War, 165; Fall of Przemysl, 213; Fall of Warsaw, 433; Forcing the Dardanelles, 81; First German Reply to U. S. Note, 189; French Success at Les Eparges, 1; Galicia, 361; German Drive, 553; German Reply in the Frye Case, 433; German Reply Unsatisfactory, 337; Germany's Note of Protest, 1; German Success in the East, 385; Great Britain's Memorandum, 289; Italian Campaign, 190, 213, 265, 313, 337; Italian Demands on Austria, 166; Italy and Austria, 166; Italy Declares War on Austria, 166; Loss of British War Vessels, 190; Lusitania Destroyed by Germans, 110; Lusitania Protests, 165; Movements in Flanders, 53; Orduna Fired on by German Submarine, 361; Poland, 361; Resignation of Secretary Bryan, 241; Russian Advance in the Carpathians, 1; Russians Retire from the Dunajec, 109; Sea Raider Interned, 2; Southern Poland and Galicia, 337; Third American Note, 386; Third Note to Germany, 241; Warsaw's Peril, 385; Vilna Captured, 577; Conquest of Poland, 529; German Submarine Concession, 529; Hesperian Sunk, 599; Ypres and Carency, 137; Allies Gain in Artois and Champagne, 625; Balkan Situation, 625; East, Less Activity in the 625

PAGE

War and Anti-Catholic Propaganda, 509; Capital and Labor (Ed.), 424; Wisdom in the 13th Century 610
Winning America for the Church (Ed.) 591
Was it "Fit to Print"? (Ed.) 16
Weismann and Some Fallacies as to Heredity 389
Wells, H. G., An Open Letter to 317
"Westward Ho!" (Ed.) 232
What Are Curmudgeons? (Ed.) 155
What is a Prisoner? (Ed.) 446
What Was Rationalism? (Ed.) 392
Why Doesn't the Pope Interfere? (Ed.) 326
Why Pray for Peace? (Ed.) 99
Will the Authorities Act? (Censoring the Mails) (Ed.) 518
Wine in the Holy Sacrifice 86
Woman, the New, After God's Heart, 91; Has She a Soul, 365; Suffrage and New York Sun 353
Women and Peace 440
Wonder Grows, The, Carranza's Recognition (Ed.) 614
World, The End of the? (Ed.) 496
Woman Suffrage 630

XAVIER, Mother Mary (Ed.) 302

"YE of Little Faith" (Ed.) 15
Young Man and the Brotherhood, The, 194; and Geology, The, 391; and Industrial Welfare Work, The, 606; and Music, The, 117; and the Navy, The, 269; and Public Accounting, The, 29; and Shorthand Reporting, The, 319; and Steamship Transportation, The, 170; and Stock Raising, The 463
Y. M. C. A. at Panama, 528; Hall Given for Bigots' Meeting 479
Youth and a Law, A (Ed.) 400

AUTHORS

Abercrombie, Lascelles: The Epic 46
Adams, Arthur: Grocer Greatheart 183
Adams, Professor John: Making the Most of One's Mind 19
Adams, Samuel H.: Little Miss Grouch 620
Aitkens, J. R.: The Christ of the Men of Art 258
Angell, Norman: America and the New World-State 130
Armstrong, Margaret: Field Book of Western Wild Flowers 499
Artzibashef, Michael: The Millionaire 357
Bacon, Leonard: The Song of Poland 47
Bacon, Paul V.: Vorwärts 184
Bainbridge, M. S.: A Walk in Other Worlds with Dante 548
Baring, Hon. Maurice: An Outline of Russian Literature 331
Barrett, T. S.J.: Compendium Theologiæ Moralis 546
Belloc, Hilaire: The Elements of the Great War 523
Benet, William Rose: The Falconer of God and Other Poems 20
Benson, Arthur Christopher: Hugh: Memoirs of a Brother 102
Benson, E. F.: Arundel 48
Benson, Robert Hugh: Poems, 19; Spiritual Letters 102
Blessed John Fisher: Commentary on the Penitential Psalms 131
Bond, Francis: Dedications and Patron Saints of English Churches 428
Bailey, John: Milton 572
Bimanski, F.: Phonetic Method of Hearing Confessions of the Slavic Peoples in Cases of Emergency 501
Bates, K. L.: In Sunny Spain 619
Bordeaux, Henry: The Will to Live 105
Birmingham, G. A.: Minnie's Bishop 596
Bleneau, Adele: The Nurse's Story 524
Bradley, Mary H.: The Splendid Chance 596
Brady, Cyrus Townsend: The Eagle of the Empire 183
Browning, R. and E. Barrett: New Poems 499
Burr, Amelia Josephine: A Dealer in Empire 105
Burroughs, John: The Breath of Life 452
Campbell, Rev. T. J., S.J.: Pioneer Laymen of North America 102
Canfield, Dorothy: Hillsboro People 104
Cannon, Gilbert: Satire 46
Cather, Willa Silbert: The Song of the Lark. 645
Chadwick, Rear Admiral French E.: The American Navy 306
Chapman, John Jay: Memories and Milestones 283
Chase, Beatrice: Through a Dartmoor Window 643
Chesterton, G K.: The Wild Knight 237
Churchill, Winston: A Far Country 307
Clarke, M. E.: Paris Waits: 1914 75
Cohen, Helen Louise: The Ballade 427
Cobb, W. H.: The Meaning of Christian Unity 523

PAGE

Coit, J. Eliot: Citrus Fruits ... 644
Conrad, Joseph: Victory ... 75
Conway, Daniel: Life of Ven. John Ogilvie, S.J. ... 284
Dall, Wm. H.: Spencer Fullerton Baird ... 404
Dalrymple, Leona: The Lovable Meddler ... 644
Davin, Olga A.: How I Became a Catholic ... 406
Davis, R. H.: Somewhere in France ... 572
Deming, Clarence: Yale Yesterdays ... 283
Dehey, Elinor Tong: Religious Orders of Women in U. S. ... 619
Doyle, Edward: Ginevra ... 331
Dragoumis, J. D.: Under Greek Skies ... 619
Driscoll, John T.: Pragmatism and the Problem of the Idea ... 259
Du Bois, W. E. Burghardt: The Negro ... 258
Dunbar, Seymour: A History of Travel in America ... 355
Earhardt, Lida B.: Types of Teaching ... 307
Eastman, Charles A.: The Indian Today ... 306
Eliot, Charles W.: The Road Toward Peace. 130
Elliot, A. F. Scott: Prehistoric Man and His Story ... 183
Emmet, Thomas Addis: Thomas Addis Emmet and Robert Emmet ... 157
Englehardt, Fr. Zephyrin: The Missions and Missionaries of California ... 619
Ensor, R. C. K.: Belgium ... 643
Eucken, Rudolf: Collected Essays ... 235
Evans, Howell T.: Wales and the Wars of the Roses ... 499
Fabre, T. Henri: Bramble-Bees and Others ... 183
Fields, Anna P. L.: The Story of Canada Blackie ... 547
Finley, John: The French in the Heart of America ... 74
Fletcher, C. R. L.: The Making of Western Europe ... 571
Foote, Mary Hallock: The Valley Road ... 620
Forbes-Leith, W., S.J.: Pre-Reformation Scholars of Scotland in the XVIth Century 282
Fortescue, Father Adrian: The Mass ... 381
Funk, F. X.: Manual of Church History ... 548
Galsworthy, J.: The Freelands ... 524
Gardner, A. G.: The War Lords ... 595
Gardiner, A. G.: Prophets, Priests and Kings 547
Gibbs, Philip: The Soul of the War ... 594
Girardey, Rev. F., C.SS.R.: Sermon Matter. 309
Gissing, Geo.: The Private Papers of Henry Ryecroft ... 547
Goodchild, George: The Love of the Wanderer ... 547
Gorgas, Wm. C.: Sanitation in Panama ... 619
Granger, Canon, Guide in the Ways of Divine Love ... 549
Grant, Robert: The High Priestess ... 596
Green, E. M.: The Laird of Glentyre ... 619
Gretton, R. H.: History ... 46
Griffis, William E.: Millard Fillmore ... 20
Grimal, Rev. I., S.M.: The Priesthood and Sacrifice of Our Lord Jesus Christ ... 283
Grisar, Hartmann, S.J.: Luther, Vol. IV ... 330
Guthrie, William D.: The Catholic School ... 644
Haldane, Viscount: The Conduct of Life ... 405
Hall, S. Roland: Writing an Advertisement. 332
Hannay, David: The Navy and Sea Power ... 331
Hare, Christopher: Life and Letters in the Italian Renaissance ... 644
Hastings, James: Prayer ... 620
Hastings, James: Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics ... 500
Hay, James, Jr.: The Man Who Forgot ... 105
Hill, Rev. M. P., S.J.: The Catholic's Ready Answer ... 234
Hoare, Alfred: An Italian Dictionary ... 380
Hodges, George: The Early Christian Church 18
Hogarth, D. A.: The Ancient East ... 331
Holborn, I. B. Stoughton: The Need for Art in Life ... 104
Holland, Olive: The Belgians at Home ... 105
Holland, W. J.: The Butterfly Guide ... 572
Hooker, Brian: Poems ... 450
Hope, Anthony: A Young Man's Year ... 596
Hull, Ernest R.: Civilization and Culture ... 476
Huneker, James: The New Cosmopolis ... 207
Hunting, Harold B.: The Story of Our Bible 620
Huss, John: The Church ... 370
Husslein, Joseph: The Children, a Message to Priests, Teachers, Parents ... 476
Irvine, Leigh H.: By Right of Sword ... 330
Ives, Ella Gilbert: The Evolution of a Preacher ... 427
Jacquin, Père., O.P.: The Friar Preacher Yesterday and Today ... 236
Jane, Lionel Cecil: The Interpretation of History ... 380
Jarret, Bede: Meditations for Layfolk ... 644
Jerome, Mother St.: Love's Gradatory ... 476
Johnson, W. S.: Prayer for Peace ... 548
Johnson, R. M.: Arms and the Race ... 548
Jourdan, Geo. V.: The Movement Towards Catholic Reform in the Early 16th Century. 522
Johnson, Henry: Dante's Divine Comedy ... 182
Kellner, Leon: American Literature ... 306
Kittredge, George Lyman: Chaucer and His Poetry ... 159
Kleist, James A., S.J.: The Dream of Scipio 76
Knox, James Carter: Henry August Coit ... 643
Kreisler, Fritz: Four Weeks in the Trenches 75

PAGE

Ladd, George Trumbull: What Ought I to Do? ... 75
Ladd, Geo. T.: What Shall I Believe? ... 474
Lake, Kirsopp; The Stewardship of Faith ... 284
Lane, Martha, A. L.: Arabian Nights' Entertainments ... 500
Lee, Chas.: The Widow Woman ... 547
Lees, Beatrice Adelaide: Alfred the Great ... 282
Lincoln, Joseph C.: Thankful's Inheritance ... 427
Little, Frances Delancy: Sketches in Poland. 451
Lynch, Ella Frances: Educating the Child at Home ... 356
MacCaffrey, Rev. James: Catholic Church History ... 45
MacCracken, Henry Noble: The College Chaucer ... 159
MacDonald, Rt. Rev. Bishop: Stray Leaves or Traces of Travel ... 309
MacEachen, Roderick: Child's Life of Christ 644
Mach, Ed. Von: Germany's Point of View ... 594
Mackintosh, Alex.: Joseph Chamberlain: An Honest Biography ... 595
Macksey, C.: De Ethica Naturali ... 474
MacRory, Rev. Joseph: The Epistles of St. Paul to the Corinthians ... 129
Mann, Horace K.: Lives of the Popes in the Middle Ages: Innocent III ... 306
Markham, Edward: The Shoes of Happiness 450
Marks, Jeanette: Early English Hero Tales ... 500
Marshall, Thomas W.: The Louisiana Purchase 1819-1841 ... 283
Martin, L. C.: The Works of Henry Vaughan (Ed.) ... 522
Martindale, C. C.: In God's Army: Commanders in Chief ... 476
Mason, Caroline Atwater: The Spell of Southern Shores ... 130
Matthews, Brander: The Oxford Book of American Essays ... 379
Mauldsley, Daniel: The Solitaries of the Sambuca ... 158
McCormick, Patrick J.: History of Education 17
McLaughlin, Maurice E.: Tennis as I Play It ... 427
Mercier, Cardinal: On the Papacy ... 184
Meschler, Maurice, S.J.: The Life of Our Lord in Meditations ... 283
Messmer, Archbishop: Woman Suffrage ... 406
Miller, Elizabeth: Daybreak ... 183
Montague, Margaret Prescott: Closed Doors. 645
Montgomery, L. M.: Anne of the Island ... 525
Moore, Leslie: The Jester ... 76
Moore, Thomas Vernier: A Historical Introduction to Ethics ... 159
Moorman, F. W.: The Poetical Works of Robert Herrick ... 522
Maumigny, René de: The Practice of Mental Prayer ... 570
Meynell, Wilfrid: Aunt Sarah and the War. 571
More, Louis Trenchard: The Limitations of Science ... 331
Morris, Charles: Famous Days and Deeds in Holland and Belgium ... 236
Muller, Margarethe: Elsbeth ... 619
Muncunill, John, S.J.: Tractatus de Christi Ecclesia ... 307
Norris, Kathleen: The Story of Julia Page ... 620
Northcate, P. M.: The Curse of Adam ... 259
Olmstead, Florence: A Cloistered Romance ... 158
O'Neill, George V., S.J.: The Golden Legend ... 308
Oppenheim, E. P.: The Way of These Women 596
O'Sheel, Shaemas: The Light Feet of Goats ... 450
Palmer, John: Comedy ... 46
Parker, S. C.: Methods of Teaching in High Schools ... 307
Parker, Sir Gilbert: The Money Maker, 620; The World in the Crucible ... 357
Peperman, W. Leon: Who Built the Panama Canal? ... 47
Perris, G. H.: Campaign of 1914 in France and Belgium ... 523
Phillips, Stephen: Panama and Other Poems, 235; Armageddon ... 645
Porter, Laura Spencer: Genevieve ... 619
Power, Matthew A., S.J.: The Protomartyr of Scotland ... 284
Powys, John Cowper: Visions and Revisions. 19
Prince, L. Bradford: Spanish Mission Churches of New Mexico ... 595
Prummer, Dominic M., O.P.: Manuale Theologiæ Moralis ... 207
Putnam, George Palmer: In the Oregon Country ... 18
Quercy, Jean: Journal d'un curé de campagne pendant la guerre ... 379
Quick, Herbert: The Brown Mouse ... 524
Reilly, Joseph J.: James Russell Lowell as a Critic ... 103
Rinehart, Mary Roberts: "K" ... 475
Ritchie, Mrs. D. G.: The Two Sinners ... 525
Robertson, A. T.: A Grammar of the Greek New Testament ... 206
Ryan, Oswald: Municipal Freedom ... 306
Sarolea, Dr. Charles: The Anglo-German Problem ... 333
Saunders, Charles Francis and J. Smeaton Chase: The California Padres and Their Missions ... 158

PAGE

Schaff, David S.: John Huss: His Life and Teachings ... 370
Schwager, Rev. Frederick, S.V.D.: The Most Vital Mission Problem ... 428
Scollard, Clinton: The Vale of Shadows ... 450
Sharp, Dallas Lore: The Whole Year Round 131
Sharpless, Isaac: The American College ... 306
Shufeldt, R. W.: America's Greatest Problem: The Negro ... 258
Slater, Thos., S.J.: Questions of Moral Theology ... 474
Simonds, Frank H.: The Great War: The Second Phase ... 595
Small, Walter Herbert: Early New England Schools ... 310
Smith, F. Hopkinson: Felix O'Day ... 645
Smith, E. M.: The Investigation of Mind in Animals ... 452
Smith, Robinson: The Life of Cervantes ... 235
Sobieski, Count John: The Life of King John Sobieski ... 547
Stewart, Charles D.: Some Textual Difficulties in Shakespeare ... 282
Stewart, Elinor P.: Letters on an Elk Hunt. 620
Stevens, J. E.: Commercial Work and Training for Girls ... 476
Stewart, I. H.: Why Catholics Honor Mary. 549
Strahan, Kay Cleaver: Peggy Mary ... 619
Stickney, J. H.: Æsop's Fables ... 500
Stoner, Winifred Sackville: Natural Education ... 356
Thompson, R. Campbell: A Pilgrim's Song ... 20
Taylor, Winifred Louise: The Man Behind the Bars ... 235
Thurston, Herbert: The War and the Prophets ... 522
Thurston, Frederick: The Romances of Amosis-Ra ... 524
Tierney, Rev. H. B.: Collected Poems ... 132
Tissier, Mgr.: Consignes de Guerre ... 524
Tower, Charlemagne: Essays, Political and Historical ... 131
Toy, Crawford Howell: Introduction to the History of Religions ... 644
Trask, Katrina: The Mighty and the Lowly. 524
Tynan, Katherine: The Curse of Castle Eagle, 48; Men, Not Angels ... 132
Underhill, Evelyn: Ruysbroeck ... 356
Vaccari, Alberto, S.J.: Un Commento a Giobbe di Guilio di Eclana ... 642
Van Loon, Hendrik William: The Rise of the Dutch Kingdom ... 46
Vaughan, Bernard, S.J.: What of Today? ... 130
Verhaeven, Emile: Poems ... 259
Vonier, Dom Ansgar, O.S.B.: The Personality of Christ ... 404
Vose, Edward Neville: The Spell of Flanders 183
Walters, Hugh: The English Essays and Essayist ... 475
Walpole, Hugh: The Golden Scarecrow ... 645
Walsh, James J.: The Popes and Science ... 498
Wapelhorst, Innocent: Compendium Sacræ Liturgiæ ... 405
Ward, Mgr. B.: The Holy Gospel According to St. Luke ... 549
Waugh, Arthur: Reticence in Literature ... 643
Wells, H. A.: Bealby ... 160
Westcott, Frank N.: Hepsey Burke ... 475
White, Steward Edward: The Rediscovered Country ... 103
Wieger, L.: Chinese Characters ... 549
Wiggin, Kate Douglas: Penelope's Postscripts 476
Wilson, Alice: The Lutanist ... 644
Wister, Owen: The Pentecost of Calamity ... 645
Winter, William: Shakespeare on the Stage. 18
Wood, Eric Fisher: The Note-Book of an Attaché ... 498
Woodson, C. G.: The Education of the Negro Prior to 1861 ... 258
Wooley, E. C.: Written English ... 548
Wynne, Arnold: The Growth of English Drama ... 184
Wynne, Rev. J. J., S.J.: The Mass ... 571

BOOKS

A. B. C. of Good Form ... 332
Abused Russia ... 429
Administration of Baptism, The ... 406
Ægypten ... 260
A Far Country ... 307
Alfred the Great ... 282
Æsop's Fables ... 500
Alice and a Family ... 285
America to Japan ... 260
America and the New World-State ... 130
American College, The ... 306
American Essays, The Oxford Book of ... 379
American Literature, 306; Readings from ... 331
American Navy, The ... 306
America's Greatest Problem: The Negro ... 258
Ancient East, The ... 331
Anglo-German Problem, The ... 333
Annuario Pontificio per l'Anno 1915 ... 20
Anne of the Island ... 525
Antonio Rosmini ... 357
Arabian Nights' Entertainments, The ... 500

PAGE

Arms and the Race ... 548
Art of the Exposition, The ... 453
Arundel ... 48
Aunt Sarah and the War ... 308
Baird, Spencer Fullerton ... 404
Ballade, The ... 427
Barfussale ... 77
Bealby ... 160
Beautiful Ireland ... 77
Beginnings of the American People ... 451
Belgium ... 643
Belgians at Home, The ... 105
Benson, Robert Hugh; Memorials of ... 428
Betty-all-Alone ... 160
Bible, The Story of Our ... 620
Blake, William, Selections from the Symbolic Poems of ... 572
Book of Answered Prayers, A ... 184
Bramble-Bees and Others ... 183
Breath of Life, The ... 452
Bred of the Desert ... 309
Brown Mouse, A ... 524
Bunte Bilder ... 77
Butterfly Guide, The ... 572
By Right of Sword ... 330
California Padres and Their Missions, The ... 158
Call of the Open, The ... 450
Campaign of 1914 in France and Belgium ... 523
Canada Blackie, Story of ... 547
Cardinal Mercier: His Philosophical and Pastoral Works ... 184
Catechism of the Religious Life ... 21
Catholic as Citizen and Apostle, The, 185; Echoes of America, 185; Historical Review, 48; Reform in the Early 16th Century, The Movement Towards ... 522
Catholicism and Peace ... 185
Catholic's Ready Answer, The ... 234
Cervantes, The Life of ... 235
Chance, The Splendid ... 596
Chaucer, The College, 159; and His Poetry ... 159
Chesterton's "Poems" ... 208
Child's Communion and Prayer Book ... 185
Child's Life of Christ ... 644
Children, The: a Message to Priests, Teachers, Parents ... 476
Citrus Fruits ... 644
Chinese Characters ... 549
Christ of the Men of Art, The ... 258
Christian Unity, The Meaning of ... 523
Church, The, 370; History, Manual of 548; in Many Lands, The ... 309
Church's Opportunity in the Present Crisis ... 405
Closed Doors ... 645
Civilization and Culture ... 476
Cloistered Romance, A ... 158
Coit, Henry Augustus ... 643
College Life: Its Conditions and Problems ... 331
Comedy ... 46
Come Out to Play ... 309
Commento a Giobbe di Giulio di Eclana ... 642
Commentary on the Penitential Psalms ... 131
Commercial Work and Training for Girls ... 476
Compendium Sacræ Liturgiæ, 405; Theologiæ Moralis ... 546
Conduct of Life, The ... 405
Consignes de Guerre ... 260
Contrary Mary ... 104
Conventual Life, The ... 185
Curse of Adam, The, 259; of Castle Eagle, The ... 48
Dante, A Walk in Other Worlds with ... 548
Dante's Divine Comedy ... 182
Darwin and Darwinism ... 185
Daybreak ... 183
Dealer in Empire, A ... 105
Dedications and Patron Saints of English Churches ... 428
De Ethica Naturali ... 474
Der Loder ... 77
Die Exerzitien des Heiligen Ignatius ... 429
Die Leidenswacht ... 332
Die Monroedoktrin ... 260
Doodles ... 184
Dream of Scipio, The ... 76
Eagle of the Empire, The ... 183
Early Christian Church, The, 18; English Hero Tales, 500; New England Schools ... 310
Early Paradise, The ... 184
Eat and Grow Thin ... 131
Edgar Chirrup ... 308
Educating the Child at Home ... 356
Education of the Negro Prior to 1861 ... 258
Emmanuel ... 21
Eirinn, A Boy in ... 619
Elsbeth ... 619
Enemy, The ... 381
Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics ... 500
English Essays and Essayists, The ... 475
Epic, The ... 46
Epistles of St. Paul to the Corinthians, The ... 129
Essays, Political and Historical ... 131
Essentials of English Speech and Literature ... 405
Europe, Western the Making of ... 571
Expansion and Conflict ... 451
Eye Witness's Narrative of the War ... 285
Evolution of a Teacher, The ... 427
Fairyland ... 48
Falconer of God and Other Poems ... 20

PAGE

Famous Days and Deeds in Holland and Belgium ... 236
Fasting and Abstinence ... 357
Favorite Fairy Tales Retold ... 184
Felix O'Day ... 645
Felon's Track, The ... 426
Field Book of Western Wild Flowers ... 499
Fireside Melodies ... 357
Fits and Starts ... 236
Five Fronts ... 260
Florentine Cycle and Other Poems ... 237
Flower of the Field, The ... 185
Forest of Swords, The ... 208
Four Weeks in the Trenches ... 75
France in Danger ... 285
Francis, Father of Aberdeen ... 284
Frederick the Great, The Confessions of ... 19
Freelands, The ... 524
French in the Heart of America, The ... 74
Friar Preacher of Yesterday and Today, The ... 236
Friends and Apostles of the Sacred Heart ... 332
Frühlingsstürms ... 77
German Army in War, The ... 237
German War and Catholicism, The ... 594
Germany's Point of View ... 594
Genevieve ... 619
Getting a Wrong Start ... 160
Giant Tells, The ... 453
Ginevra ... 331
Girl of the Blue Ridge, A ... 208
God of Battles and Other Verses ... 208
Golden Scarecrow, The ... 645
Golden Lights ... 160
Golden Legend, The ... 308
Golgotha ... 160
Gospel of Pain, The ... 185
Grammar of the Greek New Testament, A ... 206
Greek Spirit, The ... 332
Great War, Elements of the ... 523
Green Englishman and Other Stories of Canada, A ... 284
Gregorian Hymns for Benediction ... 429
Grocer Greatheart ... 183
Growth of English Drama, The ... 184
Guiding Star for Young Men ... 185
Guide in the Ways of Divine Love, A ... 549
Happy Pollypooly ... 76
Harbour, The ... 104
Heart of Uncle Terry, The ... 285
Henry Ryecroft, Private Papers of ... 547
Her Majesty the King ... 105
Herrick, Robert, The Poetical Works of ... 522
Hero of the War, A ... 406
High Priestess, The ... 596
Hillsboro People ... 104
Historical Introduction to Ethics, A ... 159
History ... 46
History of the Catholic Church from the Renaissance to the French Revolution ... 45
History of Education ... 17
History of Religions, Introduction to the ... 644
History of Travel in America, A ... 355
Homeric Scenes ... 48
Hepsey Burke ... 475
How to Follow the Mass ... 357
How I Became a Catholic ... 406
Hugh: Memoirs of a Brother ... 102
Ideal Catholic Readers, The ... 501
Il Santo Evangelo Illustrato ... 209
In a French Hospital: Notes of a Nurse ... 428
In der grossen Shicksalstunde ... 77
Indian Today, The ... 306
In God's Army: Commanders-in-Chief ... 476
In Hoc Vince ... 184
Interpretation of History, The ... 380
International Encyclopedia, The New ... 499
In the Land of the Head Hunters ... 21
In the Oregon Country ... 18
In Those Days ... 208
Introduction to the Science of Ethics ... 103
Investigation of Mind in Animals, The ... 452
Irish Nuns at Ypres, The ... 546
Italian Dictionary, An ... 380
Italian Renaissance ... 644
Jaffrey ... 285
Jail Journal of John Mitchel ... 426
James Russell Lowell as a Critic ... 103
Japanese Lyrics ... 208
Jean Baptiste ... 208
Jester, The ... 76
Jesus Christ, The Life of, in the Nez Percé Language ... 379
Joffre, The Life of Gen ... 236
John Huss: His Life and Teachings ... 370
Johnny Appleseed ... 160
Joseph Chamberlain, An Honest Biography ... 595
Josephus ... 21
Journal d'un curé de campagne pendant la guerre ... 379
Juliana Falconieri, St ... 357
"K" ... 475
Keeper of the Door, The ... 48
Lacordaire and Montalembert ... 357
Laird of Glentyre, The ... 619
Land of Delight, The ... 21
Landloper, The ... 453
Lay Apostolate, The ... 185
Les cloches des morts ... 184
Life of Our Lord in Meditations ... 283

PAGE

Light Feet of Goats, The ... 450
Like unto a Merchant ... 48
Limitations of Science, The ... 331
Little Blue Bird ... 184
Little Missionary ... 131
Little Miss Grouch ... 620
Little Brother Who Sits at Home ... 75
Lives of the Popes in the Middle Ages, Innocent III, 1198-1216 ... 306
Louisiana Purchase 1819-1841, The ... 283
Lovable Meddler, The ... 644
Love's Gradatory ... 476
Luther, Vol. IV ... 330
Luke, St., Gospel According to ... 549
Letters on a Elk Hunt ... 620
Lutanist, The ... 644
Mad Knight, The ... 184
Making the Most of One's Mind ... 19
Man Behind the Bars, The ... 235
Man Who Forgot, The ... 105
Manuale Theologiæ Moralis ... 209
Mary, The Mother of God ... 185
Man Who Rocked the Earth, The ... 208
Mary, Why Catholics Honor ... 549
Martin of Tours, St ... 357
Mass, The, 381, ... 571
Mazzuchelli, Memoirs of Father ... 378
Meditations for Layfolk ... 644
Memoirs of Zi Pre ... 21
Memorials of Robert Hugh Benson ... 428
Memories and Milestones ... 283
Men, Not Angels ... 132
Mental Prayer, The Practice of ... 570
Methods of Hearing Holy Mass ... 185
Methods of Teaching in High Schools ... 307
Michael O'Halloran ... 452
Millard Fillmore ... 20
Millionaire, The ... 357
Millstone ... 429
Milton, J. Bailey ... 572
Minnie's Bishop ... 596
Miralda ... 184
Mirror, The ... 21
Missal Gems for Children ... 185
Missions and Missionaries of California, The ... 619
Mighty and the Lowly, The ... 524
Modernist, The ... 596
Money Makers, The ... 620
Monumenta Historica Societatis Jesu ... 260
Most Vital Mission Problem, The ... 428
Municipal Freedom ... 306
Mütterlichkeit ... 260
My Life Out of Prison ... 260
Mystery of Faith, The ... 160
Nations of Europe, The ... 405
Natural Education ... 356
Naval Occasions ... 309
Navy and Sea Power, The ... 331
Need for Art in Life, The ... 104
Negro, The ... 258
New Cosmopolis, The ... 207
New Nation, The ... 451
New Poems ... 499
New World Religion, The ... 132
Nicholas Freydon, The Record of ... 381
Note-Book of an Attaché, The ... 498
Nurse's Story, The ... 524
Nutrition of a Household, The ... 357
Ogilvie, Ven. John, S.J., Life of ... 284
On the Papacy ... 184
Outdoor Sketching ... 357
Page, The Story of Julia ... 620
Panama and Other Poems ... 235
Parents' Guide, The ... 498
Parish Hymnal ... 429
Paris Waits: 1914 ... 75
Pax ... 236
Peggy Mary ... 620
Penelope's Postscripts ... 476
Pentecost of Calamity, The ... 645
Personality of Christ, The ... 404
Petrarch, Some Love Songs of ... 570
Phonetic Method of Hearing Confessions of the Slavic Peoples in Cases of Emergency ... 501 Philosophy and Belief ... 185
Pieces of the Game ... 309
Pierrot: Dog of Belgium ... 21
Pilgrim's Script, A ... 20
Pioneer Laymen of North America ... 102
Poet's Cabinet, A ... 332
Popes and Science, The ... 498
Practical Conduct of Play, The ... 452
Pragmatism and the Problem of the Idea ... 259
Prayers of the Gael ... 620
Prayer ... 620
Prayers for Peace ... 548
Prehistoric Man and His Story ... 183
Pre-Reformation Scholars in Scotland in the XVIth Century ... 282
Prescriptions ... 21
Priesthood and Sacrifices of Our Lord Jesus Christ ... 283
Primary School and Grammar Readers ... 501
Prophets, Priests and Kings ... 547
Protomartyr of Scotland, The ... 284
Pushing to the Front ... 406
Questions of Moral Theology ... 474
Rational Athletics for Boys ... 284

PAGE

Rediscovered Country, The ... 103
Red Laugh, The ... 309
Red Spy, The ... 260
Reflections of a Non-Combatant ... 285
Religious Education in the Family ... 453
Religious Orders of Women in the United States ... 619
Reticence in Literature ... 643
Riddle of the Sands, The ... 48
Rise of the Dutch Kingdom, The ... 46
Road Toward Peace, The ... 130
Roland, The Song of ... 47
Romances of Amosis-Ra, The ... 524
Ruggles of Red Gap ... 76
Russian Literature, An Outline of ... 331
Russian Realities ... 429
Ruysbroeck ... 356
Saints and Saintly Dominicans ... 21
Sanitation in Panama ... 619
Sanpriel ... 75
Satire ... 46
Scarlet Plague, The ... 208
Seal and Flag of the City of New York ... 501
Secret of an Empress, The ... 21
Secrets of the Hohenzollerns, The ... 405
Selected Letters ... 132
Sermon Matter ... 309
Service of the Sacred Heart, The ... 332
Seltsame Lent ... 77
Shakespeare on the Stage ... 18
Shall I Be a Daily Communicant? ... 308
Shall I Be a Priest? ... 185
Shoes of Happiness ... 450
Simple Mass and Communion Book, A ... 357
Sketches in Poland ... 451
Sinners, The Two ... 525
Sleepy Time Story Book ... 309
Smile of Mona Lisa, The ... 331
Sobieski, Life of King John ... 547
Socialism as the Sociological Ideal ... 105
Sœur Thérèse of Lisieux ... 76
Solitaries of the Sambuca ... 158
Some Children of St. Dominic ... 357
Some Textual Difficulties in Shakespeare ... 282
Somewhere in France ... 572
Song, The ... 357
Song of the Lark, The ... 645
Spain, In Sunny ... 619
Spanish Mission Churches of New Mexico ... 595
Spell of Flanders, The ... 183
Spell of Southern Shores, The ... 130
Spiritual Letters of Mgr. Benson ... 102
Stewardship of Faith, The ... 284
Still Jim ... 160
Stories of the Angels ... 453
Stories of Mary Our Heavenly Queen ... 453
Story of a Conversion, The ... 185
Stray Leaves or Traces of Travel ... 309
Sundown Slim ... 260
Sweet Doreen ... 285
Tabular Views of Universal History ... 333
Teeth, The Care of ... 453
Tennis as I Play It ... 427
Thankful's Inheritance ... 427
Thomas Addis Emmet and Robert Emmet ... 157
Thomas Davis, the Thinker and Teacher ... 426
Through a Dartmoor Window ... 643
Tolerance ... 184
Tourists' Maritime Provinces, The ... 260
Tractatus de Christi Ecclesia ... 307
Treasury of Catholic Song ... 429
Types of Teaching ... 307
Under Greek Skies ... 619
Under Which Flag? ... 160
Union and Democracy ... 451
United States, A History of the ... 47
University of Louvain, The ... 357
Untroubled Mind, The ... 357
Unveiling, The ... 332
Vale of Shadows, The ... 450
Valley Road, The ... 620
Vanishing Roads ... 184
Vaughn, The Works of Henry ... 522
Victory ... 75
Vida Popular San Vincente de Paul ... 184
Visions and Revisions ... 19
Vorwärts ... 184
Wales and the Wars of the Roses ... 499
Waiting ... 284
Wanderer, Love of the ... 547
War and the Prophets, The ... 522
War's New Weapons ... 285
Way of These Women, The ... 596
Westminster Version of the Sacred Scriptures. Vol. IV, Part 3, The Apocalypse of St. John ... 129
What Faith Really Means ... 21
What Ought I to Do? ... 75
What Should I Believe? ... 474
What of Today? ... 130
When I Was a Boy in Belgium ... 309
When a Man Comes to Himself ... 21
Who Built the Panama Canal? ... 47
Who Goes There? ... 104
Whole Year Round, The ... 131
Wild Knight, The ... 237
Will to Live, The ... 105
Wit and Wisdom of John Ayscough ... 21
Within the Cloister's Shadow ... 132
Woman Suffrage ... 406
Woman, The Widow ... 547
Women Under Polygamy ... 332
World in the Crucible, The ... 357
World of H. G. Wells, The ... 132
Writing an Advertisement ... 332
Written English ... 548
War, Soul of The, 594; The Great, 595; Lords, The ... 595
Yale Yesterdays ... 283
Young Man's Year, A ... 596

COMMUNICATIONS

Absent ... 635
Absurdities about Mexico ... 122
Americanization Day ... 300
American Missionaries, Few ... 13
American Spelling ... 469
Anglican's Position, An ... 564
Anglican Terminology ... 153
Anglo-Catholics, Sincerity of ... 468
Architecture, of Catholic Institutions, 469; American-Catholic ... 492
Arkansas Not Iowa ... 517
Athletics versus Sport ... 635
Belloc on Wine ... 421
Ben Jonson as a Catholic ... 421
Birth Control: An Open Letter ... 200
"Bishop's" Calumny, A ... 419
Ben Jonson as a Catholic ... 468
Black Death and Equal Pay ... 92
Black List for Motion Pictures ... 421
Boys, What Shall We Do for the? ... 324
Burke, Edmund, 612; Was Burke's Wife a Catholic? ... 636
Capital Punishment in Germany ... 398
Catholic, Apologists, 229; Booking Bureau, 645; Booking Office, A, 565; Boy Scouts, 349, 397, 493; Public Schools, 634; Circulating Libraries, 445; Correspondence School, 150, 226; Press, The, 589, 612; Press, Defects of the, 516, 540; Dailies, A Chain of, 39; Daily, The, 65-66; Evening Schools, 373; Landmarks of San Francisco, 351; Lecture Courses, 150; Publications, Circulating, 125; Subjects, Free Lectures on ... 124
Catholics in the Y. M. C. A., 13, 41, 68, 69, 97, 120, 121, 151, 152, 153; and the Scriptures, 349; Uninstructed ... 150
"C. C." Answered ... 122
Censorship of Films ... 350
Church Music ... 420
Chaplin "Charlie" ... 517
Clubs for Catholic Young Men ... 396
Costly Educational Experiments ... 276
Criticism of Anglicans ... 395
Dangers in the Navy ... 420
Dante, 227 ... 397
Delinquents and Laundries ... 469
Dowson's Conversion ... 67
Educate Our Children, The Right to ... 200
English in Catholic Schools, 399, 445 ... 493
Established Religion in Germany ... 225
Federation's Deficiencies ... 399
Flowers and Funerals, 228, 252, 277, 301, 372, 373, 444 ... 467
For the Sake of Womanhood ... 276
Gothic Vestments, 13 ... 125
Gov. Ferguson and Fair Play ... 123
Governor Opposes Capital Punishment ... 121
Grace Not Information ... 124
Guilday, Dr., and Magna Charta ... 275
Hilaire Belloc Misrepresented ... 398
Holy Name Society, The ... 348
Journal of Opinion, A ... 299
Journalism, Practical Catholic ... 565
Judas and Salvation ... 69
K. of C. and Boys' Club ... 348
Lady Mackenzie's Contribution to Science ... 148
Large Families of the Poor ... 492
Liberty, What Is? ... 516
Ludicrous Anarchronism, A, 11 ... 37
Magna Charta, The Latin Interpretation of ... 300
Metamorphosed Russian, The ... 67
Middle Ages, Understanding the ... 201
Modern Friar and Prior M'Nabb, A ... 252
Moving-Pictures, Why no Protest? ... 492
Mrs. Nickleby and the Crozer Professor ... 277
Navy, Dangers in the ... 564
New Theater, The ... 252
Pankhurst, Mrs. in Paris ... 517
Papal Elections and the Veto ... 227
Paris Clubs for Young Men ... 373
Pope, Ignoring the ... 613
Purgatorial Hymn, A ... 613
Progress in Gotham ... 325
Prohibition, 66, 67, 149, 150, 176, 199, 226, 227; vs. Temperance, 12, 13, 39, 94, 95, 96, 97 ... 125
Protest, A (Anglican) ... 350
Protestantism of a Belgian, The ... 349
"Raffle for Souls," The ... 126
Reply to "An Anglican's Position" ... 636
Repplier Miss, and Hilaire Belloc ... 443
Riddle, A ... 492
San Francisco, Landmarks of ... 228
Saving the Boy ... 151
Schools in the Philippines, 150 ... 253
Shakespeare's Heroines, 253, 325, 399; Religion ... 325
Socratic Salvation ... 397
Some Problems of the "Defenders of Liberty" ... 176
South America's Catholicism ... 64
Time of Death, The, 37 ... 38
Unification of Catholic Clubs ... 276
Vaudeville, 93 ... 225
Votes for Women ... 468
Wasted Money ... 176
Woman's Place ... 541
Woman Suffrage, 444 ... 637
"Watson's" Tom, Papers ... 612
Ye of Little Faith ... 177
Young Man and the Navy, The ... 351
Y. M. C. A., A Call for Action ... 493

EDUCATION

Bondage of Liberty ... 358
Case Method in Law and Morals, The ... 382
Catholic Educational Association Convention, 333; Summer School, The, 185; Lectures Feasible, Are? 78; Students and Protestant Chapels ... 645
Competition and Cooperation ... 597
Disciple of McMurry, A ... 161
Educational Legislation ... 209
Efficiency of Catholic Schools (Subject of "Bells" ... 502
Government Educational Work in China, 406, 430
High Winds in Chicago ... 525
Irish Christian Brothers ... 528
Ibsen in the Class Room ... 453
Inflated Verbal Currency ... 22
In the Matter of Spelling ... 261
Introducing Mr. Henry Herring ... 310
Jeanne d'Arc Club, The ... 49
More Paganism in The Schools ... 549
Muckraking the Public Schools ... 133
Normal School Psychology ... 477
Religious Instruction and the Public School ... 621
School Children's Health, 106; Schoolgirl, The, In Old New England ... 573
University Extension Work in Massachusetts 237
Woman's Educational Exhibit, The ... 285
Vacation Bible Schools ... 528

ECONOMICS

Pan-American Financial Conference, The ... 407
Psychology of Social Rest, The ... 431
Unemployment ... 334
War and the Falling Birthrate ... 598

LITERATURE

"American Thought" ... 233
Beardsley, On Aubrey and Others ... 449
Belloc, Hilaire ... 377
Burke, Edmund ... 521
Children's Books ... 593
Chesterton, Mr. G. K. "Orthodoxy" ... 181
Dante's Six Hundred and Fiftieth Birthday ... 156
English Literature, A Curiosity of ... 403
Ernest Dowson ... 17
Fishers and Fish ... 543
How to Reach the Medieval Mind ... 129
Hobbes, John Oliver ... 569
Hello, Ernest ... 329
Hearn, Lafcadio ... 73
Maturin, Works of Father ... 257
Mexico's Poet of the Home ... 281
Neo-Celts, The ... 497
O'Reilly, John Boyle ... 425
Patmore, Coventry ... 473
Pessimism and Mr. Hardy ... 641
Poesy and Prohibition ... 305
"Quotes," Italics and Parentheses ... 101
Rabindranath Tagore ... 355
Rossetti, Dante Gabriel ... 617
Shakespeare's Heroines, 205; Shakespeare, Was He a Catholic ... 44

NOTE AND COMMENT

Academic Degrees, New ... 456
Academic Freedom ... 239
Adams and Jefferson on the Jesuits ... 312
Advertising Men as Preachers ... 312
"All the News That's Fit to Print" ... 264
American Seminarians for the Foreign Missions ... 287
An American Kikuyu ... 648
Angels of Mons ... 624
Annual Convention of Catholic Federation ... 383
Anti-Catholic Paper Loses in Suit ... 187

	PAGE
Archbishop Quigley, A Tribute to the Late	408
Australasia, Reception of First Apostolic Delegate to	24
Beginning of Christianity in Canada	360
Bigot in Office, A	456
Birth Control	212
"Bishop" Burt, A Protestant Rebuke for	188
"Bishop" Herford	408
Brosnahan, Father, Timothy, S.J., Death of	240
Caldey Convert, Brother Mardon A	575
Canadian Eucharistic Congress	136
Capital Punishment in Illinois	136
Catholic Circulating Libraries, 384; Clubs, 408; Colleges, Honors for, 51; Colleges Win in Oratorial Contest, 80, 187; Conventions in August, 407; Literature in Anti-Catholic Communities, 163; Parochial Schools, A Tribute to the, 108; Statistics in England and Wales, 335; Student Wins Oratorical Contest, 135; University's Silver Tribute, The, 51; Laymen's Guild, A, 360; and American Citizenship, 288; in Practical Social Work	52
Chesterton's Imitators	600
China and Rome	576
Charity and Thanksgiving Day	456
Churchman and Rome, The	432
Clean Films for the "Movies"	312
College Students, Automobiles	312
Colton, Bishop, Dead	136
Coming Catholic Congresses	51
Conaty, Bishop, Dead	600
Confusing News About the Vatican	431
Copus, Rev. John E. S. J., Death of	264
Cost of Living, The	288
Dogma is not Theory	384
Dooley, Rev. William, S.J., Death of	360
Dumont, Rev. Dr., Death of	164
Earliest Mentioned Nurse, The	212
Ebro Observatory at Tortosa, The	264
Eddy, Mrs. A Monument to	366
Education for the Home	187
Empty Pews	552
Encouraging School Report, An	432
England's Catholic Soldiers	648
European War, Some Consequences of the	188
Family Difficulties in Court	287
Farcical Censorship of Motion Pictures	408
France, The Best Citizens in	51
French and Belgian Priests, A Tribute to	456
Gavisk, Father, President of the National Charities Conference	187
German Jesuits in India	600
Gibbons, Cardinal, and the Suffragettes	336
Golden Jubilee of the Rev. Charles Coppens, S.J.	648
Health and Literature	600
High School Curriculum, The Overloaded	135
Honor System in Colleges, The	51
Improper Employment of Children	239
Jesuit of Fiction, The	264
Jesuits as the Living Church Sees Them	288
Josefinas	552
Kikuyu Controversy Again	212
Langevin, Archbishop, Death of	288
Lasting Peace, The Way to a	384
Laws Not Enforced	187
League to Enforce Peace	552
Lessons in Decency	52
Lorenzelli, Cardinal, Dead	600
Maes, Bishop, Death of	164
Man in Relation to the State	288
Marra, Rev. Joseph, S.J., Death of	24
Masses on All Souls' Day	624
Martha, Sister, Death of	312
Maturin, Rev. Father; Last Sermon in America, 108; Drowns on the Lusitania, 136; Requiem for	240
Men Communicants, Too Few	212
Methodism's First Pope	108
Mexican Artist-Priest, A	359
Mexico, American Losses in	456
Mixed Marriages	336
Modern Press, The	336
Moral Education in Schools	456
Moral Nastiness, Discussion of	52
Mothers' Pension Law, The	80
Motives for Backsliding	432
Moultrie, Rev. A., Converted in England	383
"Movies" and Morals	432
Native Americans Striking Their Colors	408
Negligent Parents	211
Newman and Huxley	576
New York Board of Health Bulletin	648
New York Catholics and Secondary Education	108
Non-Catholics and Catholic Philosophy	312
Notable Mission Records	432
Objectionable Motion Picture Films	384
"Old Maid," An	51
Old Paganism Taking New Forms	163
Pacifism and Humbugs	336
Panama Exposition, Moral Conditions at	623
Pagan Styles for Women	136
Parental Obligations	264
Parochial School, The Fundamental Purpose of the, 52; and Society	239
"Pastor" Russell's Sermons	80
Persecution of Men of Science by Church	576
Phelan, Rev. David, Death of	624
Pilgrimages and Sacred Relics	188
Play, A Most Objectionable	455
Political Intolerance in Pennsylvania	624
Pope and Poland, The, 360; and Prisoners of War	552
Priests in the Italian Army	360
Priests of Paris, Zeal of the	164
Prison Discipline	599
Private Charities, Critics of	212
Protestant Ministers in Politics	240
Protestant Missionaries in the Philippines	552
Protestations of Loyalty Overdone	211
Public School Exercises in Churches	240
Purity Congress, The	432
Quigley, Archbishop, Death of	360
Race Suicide	164
Rationalism of Union Theological Seminary	136
Responsibility for the War	383
Revelations at Annapolis	384
Saloon, The Decline of the	188
Scanlon, Bishop, Death of	164
School Problems Concerning Morals	24
Secularizing Christianity	239
Sewell, Rev. J. D. W., S.J., Dead at Madras	24
Spectator and Papal Infallibility, The	163
Spelling, The Educational Value of	108
Spiritual Grasshoppers	336
Stage Fright	80
Stage Today, The	212
St. Joseph's Lithuanian Roman Catholic Association of Labor	648
Suffragist Cause, Progress of the	312
Strange Advice from a Former Priest	552
Statue of Joan of Arc for N. Y	552
Successful Catholic Orators	288
Syria, Thrifty Missionaries to	24
Twilight Sleep	360
Universality of Genius, The	384
Universal Reform Through Legislation	80
War a Benefit to Russia	80
Vannutelli, Cardinal	504
War and Missions	599
War Sympathies in the Schools	599
War, The Pity and Horrors of	188
War Topics	336
White Plague, The	336
Zanzibar Excommunicates Hereford	164

SOCIOLOGY

	PAGE
"A Bag of Stick Candy	79
All Work and No Money	107
Annual Conference of the St. Louis Catholic Charities	162
Capital Punishment	455
Catholic Boys' Protective League, The, 311; Federation Convention, 503; Women's League for Social and Civic Reform	286
Conscious Birth Restriction	210
Central Verein Convention	478
Convent Inspection	238
Faculty, A Neglected (Catholic Schools of Sociology)	526
Fatal Fondness for Food, The	262
Indian Problem, The	186
Industrial Commission, Margaret O'Connor and the	574
Molten Calves and Modern Prophets	550
Prisons and Prisoners: Construction vs. Destruction	382
Religious Order, A New	134
Prison of the Knave of Hearts, the	622
Recent Rulings on the Catholic Indian Schools, A	359
Sectarian Legislation in Massachusetts	23
Tannhauser and Radical Feminism	50

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XIII, No. 1
WHOLE No. 314

APRIL 17, 1915

PRICE 10 CENTS
$3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE

The War: Bulletin, April 6, p. m.-April 13, a. m.—French Success at Les Eparges—Russian Advance in the Carpathians — Germany's Note of Protest—Other Items. Austria-Hungary: Peace Rumors. France: Jesuits in the French Army. Germany: Internal Condition of Germany. Great Britain: Alcohol and the War. Ireland: List of Irish Martyrs. Mexico: New Witnesses—An Important Letter.....1-4

TOPICS OF INTEREST

Our National Nerves—"Ireland, Nurse of Heroes" — Present-Day Fiction — The Douay Bible—An Answer.....5-11

COMMUNICATIONS

"Ludicrous Anachronism"—Temperance vs. Prohibition—Catholics in the Y. M. C. A.—Gothic Vestments—Few American Missionaries...11-13

EDITORIALS

The Holy Father's Congratulations—The Patriots Again—Indecency vs. Good Taste—A College President's Reading—"Ye of Little Faith"—Was it "Fit to Print"?—Does It Pay?..14-16

LITERATURE

Ernest Dowson.

REVIEWS: History of Education — Shakespere on the Stage—In the Oregon Country—The Early Christian Church—Poems—The Confessions of Frederick the Great—Making the Most of One's Mind—Visions and Revisions—Millard Fillmore—The Falconer of God and Other Poems—A Pilgrim's Scrip.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: The "Annuario Pontificio" for 1915—Studies—"When a Man Comes to Himself"—"Pierrot, Dog of Belgium"—"The Land of Delight"—"The Secret of an Empress"—"Catechism of the Religious Life"—"What Faith Really Means" — "Memoirs of Zi Pre" — "Polemic Chat"—"The Wit and Wisdom of John Ayscough"—"Saints and Saintly Dominicans"—"Josephus"—"The Mirror" — "In the Land of the Head-Hunters"—"Prescriptions"—"Emmanuel" 17-21

EDUCATION

Inflated Verbal Currency.....22, 23

SOCIOLOGY

Sectarian Legislation in Massachusetts....23, 24

NOTE AND COMMENT

School Problems Concerning Morals—Reception of the First Apostolic Delegate to Australasia—Death of the Reverend Joseph Marra, S.J.—Thrifty Missionaries to Syria—Father J. D. W. Sewell, S.J., Dead at Madras.....24

CHRONICLE

The War.—Apart from the shelling of Reims and the resumption of an unsuccessful offensive in the Champagne region by the Germans, and some local successes by the Belgians along the Yser, which, however, have been neutralized by counter successes by the Germans in the same district, the only thing of importance which has taken place along the western battle line has been the bloody fighting between the Meuse and the Moselle. Both sides admit that many severe engagements have resulted in severe losses in men, but for the rest it is difficult to reconcile the reports from Paris and Berlin. It seems to be undoubted, however, that the advantage has been with the French. They have made repeated attacks on the two sides of the St. Mihiel triangle, in both cases with success. They have taken from the Germans Les Eparges, an important point on the line that runs north from St. Mihiel toward Verdun. This place, which dominates the plains of the Woevre, is one more of the isolated strategic points which the French have been winning of late at great cost, presumably in preparation for the general attack on the German line that has been so often predicted. Starting from Flirey also, about midway between St. Mihiel and Pont-à-Mousson, they have gained considerable territory. Further south, some six miles from St. Mihiel, they have made vigorous attacks on the German lines at Apremont, but apparently have been unable to make any very great impression.

Bulletin, April 6, p. m.-April 13, a. m.

French Success at Les Eparges

The Russians are continuing their slow but steady progress in the Carpathians. In spite of very severe losses they are constantly bringing up heavy reinforcements, and as far as can be judged from conflicting dispatches seem to be driving back the Austrians yard by yard. Last week they reported the capture of Smolnik, and of the Rostok pass, but these advantages have not yet produced any radical change in the situation. Whatever territory they have gained has been on the Galician side of the mountains and to the west of the Uzsok pass, which is still in the hands of the Austrians. The fighting that has taken place in Mezo Laborcz valley, on the Hungarian side of the Carpathians, has resulted, according to reports from Vienna, only in great sacrifices of men for Russia. The very nature of the ground in the mountains, with its seven feet of snow and its deep gorges and high ridges, makes progress by either side extremely difficult. The Russians in particular seem to have decided not to try to force their way down the Hungarian slopes until they have driven the Austrians from the Uzsok pass. This they have failed so far to do, although they report that on one occasion they succeeded in advancing from Smolnik to within four miles of this important pass. The main Russian effort appears at present to be centered on taking the mountain-gates east of the Uzsok pass. Indeed, it has been said, though without official confirmation, that the Austrian line has already been pierced at the Vereckze pass. Both Austria and Russia claim to have captured thousands of the enemy.

Russian Advance in the Carpathians

Germany has sent to the United States another note reiterating her former complaint against the policy of the United States in allowing the sale of arms and munitions to the Allies, while at the same time submitting to the Allies' interference with the trade of the United States with Germany. The occasion of the German note was the publication during the week of the official reply made by the United States to Great Britain's Order-in-Council, in which Mr. Bryan denied the right assumed by Great Britain to blockade neutral ports, and after declaring that our Government would hold the British responsible for every injury inflicted, expressed the hope that the blockade would not be enforced in such a way as to put unnecessary restrictions on neutral trade. Germany is indignant over the tone of our note, and characterizes our treatment of the subject as wanting in the spirit of neutrality. She points out that the American Government insists on its right to ship arms to belligerents among the Allies, but does not equally insist on its right to ship food to civilians in Germany. The Government of the United States has not yet replied to this complaint.

Germany's Note of Protest

In reply to the United States' demand for damages for the loss sustained by the owners of the William Frye, the German Government has signified its readiness to make compensation according to special agreements existing between Germany and the United States, but has reserved the right to investigate the matter in her own courts and to decide for herself on the justice of the claim and the amount to be paid. The method of fixing the damages is not altogether satisfactory to our Government.

Other Items

The success of Captain Thierichens, who interned the Prinz Eitel Friedrich last week, after failing to take advantage of the snow-storm which gave him his one chance of getting away from Hampton Roads, has been paralleled, if not surpassed, by a still younger German officer. Captain Thierfelder sailed out of New York harbor on August 3, in command of the Kronprinz Wilhelm. He armed his ship with guns taken from the British steamer La Correntina, which he captured; roved unharmed over many seas for eight months; sunk fifteen ships belonging to the Allies; took more than a thousand captives; got into communication with the Prinz Eitel Friedrich, and by diverting the attention of the British warships toward himself, enabled his sister ship to enter the American port; and finally, when forced by disease, lack of coal and water, ran through a whole cordon of the enemies' warships and reached Hampton Roads in safety, where he will probably intern. During all that period he did not take a single human life, nor was his ship struck more than once; and yet he either seized or destroyed property belonging to the Allies to the amount of $7,000,000. His story reads like a tale of the corsairs of old.

Austria-Hungary.—Persistent rumors obtain that Austria is seeking for a separate peace with Russia. Little more can be said than that there has been no confirmation of these latest reports, while successive rumors in the past have proved false. The statement of the Bourse Gazette of Petrograd, that Austria has sought peace with her enemies through the Vatican, was officially denied in the Osservatore Romano. On April 4 an official denial on the part of Austria of all such rumors was sent to the Austro-Hungarian Embassy at Washington. The dispatch from Vienna reads:

Peace Rumors

> The London Morning Post has published a report according to which Austria-Hungary has begun to make overtures to Russia for a separate peace. The entire story in the Morning Post is a pure invention. Austria-Hungary has made no overtures for peace.

Count Andrassy has similarly denied the reports of a separate peace with Hungary. Up to this not the slightest evidence has been given of the truth of any of these rumors about Austria's desire for peace. The Giornale d'Italia warns its readers against these rumors which it believes have been started "in order to hasten the entry of neutral countries into the war for fear lest they might come too late." The two opposing armies, it argues, are not yet so unequal in strength that either need despair of bringing about an honorable, if not a triumphant, termination of the war. It adds that the bond uniting Germany and Austria is particularly strong.

France.—A recent communication gives the exact number of Jesuits in the service of the French army as 498. Still more were to be called to the colors at the time of the writing. Of 206 priests included in this figure 48 are military chaplains, 90 stretcher bearers or Red Cross men and 68 armed soldiers. Of the 227 scholastics in the army 56 are in the Red Cross service or stretcher bearers and 171 are armed soldiers. The remnant consists of 65 lay brothers, of whom 55 are under arms. From the beginning of the war until toward the early part of March 49 were wounded, of whom 10 died; 23 were made prisoners, of whom 2 died and 4 (army chaplains) were released; 6 are missing. The total number of those killed or dead of their wounds is 28. The distinction of the Légion d'Honneur was conferred upon 4, the médaille militaire upon 3, while 19 have been cité à l'ordre du jour. From a number of instances of heroism we quote the account given of Father de Gironde in the Journal Officiel:

Jesuits in the French Army

> A priest in civil life. Joined the regiment as a reservist soldier. Soon became a devoted assistant of his commanders and a friend of his comrades, counselling, sustaining and comforting them. Always volunteered for any delicate or perilous undertaking. By his daring succeeded in bringing accurate accounts of the enemy. Named corporal September 8, 1914; decorated with the médaille militaire September 30; promoted sergeant October 16, second lieutenant November 26. He was mortally wounded, December 7, in a trench, while going to pray over the bodies of two soldiers of his company.

Such are the men whose patriotism an atheistic Government could calmly call into question. Meant for the services of mercy and consecrated to the salvation of souls, the Jesuit soldier has not refused the task the country imposed upon him.

Germany.—A stupendous municipal enterprise has been undertaken by the city of Berlin in the midst of the great world conflict. A sum of 130,000,000 marks has been unanimously appropriated by the municipal council for the purpose of purchasing the street car system and assuring cheaper electricity for the citizens. The suburb of Schöneberg is at the same time expending a large sum for the extension of its underground lines. Furthermore the building of a new underground line which is to connect the northern with the southern part of Berlin has just now been taken in hand. Equally significant of the financial strength of the country is the rapid payment of the war loan. By April 9 the total actual payment had reached the amount of 4,640,000,000 marks, more than half the amount subscribed, although only thirty per cent. of this loan falls due by April 14. Despite these heavy payments the banks have increased their loans only 44,000,000 marks, which goes to show that the payments have been made mostly from cash on hand. It is clear, therefore, that Germany's financial and economic soundness is beyond question. According to the Weekly Report of the American Association of Commerce and Trade at Berlin, the gold reserve of the Reichsbank on March 15 amounted to 2,315,895,000 marks. This at the time was an increase of 22,281,000 marks as compared with March 6. Judging from the German papers it is difficult to impress upon the people the need of conserving food products and adhering strictly to the military regulations in their household arrangements. The table of food prices now and before the war, as given in the above report, shows that, bacon excepted, meat prices have in no case risen more than one per cent. per pound. The highest price of the various kinds of meat quoted is 25 cents per pound. Milk and butter remain normal. The greatest increase is recorded in the price of potatoes. Measures have, however, been taken to make the next crop a record one, as far as human foresight can accomplish this. Wherever there is a square of land it has been rented out at almost nominal terms, easily payable on instalments, under the conditions that the crop is to be largely of potatoes. The growth of vegetables has been similarly encouraged. The Government confiscation of flour and grain, with the view of properly distributing it through official channels, safeguards the supply until the next harvest, since the weekly amount of bread represents the result of a careful investigation. No fear is therefore entertained, by the Government or the people, of starving Germany into surrender.

Internal Condition of Germany

Ireland.—The following are the Irish martyrs, exclusive of the fourteen prelates mentioned elsewhere, the introduction of whose cause for beatification has received the formal sanction of the Holy See, addressed to Archbishop Walsh of Dublin. The classification follows the order set forth in the Decree:

List of Irish Martyrs

Secular Clergy:

Eugene Cronin, Laurence O'Moore, Richard French, Aeneas Power, John O'Grady, Maurice O'Kenraghty, Andrew Stritch, Bernard Moriarty, John Stephens, Walter Tiernan, George Power, Vicar General; John Walsh, Vicar General; Nicholas Young, Daniel O'Moloney, Donough O'Cronin, cleric; John O'Kelly, Brian Murchertagh, Donough O'Falvey, Bernard O'Carolan, Donatus MacCried, Patrick O'Derry, John Lune; Patrick O'Loughran, Ludovicus O'Laverty, Philip Cleary, Henry White, Theobald Stapleton, Edward Stapleton, Thomas Morrisey, Thomas Bath, Roger Ormilius, Hugh Carrigi, Bernard Fitzpatrick, Daniel Delany, Daniel O'Brien, James Morchu and James O'Hegarty. Order of Premonstratensians: John Kieran or Mulcheran. Order of Cistercians: Gelasius O'Cullenan, Nicholas Fitzgerald, the Prior and his companion members of Holy Saviour; Patrick O'Connor, Malachy O'Connor, the Abbot and Monks of the Monastery of Magia; Eugene O'Gallagher, Bernard O'Treivir, James Eustace, Malachy Shiel, Edmund Mulligan and Luke Bergin. Order of Preachers: P. MacFerge with his companions, thirty-two religious of the Monastery of Londonderry; John O'Luin, Wm. MacGollen, Peter O'Higgins, Cormac MacEgan, Raymond Keogh, Richard Barry, John O'Flaverty, Gerald Fitzgerald, David Fox, Donald O'Neaghten, James O'Reilly, Dominick Dillon, Richard Overton, Stephen Petit, Peter Costello, William Lynch, Myles McGrath, Laurence O'Ferral, Bernard O'Ferral, Ambrose Aeneas O'Cahill, Edmund O'Beirne, James Woulf, Vincent G. Dillon, James Moran, Donatus Niger, William O'Connor, Thomas O'Higgins, John O'Cullen, David Roche, Bernard O'Kelly, Thaddeus Moriarty, Hugh MacGoill, Raymond O'Moore, Felix O'Connor, John Keating, Clement O'Callaghan, Daniel MacDonnel, Felix MacDonnel and Dominick MacEgan. Order of St. Francis: Conor Macuarta, Roger Congaill, Fergallus Ward, Edmund Fitzsimon, Donough O'Rourke, John O'Louchran, Cornelius O'Rorke, Thaddeus or Thomas O'Daly, John O'Dowd, Daniel O'Neilan, Philip O'Lea, Maurice O'Scanlon, Daniel Himrecan, Charles MacGoran, Roger O'Donnellan, Peter O'Quillan, Patrick O'Kenna, James Pillauns, Roger O'Hanlon, Phelin O'Hara, Henry Delahoyde, Thaddeus O'Meran, John O'Day, Donatus O'Hurley, John Cornelius, Dermitius O'Mulroney, Brother Thomas and his companion, John O'Molloy, Cornelius O'Dougherty, Galridius O'Farrel, Thaddeus O'Boyle, Patricius O'Brady, Mattheus O'Leyn, Terence Magennis, Lochlonin Mac O'Cadha, Magnus O'Fodhry, Thomas Fitzgerald, John Honan, John Cathan, Francis O'Mahony, Hilary Conroy, Christopher Dunleavey, Richard Butler, James Saul, Bernard O'Horumley, Richard Synott, John Esmond, Paulinus Synott, Raymund Stafford, Peter Stafford, Didacus Cheevers, Joseph Rochford, Eugene O'Leman, Francis Fitzgerald, Anthony Museaus, Walter de Wallis, Nicholas Wogan, Denis O'Neilan, Philip Flasberry, Francis O'Sullivan, Jeremiah de Nerihiny, Thaddeus O'Caraghy, William Hickey, Roger O'Mara, Hugh MacKeon, Daniel Clanchy, Neilan Loughran, Anthony O'Farrel, Antony Broder, Eugene O'Cahan, John Ferall, Bonaventure de Burgo, John Kearney and Bernard Connaeus. Order of St. Augustine: Thaddeus O'Connel, Austin Higgins, Peter Taaffe, William Tirrey, Donatus O'Kennedy, Donatus Serenan, Fulgentius Jordan, Raymond, O'Malley, Thomas Tullis and Thomas Deir. Carmelite Order: Thomas Aquinas of Jesus, Angelus of St. Joseph and Peter of the Mother of God. Order of the Blessed Trinity: Cornelius O'Connor and Eugene O'Daly. Society of Jesus: Edmund MacDaniell, Dominick O'Collins, William Boyton, Robert Netterville and John Bath. Laymen and Noblemen: William Walsh, Oliver Plunkett, Daniel Sutton, John Sutton, Robert Sherlock, Matthew Lamport, Robert Myler, Christopher Roche, Edward Cheevers, John O'Lahy, Patrick Canavan, Patrick Hayes, Daniel O'Hannan, Maurice Eustace, Robert Fitzgerald, Walter Eustace, Thomas Eustace, Christopher Eustace, William Wogan, Walter Aylmer, Thaddeus Clancy, Peter Meyler, Michael Fitzsimmons, Patrick Browne, Thomas MacCreith, John de Burgo, Brian O'Neil, Arthur O'Neil, Roderick O'Kane, Alexander MacSorley, Francis Tailler, Hugh MacMahon, Cornelius Maguire, Donatus O'Brien, James O'Brien, Bernard O'Brien, Daniel O'Brien, Dominick Fanning, Daniel O'Higgin, Thomas Stritch, Louis O'Ferral, Galfridius Galway, Patrick Purcell, Theobald de Burgo, Galfridius Baronius, Thaddeus O'Connor Sligo; John O'Connor, Bernard MacBriody, Felix O'Neil and Edward Butler. Women: Eleonora Birmingham, Elizabeth Kearney, Marguerite de Cashel, Brigid Darcy, Honoria de Burgo, Honoria Magan.

Mexico.—The chaos which still obtains in Mexico has had the effect of unsealing lips that were hitherto silent. The last to issue a statement is José Castellot, past sovereign grand commander of the "Scottish Rite" Masons. According to him the revolutionists have committed "crimes and excesses almost unparalleled"; revolution itself "has degenerated into the worst form of anarchy, whose end no one can predict, nor tell the excess to which these passions will go, passions madly struggling for supremacy in evil and the privilege of excelling in the destruction of the country." A passage of supreme interest is as follows:

New Witnesses

> I do not hesitate to-day to condemn and to demand punishment for the unspeakable outrages perpetrated against a number of Roman Catholic priests and nuns, the looting of their treasures (sic), the profanation of their temples, the ravishing of their bodies and the desecration of their most sacred objects.

As usual, the past sovereign grand master blames the Church for Mexico's ills. After a puerile description of the Church's supposed power and wealth, built up, it would appear, by a mysterious but noble woman, who was deceived by the confessional, allured by promises of reward hereafter, led by obedience, flattered "with the glory of charity and good works," and so on, he says significantly:

> At that time I was honored by being chosen to the first Magistracy of Mexican Masonry, and invested with the high post of Sovereign Commander of the Supreme Council of the Scottish Rite, an old and accepted order in the Mexican Republic. To this circumstance, and particularly through being in constant touch with President Diaz, himself a member of the same Supreme Council, I owe the fact of being familiar with all the inner history of events which have since transpired. At this point Masonry laid the foundation of its patriotic and disinterested work, in open fight, as was to be expected, against the powerful interests (the Church is mentioned as one) already created.

Proceeding, he states that masonry tried to induce Diaz to prepare the presidential succession, and thereby the new political life of the country, a task which might have been accomplished without serious consequences under his skilful guidance, coupled with the ungrudging support always given him by our people (the masons). . . . And yet the Church is responsible for Mexico's woes!

The following letter from Mr. John F. Barry to the Editor of America presents an interesting view of prevalent conditions beyond the Rio Grande:

An Important Letter

I have just arrived from Mexico City on the only train which has run out of that city to the United States border in six weeks. It took us ten days to make the trip which in normal times takes but two days. We had to lay over for days at different points: Toluca, Acambaro, Celaya, Irapuato, Aguascalientes, waiting for trains to continue our journey; this gave us an excellent opportunity of seeing for ourselves how things were in the various sections controlled by the various leaders of the robber bands which to-day are wreaking untold havoc on their unfortunate country.

It is difficult to write about the condition of affairs in the unfortunate republic south of the Rio Grande without appearing to the casual reader as an alarmist, a user of intemperate language, an exaggerator of the truth, or worse. Americans living in the sheltered seclusion of the United States, enjoying all the guarantees which an enlightened civilization confers on society, can not realize what the so-called "Revolutionists" are doing in Mexico. It is hard to believe that men, calling themselves civilized, could be capable of the atrocities that are a daily, one might say an hourly, occurrence, and I most earnestly ask you to believe me when I say that the condition of affairs at present prevailing in that country can not be exaggerated, that they are all and worse than has been written of them, that no man's life (be he foreigner or native), no woman's honor, is safe.

It is not the people of Mexico who are committing these unspeakable atrocities, it is not the people who have outraged nuns and other respectable women, who have sacked the churches, who use the houses of God for stabling their horses and the sacred vestments of the priests for their saddle blankets; it is not the people of Mexico who are the "Revolution," it is less than three per cent. of the fifteen and one-half millions. The people of Mexico, the masses whom the Revolution was originally intended to save, to emancipate, have been the greatst sufferers from the past four years of disturbance. It is the poor who are starving, who have no work, who are ground down beneath the flood of "decrees" issued by each succeeding revolutionary chief on the occupation of the various cities. It is the men of the people who are forced into the ranks of the revolutionists at the point of the rifle, leaving their women at the mercy of the next band of bandits who chance that way.

When I left Mexico City it was in a wretched condition. The city was without lights, the people were on the verge of absolute starvation. Butter, milk, wheaten bread, charcoal were not to be found. A small supply of articles of first necessity was arriving daily from Toluca, and this was doled out sparingly to the people. But since then General Villa, for reasons of his own, ordered the complete suspension of all railroad traffic into or out of the capital, and what is the condition of the 10,000 foreigners and half-a-million Mexicans in the capital at the present moment can be better imagined than described. God help them! One thing is certain; that is, that the actual conditions there will not be given to the American people, unless some individual succeeds in getting through the cordon of Zapatistas and Villistas which surround the city in the same manner that I did. What has struck me most since I arrived in the United States is the extraordinary lack of knowledge, or rather apathy, as to the actual conditions in Mexico of the vast majority of Americans. In the course of a few short weeks Mexico is destined to bulk largely in the eyes of the American people; the country is in the most complete anarchy everywhere; law, justice, the Constitution, liberty have been flung aside by Carranzistas, Villistas, Zapatistas, Gutierristas, Obregonistas . . . . and the people are on the brink of absolute famine. Within two months the total food supply available will have become exhausted, and Mexico will throw herself upon the charity of the entire world.

TOPICS OF INTEREST

Our National Nerves

WHEN Doctor Eugene Fiske, director of hygiene at the New York Life Institute, stated his belief that the European immigrant is physically the superior of the native American and that, but for him, our vital statistics would present a shoddy appearance indeed, he hardly created a surprise but certainly a stir. We had been closing our mind to what our eye could not but see. Mr. Fiske forced both wide open.

About fifty per cent. of our men, he opined, would have to be rejected in a physical examination for life insurance or military service. Naturally "nerves" are adjudged the cause of this extreme debility. Huge business demands and unremitting social pace have played havoc with our national spinal-cord. As a people, we are tottering with premature age. To relieve this sorry condition, several social physicians make haste again to prescribe the "Simple Life." It will be recollected that this celebrated panacea, first advocated some years ago by Pastor Wagner of Paris and subsequently approved by Theodore Roosevelt, fell into desuetude almost as quickly as it soared into prominence. Like Icarus of the ancient fable, it had flown too high, and the hot sun of public comment melted the wax of its wings. But evidently the crash did not kill. New pinions are now being fashioned. The panacea bids fair to fly again.

For, what with Doctor Fiske's darkly significant observation and the wave of agitation which is now seething over the globe, our countrymen are once more sighing for a soothing lack of complexity in daily affairs and for some means whereby to bring simplicity about. Here in the United States, where the Dove of Peace still finds a precious though precarious tarrying-spot, an appreciation of the need and blessedness of calm is perhaps stronger than elsewhere. Our brethren across the sea wax too busy in mutual strife to bother about the racial harm of too much business. Later on, however, when they shall have had a satiety of calamity, their interest in the subject of national neuremia will likely exceed ours.

Now is the acceptable time for us, so restless and so associated with nations that seem to have gone stark mad, earnestly to search for the real method of untying this knotty problem of "nerves." If we discover it, we can set turbulent mankind a luminous example by adopting it. The Simple Life, however, is a remedy more meretricious than meritorious. For proof of this, the panacea's brief history of popularity and disfavor may be urged. If long life evinces a theory's worth, the Simple Life would appear worthless, its span was but a day. No one cares absolutely to decry a scheme which, like this one, boasts the quality of beauty. Every one, nevertheless, must concede that the adjectives "impracticable" and "incomplete," as applied to Pastor Wagner's hobby, constitute a criticism at once kindly and correct.

The Simple Life is an attractive notion. But, like nearly all other moderately conceived ideas, it may be likened to a golden ray dropped from that ever elusive, intangible, and sparkling millennium by which the mind's eye has been dazzled so long and for which we have of late years been so strenuously—not to say stumblingly—making chase. Doubtless one reason why this world of wishes floats as far above us to-day as ever, is that the very means with which we try to grasp it push it away. Who would be so fatuous as to pursue a toy-balloon with a pitch-fork? But it is with comparatively such that we have been striving to secure our ideals. Our theories of reform bear the coarse brand of materialism; and yet we expect them to gain for us in fullest measure the immaterial prizes of equity, justice, peace, etc. All our modern devices, aiming as they do at merely natural and materially advantageous evolution and perfection, set the worse half of man, which is the body, above the better portion which is the soul. In fact, psychologists have diligently foisted upon the public the grotesque doctrine of "psychology without a soul"; the logical supplement of which teaching was, of course, "ethics without a heart." But current literature gives happy evidence that a considerable reaction in favor of a soul is now at work. It is to be hoped that a throbbing heart will be put back in the cold and lifeless bosom of twentieth-century ethics. For virtue, as a thing of the head alone, has pretty well proved itself incapable of performing its purpose.

The Simple Life makes a sort of appeal to the human breast as well as the brain; and in this it is superior to its sister-theories of to-day. But the main motive which it presents to Americans is sadly far from sublime. Advice to live simply because to live otherwise is dangerous, can hardly exercise an ennobling influence on men. How can we live simply unless we live virtuously? And can durable virtue grow from any seed save nobility?

Again. American advocates of the Simple Life take an unwarranted view of things. They assume that man's troubles come chiefly from without, that, in proportion as he reduces his excessive business activities, he increases his happiness and, consequently, his health. Whereas, undeniably, most all our ills originally come from within; and, if we diminished terrestrial concerns one iota, more than half of us, who are by no means the darlings of King Coin, would secure, not tingling red blood and bounding heart, but starvation. A few homely facts, hurled at such high-flown fancies as the Simple Life, are missiles that kill.

If Americans are a too energetic nation, why? Obviously one portion of our people, situated as they are, must toil incessantly, or they could never eat. For them the Simple Life is so impossible that it sounds ridiculous. Unfortunately the other portion, consisting of well-to-do eligibles for Pastor Wagner's theory, are animated with a greed for gain. But such a spirit can spring only from perverted morals. Our upper-class Americans are going too fast and far, because evil lust for lucre and pleasure has eaten into their very soul. Simple Life enthusiasts, with truly unique simplicity, say, "This should not be." Of course not; every one agrees. But how can it not be? With renewed simplicity, they reply, "Stop it—if you value your life." Clearly such monition can have small weight with a class who are so largely swayed by such crass maxims as "Eat, drink, and be merry to-day." "A short life but a merry one," etc. To worldly eyes, worldly objects alone appear desirable. So long as the orbs of Uncle Sam have the cold cash gleam, the good old gentleman's family will wantonly spend time and energy in a nerve-racking race for temporalities.

Simple Life could be preached from now till the crack of doom and Yankeeland would be little better; unless, through sheer weariness with being bad, it should decide to be good for a change. As one of our popular novelists pointedly asserts, there is a way of "degenerating into virtue." Indeed, to some extent, we have already deteriorated thereunto. As we look around us, we must admit that virtue, in all too many instances, is adopted merely as a fad. For example, representative American families, having indulged an athletic and frankly scandalous thé dansant of an afternoon, divert themselves in the evening with meetings intensely antagonistic to white slavery; or, having pleasantly cast maternal cares on the paid shoulders of nurses, hotly lecture to wondering audiences about sex-hygiene as a preventive of juvenile indiscretion; or, having squandered unconscionable sums on "bridge," limousine into the slums and initiate the poor into the Eleusinian mysteries of economy. Such virtue brings little credit to its devotees; forsooth, by filling them with ill-earned complacency, it actually does them harm. Whimsically assumed, it is whimsically dropped. It neither does nor can effect any permanent good in society.

The Simple Life, itself a beautiful foible, would render virtue the same. Human-made, it could never fully satisfy spiritual wants. If the world is wrong, it is because men's hearts are not right, if the world is to be right, wrong must be absterged from men's hearts. And the only specific which ever could, can, or will be able to cure error-torn bosoms is the tender truths of religion.

Edward F. Murphy, M.A.

"Ireland, Nurse of Heroes"

OUR title is taken from the first words of the Papal Decree, published in Rome on St. Patrick's Eve, concerning the "Beatification or Declaration of Martyrdom" of over three hundred children of Ireland. The Decree recites that the Sacred Congregation of Rites, acting on the investigatory process of the Ecclesiastical Court of Dublin and the wishes of "the whole Catholic nation of Ireland," and having heard the presentments of Mgr. O'Riordan, Relator, Cardinal Vannutelli, Postulator, and Mgr. Verde, Promoter of the Faith, decided that the Commission for the Introduction of the Beatification of 257 Servants of God and certain of their associates should be instituted, and that the Holy Father, Pope Benedict XV, ratified their judgment, and with his own hand signed the Commission of Introduction. Thus after three hundred years of the world's obloquy or oblivion, have its judgments been reversed by the highest court under heaven, and the representative types of the many it condemned to ignominious and painful deaths have been gloriously vindicated. And not these alone, but with them all the long, unbroken line of Ireland's martyrs. The opening sentence reads:

> In Ireland, nurse of heroes, besides the countless athletes of Christ who fell in the unbridled and furious persecution waged against Catholics in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries and whose names, unknown to men, are written in the Book of Life, many known by name and fame still live in the memory of men.

Besides the 257 martyrs named, the Decree includes three bands of forty Cistercians, thirty-two Dominicans, and 24 companions of Prior MacFerge, O.P., and several other unnamed associates of martyrs, so that the total number of Irish witnesses of the Faith declared admissible to the Church's altars approaches, if it does not exceed, three hundred and seventy. Ven. John Travers, O.S.A., one of several Irishmen included among the English martyrs, was executed in 1537, but already thousands had preceded him. Henry VIII, in the very year of his revolt, proclaimed his spiritual supremacy in Ireland, and also the penalties of death and confiscation against all who should deny or contravene it, and appointed Brown, an English apostate monk, Archbishop of Dublin to execute his designs. He found but one bishop of Irish birth who accepted his supremacy, and even he was finally reconciled to the Church. Therefore, against the bishops was his first fury directed, and with them, and even more drastically, against the religious Orders, because the monks and friars were faithful and revered, and the monasteries were numerous and rich. But he found the prosecution of such matters more difficult than in England. Brown wrote that, "This Island hath long been held in ignorance by the Romish Orders," and "The common people of this isle are more zealous in their blindness than the saints and martyrs were in truth at the beginning of the Gospel." Not only the people. "The forwardness and obstinacy of the clergy," wrote the King's agents to Chancellor Cromwell, "from the beginning of the Parliament and at this session, both of them, the bishops and abbots, was such that his lordship should be advertised thereof." He was; with the result that the spiritual representatives were excluded from all parliamentary voice, and a packed parliament decreed that all who would not renounce the Pope and acknowledge the spiritual supremacy of the King, "Shall suffer the pains of death and other penalties in the case of high treason," and that all the monasteries of Ireland, "with their lands, tenements, jewels, goods, chattels," shall be confiscate to the King.

All this was carried out with a literal and exhaustive comprehensiveness and an ingenuity of rigor for which not even the persecutions of Rome or Japan present a parallel. The Commission appointed to execute the King's decree found "The regulars and nuns so addicted to the pestiferous doctrines of the Romish Pontiff" that they had to be removed, and in what fashion we gather from one of their reports in the State papers of the same year:

> At Waterford we kept sessions, where were put to execution four felons, accompanied with another thief, a friar, whom we commanded to be hanged in his habit, and so to remain upon the gallows for a mirror to all his brethren to live truly.

The mirror was exhibited wherever the King's law ran, and gradually by his successors through the length and breadth of the land. In 1539, the forty-two Trinitarians of Adare were executed to a man, because, despite many inducements of high office and preferment, they declared the Vicar of Christ the only Head of the Catholic Church and the King of England, "the Head of the synagogue of Satan"; and in the same year the fifty members of the rich Trinitarian Convent of Dublin, and the forty-six Trinitarians of the Holy Cross in Limerick, were exterminated—some beheaded, some hanged, others cut to pieces with axes, or boiled in oils, or dragged through the streets at the tails of horses, and so on through every ingenuity of torture. And yet but two Trinitarians are glorified in the recent decretal. Cardinal Moran's explanation has wider significance:

> The other convents of the Trinitarian Order, Cork, Kilkenny, Ross, Dundalk, Galway and Cashel, showed the same fortitude. All were plundered of whatever they possessed, and there was not one of them but was adorned with the palm of martyrdom. So universal, indeed, was the ruin that fell on this religious Order that all vestige of it has disappeared from the subsequent history of our Church.

So severe has been the discrimination of the Sacred Congregation, owing to the destruction of judicially convincing records, that the name of Bishop Conor O'Neill, of Limerick, Provincial of the Trinitarians and a scion of the princely O'Neills of Tyrone, does not appear in the Decree. Consulted by King Henry on his projected divorce from Queen Catharine, Bishop O'Neill firmly declared against it, and, with all his community, was punished accordingly. In St. John's Cathedral he pronounced the King's commands heretical, and anathematized him and all his supporters. On the same evening he and his community were executed, with various degrees of ingenious ferocity; and this became, forthwith, the order of the day in Ireland—excepting the short reigns of Mary and of James II—with all the religious Orders and the secular clergy and the distinguished or influential, and at every period of stress, with the whole recusant laity; for in fidelity to Rome and invincible endurance of heretical oppression all classes were as one. The martyrs of Drogheda and Wexford and Cashel went into the tens of thousands, but the martyrs between and before and after these events were many times more numerous. The "Four Masters" conclude:

> There was not a monastery from Aran of the Saints to the Iccian Sea that was not broken and scattered. . . . Great as was the persecution of the Roman emperors against the Church, it is not probable that so great a persecution as this ever came upon the world; so that it is impossible to tell or narrate its description unless it should be told by one who saw it.

Such a description may be attained in some degree by the students of our day. The accounts of Father Richard Goold, the Trinitarian Professor at Alcalà, of O'Sullivan Bearr, as stout with the pen as with the sword; of Fathers Rothe, Wadding and Bruodin, O.S.F., include all that was published up to 1669; and practically nothing further appeared until, in 1861, Cardinal Moran commenced his volumes on the martyrs. The first general catalogue of the Irish martyrs had been compiled by Father John Houling, S.J., in 1599; the next was entrusted, after three centuries, to his brother Jesuit of Ireland, Father Denis Murphy, S.J., who, in 1896, a few hours before his death, completed the authentic story of "Our Martyrs." The Irish Episcopate entrusted the continuance of this work to Mgr. O'Riordan, whose imperishable "Catholicity and Progress in Ireland" marked him as the most appropriate defender of the cause of Ireland's martyrs. The result is the comprehensive and most gratifying Declaration just issued by Benedict XV.

Four Archbishops head the list: Dermot O'Hurley, of Cashel; Richard Creagh and Edmund MacGauran, of Armagh; Malachy O'Queely, of Tuam; and ten Bishops: Terence and Murrough O'Brien, of Emly; Redmond O'Gallagher, of Derry; Edmund Dungan, and Conor O'Devany, of Down and Connor; Owen MacEgan and Boetius Egan, of Ross; William Walsh, of Meath; Patrick O'Healy, of Mayo, and Heber MacMahon, of Clogher, who took up the sword that fell from the hand of Owen Roe O'Neill. There follow some forty secular clergy, two Premonstratensians, the Cistercians of two monasteries, and ten others, about eighty in all; eighty Dominicans, seventy-nine Franciscans, ten Augustinians, three Carmelites, two Trinitarians, five Jesuits, fifty-six of the laity, including three ladies, and three religious women, Brigid Darcey, Norah de Burgo and Norah Magan. The cause of twenty-three others is postponed for further proof.

It is a glorious catalogue, representing every clan and class and calling, and every strain of blood of Celt and Norman and Saxon, whose common fight for a common Faith, more than any other influences, made all alike "Kindly Irish of the Irish." As we have seen, the list could be indefinitely enlarged, except perhaps for technical difficulties. Archbishops Gibbon, of Cashel, and Talbot, of Dublin; Bishops Lacy, of Limerick, and Tanner, of Cork, only fell short of martyrdom in that they died of sufferings in prison, and not by the axe; and the records show that every martyr in each class is representative of thousands, and that Ireland's ancient title may now be extended to Insula Sanctorum, Doctorum et Martyrum.

MICHAEL KENNY, S.J.

Present-Day Fiction

SOME one has counted among the really noteworthy benefits that have accrued to us from this war the fact that for the moment, at least, the flood of fiction which has been pouring from the presses for years has dwindled to a comparatively tiny stream. Men are not reading novels, there is so much to read about the war; and for the first time in a good while there is a satisfactory sale for serious books—only they must be on war topics. I saw quite a respectable-sized catalogue, bound in cloth, the other day, issued by an English club, of books about the war. Perhaps during an interval like this we may take advantage of the lull in the flood of story-writing to consider what our fiction has come to signify during more recent years. There are a great many people who seem to think that this rapid flow of story-books from the presses is as much a sign of marvelous progress as trolley cars, fast express trains, and all the other means of getting through life rapidly. Let us see.

The interesting previous period of fiction-writing more completely comparable to our own was that of the Renaissance. The study of the Latin and Greek classics had relaxed the faith of many people. Not that it had disturbed the beliefs of the great minds of the time, but it seriously perturbed a large number of the smaller minds. That always happens in a transition period. It happened with the development of physical science in the nineteenth century. Among the Latin and Greek classics were many stories of immorality. Writers soon found that they could imitate these portions of the older literatures rather easily or, at least, that what they wrote in imitation of them had a zest which attracted attention. As a consequence there was a flood of "novels," novelle they are in Italian, though by that word the Italians meant what we call short stories rather than our longer novels. I suggested in my book on "The Century of Columbus," that in the period between 1400 and 1600, probably several hundred thousands of these short stories were written. Those written in the earlier period of the Renaissance had some value as literature. The later productions of that time are almost too trivial to be noted. As the reading public grew, however, the later novelle of the period were probably much more widely read than earlier stories of some real literary merit.

As time went on in the Renaissance period two things became noticeable. The reading public for the novelle came to be much more feminine than masculine, and after a time a number of women writers of stories came to the front. One might naturally expect that when these two incidents happened there would be an immediate reform in the kind of stories written and that immorality would cease to be their theme. On the contrary, as the women readers and writers grew in number, the licentiousness of the novelle increased apace. Personally, I do not know what that means. It is exactly what happened in our time, also. As the number of women readers and writers of novels has grown, our novels have become worse and worse, so far as the exploitation of ugly sex questions in them is concerned, and some of the worst of these novels, as every one knows, are written by women. Just this same thing happened at Rome, for we have complaint, I think it is in one of Petronius' letters, that the entrance of women into the circle of readers and writers of Roman fiction was followed by a degeneration. It would be easy to say that this was due to the viciousness of the feminine mind at Rome during the early days of the Empire. I am not drawing conclusions here, however, because I am free to confess that I do not know what conclusions to draw. I hesitate to think that women are so much more interested in the vicious sex questions than men, but here are the facts of three periods of fiction-writing; and I know very well that if the good women, who would rightly scorn any imputation on their respectability, would to-morrow stop once and for all reading lascivious sex stories, we should have an end of that sort of fiction within a year.

What is more interesting for our consideration of present-day fiction, however, is the other fact that at both previous periods of fiction-writing all of it that was worth while was written at the beginning of the story-writing period, and then degeneration set in and the tales became trivial and commonplace, and followed fashions of various kinds and did not in any sense represent life. They ceased entirely to be literature and they became mere superficial presentations of phases of existence that for some reason the author thought his readers would be interested in at that time. In a word, they were written with the idea of making as much money as possible for the author, but not at all with the purpose of enabling an artist to express a vision of life worth while preserving.

That is just what has happened in our period.

Meredith said in word and practice: "Do not democratize literature." We talk about leveling things up, but what we really do is level them down. The wider the appeal literature, or the theater, or art has, the more surely is it without high merit. You can make soap or catsup or biscuits to please the popular taste without deterioration of the product. It is an extremely difficult matter to make literature after the same fashion, but our American writers have been tempted to do so because of the money to be earned.

Ay! There's the rub. "The money that 's in it" has ruined our fiction to a great extent, as it has ruined nearly everything else. We have commercialized the newspaper, commercialized the theater, commercialized the family by the family hotel; and are commercializing our literature; only it won't be commercialized; its spirit vanishes under the pressure. So much for the twaddle that most people read. It is not only not worth while, but it is a positive injury to the mind. Most of our fiction is sawdust or seaweed. No one will care to remember, not alone twenty years from now, but even five years from now, that they have ever read it. But, then, we do not read to remember any more. When publishers wish to be particularly fulsome in their praise of an up-to-date book they advertise: "This is the sort of book that makes you forget." Nearly all our pastime is arranged to help people to forget.

There is another and more serious side to our present-day fiction. A great deal of it is calculated to do serious harm. It is surprising how ready people are to forget that reading is suggestive. The boy who reads Indian stories wants to run away and fight Indians. Whenever the thing to be done is simpler than a "Wild West" adventure, readers are almost sure to think more persistently of its possible accomplishment. We have found that the exhibition in the moving pictures of pocket-picking or "second story" work is followed by a series of incidents on the part of young spectators which indicate very clearly that the suggestion to do what they have seen has taken hold of them. A great many young folk are very susceptible to such suggestions. When the suggestions refer to something as alluring as sex matters are sure to be, because of a natural curiosity exaggerated by morbid inquisitiveness in our time, they are very likely to work serious harm.

Many of our popular novels are full of sex suggestions. Many of these are written by university men. Some of them are meretricious to the last degree. A book like Owen Johnson's "Salamander" is sure to work serious harm. We have many such books, though few quite as suggestive as this. The story itself is the veriest twaddle. An excellent English critic said of it:

> The author exhausts us with a surfeit of flimsy and violent sensationalism, he plays with the loud pedal down, and is continually throwing in all kinds of flashy effects. He commences with exaggerated emphasis and after the first seventy pages he can only offer us a repetition of the old shocks.

The excuse offered for some of this pander fiction is that it represents a warning for those who read it. Surely, the men who offer such an excuse have their tongues in their cheeks, while they offer it. It is curiously interesting to realize that just this same excuse was offered before in the Renaissance time. Even dear Margaret of Navarre, when she wrote her ugly sex stories, which do not hold a candle for evil suggestion to many that now pass muster in drawing-rooms, added morals to them and hoped that since people were reading such stories anyhow, hers with the morals would neutralize some of the evil effects. Alas! for good intentions, the good Margaret (I believe that she was a saint) only furnished another paving-stone for the place below, for subsequent generations read her stories and neglected the morals. They much preferred the "immorals" of the tales. With the degeneration of our fiction, as in the Renaissance time, we have come round to the same old excuse for it: how man does progress!

James J. Walsh, M.D.

The Douay Bible

To the Editor of America:

I. Is the Douay version to be considered a complete Bible or not? II. What is the aim of the Commission for the revision of the Latin Bible? What is Cardinal Gasquet's connection with it? III. What bearing will the completion of its labors have upon the Douay Bible? IV. In short, kindly give all there is to know about the Douay Bible.

Haileybury, Ontario. A. V.

I. The Douay Bible contains the whole of the King James Bible, from Genesis to the Apocalypse, and more. It is not, therefore, accused by Protestants of incompleteness. That is our charge against them, while they hold against us that we have included in our Bible certain writings not properly belonging to Holy Scripture at all. The dispute concerns only the Old Testament; for the New, both Bibles are identical in contents, book for book and almost verse for verse, though they vary not a little in their renderings of the text. The Protestant version of the Old Testament contains only the books of the Hebrew Bible; they are thirty-eight in number. The Douay Bible has all these and seven other books besides, namely, Tobias, Judith, First and Second Machabees, Ecclesiasticus, Wisdom and Baruch; also, certain portions of Daniel and Esther which are not found in the Hebrew Bible. The Douay derived these disputed books and portions of books from the Vulgate, the official Latin version authorized by the Catholic Church; and the Vulgate derived them in turn from that Greek Bible which is called the Septuagint. Now, the Septuagint was the Bible of the Apostles and of the early Church; several writers, at least, of the New Testament knew Hebrew, yet they used the Greek Bible in preference to the Hebrew. All the Fathers of the early Church quote the Septuagint habitually, and frequently show themselves acquainted with the disputed books which they received as inspired writings. These books can not be rejected on account of their original language, for five, at least, out of the seven, Tobias, Judith, Machabees, Ecclesiasticus and Baruch, were written originally in Hebrew or in Aramean, the later language of the Jews, which occurs in parts of Daniel as found in the Hebrew Bible. The Catholic Church in pronouncing canonical the books contained in the Vulgate simply clung to the tradition of the Christian Church which goes back to the Apostles. The Protestant canon was an innovation. There never had been a time when it was received in the Christian Church. It constituted a rejection of the Christian Apostolic traditions in favor of the tradition of the rabbis of Palestine.

These disputed books have a very high religious value. They were greatly admired by the Fathers and by the undivided Christendom of the Middle Ages. The books of Ecclesiasticus and Wisdom, for example, were favorites with such a devout soul as Thomas à Kempis. First Machabees is recognized by Protestant scholars as presenting stronger internal guarantees of historical worth than certain books of the Hebrew Canon. Baruch is a beautiful and touching little book, full of the prophetic spirit; and there is certainly nothing in the remaining books which would, of itself, cause any Christian to reject them. There is no logical and no sound historical reason why any consistent Protestant should refuse to accept these writings.

The same may be said of the portions of Daniel and Esther which Protestants exclude from their Bible. The Catholic book of Esther is far more edifying than the Protestant. And think of the lack of religious sense which rejects the Benedicite (Daniel iii), one of the grandest poems and most deeply religious hymns ever penned by man and inspired by God. Whatever prompted the rejection, it was certainly not a more highly developed religious sense.

II. The answer to this may be best given in the words of Cardinal Gasquet himself, as found in the "Catholic Encyclopedia," Vol. XIV, p. 515. He says:

> The aim of the Commission for the revision of the Vulgate is not to produce a Latin Bible, to be proposed as an official text for the approbation of the Church, but to take merely a preliminary step toward that official version. The object is clearly set forth in the charge given by the Pope to the Commission. It is to determine as accurately as possible the text of St. Jerome's Latin translation, made in the fourth century. This text is admitted on all hands to be an absolute necessity as a basis of any more extended and critical revision.

This revision was placed by the late Holy Father, Pius X, in the hands of a Commission composed of Benedictines and presided over by the Abbot Gasquet, who has since, orbi plaudente, been created cardinal.

III. When the labors of the Commission shall be completed, the authorities of the Church, using the results obtained as a basis, will probably issue a revised text of the Vulgate. They may go still further and with the aid of the Hebrew Bible, of the Septuagint and of other ancient versions, prepare a Latin Bible that will be declared the official Bible of the Catholic Church. As soon as any revised text is published with the approbation of Roman authorities, it will then be in order for us to revise our Douay version in accordance with the new official text. The occasion will be very opportune, also, for a literary revision of our English text. The faults of our English Catholic Bible are principally literary: they do not affect doctrinal points and, regarded in their substance, are not of grave importance.

IV. A satisfactory reply to this request would carry this article far beyond the space limit assigned. It may be well to reread the excellent comparison of the Douay and King James Bibles which appeared in these pages on January 2 and supplement it by the very good account of the Douay version, sufficient for the needs of most men, in the fifth volume of the "Catholic Encyclopedia," which can be found in every library of any pretensions to completeness.

Catholic University of America. JOHN F. FENLON, S.S., D.D.

An Answer

MR. CHESTERTON has hinted, in a preface, at the thrilling tale of an Englishman who went to sea and in a fog discovered—England. Not a few Sodalists nowadays have acted out this parable, and discovered—the true Sodality. For the Sodality, like many another ancient institution, has been sadly misrepresented and misunderstood even by its friends.

This is unfortunate on more than one account, for the Sodality, properly understood, carries in itself the solution of many of the anxious questions which the Catholic laity, in common with the clergy, are asking themselves and each other, notably of late in the correspondence columns of AMERICA.

I must in this article say many things briefly, and so trust to be pardoned for growing a bit axiomatic. To begin with, so as to avoid any misapprehension, let us set down what the Sodality is not. It is not a society for the promotion of monthly Communion merely, nor even of a weekly meeting. Its activities are endlessly wider and deeper than that. To confine one's Sodality work within such narrow limits, is quite to misapprehend the scope and aim of Sodality activity.

Neither is the Sodality an organization only for women and for children. It began in a boys' college in Rome and its membership was afterwards extended to include men, women and girls. Nowadays, Sodality organization is adapted to the needs of every class and age. All that one needs for membership in a Sodality is a willingness to carry out its spirit and to obey its rules.

Finally the Sodality, in all non-Jesuit parishes and institutions, is entirely subject to the jurisdiction of the bishop, and under the control of its own director. It is not dominated by any religious order, and its affiliation to the head Sodality at Rome is a spiritual one, for the conferring of indulgences and spiritual benefits. The separate Sodalities owe no obedience to the Head Sodality, pay no contributions and receive no instructions. They are left entirely to the control of their own officers.

And now for the positive side. What is a Sodality of the Blessed Virgin? Its nature and activities are admirably summarized in the first rule of the edition of 1910. This rule reads as folows:

> The Sodality of Our Lady is a religious body which aims at fostering in its members an ardent devotion, reverence and filial love toward the Blessed Virgin Mary. Through this devotion, and with the protection of so good a Mother, it seeks to make the Faithful gathered together under her name, good Catholics, sincerely bent on sanctifying themselves, each in his state of life, and zealous as far as their condition in life permits to save and sanctify their neighbor, and to defend the Church of Jesus Christ against the attacks of the wicked.

This is the official and authentic declaration of the Sodality's scope and purpose. One sees at a glance that it sets up the Sodality as a training school for the Lay Apostolate and as an epitome of the Christian life. The Sodalists, a devoted brotherhood of ardent sons of Mary, are to be sincerely bent on working for their personal holiness, for the help of their neighbor and the defence of the Church against the wicked. They are to be the lay auxiliary of their pastor, ready to his hand for any help which he may wish in the spiritual and temporal activities of the parish.

Sodality organization is at the same time strong and flexible. It combines a deep and supernatural spirit (which is guaranteed by a true devotion to the Mother of God) with the active and energetic zeal inspired by its threefold purpose of work for self, the neighbor and the Church. There is no worthy enterprise in a parish which can not be mightily helped by a well-organized Sodality.

Strange though these ideas may be to some American readers, they are familiar to the Catholics of Europe, who have seen the most remarkable examples of the efficiency of Sodality organization in their midst. There, as in some of our own American centers, the Sodality works by means of sections or committees each with its own officers and special purpose. Through these sections the Sodality attends to all the needs of the parish, and coordinates and systematizes the entire work of the laity. There are sections for reducing the church debt, for teaching catechism to poor children, for promoting Catholic literature, fostering the spirit of frequent Communion, helping the missions, encouraging every sort of charitable enterprise. Some sections conduct workmen's cooperative banks, industrial schools, even orphanages and protectorates. Others carry on the activities which we associate with the Y. M. C. A. It would require many articles to do rudimentary justice to the activities of the European Sodalities. Suffice it to say that there is hardly any social or charitable activity which is not being systematically fostered and promoted by these Sodality sections or committees.

Even from this hasty sketch one can see what possibilities are in this movement for our American Catholics. Indeed, in not a few parishes, the work is already well under way. We need unity, and the Sodality can insure this unity in a parish by coordinating parish work through its various sections. All other societies in the Church have some especial purpose peculiar to themselves. The activities of the Sodality embrace the whole Christian life.

Again the Sodality can promote unity among the faithful throughout the whole Church in America. By means of a Sodality Union in the cities, the parishes can be linked more closely together, and through a national union of these civic Unions of Sodalities, all our American Sodalists may be brought to a closer understanding.

This may seem a fantastic dream to those who have not carefully studied the possibilities of Sodality organization. But their wonder may grow less when they consider that the Sodality, with half a million members here in America, unites these great desiderata—absolute control by the individual pastors and complete subjection to the Ordinary, with a geographical distribution that makes it almost ubiquitous. Besides, the Sodality brings to our hand the supernatural power which comes with the name of Mary and with the strength of three hundred and fifty years of saintly tradition.

Whether these desirable things will come to pass in our own, or in a future generation, depends of course upon the zeal with which we of this generation study and employ the huge possibilities of Sodality organization, as our brethren in Europe are beginning to study and employ them. The mere largeness of the idea should not deter us. Only by large ideas courageously carried into action can the Catholics of America fulfil their tremendous mission. The times move quickly. Great opportunities open before us with all bewildering swiftness, and if we do not prepare to meet them they will pass just as swiftly. We should be planning well, because our plans of to-day must make the history of to-morrow.

EDWARD F. GARESCHÈ, S.J.,
Editor of the Queen's Work.

COMMUNICATIONS

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

"Ludicrous Anachronism"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Mr. Ronald's last letter has made this indisputably clear: that our discussion is not upon a common ground. Let me, then, simply restate my position. The question is not "Is there bigotry?" but "Is American public opinion bigoted?" Mr. Ronald, I think, either confounds the two or is under the impression that the former, answered negatively, is my contention. Bluntly, it is not. Even had I held such a position, Mr. Ronald's array of facts (some of which were instances of real bigotry) would not have compelled my unconditional surrender.

Now, I gather from my critic's last letter that even were our issue the same, we should yet be at odds in defining two fundamentals of the status: "Is American public opinion bigoted?" Namely, we should differ on the definition of "public opinion" and of "bigotry."

Public opinion, as I should take it, is the complexus of the opinions (in a determining proportion) of individuals. We all know that there is a certain way of looking at things common to the men of a given generation: that this is nothing more than a certain body of views which you may take for granted in addressing contemporaries; that these opinions become part of their mental atmosphere and yours and in direct communication are no more adverted to than the glass in the window through which you view outside objects, or the light by which you read. To this complexus, this "sphere of ideas" as Cardinal Newman says, all things are referred. In the light of it judgments are formed, policies and institutions upheld or condemned. In the abstract we call it public opinion; but in the concrete it exists not at all, if not in individuals sufficiently numerous to manifest and characterize the thought of the day. How it comes to be in the individual is another question and on its answer, for instance, by discreet investigation, or by blind prejudice, depends the justice or injustice of the public opinion in question.

Now, this definition Mr. Ronald denies, and in what justice, or by what canon of analysis he appeals to mob psychology as to the normal psychology of the American mind, I do not know. I should have thought all peoples under such circumstances were abnormal, and hence unsymptomatic of their opinions and views. Nor are we more at one in defining "bigotry." We are talking, of course, about religious bigotry and the basis of my position here is the definition given in the "Standard Dictionary" as being most likely to reflect what is popularly meant by bigotry. If Mr. Ronald's view be right, then all the unchristianity of the day, all the materialism, all the unmentionable malice of the modern human heart is bigotry. But if mine be the correct one, bigotry is predicable of that class of men alone, against whom as being bigots the inherent fairness of Americans has quite recently taken action.

The exigencies of space deny me the manifest advantages rhetoric would here afford, in the potent marshalling and amplification of facts. But doubtless Mr. Ronald will have noticed the action of those Protestant ministers who bought advertising space to protest against bigotry. (Catholic Standard and Times, February 27.) He will have consulted Our Sunday Visitor of March 14, for accounts of actions by Protestants equally fair. AMERICA for March 20 will have likewise attested to American fairness when (p. 576) it says: "The legal measures recently taken against an anti-Catholic publication have in general met the approbation of the public." He will have realized, too, the significance of Dr. Berle's action (a Protestant minister) who entered the Massachusetts Legislature to protest against an anti-Catholic bill. Above all he will have seen quoted in the speech of Representative Sullivan given in the House, February 4, 1915, the appeal of another minister, Dr. Gladden, to Protestants, against bigotry, and the weighty opinion of Dr. Condé B. Pallen in which he voices exactly the position for which I contend, when he says: "We believe that the vast majority of American citizens are above the sinister influences of a propaganda so vile in its methods, so base in its principles, so contrary to the basic character of our Constitution." The instances have all come under my observation quite recently and casually. How many others an attempt to gather data might have revealed I do not know.

As for the instances again cited by Mr. Ronald, many are not instances of bigotry; none are sufficient to prove such an extension of bigotry in the United States as to justify us in saying "American public opinion is bigoted."

Here, then, is the issue as cleanly chiseled and as concrete as I can make it. At the risk of seeming unduly iterative I must again insist that the question is not "Is bigotry rife?" but "Is public opinion bigoted?"

With this restatement of the position I am content to leave my critic to his own opinion. Perhaps a re-reading of the original article and my subsequent letter will convince Mr. Ronald that, with the issue uncloudedly seen, there is not too optimistic a point of view in "A Ludicrous Anachronism."

Woodstock, Md. GEORGE D. BULL, S.J.

[This controversy will be closed next week.—Editor AMERICA.]

Temperance vs. Prohibition

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Judging by your correspondence column of the past few weeks the question of temperance against prohibition must be a live issue. Regarding the two writers who disagree with my views on the subject of prohibition, I must say in general terms that they both ignore the real question and waste valuable space dealing with side issues. The question before us is whether it is not more wise from the standpoint of statesmanship and good citizenship to encourage, by means of all the moral forces left in our country, the cardinal virtue of temperance rather than adopt stringent laws, which nobody will ever dream of seriously enforcing, prohibiting the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors in the United States. My contention is: (1) that our present liquor laws are altogether too lax; (2) that, weak as they are, they are not properly enforced, because (3) our law officers in every city in the land are the ephemeral creatures of the lowest grade of politicians. Neither Father Lambing nor Mr. Fitzgerald deal with the problem as thus stated, but treat us to a whole host of irrelevancies. My idea, in brief, is that if we do not now enforce a very inferior and lax set of liquor laws, a fortiori, we most certainly will not enforce laws which trespass upon a fundamental human right.

I am sorry Father Lambing does not consider my methods of discussing the prohibition fad as sufficiently reverential, yet he himself informs us that "men do not lose their reason for a gnat," thereby implying that his friends are fit subjects for the State Hospital! But the Scribes and the Pharisees some years ago lost their reason for a gnat. Later on in his letter Father Lambing suggests that the prohibition movement "may be directed by sympathetic reasoning"; but how in the name of common sense are we to direct, by sympathetic reasoning or any other kind of reasoning, people who, according to him, have lost their reason? What he has to say about Pius X and the Third Plenary Council has no bearing on the case; the late venerated Pope and the Council of Baltimore, like all popes and all councils for some nineteen centuries, approved and encouraged the admirable, but voluntary virtue of self-denial; which is just a bit different from compulsory prohibition.

Your second correspondent who objects to my position, Mr. Fitzgerald, appears to think I belong to the great school of closet philosophers, and that consequently I have no practical experience of "the problems of real life." Let me reassure him on this point: I am not in the least degree a hermit. The greater part of this gentleman's communication is as little ad rem as his smart, though rash, characterization of one who presumes to differ with him. Here, however, is a rare gem produced by so ardent a prohibitionist: "Alcohol is made to be sold, and is going to be sold, law or no law!" Why, that is just my contention. And to show him how true his confident affirmation is, let me cite a few facts. The number of illicit distilleries found in the United States in the year 1913 was merely 2,374, whereas the registered distilleries totaled 821. Further, 80 per cent. of the former class of alcohol producers were discovered in the prohibition States of Alabama, Georgia, Tennessee, Mississippi and the Carolinas. This is a pretty fair indication that alcohol will be made and sold, "law or no law."

The "practical" Mr. Fitzgerald also assures me that anybody who says prohibition "means drug-fiends doesn't know the first thing about the subject from the practical standpoint." Really I am awfully ashamed at my total want of the "practical" sense. Yet I find that the Clinical Director of the Georgia State Sanitorium reports a "steady increase in insanity from the use of drugs in the last five years in Georgia," and in particular an increase "of more than 700 per cent. in the first two months of 1914."

Even as regards that American Utopia, the State of Kansas, there seem to be differences of opinion. For instance, a correspondent of the New York Sun, writing from San Bernardino, Cal., under date of February 9, tells of an experience he had in a Kansas town of some 20,000 inhabitants, last New Year's Eve. This traveler, Mr. W. H. Wright, says that in the course of the last evening of the Old Year he looked around for some of the usual features that mark such an occasion; but all was quiet, "just deadly quiet." The following morning he inquired the reason for so peculiar a way of ushering in the New Year and received this explanation: "The people of this State," the hotel proprietor informed him, "are licked, just licked, that is all there is to it. There are so many laws against everything, and so many busybodies prying about trying to convict somebody of something that people have lost all heart and can not even shout. They have become callous to all emotions whatever."

Another claim advanced with confidence by Mr. Fitzgerald is that "the great majority of men would never think of taking a drink if it wasn't under their nose all the time." Let us see. The number of illicit distilleries noted above as existing in the Southern prohibition States in 1913 seems to me to indicate that if people do not find liquor "under their nose" they are willing to take some pains to get in a position so alluring, unlawfully. Moreover, I am informed by a pamphlet of former United States Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Mr. Royal E. Cabell, that in one year the Southern Express Co. alone shipped over six million gallons of whiskey directly to consumers in dry territory. Do these figures sustain Mr. Fitzgerald's contention? Of course he tells me to throw all such statistics, got out by wicked men, into the waste basket; a very convenient way, and the usual way of the prohibitionist, of disposing of an argument.

Finally, let Mr. Fitzgerald get this into his mind once and for all; that people who take my point of view are far and away from being friends of the American saloon. On the contrary we despise and detest it in its existing form, as a corrupting institution. But we oppose prohibition because we believe there is ample reason to fear that it will make bad immeasurably worse. I find nothing in the correspondence with which I have been dealing to induce me to modify this opinion.

Harrisburg, Pa. HENRY MAURICE.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Will you permit me, a priest, to make some remarks on this question of Temperance vs. Prohibition, which has been opened up in the pages of AMERICA? Human rights, howsoever humble, are sacred, especially when they are chartered in the Bible. We can not afford to let any real right of man be minimized or be taken from him. The Prohibitionists are assailing one right of man, and the Eugenists are sharpening their weapons to take away one or two others. When I hear men denouncing drink as if it were in itself an evil and speaking of total abstinence as if it were a matter of obligation, there rises before my mind the example of Our Divine Lord at the wedding in Cana, and the example too, I may say, of His Blessed Mother, who requested the wine for the guests which He so plentifully gave them. (John ii: 1-11.)

There comes also before my mind Our Lord's words to the Jewish people: "John came neither eating nor drinking; and they say: He hath a devil. The Son of Man came eating and drinking, and they say: Behold a man that is a glutton and a wine drinker, a friend of publicans and sinners. And wisdom is justified by her children." (Matt. ii: 18, 19.) Certainly Our Lord knew the evils that would flow from intemperance. Yet He did not command us to abstain from wine. "Touch not, taste not, handle not" (Col. ii: 21) is a favorite quotation of certain persons who look with disfavor on the use of wine; but if they examine that verse in the light of its context, they may not quote it any more. Our Lord knew also the benefits to be derived by millions from the proper use of this gift of God to men, and He would not deprive them of it; and His example, higher than which we can not have, would seem to have been set up against all who would rob man of this liberty.

Total abstinence is very good, and for some necessary, as every confessor knows. He who marries does well. (At least we hope so.) He who marries not does better; provided his motives are proper. So too is it with the man who likes his glass of wine, and with the total abstainer who prefers his glass of water. But the Bible is not a cold water tract. The Bible condemns intemperance, but it does not command total abstinence. It holds the golden mean. "Wine drunken with excess raiseth quarrels, and wraths, and many ruins." (Ecclus. xxxi: 38.) "Grape-juice" certainly wouldn't do that. "Use a little wine for thy stomach's sake, and thy frequent infirmities." (I Tim. v: 23.) "Wine may cheer the heart of man." (Ps. ciii: 15.) "Give wine to them that are grieved in mind." (Prov. xxxi: 6.) "Wine was created from the beginning to make men joyful, and not to make them drunk. Wine drunken with moderation is the joy of the soul and the heart." (Ecclus. xxxi: 35, 36.) "Grape-juice" wouldn't do any of those things either. Not in the Bible will certain of the Prohibitionists find what they are looking for. They will find it, however, in the Koran.

Father Lambing says in his article in America of March 20 (p. 565), that "superintendents of penal and charitable institutions state that drink, directly or indirectly, brings nine-tenths of the inmates to these institutions." I do not now question the correctness of the superintendents' estimate; but it is obvious that those nine-tenths in penal and charitable institutions are not nine-tenths of humanity. Shall the rest of humanity therefore be deprived of their use of a thing because some abuse it? Father Lambing also says, "Bishops attribute to the same source nine-tenths of the trouble they have in the administration of their office!" But nine-tenths of their trouble, surely, are not nine-tenths of their priests and their people! What of the Bishop of bishops? What was the cause of nine-tenths of the troubles of Pius X? Was Modernism, for example, and the carrying out of the decree Quam singulari only one-tenth of his troubles? Was it drink or was it heresy that vexed the pontificates of Paul III and Pius IV? And so on, back through the ages of the Church, has it been drink or has it been pride that has done the greater harm to souls?

Intemperance is bad. And some other things are bad; some other things are worse. Gluttony is only one of the capital sins. Anger, avarice, envy, lust, pride, sloth, are others. It isn't the love of drink, but the love of money, that St. Paul styles "the root of all evils." (I Tim. vi: 10.) Judas fell by avarice, not by drink. "By the envy of the devil, death came into the world." (Wisdom ii: 24.) It was not the fury of drink, but the fury of envy, that delivered Our Lord to be crucified: "For he knew that for envy they had delivered him." (Matt. xxvii: 18.)

And then there is sloth! Ordinary laziness! You know the proverbs: "An idle brain is the devil's workshop." And: "Some temptations come to the industrious, but all temptations come to the idle." "The continuation of the Mass does not depend on this movement being overcome or controlled," says Father Lambing. What of Arizona? What of the Mass in the whole country if prohibition of the Arizona kind should become nation-wide? "Who will be to blame?" inquires Father Lambing; and he implies that Catholics will. But Prohibitionists also, Father Lambing. Two wrongs, as you well know, do not make a right. Imagine the fanaticism that would make Holy Mass impossible, by forbidding wine even for sacramental purposes!

No doubt our lamented Holy Father, Pius X, regarded the Catholic Total Abstinence Union of America as worthy of all praise. So do many priests, though they do not all choose to become members of the organization. The Church stands for sobriety, yes. She stands also for truth and for liberty, and she would expect every one of her priests to be ready to give up his life, if necessary, in defence of them. The right to take a drink of wine may seem a small thing; but it is a right, nevertheless, when one can use it without sin. Put that right under the guillotine and other rights will soon have to mount the stairs and suffer a like fate. Finally, it is no small thing, but a monstrous thing, to stand between a priest and his right and duty of offering the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass, as Prohibitionists have done in Arizona, and as they have planned to do in other places.

San Francisco, Cal. A Subscriber.

Catholics in the Y. M. C. A.

To the Editor of America:

The dispute about the Y. M. C. A. should, I think, be confined to this question: Is the association a religious corporation? The answer to this will solve many of the minor problems under discussion. Presumably the officials of the Y. M. C. A. know their mind in the matter. They unhesitatingly pronounce the association religious in character. On page eight of their book, "With Men and Boys," they say:

> The Young Men's Christian Association seeks to unite those young men who, regarding Jesus Christ as their God and Saviour according to the Holy Scripture, desire to be His disciples in their doctrines and in their life, and to associate their efforts for the extension of His kingdom among young men.

Further, among the items of interest in one of their official publications is found the following:

> The root of this (political) liberty, which makes men simple, single-minded and sincere, is religion; not the superficial religion of verbal profession, ritualistic form or sacerdotal magic, but the religion that walks humbly with God and cultivates the spirit of service and good-will, etc., etc.

From this it appears that the Y. M. C. A. is: a militant, non-Catholic, religious corporation; shrewd enough not to allow its "rubbers" and "track managers" to "broach religion," but careful nevertheless, to ridicule the "ritualistic form" and "sacerdotal magic" of Catholicism. Would the defenders of the Y. M. C. A. allow athletic young Catholics of twenty-five to join the Baptist Church for the sake of a swimming pool?

Baltimore. E. L. A.

Gothic Vestments

To the Editor of America:

The return of Gothic vestments is urged for their splendor and because they are appropriated by other sects that mimic the true religion. Those who are so stridently demanding the return, give the impression that the priests, of their own accord, chose to abandon the Gothic vestments for those now in use. Is this really the case? If not, then the change was made by the higher powers to whom a respectful appeal must be made, if a return to Gothic vestments is desired.

Haileybury, Ontario. A. Vidal.

Few American Missionaries

To the Editor of America:

Some time ago you said in an article in America, "The world knows too little of Damien's successors." I thought you would be interested in a notice that appeared in our local papers recently, and runs as follows: "On the Spanish mailboat Alicante arrived eleven Paulist Fathers (S. Vicent a Paulo) and eight Sisters of Charity, all from Spain." Do you know how many have come from the United States during the fifteen years of occupation? Hardly eleven priests and certainly not eight nuns. Preachers, however, of other denominations and teachers, both male and female, are not lacking.

Philippine Islands. Ed. Y. Y. C.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, APRIL 17, 1915

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Contributions for the Mexican fund may be sent direct to AMERICA.

A complete index of Volume XII is published with this number of AMERICA.

The Holy Father's Congratulations

AS AMERICA was begun on April 17, 1909, this present issue marks our sixth anniversary. Nothing could be more seasonable therefore than the letter of congratulation that recently came to the editor from Pope Benedict XV, and the publication of this letter is the fittest way of observing AMERICA's birthday:

To REV. FATHER RICHARD H. TIERNEY, S.J.
Editor-in-chief of AMERICA, New York:

Your letter with its expressions of loyalty has been a source of satisfaction and joy to the Holy Father, for in it He has found clear tokens both of your ardent zeal for the salvation of souls, and your undoubted and devoted attachment to the Apostolic See. He has ample proof both of one and the other in the review, AMERICA, which, under your direction, seconded by the labors of your brothers in religion, is now entering on the seventh year of strenuous effort in behalf of Catholic truth, its exposition, its explanation and its defence.

To you, therefore, and to your associates, the Holy Father extends His sincere congratulations for all you have done, and He is prompted by His special love for His noble children in the United States of America to convey to you His earnest, urgent desire that you continue with high courage the work you have begun. It gives great joy to the August Pontiff to look forward with hopeful anticipation to the profit and honor which will accrue both to religion and to the State from the accomplishment of the task which, with the approval of the episcopate, you have taken upon yourselves, viz., to guard inviolate the rights of the Church, to unmask error, to increase piety among the faithful, and to maintain union of all hearts with this infallible chair of truth.

That God may smile upon your efforts, that there may be richer and more abundant fruit to your labors, and that you may have proof of His Holiness's affection, He bestows with all love in the Lord, on you and on the other writers of AMERICA, the Apostolic Benediction. With much esteem I am happy to be

Yours devotedly in the Lord,
P. CARD. GASPARRI,
Secretary of State to His Holiness.

From the Vatican,
March 13, 1915.

The Patriots Again

THE Mexican patriots have played their tune once again. It is the same old tune, a wheezy grind-organ affair rolled off the barrel by the swarthy artist in charge of the Villista agency in Washington. The refrain is very simple: Villa is an angel sweet and gentle; Villa is a saint holy and powerful; Villa, Villa, angel, saint; Villa saint; Villa angel. Here the mocking-bird artist drops into an ecstasy. But ecstasy or no ecstasy, the Church is the cause of Mexico's ills. That is clear. Everybody admits it. She has brought many calamities to the land beyond the Rio Grande. Among the greatest of these was the redemption of Villa's and Carranza's ancestors from the worship of the rain-god. Had the Church not committed this crime the precious blood of Pancho and Victoriano would have gone steaming up or down to the hideous god in sacrifice, and Mexico would have been spared the awful carnage now disgracing civilization.

But a part of the Mexican refrain was omitted. Here it is: Priests and Sisters were law-breakers; their presence in Mexico was illegal. Granted; but only for the sake of the argument. Behold the result. Priests and Sisters are here in defiance of law; to right that hideous wrong, to restore the equation of justice, we, the righteous Mexican revolutionists, shall blaspheme God, deny His existence; arise in our sacred might and desecrate churches, defile altars and vestments, perpetrate unspeakable sacrileges against the Blessed Sacrament; we shall teach priests and Sisters a lesson; we shall dress abandoned women in vestments, pull down a statue from the altar and replace it by a naked priestess of sin; we shall torture priests, under the direction of Fierro; carry off young girls—ah, the priests will catch it—we shall murder inoffensive Brothers, and Sisters will be our victims. How dare priests and Sisters defile our holy, beloved land by their presence! And greatest vindication of all, we shall fool Los Yankos; we shall use the loot from churches to keep an agent in Washington who will talk to the stupid Gringos, as if they, like ourselves, were just emerging from the stone age. Holy is our warfare; justice is saved.

Indecency vs. Good Taste

NOT long since an irresponsible critic took it on himself to reprove a Catholic mayor for inveighing against a play that outrages, to phrase it mildly, the sense of Christian modesty. The critic drew a rather sharp distinction between decency on the one side and intelligence and good taste on the other, and he implied that not the former but the latter should be used in judging the drama. Obviously he was wrong. A correct feeling for the proprieties is essential to sound criticism of any work of art. Mere intelligence is by no means a safe guide to a right judgment of literary excellence. Aristophanes undoubtedly had rare intelligence, but he blundered nevertheless from an artistic point of view, and spoiled his otherwise excellent work by a fondness for scurrility. "Good" taste, too, by the very fact that it dispenses with the canons of decency, brands itself as unquestionably bad. Whatever shocks, offends good taste; indecency always shocks; therefore it is never artistic. Even pagans, past and present, acknowledge this. Great art, of its own inherent nature, refuses to pander to base inclinations. It feels itself degraded, it rebels. How then is it possible to justify indecent plays on the score of good taste? Indecency and good taste are mortal enemies, and this even from the purely natural standpoint.

A College President's Reading

THE papers have lately been giving considerable space to a letter Dr. Andrew D. White, sometime President of Cornell University, wrote to the Cornell Era. The doctor gives a list of the books which have furnished him with "the most real profit and abiding pleasure." Except for his eulogium of Rutherford B. Hayes, whom he thinks "one of the best equipped and noblest Presidents in the whole line," and save for the prominence given to Lecky's "History of Rationalism," Froude's history and Matthew Arnold's "Literature and Dogma," the list is worthy of little notice. It merely betrays Dr. White's limitations. His unbounded admiration for Anatole France's books, for example, comes with a bad grace from an optimistic American educator. The shallowness of that French cynic's wit has been thoroughly revealed by the present war.

The list is more remarkable, however, for its omissions —Dr. White's own masterpiece, for instance, "The Warfare of Theology with Science," which must be a prime favorite of his, is not even mentioned, though it is still to be found in most of our public libraries and is accepted as an authority by many imperfectly educated people. "The Warfare of Theology with Science" was written a quarter of a century ago to advertise and defend a new system of teaching at Cornell; one absolutely free from all religious influences. The president of the institution, irritated by opposition to this then very unusual university procedure, deliberately set out to make it clear that theology and religion had always hampered the progress of science and that therefore great things might be expected from Cornell.

Dr. White declared, for instance, that in the Middle Ages papal documents had been issued which forbade the practice of dissection and the study of chemistry, and suggested that the real reason for these decrees against anatomy and chemistry lay in the Church's desire that people should seek cures not in medicine and surgery but only in pilgrimages, relics, prayers and Masses.

The modern phase of the history of medicine had only just begun when President White wrote that book. Had he been a really wide-awake scholar he would have detected this movement. As it was he missed it and consequently his work shamefully betrayed his lack of scholarship, and the book's general acceptance by American readers has simply served to show how little even supposedly educated men, such as university professors and editors of scientific monthlies, knew of the immense advance that was then taking place in the history of science and above all in that of medicine and surgery. It has now been proved that dissection was general in Italy at the very time when, according to Dr. White, a few men were secretly dissecting in fear and trembling, owing to the opposition of the Church. This is clear from the sketches that have been discovered, and from the surgeons' text-books that have come down to us.

So it would seem that Dr. White, instead of compiling lists of books, owes the American people a candid acknowledgement of the fact that, because of his dependence on secondary authorities, he was deceived as to the real status of science and particularly of medicine and surgery during the Middle Ages and the Renaissance period. If he is taken away from us before some such acknowledgement is made he will be remembered in the history of American scholarship as a man who, just at a moment when a great change was coming over our knowledge of history, followed the old, neglecting the new, and wrote a book that became quite absurd in the course of the next ten years. On the other hand a frank withdrawal of a number of incorrect statements in "The Warfare of Theology with Science" would deservedly attract attention. For such a retraction would prove the author a man to whom truth meant everything. Here is a fine opportunity for our great American truth-seeker. Will Dr. White take it?

"Ye of Little Faith"

YE of little faith, less dignity and still less patriotism, ye are filling human ears these days with hollow words that mock the dignity of man and make sport of God's law. Ye have joined hands with anarchists; ye have seduced two powerful journals to your wicked cause, and ye of little faith will now wage war in favor of a horrid sin: "The Control of Births." God's positive law will be violated, and God will not be mocked for ever, ye of little faith. The natural law will be broken, and the crime will carry with it its own punishment. For that law objectively viewed is part of your very self; it is interwoven with the very fiber of your soul. A sin against it is a crime against self, a degradation of self, a lowering of self from manhood's plane to the animal's estate. Control births, ye of little faith, and ye shall no longer walk upright with man; your spirit will grow coarse; your instincts, brutal, your nature, crass beyond telling. The sign of the beast will be upon your brow; the stigma of infamy on your nation, ye of little faith.

Was It "Fit to Print"?

A WIDELY read metropolitan journal that has chosen for its motto, "All the news that's fit to print" considered Easter Sunday an appropriate day for publishing in its "magazine section" a particularly offensive attack on Christianity. A Boston physician, leaving his legitimate domain of medicine, has been dogmatizing about the "complete subjectivity" of all religion, the "eroto-genetic" basis of every form of worship and the "psycho-physiological urge" of which religious ceremonials are the expression. He flouts the "belief in miracles, in transubstantiation, in virgin births," maintains that "costly churches" and a "large and prosperous clergy" have no right to exist, and practically asserts that the Church's Eucharistic devotion has an origin like that of certain pagan cults.

Had these "advanced" views been left in the magazine of "religious psychology" in which they first appeared, few, no doubt, would have been harmed by them. But since the New York Times, which numbers among its readers thousands of Catholics, considered the doctor's insulting paper "fit to print" and that too on Easter Sunday, it is high time a vigorous protest were made. For publishing such wicked nonsense as the article entitled "Is Sex the Basis of Religion?" the Times owes its Christian readers an apology.

Does It Pay?

NOT many years ago a historian, or rather a man who wrote a history, taking a comprehensive view of Christianity, expressed his surprise at the fact that the Catholic Church was continually beginning new religious orders. The old orders grow rich, lose their spirit and efficiency, and then comes another return to poverty and austerity. This process is a weakness according to the professor who wrote a history. It is indeed a confession of the weakness of human nature, but it is an exhibition of strength in the Church. To meet the same disease with the same effective remedy, shows wisdom on the part of the physician. To cure human ills with the remedy prescribed by Christ, manifests divine wisdom in Christianity. When the whole world is run on a financial basis, when "Does it pay?" is the eternal question of the human race, it is courageous and bracing and immensely uplifting to have a few take literally the invitation: "Go; sell all thou hast and give to the poor."

The dollar is a precious thing. At an auction you would rate the value of an article very high, if you saw a thousand bidding for it. How many hands are now reached out, yearning for the dollar around which your enamored fingers cling? Wife and child and school and church and taxes and comrades and a host of others are bidding fast and furious for that precious coin. In what direction can it roll? A sphere represents the most unstable equilibrium. A sphere rests on one point and waits but a touch to speed in any one of a countless number of ways. Down all those ways your precious dollar may roll. Yet despite its unstable equilibrium the dollar resists the touch. The earth, the sun, the moon and the other great spheres with all their possible ways of travel keep faithfully to their allotted paths under the sway of gravity. Your dollar holds back, too, and gravity must modestly retire to an inferior position when compared with the mighty force which clings to a dollar and which may be summed up in the fateful words, "Does it pay?"

"Does it pay?" is the highwayman on life's broad roads. Every one must stand and deliver at his imperious commands. Not the rich only but the poor, too; not the strong simply but widows and orphans. Some brigands had a sort of chivalry like that of the burglar not so long since, who entered a house to rob it but, finding in it only a poor, sick woman, gave her a contribution and departed. Let this question of Mammon echo persistently in the soul behind every word and act and thought and desire, and that soul becomes as merciless as it is mercenary. Friendship and the love of kin and the worship of God and high honor and conscience, all must cash in to the monster Mammon and his one, unvarying question. "A blaze in the east, a blaze overhead, a blaze in the west," so appeared the tropical sun to the poet. The blaze which makes its dazzling track across the sky of the soul-miser, the blaze which blinds his eyes to all else, is that orb of gold whose dawn is red, whose noonday is deadly and whose setting is bloody. The mighty dollar is the center of the soul system where "Does it pay?" is master. "Does it pay?" is the single standard of gold which rules and ruins the noblest.

There is one consolation. The world hates a miser. Treating and the giving of useless presents are indeed abuses, but they have their good points. They are often the tribute miserliness pays to human respect. It takes nearly the unanimous scorn of the human race to pry open the purse of "Does it pay?" We recommend this tyranny to the consideration of the socialistic state and ask it, when it is finally established, to make Santa Claus a cabinet officer in charge of the Department of Treating and Gifts. Nay rather, as you have made your soul a den of thievery with that foul robber, "Does it pay?" at the gateway, pray and get your friends to pray for the cleansing lash of the poor man of Nazareth. Then we shall need no socialistic state. "Does it pay" will lose its power; greed will disappear; charity will reign supreme and men will become your brothers. This is more than silver and gold.

LITERATURE

Ernest Dowson

BELONGING rather to gossip than to literary history, the following anecdote is nevertheless significant when considered merely as an illustrative legend. A certain London publisher, it is said, recently had in his possession a notebook that had been found, after his death, among the effects of Lionel Johnson. The poet had scribbled in it memoranda of all sorts: notes for essays, stray epigrams, rough drafts of poems. He had also copied into it, from books and magazines, bits of prose and verse that gave him pleasure. Well, one day this friend said to Johnson's loyal friend, Miss Louise Imogen Guiney—and, by the way, Miss Guiney is not my authority for this story—"Do you know, I have found in this notebook an unpublished poem by Lionel Johnson! It is very beautiful, far better than any of Johnson's published poems. I'll read it to you." Thereupon he opened the notebook and began to declaim:

> Last night, ah, yesternight, between her lips and mine
> There fell thy shadow, Cynara!

Of course Lionel Johnson, like every other lover of good poetry, had felt the charm of Ernest Dowson's now famous poem which is headed by the phrase, "Non Sum Qualis Eram Bonæ Sub Regno Cynaræ," and had hastily copied it in his notebook, perhaps from Dowson's manuscript at some meeting of the Rhymers' Club. The point of this story is that the publisher, knowing Johnson chiefly as a celebrant of the Catholic faith, attributed to him not one of Dowson's poems about nuns, or Extreme Unction, or the Blessed Sacrament, but a lyric which at least in tradition and phrasing is obviously pagan.

Out of the mouths of babes and publishers! That wise and sympathetic critic, Miss Katherine Brégy, has justly praised the lovely poetry which resulted from Ernest Dowson's return to the faith of his ancestors. She has demonstrated, for all time, the genuineness of his Catholicism, and made Mr. Victor Plarr's recent sneer at his dead friend's conversion seem the most futile thing in his entertaining but ineffective book. It would be absurd for me to attempt to add to Miss Brégy's interpretative appreciations of the "sculptural beauty" of Dowson's religious poems. But, like the simple-minded publisher previously mentioned, I find indications, if not of piety, at least of normality, sanity, wholesomeness, virtue, in nearly every poem which this so-called "decadent" wrote.

There are, and there have always been since sin first came into the world, genuine "decadents." That is, there have been writers who have devoted all their energies and talents to the cause of evil, who have consistently and sincerely opposed Christian morality, and zealously endeavored to make the worse appear the better cause. But every poet who lays a lyric wreath at a heathen shrine, who sings the delights of immorality, or hashish, or suicide, or mayhem, is not a decadent: often he is merely weak-minded. The true decadent, to paraphrase a famous saying, wears his vices lightly, like a flower. He really succeeds in making vice seem picturesque and amusing and even attractive.

Now, this is exactly what Ernest Dowson never could do. He was a member, it will be remembered, of that little band of "esthetic" poets which was called the Rhymers' Club. With them he spent certain evenings at the Cheshire Cheese and there he drank absinthe. This is a significant and symbolic fact. Not in some ominous Parisian cellar, but beneath the beamed ceiling of a most British inn, still stained with smoke from the pipe of Dr. Samuel Johnson, among thick mutton chops and tankards of musty ale, in a cloud of sweet-scented steam that rose from the parted crust of the magnificent pigeon-pie, Ernest Dowson drank absinthe.

Of course it is true—more's the pity!—that in the melancholy years just before his death he drank absinthe in places where it is terribly fitting to drink absinthe. But this does not destroy the splendid symbolism of his act of drinking absinthe in the Cheshire Cheese. In his poems, he is always drinking absinthe in the Cheshire Cheese. The wickedness in his poems and in his prose-sketches are always as affected and incongruous as is that pallid medicine in any honest tavern.

He tried hard to be pagan. In the manner of Mr. Swinburne, he exclaimed: "Goddess the laughter-loving, Aphrodite, befriend! Let me have peace of thee, truce of thee, golden one, send!" And not even Mr. Swinburne ever wrote lines so absolutely unconvincing. He said, "I go where the wind blows, Chloe, and am not sorry at all." And from this lyric no one can fail to get the impression that the poet was very sorry indeed. He imitated, even less successfully than Oscar Wilde, the unpleasant prose poems of Baudelaire, and he made the very worst of all English versions of Paul Verlaine's "Colloque Sentimental."

When Dowson took hashish during his student days, Mr. Arthur Symons tells us, it was before a large and festive company of friends. I do not think that he convinced them that he was that supposedly romantic character, an habitual user of the drug. The hashish, so to speak, in his poems is similarly incongruous and unconvincing. He was an accomplished artist in words, a delicate, sensitive and graceful genius, but he was no more fitted to be a pagan than to be a policeman. And so, in his best-known poem, he uses all the pagan properties, all the splendors of sin's pageantry, but his theme, his over-mastering thought—very different from the over-mastering thought of, say, Mr. Arthur Symons in similar circumstances—is a soul-shaking lament for his stained faithfulness, for his treason to the Catholic ideal of chastity.

He could not write poems that really were pagan. He was not a true decadent. And for this undoubtedly he now is thanking God. He had his foolish hours: he sometimes misused his gift of song. But—and this is the important thing about it—he did not know how to misuse it successfully. The real Ernest Dowson was not the picturesque vagabond about whom Mr. Arthur Symons and Mr. Victor Plarr have written, but the man who with all his heart praised "meekness and vigilance and chastity," who "was faithful" in his pathetic, ineffective fashion, but who knew at least the fidelity of his eternal Mother, who, in Miss Brégy's beautiful words, "laid his broken body in consecrated ground and followed this bruised soul with her pitiful, asperging prayers."

JOYCE KILMER.

REVIEWS

History of Education. By PATRICK J. MCCORMICK, S.T.L., Ph.D. Washington: The Catholic Educational Press.

The history of education has been written in English before, but rarely, if ever, without either belittling or ignoring the educational influence of the Catholic Church. Dr. McCormick's book is, of course, very different. He treats of ancient education, Christian education, Renaissance and Reformation and modern education. The treatment of each of these divisions is unusually adequate for a text-book; the language is a model of clearness, and the references to pedagogical literature are comprehensive and abundant, and there is a gratifying absence of polemics when treating of false educational systems.

To those who still cling to the hallucination that everything good in educational theory and practice is something ultra-modern, a diligent perusal of this book is recommended. Therein they will learn that the Fathers of the Church and early ecclesiastical writers were extremely practical pedagogues, besides being holy men and great theologians; that many of them, notably Origen, cultivated and recommended the study of the natural sciences; that free popular education flourished in the early monastic schools and all through the Middle Ages; that industrial and vocational training was widely developed in these schools all over Europe, and that women and girls were admitted into the schools and universities. Furthermore, they will learn that classical studies flourished centuries before the Renaissance, that the scholastics were devoted students of the natural sciences, and that "It seems safe to assume that, at the end of the Middle Ages, the entire population of the towns, with the exception of the lowest classes, was able to read and write." What, then, becomes of the pre-Reformation illiteracy bogey of a great many modern writers on educational history? For writing this excellent book Dr. McCormick deserves the hearty gratitude of Catholic educators in English-speaking countries. Catholic teachers should be familiar with it. No Catholic college student should fail to read it during his college course, and Catholic students and teachers in non-Catholic and State normal schools and colleges should see that this "History of Education" finds a place among the reference books. A. J. M.

Shakespere on the Stage. (Second Series.) By WILLIAM WINTER. New York: Moffat, Yard & Co. $3.00.

A new volume from the still unimpaired pen of William Winter is always a decided and thrice welcome acquisition to the library of students of the drama and dramatic criticism. But the sane views, refined taste and scholarly language of the venerable dean of American dramatic critics will prove especially refreshing at the present moment, coming as they do, on the heels of much ponderous nonsense from Mr. Frank Harris, who has recently been comparing the artistic faculties in Shakespere and Christ, respectively. That is the sort of Stratfordianism that drives men into the ranks of the Baconians.

Mr. Winter's book, containing his notes on "Twelfth Night," "Romeo and Juliet," "As You Like It," "King Lear," "The Taming of the Shrew" and "Julius Cæsar," is intended to embody in permanent form the miscellaneous commentary which the author has elaborated during his half-century and more of devoted study of stage affairs in America. In his early days, the young critic found that the old chronicles were deficient in one respect: they lacked specific information as to the methods of the great performers, the expedients of their stage "business," and other valuable details regarding acting, interpretation, setting and costume. Being persuaded that sound judgment as to acting in the present should be informed and aided by precise knowledge of acting in the past, he early set himself to discover the traditions of the past, and to preserve in his current writings the usages of the present. And now, in the evening of a well-filled life, for Mr. Winter must be close to eighty, he is re-editing former studies and presenting in compendious form this stage history of the Shakesperean dramas.

The result is admirable. The author's knowledge of his beloved art is unimpeachable; his judgment is that of the trained connoisseur, gentle and kind when possible, but unerring in detecting fraud and mediocrity. His English is classical, and will exalt into the realms of true literature what might easily have degenerated into a mere historical and biographical dictionary. For example, his closing paragraphs on "Romeo and Juliet" have all the sadness, tenderness and sweetness that oftentimes creep over the "world-worn dreamer," and which, granted power of expression, furnish the groundwork for a literary masterpiece. But it might be noted before leaving this particular gem, that Mr. Winter was in much better company when alone with his voices from the past than when, at the end of the chapter, he invokes that sad prophet of paganism, Swinburne.

As in the previous volumes, there are numerous excellent illustrations, and reproductions of old prints and photographs. The three remaining volumes of this series, Mr. Winter promises to have ready for us, if life is spared to him. With Furness as textual editor and Winter as historical interpreter, American scholarship should no longer be tempted to look to England or Germany for authentic and discerning Shakesperean commentary. E. A. W.

In the Oregon Country. By GEORGE PALMER PUTNAM. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.75.

This is a healthy story of outdoor life in the Northwest. The writer sketches this great playground of America with an enthusiasm born of love of the land and admiration for the spirit of the West. Greeley's dictum never sounded truer than to-day, but the present writer would revise it: "Come West, young man, and help the country grow." The central topic of these sketches of the open is the Oregon country, with trips, delightfully narrated almost in guide-book detail, into the Inland Empire and Puget Sound country of Washington, with peeps into the matchless Sierras and the incomparable Yosemite. We follow the writer in his trip along the Columbia to the Dalles, follow the canoe trip on the Deschutes, and Shasta, Hood, Adams, Olympus and Rainier are all introduced. The author is partial to his snow-quilted neighbors, and his chapter on the Olympus should be read by Americans who forget their own Alps of the Pacific.

The book throughout is rich in word-pictures of the land the Westerner loves to call "God's country." There is an interesting chapter on the railroad war, four years ago, between the rival Harriman and Hill interests in their fight for the favored route to open up Central Oregon. Mr. Putnam is, or rather was, an Easterner who almost literally "hiked" from Portland, Maine, to her big namesake on the Willamette, and in six years has become as confirmed a "booster" as the most enthusiastic Oregonian. Primarily the sketches deal with outdoor life; here and there, however, interesting problems for the West are touched on. The book can be recommended to all lovers of healthy outdoor life at its best, to all who desire to get acquainted with the Great West, as well as to the many who will make the Golden Gate their objective during the coming six months. The volume is finely illustrated. W. J. B.

The Early Christian Church, from Ignatius to Augustine. By GEORGE HODGES. Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.75.

On a complex background, in which are depicted political and religious Rome, together with Græco-Oriental syncretism, the heroism of the early martyrs, and the primitive heresies, Mr. Hodges, Dean of the Episcopal Theological School of Cambridge, traces the constitutional, liturgical, mystical and doctrinal evolution of the Christian Church. The process is from the simple and economic organization of Apostolic times, from a faith grounded on the expectancy of the speedy return of Christ, from simple forms of worship, to the organization of the Ecclesia, the doctrines of Augustine, and the ornate liturgies. In a word, Mr. Hodges seems to hold that Christianity evolved from Protestantism to Catholicism. Here he is in error. The Catholic Church is found in the Gospels and the writings of Clement of Rome, which he neglects, and the testimony of Ignatius, which he misinterprets. The words of Ignatius are plain enough: "Obedience to the bishop is obedience to God. . . . He who does anything apart from the bishop serves the devil," and yet Mr. Hodges understands them in a practical rather than in an ecclesiastical sense. Clement of Rome writes that the Apostles, sent by Jesus Christ, constituted bishops and deacons, and that these transmitted their office to their successors. Christ himself testified: "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I shall build my church." In the light of these statements it is evident that Mr. Hodges exalts the abnormal and temporary aspects of Christianity, such as the existence of the charismata, to the detriment of its normal and permanent aspects, such as the constitution of a Christian society and its divinely appointed rulers. Even Harnack finds essentials of Catholicism in the Apostolic Age, and Lake, as regards the nature of the Sacraments, proclaims Catholicism to be nearer to Primitive Christianity than Protestantism. Like Nelson at Copenhagen, Mr. Hodges has put the telescope to a blind eye. J. T. L.

Poems. By Robert Hugh Benson. New York: P. J. Kenedy & Sons. $0.75.

"It is the test and triumph of Mgr. Benson's achievements," writes Wilfrid Meynell in an introductory note to this dainty little volume, "that his origin was swiftly forgotten in his own originality, and that he became far too eminent in himself to be thought or spoken of any more as his eminent father's son." These two-dozen sets of verses, largely autobiographical in character, are as thoroughly Bensonian as the author's prose and are sure to be treasured by his friends. In poems like the "Lines" written before his conversion, "Visions of the Night," "The Invitation," "A Halt," "Christian Evidences," and "The Priest's Lament," Mgr. Benson lays bare his soul. In the last-named verses, he had complained: "Lord, see what wounds on me Thy burden makes!" and hears the answer:

Son, turn a moment, see
Is that blood thine?
Who is it shares thy yoke with thee,
Treads foot by foot with thee the road?
Whose shoulder bears the heavier load.
Is it not Mine?

"Savonarola Moriturus," who "Dreamed that the King of the Sky should be King of the Earth that He trod" is another striking poem and "The Teresian Contemplative" is vividly described as

She moves in tumult; round her lies
The silence of the world of grace;
The twilight of our mysteries
Shines like high noonday on her face;
Our piteous guesses, dim with fears,
She touches, handles, sees and rears.

There are also several good translations in the book, a beautiful "Christmas Carol" and a fine portrait of the author. In an appendix Canon Sharrock describes Mgr. Benson's last days. A memoir has been written by Mr. Arthur Benson, the convert's brother, and a "Benson Memorial Fund" has been started for the completion of the little church at Buntingford, England, the novelist had begun. Americans who wish to contribute should send checks to Lloyds Bank, Ltd., 33 Belgrave Road, London, S. W. W. D.

The Confessions of Frederick the Great, with Treitschke's Life of Frederick the Great. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.25.

The confessions of Frederick the Great differ widely from those of St. Augustine. The latter bewails his evil deeds and glorifies the mercy of God in his regard. Frederick acknowledges none of his misdeeds, probably did not believe in God, boasts of his principles (or lack of them) and in everything seeks his own aggrandizement. "The true religion of a prince," he says, "is his interest and his glory." Here Frederick is first, God, as known and worshiped in religion, must be subservient. Self is the keynote of his life, for this he drilled his boorish subjects and made of them a manly race, conscious of their nationality and their worth; for this he warred and stole provinces; for this he fought against the great house of Austria and made Prussia a power in Europe. Treitschke in the rhapsody called "The Life of Frederick the Great" closes his eyes to the evil and sees only the good in Frederick, just as many an English writer will grow enthusiastic over the exploits of Marlborough or Nelson, forgetting these men's shortcomings. "The Confessions" and the "Life" are, of course, published just now as an anti-German war-book, and are by no means calculated to foster in American hearts the spirit of neutrality. P. J. D.

Making the Most of One's Mind. By John Adams, Professor of Education, University of London. New York: George H. Doran Co. $1.00.

The writer of this book is an educator of experience who has put into a few hundred pages some very practical suggestions that will prove helpful to teacher and student. The chapters on reading, note making, translation, essay writing and examinations are especially good. The sub-title, "A Guide for All Students," really indicates the value of Professor Adams's book, for the hints that are given in a style at once easy and convincing are really excellent. Self-development, self-realization, the need of personal effort is insisted upon. "The teacher's aim should be to make himself dispensable. No doubt, as teacher he may still be of the greatest possible service, but as educator he has succeeded only when his occupation is gone." The Catholic educator, however, can scarcely read a plan of campaign for "making the best of one's mind" that leaves God out of the counting and really think the title justifiable. So the book is by no means "an introduction to a liberal education in the arts and literature and above all in the great art of life," as the volume's jacket claims. The reader will close the book with the satisfaction of having garnered a great deal of useful knowledge bearing upon many phases of self-development, but without entering the borderland of "the great art of life." G. C. T.

Visions and Revisions. By John Cowper Powys. New York: G. Arnold Shaw. $2.00.

"Visions and Revisions" open with Rabelais and close with Walt Whitman. Startled, perhaps, to find themselves elbowing each other in the mazes of this literary evocation, Shakespere and Dostoievsky, Nietzsche, El Greco, Hardy and a dozen others pass before the seer. Mr. Powys yields himself plastically and unreservedly to the spell of these "planetary creators." He does not pretend to measure them by any very definite esthetic or moral standard. He divests himself of opinions and in pure, passionate humility thrills responsive to the music of these masters. He applies but one standard and that an elusive one, the "grand style." Judged even by that measure, some of his figures might, on the verdict of the vast majority, be barred from a place of honor in his gallery of worthies. In the turbid stream, for instance, of Whitman's so-called verse, and embedded in thickest layer of ooze and silt, there are undoubtedly a few grains of virgin gold. But what claim has the author of "Leaves of Grass" to be considered a representative of the "grand style"?

Mr. Powys writes with enthusiasm, with vigor, at times with originality, but sounds a too persistent and piercing note of clamorous emphasis. The principle, moreover, with which he starts is unsound. He contents himself with being a kind of æolian harp, its chords vibrating at will, under the touch of Nietzsche and Rabelais, Dickens and Poe! The genuine critic must do more. He must summon his impressions before a higher court, allow all his faculties to serve on the jury and to give their verdict. He must judge his emotions by the laws of reason, virtue, truth. Mr. Powys divides the critic into compartments. He is an impressionist. But our impressions are too often unsafe guides. They have to be checked and controlled. In this lies the central mistake of a book which in many respects is stimulating and interesting. In some of these "Visions and Revisions" this mistake is aggravated by a veiled but none the less painfully apparent grossness of moral standards and ideals.

There are not a few errata in the book: "Barrés" for Barrès (p. 75), "Orguz" for Orgaz (p. 76), "Graugousier" for Grandgousier (p. 31), "le grand Penetre" for le grand Peut-être (p. 33), "Dostoivsky" for Dostoievsky (p. 78), "Quintlian" for Quintilian (p. 96), "flamantia mania" for flammantia mœnia (p. 156), "libre vers" for the real French, vers libre (p. 283), and we positively shudder at "Santa Maria, . . . in hora mortis nostra!"

J. C. R.

Millard Fillmore. By WILLIAM E. GRIFFIS, D.D., L.H.D. Ithaca, N. Y.: Andrew & Church.

After reading this well-written biography the reviewer was more convinced than ever that the burning questions of compromise and settlement, and more especially the men who for twenty years and longer before the Civil War grappled with them, are well worth our patient study to-day. The need, too, of remodeling our notions of Millard Fillmore's character, which is commonly thought to be that of a rather weak opportunist, becomes imperative. Instead of a machine politician, the author depicts him as a staunch, consistent, progressive statesman, whose foresight opened the rich marts of Japan to the commerce of the world; whose energy promptly and effectively baffled the Cuba filibustering expedition; whose courage did not shrink from sacrificing his personal chances for reelection, first by signing, and later by carrying into effect, the "Fugitive Slave Law." To bring into prominence the life and actions of such a man, and to set them in their true light, has been the effort of Mr. Griffis, and he has done it well. Without belittling others he has exalted his hero to a well-merited eminence, following in his method the spirit, as he himself says, of the great Jesuit, Leonard Perin's "Rules of Good Behavior."

M. J. S.

The Falconer of God and Other Poems. By WILLIAM ROSE BENÉT. New Haven: Yale University Press. $1.00.

The author of this book thanks fifteen different magazines for the reprint of his verses, and they all would plead guilty to catering to the multitude except perhaps Poet-Lore, Poetry and the Poetry Review. In "People" Mr. Benét humorously and popularly caricatures toadying to the mob. Another evidence of the popular tendency may be discerned in the bewildering variety of meters and rhymes. From the jog-trot of Pope all the way to the craw-fish amble of Whitman, with little, however, of the two extremes, this falconer pounces on all the styles. He is as opulent in rhymes as Swinburne and but faintly disguises their music by imbedding them in long lines. Mr. Benét is a diligent student of all the poets, many of whom are found in the "Schoolroom of the Poets," where Goldsmith seems more lovable than Chatterton, as he is vastly more popular. "The Intrepid Mariner" introduces Shelley speaking in a Browning dramatic monologue, and it is an excellent talk with a tragic end. Whether descriptions that overwhelm by romantic wealth, as in "May Celebrants," are preferred, or those that suggest with Homeric clear-cut simplicity as where the "Street Lamp" "sheds on the pave its careful boundary," readers will be satisfied with the falconer's prey. They will find Kipling popularity of detail and dialect in "On the Waterfront" and elsewhere, and Kipling matter with Swinburne meter in the "Foreign Sailor." "The Cats of Cobblestone Street" will recall the witches of "Macbeth" without the dramatic propriety of its prototype.

Mr. Benét never comes down to the Tupper level, but "His Worst Enemy" and "The Good Counsel" represent the tendency. More frequently the good and evil wing his falcon flight with eloquence, not so happily in one or two sordid subjects as "The Laughing Woman," where it is hard to see glimpses of good through the black evil, but very happily in "The Man," a noble, religious poem, and quite happily in "Reprisals," which should be read by all women and by all but a few men. We are heirs of all the ages and Mr. Benét, who writes things worth while, has not been disinherited.

F. P. D.

A Pilgrim's Scrip. By R. CAMPBELL THOMPSON. New York: John Lane. $3.50.

As excavator of Nineveh in the company of Mr. King, and of Carchemish, and other sites, Mr. Thompson has contributed scientific articles and monographs to such publications as the "Proceedings of the Society of Biblical Archeology." These publications are necessarily very limited in their circle of readers nor do they admit of popular writing. And so Mr. Thompson has set down, with facile pen, in highly imaginative language, the interesting experiences he had in Mesopotamia, Sinai, the Sudan and elsewhere. He has given us a pleasant and instructive book. Few have toiled as much as he in the ruins of Semitic, Hittite and other civilizations and, of these few, exceedingly few details of natural scenery—such as mountains against the horizon, the tone-color of clouds, "the hush of the star-shine"; and still fewer pick up those odd bits of accurate folk-lore that are so characteristic of the present work. One who has left the beaten path followed by tourists in the Orient knows how far from exaggeration are some of the medical prescriptions Mr. Thompson describes. For a sure cure for rheumatism, for instance, is an ointment of worms steeped in olive oil. The heads of young mice, if soaked in oil, make a good liniment for kinks in the joints, and young puppies are the proper diet for consumptives. The only jarring feature in Mr. Thompson's book is its occasional jargon. He revels in words that are rare, archaic, poetic and, now and then, of his own coinage. On one page we find "poluphloisboisterous," "pompholygopaphlasmatic," "trailbaston patriarch," and another instance of obscure expression of a simple thought is "theologomachy at Sabbatothysia."

W. F D.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

We lately received the "Annuario Pontificio per L'Anno 1915" (Typografia Poliglotta Vaticana, Roma, $1.40), the official directory of the Universal Church. This useful volume contains a complete list of the popes, giving the nationality, date of accession and length of reign of each one. There are now fifty-nine cardinals: Cardinal Netto, created in 1884, is the dean of the Sacred College, twenty-nine are Italians, and nine cardinals died last year. There are 14 patriarchal sees, 208 archbishoprics, 900 bishoprics, 546 titular sees, 22 sedes nullius, 80 sees or vicariates following the Oriental Rite, 13 apostolic delegations, 164 vicariates apostolic, 65 prefectures apostolic, nearly 2,500 domestic prelates and 89 religious Orders or Congregations of men. To writers, editors and publicists the "Annuario Pontificio" is indispensable.

The current number of Studies, that admirable Irish quarterly, opens with a timely paper by Professor J. M. O'Sullivan on "German and Slav in the Middle Ages." It is a corrective for C. R. L. Fletcher's recent volume on "The Making of Western Europe." In "Ideals at Stake," A. J. Rahilly shows that the present social and international chaos of Europe is the outcome of naturalism. Father Corcoran concludes that "State Monopoly in French Education" would mean "State monopoly of free thought." Sir Bertram C. A. Windle shows what a menace to morality "The Latest Gospel of Science" is. W. F. Butler continues to the end of Elizabeth's reign the history of confiscation in Ireland. François Veuillot shows how much the Church in France owes to the late Count de Mun and Father A. M. MacSweeney, O.P., contributes an interesting "Study of Poverty in Cork City." This scholarly "review of letters, philosophy and science" should be found in our parish libraries and in public reading rooms.

President Wilson's lay-sermon, "When a Man Comes to Himself" (Harper's, $0.50), reads like an address to a graduating class and seems reminiscent of the author's Princeton days. Like every piece of literature that comes from Mr. Wilson's pen, this essay is excellently written, and while it contains sentences over which the newspaper paragraphers have, of course, made merry, "When a Man Comes to Himself" abounds in shrewd bits of wisdom and happily turned phrases. He writes, for instance:

> Mr. Bagehot used to say that a bachelor was "an amateur in life," and wit and wisdom are married in the jest. A man who lives for himself has not begun to live—has yet to learn his use, and his real pleasure, too, in the world. It is not necessary he should marry to find himself out, but it is necessary he should love. Men have come to themselves serving their mothers with an unselfish devotion, or their sisters, or a cause for whose sake they forsook ease and left off thinking of themselves.

The essay ends with a fine tribute to the power of Christianity in the world of to-day.

Walter A. Dyer's "Pierrot, Dog of Belgium" (Doubleday, $1.00) and Josephine Scribner Gates's "The Land of Delight; Child Life on a Pony Farm" (Houghton, $1.00), are well-told animal stories that the children will enjoy. The first book follows the career of little Lisa's canine friend from the time of his joyous puppyhood, through the perilous days of the German invasion, when he served his country by drawing about a machine gun, till the night he returned home covered with honorable wounds. The other books tell of the splendid time a flock of little boys and girls had during a visit to "Old Aunt Mary's," where every child had a Shetland pony to ride. Both volumes are well illustrated.

It is surprising that a publishing house of Houghton, Mifflin's standing should bring out such a manifestly fraudulent and mendacious book as "The Secret of an Empress." It is supposed to be the autobiography of Countess Zenardi Landi, who calls herself the fourth child of Emperor Franz Joseph and his wife Elizabeth. That the author might grow up free from the soul-repressing atmosphere of the court, her mother, we are asked to believe, gave her to a bourgeois Lutheran family to rear. A Jesuit, however, whose normal hue was yellow, but who turned green when enraged, taught the child catechism. The Empress Elizabeth, according to the testimony of this precious "daughter," was an "anti-clerical," a pantheist, and perhaps a vulgar intriguer. This attack on the memory of a pure and noble woman no French or Italian firm would publish. The author protests that she is a Catholic, but no religious scruples seem to have kept her from securing a divorce in this country from her lawful husband in order to marry Count Landi.

From Tequi, Paris, comes a small French "Catechism of the Religious Life" (1 franc). The late Mgr. Delong, Bishop of Nevers, is the author. Vocation, the vows and virtues of the religious state are dealt with briefly and clearly.——"What Faith Really Means" (Herder $0.15) is a simple explanation which Father Graham of Motherwell has composed in order to dispel the darkness of Protestant minds with regard to what Catholic faith means. The author is a convert and has selected for explanation those topics with which Protestants find most difficulty. The pamphlet will be useful in the class for converts.——Under the title, "Memoirs of Zi Pre" (Herder, $0.50), Bishop Dunne of Peoria has written a companion volume for his "Polemic Chat." This book contains a series of elementary Catholic instructions. All the subjects treated are woven story-like into the "Memoirs" and are simply and clearly discussed.——The latest number of "The Angelus Series" is "The Wit and Wisdom of John Ayscough" (Benziger, $0.50), which Scannell O'Neill has judiciously gathered from that excellent author's writings.——"Saints and Saintly Dominicans" (John Murphy, Baltimore) is a book of short meditations, one for each day of the year, based, as a rule, on the lives of the numerous men and women who reached lofty holiness by following the rule of the Order of Preachers. Father Thomas à Kempis Reilly, O.P., has edited the volume.

Every one, whose copy of Whiston's translation of "The Antiquities of the Jews" and of "The Wars" became properly dog-eared in the days of his youth, will recall two ways in which he was impressed. At first he was carried away by the lurid scenes with which the work abounded; wonderful battles and scenes of blood, most satisfying to the youthful mind. Later, though just as surely as the book became dog-eared, there arose a feeling of antagonism for the narrator, for was not this man Josephus dangerously akin to a traitor to his country and his people? And as the eye grew more discerning, other unlovely traits in his character, such as his vanity and obsequiousness, became conspicuous. Yet, if we discard Josephus, whom else have we to lift the veil from many of those long-gone days? In his "Josephus" (Jewish Publication Society, Philadelphia), Mr. Norman Bentwich makes a critical examination of the man and the book which will confirm the foregoing opinion.

In "The Mirror" (Herder, $0.60) Mary F. Nixon-Roulet, the author of numerous popular juveniles, tells the interesting adventures of Carlo, a little Italian boy, who was kidnaped in Chicago. But Miss Alice takes care that all turns out right.——Those who have seen the fine moving picture entertainment, "In the Land of the Head-Hunters," the photographs for which Mr. Edward S. Curtis took during a long sojourn among the British Columbia Indians, will be interested to learn that he now has out a book about that tribe. Thirty half-tone pictures from the scenario are reproduced to illustrate the text. (The World Book Co., Yonkers, N Y., $1.20.)——While ordering a febrifuge or a cough-mixture for their patients, doctors might, with due caution, add a few words of advice, culled from the "Prescriptions" of R. C. Cabot, M.D. (Houghton Mifflin, $0.50.) These maxims and aphorisms, gathered from their author's larger work: "What Men Live By," "will make Work easier, Play more rational, Love more beautiful, Religion more real." So the editor, Edith Motter Lamb, assures us. Judged by his pithy reflections, Dr. Cabot is a genial, serious, high-principled gentleman. His counsels will not cure the grosser evils of our nature. But they can prepare the way though a slight precipitate of pantheism lingers elusively in the good doctor's prescriptions.——"Emmanuel" (McVey, Philadelphia, $1.00) is a devotional work by Archbishop John Joseph Keane. The author imagines Our Saviour holding successive councils at Bethlehem, Nazareth, Calvary, Rome and Mt. Olivet and applying the Gospel principles to the present state of the world.

EDUCATION

Inflated Verbal Currency

WE know what inflated currency means. It is the stagnation which an oversupply of irredeemable paper can inflict on the nation. We know, too, how difficult it is to apply a remedy for this evil. Inflate your money and you depreciate the mechanism of exchange, and the greater the inflation, the more hopeless the depreciation. With its mechanism valueless, exchange of products, and thus industry and earnings, come to a standstill.

Before all exchange of products, however, comes the first and most necessary of all exchanges, viz., the exchange of ideas. You can not have industry without the one; but you can not have society, hardly thought or life itself, without the other. For the transfer of ideas, you need a currency even more than for the exchange of products. We know and handle the products themselves, apart from the money that we exchange them with; but ideas are delivered to us and sent from us veiled in words. Words are the currency, the mechanism of exchange for ideas. If the depreciation of money has at times been so disastrous, what will be the result of a depreciation of the intellectual currency of words?

A FLOOD OF "BROMIDES"

Few will deny that there is such a depreciation at the present time. The existence of "bromides" is a symptom. Nor do we need to go far to discover the inflation of language which is the cause of it. If nobody were allowed to issue a phrase without a United States certificate that an exactly corresponding idea had been duly deposited in his mental treasury, how many of our preachers and writers and talkers could continue their business? The market is flooded with these verbal greenbacks. Unfortunately the issue is not restricted to Congress or the President or any other responsible party, but is free for all. They can be picked up on every hand. You need only read some current essayists, or subscribe to a philanthropic magazine, to learn that "the spiritual and individual appeal of feminism is to the waxing social consciousness throughout the world," or that "the restatement of faith in terms of equal rights and the recasting of work in the mold of democracy are shown to be essentially involved in the gospel of the awakening Church."

Note that we do not stigmatize these utterances as valueless. There is comfort in knowing, for instance, as a "grip-you-hard" advertisement puts it, that "health is too vital, too strenuous, too energetic and expansive for bottle or box to hold it." The inflated greenbacks were not valueless. You could buy a cake of soap for a hundred dollars worth of them. In like manner these words have some value. But they mean very little in comparison with what a word ought to mean. They are inflated. Their value depends on the credit of those who use them. There are even artificial means for creating this credit. But take away this credit; meet a miserly critic, and their exchange value drops.

THOUGHT LOST IN WORDS

Such a devaluation of language is certainly regrettable, especially as it appears most in those fields of discussion which require clear expression as well as clear thought. Questions of ethics, of society and religion are often obscure enough in themselves, without being further darkened by cloudy phraseology. We could come to an understanding much more readily if we had only to adjust ourselves to our opponent's thought, without the added problem of unravelling his skein of language. The result is that public discussion becomes frequently a mere matching of phrase against phrase. "Personal liberty," for instance, is pitted against "social responsibility"; and without definitely understanding the meaning of either term, the public looks on to see which bantam will win out. Such a habit increases the very evil from which it springs, viz., the inability to distinguish between thought and language.

Lack of training, rather than lack of intelligence has produced this inability. Many people who use words without any definite relation to thought are at bottom as intelligent as any one else, but their deficiency comes from an educational defect. By education we learn to think; by it we learn to speak and write; but there should also be a factor in the process of education which will establish precisely the habit of abstracting ideas from conventional modes of expression, and so getting a clear notion of language in its relation to thought. The more widely you vary different expressions of the same idea, the better is your hold on that idea; and the more just your estimate of the value of language as an expression of ideas. Synonyms, definitions and paraphrases accomplish this end to a certain degree, as well as the contrast of learned and popular expressions. If you understand, for instance, that "Christian chivalry" may be expressed by "honoring woman as the weaker vessel," to use St. Peter's phrase; or that it is immaterial, so far as ideas go, whether you say "the exercise of parental devotion" or "looking after the children," you will acquire first, a somewhat clearer idea of chivalry, or parental devotion, as the case may be, and secondly, a better estimate of language as an instrument; as the haidmaid, not the mistress, of thought.

THE VALUE OF TRANSLATING

The most thorough-going treatment, however, is the study of a foreign language, and particularly of a form of expression entirely at variance with our own. A modern language can hardly offer this. No matter how different the verbal or grammatical form may be, there is a community of idiom, despite the numerous variations, among all modern languages. In all of them the distinctly modern turn of speech remains, with the modern trait of preferring abstractions, where the ancients used concrete terms. The Russian or the Frenchman, the German or the Spaniard, will all use, for instance, and understand such an expression as "national profit" or "social betterment." We have to go back to Roman times to meet with people who could not possibly avail themselves of such a phrase. If you wish to convey the same ideas to them, you would be obliged to express them as "those things which benefit the commonwealth," quæ prosunt reipublicæ; "that by which the citizens can better live," or some such round-about phrase.

Hence, and here is the point, there is a discipline in the ancient languages which no modern tongue can offer, precisely because by them you are forced to detach your thought from its conventional modern wrappings and examine its very essence. Then, after you have clothed it in a new form of expression, wholly unlike that which you are used to, you have formally registered, so to speak, your new understanding of an old thought. The old conventional phrase appears to you in a new light, not as a vague utterance, but as definitely related to a definite idea.

THE WORTH OF LATIN COMPOSITION

How much attention, then, do our secular colleges pay to that branch, Latin composition, which is undoubtedly the specific for the evil which we are discussing? Not that the study of Latin composition is absent from the secular institution. We know the attention and care which many of their most eminent professors have devoted to it: the warm enthusiasm of such scholars as Professor Parker, Professor Collar and many others. But it remains a side issue, an elective which very few, relatively to the total of arts students, care to choose. There is, moreover, the inevitable difficulty of teaching it in a stimulating and thoroughly educative manner, owing to that lack of correlation with other studies which is a marked defect of our secular college system. From its very nature it can not be an isolated branch. Yet ask the graduate of any of our secular colleges, who may have studied Latin composition there, to note what close connection was observed with even the Latin authors taken up in other classes, not to speak of the English courses, which only in the Catholic system of studies can possibly be brought into close relationship with the Latin hour. He will reply that it was treated pretty much as an isolated study; and will witness to the prevailing modern sentiment that Latin composition is a rather dead and unprofitable task for the average boy, a matter for specialists in Latin, irrelevant to the study of English or the formation of a practical speaker or writer.

The Catholic College's Superiority

By yielding, however, to this opinion, the secular colleges have lost a clue to mental training to which Catholic educators have been far more faithful. Why apologize for the insistence on this study in our principal Catholic high schools and colleges? One of the chief reasons, apart from their training in logic and oratory, why the debaters from our Catholic colleges usually excel those from other institutions is the habit that the Latin classroom has given them of seeking the thought below the words.

Therefore do not let your boy talk you out of sending him to a Catholic college by the complaint that "they insist there so much on Latin composition and other obsolete stuff. What we need to-day is sociology, science of government, etc." Remind him gently, but firmly, that many a volume of sociology could be written on a sheet of note-paper if the author were faced by the study of Latin composition, under a teacher true to the thorough Catholic educational tradition, to redeem his verbal greenbacks for the gold of exact expression.

John La Farge, S.J.

SOCIOLOGY

Sectarian Legislation in Massachusetts

ADOPTED in 1780, the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts sets forth in its preamble the purpose and aim of government as the procurement of safety, prosperity and happiness for the people. The government is to be one of "laws not men."

In the Declaration of Rights, Article III of Part First, as amended by Article XI, of the Articles of Amendment, it is provided, among other matters, that "all religious sects and denominations demeaning themselves peaceably and as good citizens of the commonwealth, shall be equally under the protection of the law; and no subordination of any one sect or denomination to another shall ever be established by law."

It is in connection with the above provisions, and for purpose of further amendment of such in reference to appropriations, that three petitions, known respectively as the Fitzgerald, Cross and Batcheller bills, were introduced this year into the Massachusetts Legislature. The first two provided for different degrees of limitation governing appropriations made for educational, charitable or religious bodies. The third, known as the Batcheller Bill, demanded that no appropriation of funds raised by taxation be expended for "the purpose of founding, maintaining or aiding by appropriation, payment for services, expenses, or in any other manner, any church, religious denomination or religious society, or any institution, school, society or undertaking which is wholly or in part under sectarian or ecclesiastical control."

All three bills were referred to the Legislative Committee on Constitutional Amendments. "Leave to withdraw" was reported by the committee on the Fitzgerald and Cross petitions. In each case five members of the committee of eleven dissented, four of the dissenters being democrats and one a republican. The committee reported the Batcheller Bill, with the same men dissenting who opposed the committee's action in the Fitzgerald and Cross petitions. Action was taken on the floor of the House on Wednesday, where a lively debate followed.

A Revival of Bigotry

All three bills were made the subject of discussion. In the course of the argument it was shown that from a total appropriation for charitable purposes, made from 1860 to 1914 and amounting to $6,350,000, but $49,000 was granted to Catholic charitable institutions. Of an aggregate of $8,614,000 appropriated within a similar period for educational purposes (State normal schools excepted) not one cent had been granted for the support of Catholic educational institutions.

The substitution of the Cross Bill, which restricted appropriations to institutions controlled by State, city or town, was urged as a final settlement of all controversy occasioned by religious prejudice. The broader standpoint of opposition was enunciated by Representative Sherburne, of Brookline, who declared that the passage of any one of the measures before the House was in substance a criticism of the wisdom of the Legislature and its ability to deal in a rational and public-spirited manner with problems of a charitable, educational or any other nature which might present themselves in the future for legislative action. It was argued that the measures before the House occasioned a rekindling of the long-smoldering religious prejudice and bitterness and that this feeling should find no place in a government of laws for the public weal.

It was also pointed out that many of the higher educational institutions throughout the Commonwealth are substantially denominational in character, and that to the support of these institutions the Catholics had uncomplainingly contributed for many years and in large sums. The Batcheller Bill, as Representative Sherburne of Brookline declared in his opposition to the measure, was founded in the imagination of a religious bigot, one who is seeking for personal advantage and exploitation and perhaps for a position as a reward for his prejudiced efforts.

A Question of Appropriations

At present there is no constitutional prohibition against appropriations for higher educational institutions, societies or undertakings under sectarian or ecclesiastical control. (Merrick v. Amherst, 12 Allen, 500. Jenkins v. Andover, 103 Mass., 94.)

In regard to the question of appropriation of public money for aiding any church, religious denomination or religious society, there is less legal certainty upon this very important matter. Because of a bequest made by the Legislature under date of April 24, 1913, the Justices of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts in a divided opinion held to the belief that such appropriation is prohibited by the Constitution and its amendments, but this belief is in the nature of things not a decision of law and therefore not final. In the matter of statutory requirements and in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution the Legislature is supreme in enacting provisions under which appropriations shall be granted.

Defeat of the Proposed Legislation

The effect of the lively and at times heated arguments upon the Fitzgerald, Cross and Batcheller bills upon the floor of the House on Wednesday afternoon resulted in defeat for all three measures: the Batcheller measure was rejected by a vote of 115 to 107, the Cross Bill thrown out by a voice vote and the Fitzgerald petition defeated by a vote of 116 to 111.

It would seem logical to assume that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, rich in growth and development and equally rich in notable accomplishments, would not witness this child-like attempt to stir up religious strife and bitterness. On the other hand, we can not but remember that Roger Williams was forced to locate at Providence, Rhode Island, because of the hard-hearted prejudice shown by the early settlers in Massachusetts who sought the shores of this country to worship God as they believed, yet who, on the other hand, could not tolerate a stranger coming among them, seeking only that to which every man is entitled—justice.

Of what advantage has been all this growth and development in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts if it has not brought to the citizens of the community a spirit of justice that is compatible with the standard of real Christianity? Let us hope the swan song of organized A. P. A.-ism in Massachusetts has been sung and that the descendants of the far-famed Puritan fathers may see the light as they never have seen it before.

LESTER B. DONAHUE, PH.D.

NOTE AND COMMENT

All sorts of school problems, those concerning morals excepted, have had the serious attention of pedagogues these many years past. The following item taken from the New York Sun may now direct thought and rhetoric to one phase of our boys' morals:

> On learning that the principal and assistant principal of a large public school found it necessary to call the police and invoke the processes of the criminal law to protect them from the annoyances devised and practised by their fourteen-year-old pupils, a large number of hitherto unconvinced New Yorkers made up their minds that there is urgent need of reform in the education system.

What will come of the riot? Platitudes probably and cries of warning from preachers that moral instruction can not be given for fear of union of Church and State.

Austral Light gives a splendid account of the reception tendered, in Sydney, on February 13, to His Excellency, Mgr. Ceretti, first Apostolic Delegate to Australasia. After the Lord Mayor had delivered an address of welcome, there was a great procession, in which many prominent people, priests and prelates, as well as laymen, took part. In the line were the Bishops of Armidale, Goulburn, Wilcannia and Maitland, the Coadjutor-Archbishops of Brisbane and Adelaide, the Archbishop of Melbourne and the Archbishop of Sydney and staff. In his really notable speech, His Excellency, the Delegate, paid this graceful tribute to the spirit of good will existing in Australia:

> I am not surprised to hear that the Catholics under your care are devoted to the Crown and Constitution. Catholics in every country have ever been loyal to lawfully constituted authority and, when they enjoy so large a measure of liberty and prosperity as in this country, as mentioned by you, the State can not but expect from them their cordial cooperation.

The new Delegate's lot is cast in a beautiful country, among generous people, whom he will serve to the full extent of his great talents.

The death of Reverend Joseph Marra, S.J., for nine years Superior of the Colorado and New Mexico Mission of the Society of Jesus and later Provincial of the Neapolitan Province, took place in Naples, Italy, March 30. He was born in the same city in 1844 and entered the Jesuit order there. At the dispersion of the Society in his native land, in 1860, he was sent to Ireland for his novitiate and the completion of his classical course. He studied philosophy at Tortosa, Spain, and theology at Woodstock, Maryland. After ordination he became one of the pioneer laborers in the New Mexico and Colorado Mission and later was made Prefect of Studies and Rector of the newly founded college at Las Vegas. For twenty years he was connected with the Revista Catolica, the Spanish weekly review published in that city, remaining its editor even during the years of his superiorship over the entire Mission. In 1896 he was called to Naples and there made Provincial of the Neapolitan Province, a position which he occupied until 1903. Returning to Las Vegas, he was again installed Superior of the Mission and editor of the publication for which he had formerly labored so long and fruitfully. Finally, in January of the present year, he left for Rome as a delegate to the General Congregation which was to elect the new Jesuit General. At the close of this Congregation the news of his sudden death was flashed back to the Sacred Heart College, Denver, whose second president he had been. He was a man particularly fitted for the high positions of trust and authority which he filled, combining singular sweetness with great strength of character.

Recently a writer in the Brooklyn Daily Eagle published part of a letter from an officer aboard the U. S. S. North Carolina, which has been at anchor off the wretched Syrian port of Beirut since September 23. Among other items of interest in the communication are found the following:

> I have found these agents (missioners) of American and English religious organizations engaged in speculation by methods quite inimical to local tradesmen. Dreadful tales of woe, intended to pry "backsheesh" from sympathetic Americans, are forwarded to the United States. It will sound incredible, but these people "frank" their letters through the consulates and aboard United States naval vessels as "sailors' mail," thereby giving color to their allegations that rigorous censorship exists over the mails. Nothing of the sort exists outside Constantinople, even since Turkey entered the war!
>
> Six hundred and forty officers and men of the North Carolina will agree to raise and present $1,000 to any missionary who can prove that they (the missionaries at Beirut) are in the slightest personal danger! Some of them ARE in fear of being found out, as I know. That wireless call for an American warship at this place—as YOU know, it isn't a port, only an open roadstead, with two miles of rocks and bars between where we lie and the shore—was a deliberate scheme to enrich the Beirut provision purveyors and bumboat women to the amount of $50,000 per month. In this scheme, to my personal knowledge, certain highly moral (?) foreigners share! It is a clever way of putting Uncle Sam's gold in circulation. And it has worked here since September last.

Evidently these missioners have one eye and a half on earth and a half an eye on heaven.

In the recent death of Father J. D. W. Sewell, S.J., at Madras, India has lost its most distinguished Catholic educational leader. He was the son of Sir William Sewell and like his father entered upon a military career, working his way to the rank of a major. Born in 1836, he became a Catholic only in 1872. He soon yielded his sword to the soldier saint of Pampaluna and in 1880 was ordained priest in the Society of Jesus. For the last thirty-two years he was at the head of St. Joseph's College, Trichinopoly, raising that institution to the eminence it now holds. In his position of principal of St. Joseph's he likewise amply shared in the government of the Madras University, and the impress of his personality is visible in every page of its legislation during the past three decades. No educational commission of any importance was instituted by the university in which he did not take a prominent part. Particularly noteworthy was the set of regulations, mainly due to him, which has helped to overcome the difficulties arising from the great diversities of castes and creeds among undergraduates. This part of his educational activity received universal recognition and was acknowledged as an important factor in promoting the social development of the country. In recognition of his educational services the British Government decorated him with the Kaiser-i-Hind Gold Medal. Father Sewell was for years a member and chairman of the municipality of Trichinopoly and set on foot many excellent municipal reforms. His influence among the Hindoos and Mohammedans was so deep and practical that he conciliated good will and respect toward the whole Catholic community.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XIII, No. 2
WHOLE No. 315

APRIL 24, 1915

PRICE 10 CENTS
$3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE

The War: Bulletin, April 13 p. m.-April 20, a. m.—Deadlock in the Carpathians—Other Items. Austria: The Russian Persecution. France: The Class of 1917. Germany: Germany and the Pope. Great Britain: Novel Doctrine—The American Note. Ireland: The National Volunteers—Hostile Symptoms. Mexico: More Revelations.....25-28

TOPICS OF INTEREST

The Young Man and Public Accounting—Mexico—The Art of Augustus V. Tack—The Church of the Revolution—The Daily Paper.....29-37

COMMUNICATIONS

"A Ludicrous Anachronism"—The Time of Death—A Chain of Catholic Dailies—Prohibition vs. Temperance—The Y. M. C. A. and Catholics 37-41

EDITORIALS

The Pope's Letter on Mexico—A String-Pulling Jesuit—Spreading Catholic Books—Reno's Joy—Peace; Hatred, Arms—Carrying His Point.42-44

LITERATURE

Was Shakespere a Catholic?

REVIEWS: History of the Catholic Church from the Renaissance to the French Revolution—Comedy—Satire—History—The Epic—The Rise of the Dutch Kingdom—The Song of Roland—Who Built the Panama Canal?—A History of the United States for Catholic Schools—Arundel.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: The current Catholic Mind—The Catholic Historical Review—"The Riddle of the Sands"—"The Keeper of the Door"—"The Curse of Castle Eagle"—"Like Unto a Merchant"—"Fairyland"—"Homeric Scenes"—Librarians' "Bromides."

BOOKS RECEIVED.....44-49

EDUCATION

The Jeanne d'Arc Club.....49, 50

SOCIOLOGY

Tannhäuser and Radical Feminism.....50, 51

NOTE AND COMMENT

Coming Catholic Congresses—Honors for Catholic Colleges—The Best Citizens in France—The Catholic University's Silver Jubilee—An "Old Maid"—The "Honor System" in Colleges—Catholics in Practical Social Work—The Fundamental Purpose of the Parochial School—Discussion of Moral Nastiness—"Lessons in Decency" 51, 52

CHRONICLE

The War.—On the western front nothing of vital importance has taken place. Neither side has announced any considerable victory, although the Allies claim to have pushed forward their lines at many points, seldom, however, more than a few yards at a time. North of Arras the French have carried one of the German positions. In the Champagne district they have also gained some slight advantage, which, however, has been counterbalanced by German successes near Perthes. German dispatches have laid insistence for the most part on the fact that the attacks of the enemy have been resisted and repulsed, and that the French offensive, especially at Les Eparges, Combres, north of Flirey, and at other points in the St. Mihiel wedge, has everywhere failed.

Bulletin, April 13, p. m.-April 20, a. m.

The principal success of the week seems to have been gained by the French over the strongly fortified German positions to the west of Colmar, in Alsace. Starting a new drive some miles to the north of the recent advance, which resulted in the capture of Hartsmannweiler Kopf, the French have pushed forward almost to Metzeral, on the river Fecht, and have captured the summit of Schnepfenreith Kopf, which dominates the slopes that lead down to the Rhine.

The situation in the Carpathians has apparently developed into a deadlock. Russian dispatches claim only minor successes, and dwell on the fact that the bad condition of the roads, brought on by the beginning of the thaw, has prevented military operations. Austrian and German reports state that the lull in the Russian offensive is due to the fact that the Russians are exhausted. Russian losses in the Carpathians are estimated by Berlin and Vienna at not less than 500,000. These figures include not only killed, wounded and prisoners, but also sick and missing. It seems to be clear, however, that the Russian positions in the Carpathians are at present stronger than they have been at any time in the campaign. They still hold the Dukla and Lupkow passes and the territory to the south of these passes; they claim to have advanced within three miles of the Uzsok pass; and all along the mountains they are facing the Austrians and Germans on a front of 115 miles that stretches from Bartfield, which is situated just over the Hungarian border, to Stry, in Galicia. On the other hand, the fierce fighting which characterized their former attacks has given place to desultory engagements of an unimportant kind.

Deadlock in the Carpathians

Experts have been predicting that if the attempted Russian invasion of Hungary did not succeed before the thaw set in, it would have to be deferred for several months. It may be that these predictions have already been verified, and that the Russians, seeing the necessity for delay, are content to wait and merely to hold their present hard-won positions. Their greatest danger for some weeks will be the maintenance of their communications, for the roads leading up to the mountains are rapidly becoming impassable. Meanwhile the Austrians and Germans are taking no chances, but are strengthening their lines to such an extent that of the Germans alone 350,000 men are said to be supporting the Austrians. Altogether the forces now facing each other in the Carpathians number, according to reports, 3,500,000. Some have described the recent fighting as the greatest battle in history; and it is certain that when active operations are resumed they will be conducted on an heroic scale. For the present, however, comparative quiet prevails, and the Russian invasion has been checked.

The British Government has offered to the Chilean Government "a full and complete apology" for the sinking of the Dresden in Chilean waters. The Chilean Government stated that the Dresden having overstayed her time limit had been declared interned. Sir Edward Grey hopes to explain the action of the British commanders on the grounds that the Dresden had not accepted internment, that the Chilean Government was unable to enforce its order, and that the Dresden might have made her escape unless the British warships had dealt with her summarily.

Other Items

For three days in succession German aircrafts made raids on many towns in France and England, on one occasion by day, and on another approaching to within thirty miles of London. The Allies retaliated by raiding Freiburg, Strassburg, Metz, Rottweil and Baden. Practically no damage was inflicted. Little or no progress has been made by the Allies in the Dardanelles. Bad weather is assigned as the reason for the delay in active operations. The Turks are massing troops in the Gallipoli peninsula, and are bringing up from Constantinople many heavy guns, to further strengthen the forts in the narrows, and especially Fort Kilid Bahr.

Holland is indignant over the sinking by a submarine of the Dutch steamer Katwijk. The Dutch vessel was at anchor off the Dutch coast, was flying Dutch flags, so brilliantly illuminated as to be unmistakable, and yet without warning was torpedoed and sunk within twenty minutes. The captain of the sinking vessel called for assistance to the submarine, whose periscope was clearly seen, but his appeal was unheeded. The crew were finally rescued by a Dutch lightship. Both Holland and Germany are taking steps to identify the nationality of the submarine, but their findings in the case have not yet been made public.

The account of the battle of Neuve Chapelle, recently published by Sir John French, points very clearly to the immense difficulties that must be faced and the casualities that must be expected before any marked change in the western battle line can take place. The British won the battle in the end, but only after long preparation, at very heavy cost, with a final gain of only half a mile on a front of several miles. The French offensive in the Champagne district and the capture of Les Eparges tell the same story.

Austria.—Stories of unspeakable barbarities perpetrated by the Russians in the provinces overrun by them have lately been reported by American correspondents. Herbert Corey, the American war correspondent of the Associated Newspapers, writes:

The Russian Persecution

The Russian made war in 1915 precisely as he made war in 1515. He ruined forever the lives of the unfortunate women who fell into his hands. He burned every house he came to. He acted up to the highest standards of old-time looters. He was followed by a cloud of thieving peasants from Russia, who completed his work of destruction. He sent long, hopeless lines of women and children as prisoners to Russia. He broke every law of war between nations and every rule of human honor, and every consideration of decency.

"Americans," writes a correspondent, "seem to have no idea of the desolation, ruin and misery in Galicia caused by the Russian invasion. Things have taken place there which have no parallel in Belgium." The Tijd of Holland reports that two Jesuit priests were shot in a church at Lemberg, and tells of another member of the Order beaten to death. Still others were dragged away to Strakau. Two hundred and fifty inhabitants of a Galician village are said, in the same paper, to have been placed against a wall and given their choice between apostasy or death. They chose the latter. It is not possible to obtain further confirmation of these reports, but the campaign of making apostates of the Galician Catholics has been sufficiently established. Russia has shamelessly carried on a religious persecution against the Catholic Church. She has not spared churches, priests or even the head of all the Ruthenian Catholics, who has been subjected by her to the most unworthy treatment. Her past history has been one of intolerance and persecution and her present methods of dealing with conquered populations have been in full accord with her historical traditions. Not only Catholics, but orthodox Jews have likewise fallen victims to her fanaticism or systematic campaign of religious proselytism. It has been remarked in a missionary journal that Russian missionary work is always carried on by the Russian Government for purely political purposes in order to prepare the way for political power. It is in this way that the campaign in Galicia has evidently been planned.

France.—The French Chamber recently voted in favor of a law proposed by the Minister of War, M. Millerand, to incorporate into the army the recruits of the class of 1917. As the Minister of Finance and the President of the Council had done on former occasions, M. Millerand in his speech on this occasion seized the opportunity of expressing his conviction of the country's determination to carry the war to a successful conclusion. He cautioned his hearers, however, not "to cradle themselves in a foolish optimism." The following was his explanation of the projected law:

The Class of 1917

Its object is to take preparatory steps in order that we may draw upon a portion of our resources in men. It is a law of prevision. It signifies our purpose to use the most effective means, and when the time comes for incorporating the class of 1917—should it so seem advisable—to have recourse to this measure only after we have already drawn upon all other available forces.

He then promised to aid in providing for even better sanitary conditions for the young soldiers than had been proposed by him when, on March 12, the Chamber voted for the incorporation of the class of 1916. In order to interfere as little as possible with the teaching in the schools to which recruits of the class of 1917 might belong, he believed it prudent that volunteering on their part should not be closed until July 15, the end of the school term. The actual incorporation of these very young recruits is to take place when the Parliament decides, in case all other resources have been exhausted. The measure shows what tremendous sacrifices France has already been called upon to make. Yet the enthusiasm of the nation has not abated as the applause given to the speaker made plain. France is prepared for still greater sacrifices.

Germany.—"Protestants," says a recent wireless message from Berlin, "can not surpass Catholics in their spirit of sacrifice. Party spirit and religious bitterness have been banished from Germany by the great war." The occasion of this statement was the visit paid by the Cardinal Archbishop of Cologne and the Bishop of Trier to army headquarters, to present the Emperor with the sum of 575,000 marks as a birthday gift. The money is to be devoted to the fund for war invalids. One of the liberal organs of Germany recently commented favorably upon the intimation given by the Secretary of State that the law against Jesuits must be abolished after the war. So, too, the Berlin papers, and in particular the Lokal-Anzeiger, which is in close touch with the Government, are enthusiastic in their praise of Pope Benedict XV. They admire his spirit of perfectly impartial neutrality toward all the belligerent Powers. In reference to the recently published interview with the Holy Father, they point out the extreme care taken by him not to offend against this spirit even by a single syllable. They extol no less his ardent love for peace and his deep charity toward his fellow men. It is natural that they should draw their own conclusions from his alleged appeal to Americans, but they make it clear that the sentiments are theirs, not the Pope's. The moral power of the papacy has been acknowledged by the German Government upon all occasions throughout the present war. The influence of the Holy Father has been well described by the Kölnische-Volkszeitung: "His activities to soften the harshness of war and restore peace," it writes, "not only show his great wisdom and gentleness, his great diplomatic skill and true neutrality, but likewise his influence upon mankind, the internal power and consecration of the papacy, the supernatural value of the Catholic Church and her undying merit in the religious renewal and moral rebirth of the nations." The continued American shipment of arms to the Allies is still causing comment. The sentiment of every German upon this important issue has been characteristically expressed by the German Field Marshal von Hindenburg: "Have the clever American business men," he asked, "ever vividly pictured for themselves a German soldier dying with an American bullet in his heart?"

Germany and the Pope

Great Britain.—There has been a stir in certain English circles over the interpretation given by prominent parsons to Our Lord's injunction, "Love your enemies." The Times considers the matter important enough for editorial comment, which is in part as follows:

Novel Doctrine

. . . the words of the Sermon on the Mount are quite plain and can not be explained away: "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefuly use you and persecute you." There they are, and you can obey or disobey them; you can think them right or wrong; but you can not doubt what they mean. At present they seem to command impossibilities, but they are not to be condemned or disregarded for that reason. The Christian doctrine is that we should always attempt impossibilities. In that the Christian is like the artist, who is an artist only because he attempts more than he can possibly do. The Sermon on the Mount sets before us a state of mind that we should aim at, not one which we are likely to attain in this life; and therefore it gives us extreme examples of that state of mind; examples not tempered to our infirmities, lest we should think our infirmities are virtues. When it tells us to love our enemies, it means, first of all, that we are never to think our hatred of our enemies righteous; it is against virtuous indignation, except when we are virtuously indignant with ourselves. The feeling of hatred, it tells us, is bad for us, no matter whom we hate; and we are not to answer hatred with hatred, or to feel a flush of virtue when we do so.

This surely is novel doctrine. Most Christians will conclude that, despite the Thunderer's protestation to the contrary, the Sermon on the Mount has been actually explained away.

Of late British criticism has been concerned with America's Note, in answer to Sir Edward Grey's defence of the "blockade" of German ports. The remarks in the different papers are, on the whole, temperate. There is general recognition of American frankness, but there is no disposition to yield any point of the dispute. The Times states that the British will show neutral commerce all the consideration compatible with the object they have in view, to wit, the defeat of Germany. This paper then proceeds to say:

The American Note

That object, we may again remind the United States, is as vital to us as the destruction of commerce with the Confederate States was to the Union during the Civil War. We did not then stand upon technicalities with them, and we feel that we may fairly ask them not to show greater jealousy of their extreme legal rights now that we are fighting for our existence than we displayed in 1861. There are some passages in this (American) Note which might be interpreted, did they stand alone, as indicating an inclination to treat particular points in a somewhat narrow temper. It is suggested, for example, that the blockade is not at present effective so far as Baltic ports are concerned. Was the American blockade of the Southern ports effective for months after it was declared? Americans know that it was not, but nevertheless we raised no controversy with them upon that score. The Note argues that whatever form of blockade may be adopted, it should be possible to conform "at least to the spirit and principles of the essence of the rules of war." To advance such a proposition to us is really forcing an open door. We have done our best, and we shall continue to do our best, to apply that spirit and those principles in any adaptations of former usage to new facts and circumstances which may be forced upon us. The Note practically admits that it may be imperative for us to extend the blockading cordon across the approaches to neutral ports or countries, but it suggests that free admission and exit through that cordon might be given to all lawful traffic with neutral ports. There may possibly be room for differences of opinion as to what is, or is not, included in the term "lawful traffic," but it would seem that the substance of this suggestion is met by the Order in Council itself. That instrument provides for the grant of passes enabling ships to proceed to a neutral port, and we can not doubt that these passes are being issued in suitable cases. The Note invokes the Declaration of Paris. It should hardly be necessary to remind Americans that they are estopped from appealing to that document by the steady refusal of their Government to become a party to it.

After this there is a declaration that international law is conditional, and can hardly be obeyed literally unless both sides are prepared to obey it. Germany has flagrantly and persistently broken the condition, and England can not be regarded as rigidly bound, while her opponents arrogate to themselves a boundless freedom. Such is British sentiment; part of it will sound strange in the ears of Americans who know the history of our Civil War.

Ireland.—On Easter Sunday there was a parade and review in Dublin of some 25,000 National Volunteers, the largest military mobilization that the city ever witnessed. All were in uniform and about a third carried rifles. Colonel Moore and Mr. Redmond expressed their satisfaction with the order and discipline displayed, especially as the calling out of the reserves took away military instructors. The British papers that gave pages to the Carsonite parades took slight notice of this much more striking display, except to wonder that such good material had not gone to the front. Most of the Irish counties were well represented, except Dublin, where the Irish Volunteers, the original organization, preponderate. At the Gaelic Athletic Convention, held on the same day, motions to admit to membership associates of the army or police and volunteers to the present war were withdrawn. The National Volunteers' Convention added to the governing committee one representative for each city and county and four appointees by the Inspector General. Mr. Redmond, who presided, again complained that his offer, to substitute for the twenty thousand soldiers now garrisoning Ireland the Ulster and National Volunteers, had been declined, and asked, "What fatal infatuation had prevented the War Office from accepting that offer?" He insisted that the Volunteers should arm and drill, "to hold fast to what they had won and make sure that force would not rob them of the fruits of victory." They would ultimately become "a permanent military body at the disposal of the Irish Parliament to defend Ireland at home and abroad, and remain a guarantee for the order, good government and liberty of the reborn Irish nation." Mr. Dillon added that when the questions interrupted by the war were resumed, 100,000 Volunteers would be summoned, and "then it would become manifest to every politician, English or Irish, that Ireland free and indivisible must be conceded, or they would want to know the reason why." The absolute sobriety of the Volunteers and of the many thousands that witnessed the review was favorably commented on by the press and the Father Mathew Association.

The National Volunteers

Colonel Lynch, the Clare M. P., who had been condemned to death for fighting for the Boers, was reprimanded by the Freeman's Journal, the Irish Party organ, because he had asked in Parliament, what was the Government's intention regarding the Amending Bill. In a lengthy defence, he charged "the Front Bench of time-serving politicians" with having tricked to its face the Irish Party, who permitted them to use the war to cover up every lapse, and he promises to carry the question to his constituents. He is supported by Mr. O'Brien and those who, on various grounds, are opposed to Mr. Redmond's present policy. There have been many arrests anl imprisonments and trials by court-martial in various districts for interference with recruiting and expressions hostile to the Government. The censorship of papers and private letters has grown more stringent, so that it has become increasingly difficult to estimate the direction of public opinion.

Hostile Symptoms

Mexico.—The Past Sovereign Grand Commander of the Scottish Rite Masons in Mexico has more to say than appeared in AMERICA last week. In giving the reasons why Masonry made war on the Mexican Church, he says among other interesting things:

More Revelations

There then took place events beyond the comprehension of those who could not investigate and determine the real nature of the phenomena, nor understand the degradation to which lifeless souls can reach. Former Liberals, well known for the strength of their principles, built private chapels and oratories in their homes to satisfy their families with Masses and other sacraments.

Continuing he remarks:

. . . About this time there started the socialistic preachings of Madero, which spread like a flash through every corner of the republic. With the faith of the inspired, with the fortitude of the apostle, Madero scattered everywhere his gospel of freedom, of love and of community of goods, and his words fell on the hearts of the people like the blessed dew bringing health, and life and promise of happiness, . . . and the people, believing the promises to be true, dreamed of the distribution of lands and money, and of sharing in each and every one of the honors enjoyed on the pinnacles of power, to which only a selected few ever arrive. . . . It (Masonry) helped Madero honestly and loyally, because he embodied its principles and preached its ideals. . . .

Comment is quite superfluous.

TOPICS OF INTEREST

The Young Man and Public Accounting*

TO the young man contemplating a career, public accounting offers a unique appeal. It is the only profession which is not over-crowded, and in which, to use a commercial expression, "the demand is greater than the supply." In some of the old world countries, notably England and Scotland, public accounting is a profession of long and high standing. In the United States its development has been more recent; it is, in fact, even now only in its infancy. Nevertheless, the great commercial advancement of the country, and the rapid expansion of our credit system has created a fertile field in which the profession of accountancy has grown and thriven to a remarkable extent. It is estimated, however, that this field still remains ninety per cent. undeveloped.

In order properly to meet the demands made on it, the profession has undergone a great change. From the mere technical checking of accounts, in order to ascertain their correctness, it has become "the profession of business advice." Many business concerns now retain public accountants not only to make regular annual audits, but as advisers in business and financial affairs, in the same manner as attorneys are retained for the purpose of consulting them on legal matters. This is but the natural result of the conditions surrounding modern business. The keen competition of the present day, with the smaller margin of profit resulting therefrom, has made it imperative for the business man to have his accounts, the history of his business, in such shape that they not only tell him the truth, but tell it in such a way that he can understand it fully. False financial statements have led many supposedly prosperous men into bankruptcy. Furthermore, modern banking houses no longer extend credit on personality alone. They have found this a costly procedure. They now want to know what their loans are for and what is back of them. They want to see the financial statements. The business man has discovered that if he is fair to his banker in this respect, his banker will be fair to him, and that there is no better way to give his banker a strong feeling of confidence in him, than by periodically submitting certified statements prepared by impartial public accountants. An inquiry conducted a few years ago by the American Association of Public Accountants revealed the fact that a large majority of bankers offer better terms and rates, or at least look more favorably on loans to those borrowers who submit audit statements. The Association of Reserve City Bankers passed a formal resolution approving the submission of such statements, and even the Federal Reserve Board, in defining such commercial paper as will be accepted for rediscount by the Federal Reserve Banks considered the question of certified accountants' statements, but postponed adopting any formal action until a later date. Finally, investors are realizing that one of their best safeguards is the impartial audit. They, too, are demanding audited statements. In fact, the whole tendency of the work of public accountants is to produce better, more honest and more efficient business.

These facts are mentioned merely to show the great inducements which this profession holds out to young men, provided, however, they are properly qualified. While there is a dearth of good public accountants, the field is full of those who have rushed into the profession without the slightest fitness for the work. They are a burden which the profession is obliged to carry. In order to protect the public from their incompetent work, thirty-three States have enacted Certified Public Accountant laws. The examinations for C.P.A. in most of these States are as strict as those for law and medicine. In spite of such laws, however, this profession, like all others, has its quacks. Nor must it be supposed that the work is easy. On the contrary it is the hardest kind of work, tedious and confining. Years of experience in the most monotonous details are required, before it is possible to take up properly the larger phases of the work. Many have neither the patience nor the inclination for such detail, and hence can never attain great success in the profession.

In general, it may be said that the qualifications and requirements essential to success as a public accountant are as strict as those of any other profession. Without entering into a discussion of all the requisites, the following can be regarded as fundamental:

In the first place, there is required not only a broad and sound general education, but a particular training in all the branches of practical and theoretical accounting and in business usage. In most States having C. P. A. laws a high school or equivalent education is required of those taking the examinations. Secondly, the successful public accountant must possess that peculiar inborn talent, that quick, clear, analytical and imaginative mind which enables him to visualize dry statistics, to see the real living things which are represented by cold figures. Finally, the successful public accountant must be a man of the greatest integrity and moral stamina. His position is a confidential one; his decisions are frequently accepted without question in important matters. As a consequence, he is laid open to influence of all kinds to color his opinions for the benefit of those seeking an advantage. The accountant who allows himself to be influenced wrongfully may secure a temporary gain but can never hope for permanent success.

With regard to the first requisite mentioned, it was not many years ago that the accountant's training had to be acquired entirely by practical experience, but of late years the many excellent colleges of accounts, finance and commerce, which have been inaugurated by various institutions afford a means of acquiring a part of this training. Experience is, of course, essential, but the schools have been a wonderful help. Several of the Catholic colleges have inaugurated very thorough courses in higher accounting, notably, St. Louis University, Marquette University of Milwaukee, and St. Xavier College of Cincinnati.

*The thirty-first of a series of vocational articles.

The second requisite mentioned, the natural inborn talent, is something which can not be acquired. For real accountants, like real poets, are born and not made.

With regard to the moral standard of the profession, it can be truthfully said that it has been high. Nevertheless there have been instances where public accountants have betrayed their trust. A young man who contemplates entering the profession need only inquire about the fate of those who did betray the confidence placed in them to realize how important it is to preserve the greatest integrity under any and all circumstances. To the Catholic young man, the profession should have for this reason, a particular appeal; it is a profession in which the most scrupulous honesty is not only appreciated but is essential.

As to the pecuniary rewards, the profession of public accountancy offers as good, if not better, prospects than most of the walks of life. This is particularly true with regard to young men who, if they are qualified, are apt to secure a larger pecuniary return in this profession during the earlier part of their life than in the majority of other pursuits. When it comes to large incomes there are no statistics available. It is probable, however, that there is as large a percentage of public accountants with incomes from their practice of $5,000, $6,000 and even $10,000 a year, as there are lawyers, doctors or engineers.

It must not be assumed, however, that the profession is over-paid, or that it offers a short and easy road to wealth. The work is hard, and it requires special training and special talents. In fact, it can be safely said that in consideration of the services given, there should be a general tendency among public accountants to increase rather than to lower their charges. The idea to be conveyed, however, is that the profession affords an opportunity to young men who have the necessary talents, and the application and industry to develop such talents, to put them to honorable and profitable use.

The young man who contemplates entering the profession and who has assured himself that he has the necessary talent, general education and knowledge of the principles of bookkeeping should endeavor to secure a position with a reliable firm of public accountants. At first his services could only be used in the mere detail of office work. He would be paid approximately $60.00 per month for such services. In this way he would start his practical training. In the meantime, it would be of the greatest assistance to him to take a course in accounting, auditing and commercial law at a recognized college of accounts, finance and commerce.

As he progresses in his work, he will probably be sent out as an assistant or "junior" accountant, to do detail work under a "senior." Juniors are usually paid from $1,200 to $2,400 per year, depending on their experience and ability. During this period he should endeavor to pass the C. P. A. examinations and secure his certificate, providing, of course, there is a C. P. A. law in his State. As a "junior" accountant, he will progress faster if he secures the good will of the seniors under whom he works, by being faithful and loyal. The "seniors" can be of the greatest assistance to him. In due course of time he will be permitted to handle smaller cases and will gradually become a "senior" with a salary ranging from $2,000 to $5,000 per year, depending on his abilities. As a rule, larger incomes than this can only be secured by "principals," that is, by those having an interest in or controlling a firm. Principals must usually have, in addition to their other qualifications, executive and "business-getting" ability.

And during all this course of progress the one predominating motto should be: Absolute honesty and integrity under all circumstances.

J. D. Cloud, M.A., C.P.A.,
Lecturer on Accounting and Auditing, St. Xavier College of Finance, Accounts and Commerce.
Cincinnati.

Mexico

THERE is no revolution in Mexico to-day. There is a condition of anarchy. Revolution is described in Webster's dictionary as, "The overthrow or renunciation of one government, and the substitution of another, by the governed." The Government of Mexico was not overthrown by the governed, it was overthrown by about two per cent. of the population with assistance from outside. No attempt at government has been instituted to replace that overthrow. Anarchy is described in Webster as, "Absence of government; the state of society where there is no law or no supreme power; hence a state of lawlessness or political disorder; the social state that is advocated by modern anarchists." "A polity without a head . . . would not be a polity, but anarchy." How much more is this the case in a polity which has half-a-dozen heads each fighting the other. Anarchy implies the total absence or suspension of government; chaos, the utter negation of order. Therefore I repeat, there is no revolution in Mexico to-day—but there is a condition of anarchy and chaos. It would be impossible to exaggerate the condition of affairs which obtains in the sunny, rich land south of the Rio Grande. It is all that has been written of it . . . and worse.

When General Victoriano Huerta left Mexico, a voluntary exile, the only semblance of a "Government"—properly so-called—which Mexico had after its three years of continuous disturbance disappeared; there has been no attempt made by any of the Mexican leaders to replace it by any other semblance of Government. The bonds which united the various leaders during the time they were in arms against the government of Huerta fell asunder the moment their desideratum was attained. The "revolution" forthwith split itself up into a half-dozen bands of armed men, each fighting the others, to the utter ruin of the nation. The line of cleavage was not patriotism, nor a desire to advance the well-being of the nation, it was purely petty jealousy and ambition, the vehement desire of each chief to be Primer Jefe, mingled with which was a leaven of doubt as to the honesty of the intentions of all the others.

There is no fundamental difference between the aims of the various leaders, neither is there any difference between their mode of attaining that end. Each leader is out for himself. Each states, in interviews intended for the ears of the American people, that his is the cause of right, of justice, of liberty, that he is the real Constitutionalist—and that all the others are sin verguenzas who are devoid of patriotism, reactionaries, or worse.

Their methods are the same, suppression of the press, lest the real opinion of the people should be heard; denial of political and religious liberty; the dragooning of the people lest they realize their strength and fall on the insignificant percentage which has arms; robbery of public and private property; suppression of courts of justice; forced loans. Villa, Carranza, Zapata, Guitierrez, Obregon, they are all the same. Zapata carries on his banner the magic words: Libertad, Constitucion, Justicia, Ley—"Liberty, Constitution, Justice, the Law," the while he blows to the heavens passenger trains filled with hundreds of non-combatants, fires volleys into them, the while the wounded and living struggle to escape, and then sets fire to the wreckage. Villa murders foreigners and Mexicans with his own hands, carries off helpless women to satisfy his lust, issues decrees which amount to the appropriation of Mexican and foreign properties, such as mines, etc., holds wealthy Mexicans for ransom as in the old degenerate days when he was a bandit purely and simply—and not the "regenerator of the Mexican race." Carranza stays always in the safe places—there are few in Mexico to-day—far from the strife and war, he likes not to hear the bullets rattle in the battle, the while his generals, like Obregon and Coss, endeavor to out-Villa Villa in the unfortunate cities which fall into their hands. There they hound down priests and Catholic women, when they protest against the imprisonment of the clergy; take the food from the mouths of the people already on the verge of starvation; impose forced loans amounting to nearly a hundred million, and when the merchants refuse to obey this monstrous decree, endeavor—in the most open manner—to incite the lower classes to loot the homes of the rich.

The Carranzistas under Obregon evacuated Mexico City when they had robbed all that they could, and the "Liberating Army of the South" took possession. They found the capital but an empty husk. There was not a stick of furniture in any of the Government offices, not even a typewriter or a bottle of ink. General Obregon may not be much of a hand at fighting, he is not making a very impressive showing against Villa the moment of writing (although his troops outnumber the Villistas), but when it comes to the wholesale looting of an evacuated city—like Mexico City and Guadalajara—there is no other "General" who can come near him. The Zapatistas found not a centavo in the treasury, there was not even a printing press left with which to print new bills. So the chiefs sent the soldiers out on the streets to beg.

In twos and threes they wandered about, looking cold and miserable in their dirty white cotton pajamas, and empty cartridge-belts, begging un peso, Señor, para comprar pan (a peso to buy bread). Some were satisfied with ten cents, and I have heard of no instance of their being refused—one hates to refuse a beggar especially when he has a rifle in his hand with the muzzle carelessly pointed in your direction. They were such a relief from the men of Obregon that the people were almost enthusiastic. It was so strange to be "asked" for your money. That was in the beginning—as the days passed, the popular enthusiasm began to wane.

Plagiar means to hold for a ransom. It is an old trick in Mexico, beloved of the bandits; it is as old as their national "Independence." The Zapatistas began to revive it in all their glory. They began to arrest—on suspicion of being Carranzistas—men and women of families reputed to be wealthy. The method was simplicity itself. A band of armed men rode up to any of the large houses, one dismounted while the remainder covered the entrance with their rifles. When the criado (servant) opened the door they asked who lived there; on being told, they said they came to arrest him as a suspected Carranzista spy. Probably the head of the house was a refugee in the United States—having fled before the Carranzistas—but that made no difference, they then demanded to see the Señora, and if she made her appearance, they covered her with their rifles and made her march between them to their barracks, where she would be held until her family paid the $1,000 or $10,000 demanded for her release. The effect of such an experience on a delicate, refined lady may be imagined—more especially as nearly all the best families in Mexico to-day are in mourning for some relative whose life has been snuffed out by the "revolution."

In Mexico City to-day there is not one family who has not the principle male members in hiding or exile. The Sisters expelled from the various convents have been taken into the homes of the better classes, they dare not appear on the streets, nor can they look out from the windows for fear of being seen by any of the spies with which the city swarms. Think of the continual anxiety, the frightful strain that all this is, waiting from hour to hour for a blow to fall, awakened night after night by the crack of rifles, absolutely helpless, defenceless.

When I left Mexico City on March 25 there was no light on the streets except that of the moon. What happened when the moon waned we do not yet know. There was little bread, beans, corn, charcoal, etc., except at prices far beyond the reach of the tens of thousands who have neither work nor money. The people were on the verge of starvation, and every day there were "bread lines" and "milk lines" and "charcoal lines"— and many went hungry because the stocks coming in from Toluca were small and not sufficient to meet the demand of the half-million hungry people. The train on which I left Mexico City was the last which ran even to Toluca—as Villa gave strict orders that no trains were to run into or out of the capital.

The Zapatistas when they took possession allowed the churches to reopen, and they permitted the celebration of Mass which had been suspended for the preceding fortnight by General Obregon. The people flocked to the churches in thousands, none of the sacred edifices were large enough to accommodate them and the lines stretched far out on the sidewalk. Having learned the lesson taught by Obregon that any number of people, however brave, can be dominated by a handful of armed men unless they are organized, the men of the capital immediately set about the formation of a Defensa Social which was to defend property and lives in case of future trouble. Thousands of the best young men in the city enrolled themselves, they got the sanction of the Zapatista governor to arm and drill, and the popular enthusiasm grew. Bank-clerks, merchants' clerks, students, professional men, workmen, all eagerly enrolled themselves under the banner of order, and a great demonstration was held on Sunday, March 22, in which nearly 20,000 men and women marched through the principal streets. There was perfect order. The following Tuesday a Decree was published ordering all the inhabitants of Mexico City to deliver up to the Zapatista commander all the arms and ammunition in their possession—on pain of death. It was a bolt from the blue—the people were terrified. In all they had about 3,000 rifles, and very little ammunition; if they delivered these up they would be at the mercy of the Zapatistas, or the lower classes, if they should rise up. They decided not to obey the decree. That was a few days before I left . . . what has happened since?

John F. Barry.

The Art of Augustus V. Tack

THE world of religious art has surely witnessed nothing more revolutionary than the recent exhibition of paintings at the Worch Galleries in New York by Augustus Vincent Tack, a Catholic artist of this city. The work of Mr. Tack is the fusion of two principles that, hitherto, have commonly been reputed to be more or less in antagonism, Catholicism and the school of impressionism, and the fact that the artist has breathed the spirit of Catholic art into the methods of the modern school of painting is an important event in the present-day annals of religious painting.

It is important because here we have at one extreme a Catholic artist, who has imprinted the influence of his religion upon an aspect of art which has, rightly or wrongly, been associated with its purely humanistic side, and, in its degree, has come to denote the spirit of revolt against authority and tradition. At the other extreme is the rigidly conventional art of the school of the Benedictines of Beuron; a school that goes back to the earliest principles of Christian art, idealizing its subjects with the spirit of the cloister, conceiving them as with the divine unconcern of souls released from the burden of the flesh and its limitations, for whom there is no time, but only an eternal and ever-abiding present. The spirit of the Beuron art is the spirit of the clear vision. The spirit of the art of Augustus Vincent Tack is that of the vision seen through a glass darkly, afar off: not the attainment of the ideal, but the pulsating eternal struggle of humanity, groping onward toward that vision which shall only be attained when the flesh has cast off the shackles that weigh it down to the earth.

The five large canvases recently completed by Mr. Tack may very well be called a symphony in five movements, which has humanity for its theme. Each painting is complete in itself, yet each is but a part of the great message which the artist desires to teach in entirety. In each there is the sense of space which asks the question: Whence is Man, and whither goes he? And in the vast, limitless domain there is worked out the drama of the Fall and the Redemption. The paintings are on a large scale, and the method is that of pointillism; that is, the colors are not laid on with the brush, but are squeezed direct from the tube on to the canvas.

The first picture is entitled "The Remorse of Eve." It shows the figure of a woman, walking with bowed head and faltering steps from the eternal brightness, which she has forfeited, into the somber shadow of the life which is to be her portion henceforth. There is neither grace nor comeliness about her. Her hands are gropingly extended upward, her hair thrown forward across her face, and she stumbles, as though dazed with the terrible sentence of expulsion still ringing in her ears. Slowly she takes her way from the Paradise she has forfeited; a gaunt, gnarled tree darkens her pathway, and the roots and briars entangle her feet. Stricken as she is in her remorse, there is yet a note of hope, for the body is bent as with the tenseness of a listener, and back, in the vanishing brilliance, there is a promise, a hope of redemption. So, with her clasped hands, Eve would shut out the terrible words "Depart hence!" while one ear might catch the promise that in her motherhood there should come eventually a Saviour: thus is she portrayed strong and virile, for she was to become the mother of nations.

The second picture of the group, "Simon of Cyrene," is in strong contrast to the first. Against a vast background as of a near-by brilliant dawning, there is seen the powerful figure of a man, bowed down by the heavy weight of a cross, which he is carrying up the side of a hill. The figure is unclad, save for a scarlet loin-cloth, and the burden of the cross almost pulls him to the earth. In this, as in the other pictures, save the third, the artist has made the unclad figure the central point of his symbolism—a condition necessary for the complete enunciation of his message. The undraped figures symbolize the eternal and terrible scrutiny of God, in Whose sight all the wretched rags of self-respect, hypocrisy and complacency fall away, and man is seen to be as he really is: they depict the ineffaceable truth that nothing can hide Man from his Maker. So, in "Simon of Cyrene," Man is seen bearing his burden, which threatens to fell him to earth, and only the golden dawn which is so near lightens the picture of despair.

"The Madonna of the Everlasting Hills," which is the central picture of the group, is the breaking of the golden dawn, which was symbolized by the brilliant backgrounds of the former pictures. The Blessed Mary sits enthroned on the topmost peak of the whole world, and on her knee rests the Holy Child. The rising hills, which typify the patriarchs and prophets who pointed the way to this coming dawn, lie at her feet, and stretch away through the dim centuries to that unhappy day in Eden. Serenely throned above the world, the blue skies have come down and woven themselves into Our Lady's mantle. In her eyes is the unfathomable peace which was hidden from the remorseful Eve. Mr. Tack has made a very strong point in the picture of the Blessed Virgin, who is, together with her Son, the only one represented full face, as though she alone of all the creatures has seen the clear vision; that she and God were the only two who had looked on each other unveiled. The strong arms of Mary uphold her Divine Child, and He, all quivering with life and eagerness to leap down into that world which He came to save, stretches out one little hand to mankind to call it to himself; while with the other hand he points upward to His Mother, the Mother of all men. And above and beyond Mary radiates the light that was to shine upon a darkened world; the light that came through her sinless Motherhood.

> Thou the root art, thou the portal,
> Whence hath shone the light immortal.

A critic comments thus on the picture: "This canvas expresses the Universal. It contains elements of the Byzantine, the Italian primitive, the Gothic and the Modern, and encompasses, as does no other painting of the Madonna, four periods of Christian art."

In the "Pardon of Dismas" the artist has struck the note of eternal continuance. There is, as it were, a deathly silence. Beyond the figure on the cross is infinite space and timelessness. About the background roll the troubled clouds of uncertainty, and down the mountain the twilight gathers. The central background is broken by a gleam of golden light, and in its shining stands out, in all its harrowing reality, the broken body of the thief on the cross. His ghastly form is all twisted in agony, and the glazed grin of death is fixed upon his countenance. The writhe of the death agony has scarce passed from his tortured frame, and from his lifeless hands and from the ropes that bind him to the cross there seem to drip slowly, drop by drop, all the agonies that man has suffered since suffering came into the world. His head is thrown back on his shoulders, his face turned upward, and his dead eyes rest upon that Figure which is on the cross above him. With exquisite imagination the artist has pictured only the lower limbs of the Crucified Christ, their pale delicacy standing out in strong contrast to the gross misshapen body of the thief: the contrast between the stainlessness of the Sinless One and the grossness into which the sinner has fallen. Where the Divine Figure disappears there is calmness and serenity; below Him is the unrest of the ages. Between the dead eyes of the penitent thief and the hidden face of Christ is the promise: "This day shalt thou be with me in Paradise."

The last picture of the group, "Resurgam," is perhaps the most symbolical of all. It represents a young man on a lonely mountain top, alone, for each man must work out his salvation by himself: in the whole spiritual universe there are, ultimately, but two persons, oneself and God, and this is the note upon which Mr. Tack insists throughout his religious art. The young man is seated upon a rock, his feet are held and fixed in the earth, his hands clasped behind his back and about him is the infinite void of illimitable space, voiceless and dark with the impenetration of unquenchable night, save in the far distance, where, down the mountain side, there glimmers the light of a coming day. Here are three things: The earth which has enslaved man and led him captive in its bonds; humanity, naked and bare in the knowledge of its own insignificance, but with its back to the darkness which is passing and half-turned toward the coming day. And, as the dawn grows brighter and comes nearer, so will the man rise from the earth that binds him, and at last, with a mighty leap, run forward to greet the sunshine of the full day. No longer, as in "The Remorse of Eve," is Man walking with bowed head and faltering steps away from the light. The darkness is now behind him, and he waits, in all the joy and virility of life, to bound from his shackles and cry throughout the limitless space, "Resurgam."

The only fitting home for these five pictures is high on the walls of some great cathedral, where they may cry their message to all who pass by. Henry C. Watts.

The Church of the Revolution

WE hear much in our day of the religion of socialism. It consists in the ardent longings of its votaries for the day of the social revolution and their eager and incessant strivings to hasten its coming. The dedication of the whole man, with all his powers, to this single cause is compared with the true Christian's devotion to his Faith. To this vague, class-conscious worship of the revolutionary ideal Bouck White has now sought to give a local habitation and a name in his newly founded "Church of the Social Revolution." Its mission is to herald abroad "a new and stupendous gospel, the religion of industrial democracy."

The Church and its ritual are not to be taken too seriously, and certainly they would deserve no special notice here for their own sake. They are of significance, however, as a crystallization of what in rationalistic socialist literature is often proclaimed to be the deep religiousness and even the profound Christianity of the modern revolutionary movement. The fact that the movement was set on foot by renegade Jews and ribald atheists does not matter. "The socialist, though an atheist and a scoffer, infallibly has God in the self-same way" as "Jesus had God," wrote the Reverend Herman Kutter, and the Christian Socialist enthusiastically endorsed his words. (Jan. 15, 1908.) Doubtless the Church of the Social Revolution is no less broad in its views.

Its order of service opens with two songs fittingly selected to attune the minds of the comrades to a proper devotional or revolutionary mood, for the two words are here synonymous. The object of the new religion is then announced by the "leader":

> To sing the folk upheaval and to grow a socialism of the heart, we are assembled. Unto us has been entrusted the high, glad gospel of democracy. Therefore with joy, with beauty, with strong devotion, let all the doings of this hour proceed. That so the revolution may be wrought in sweetness and in majesty. Till the Lord-of-the-uprising-of-labor shall have been enthroned o'er all the earth, and the people be established.

A third song now follows to promote still further "with joy, with beauty" and "with strong devotion," the religion of the revolution. The congregation then rises and in unison recites its covenant:

> I enlist under the Lord of the blood-red banner, to bring to an end a scheme of things that has enthroned Leisure on the back of Labor, an idle class sucking the substance of the poor. I will not be a social climber, but will stay with the workers in class solidarity till class shall have been done away in fellowship's glad dawn. I will seek recruits for the Church of the Revolution, unto the overthrow of present-day society and its rebuilding into comradeship.

The lawful correction of the just grievances of labor, wherever they exist, is nowhere more strongly sanctioned than in the Catholic Church. But it is not by the socialist revolution that this is to be brought about. No abolition of classes was ever taught by Christ, but the solidarity of all classes and of all mankind is the doctrine of the Scriptures and of the Church. The sanctification of the individual life, the arousing of the public conscience and the consequent enactment and strict observance of the necessary social laws is the Catholic remedy. Not more, but fewer laws and better, duly enforced, are the need of the day, laws based upon the teachings of Christ, just alike to all men and all classes.

A collection is next taken up. "The holiest cause that has come to earth in eighteen hundred years asks you for a money offering," is the invitation to give with generosity. This important duty performed, there follows "the consecration of the children to the cause of Human Freedom." The commandment of Christ regarding the Sacrament of Holy Baptism is announced to be an outworn superstition: "The morbid fear of the universe upon which the ancient rite of baptism was based is forever passed away." The new rite of dedicating the child to the revolution is to be of present value chiefly to the parents. In view of this twaddle it is quite natural for these socialists to reject Christ's doctrine on sin. For them sin has an economic aspect only. The great sin of the world is poverty. Not a spiritual, but an economic cleansing, they say, is needed. The ministration of socialism is spoken of as spiritual in its nature, because in its last results it is to bring about the spiritual renovation of the earth. Socialism would renew the individual by renewing the economics of the world, while Christianity would purify the social and economic life by sanctifying the individual without, however, forgetting the great public interests of the day.

The marriage rite of this Church of the Revolution may finally deserve a word of comment. Again, it is strictly in conformity with the doctrine which unfortunately finds favor in wider circles than those of mere socialism. "Where love is not," the church leader advises the couple before him, "marriage is not. No clergyman has the right to join a man and woman 'while life shall last,' but only while love shall last." There is no giving or taking of man or woman, but only the will to abide together, for better or worse, in a love which they resolve to make lasting. With this resolution expressed, their hands are joined and the ceremony is ended. The leader has only to "pronounce" them man and wife and tenderly commend them to the embrace of "the Everlasting Arms."

There is, apparently, no need of any belief in a personal God. The opinion of the leader of the Church of the Revolution himself is sufficiently vague. From his book "The Carpenter and the Rich Man" we may gather, however, that "the labor movement is the incarnation of God," and "the folk upheaval, God Incognito to-day." The new divinity, invoked as the "Lord-of-the-uprising-of-labor," may, therefore, be defined, it would seem, as the personification of the revolutionary impulses which arise from the hearts of the revolutionary workers. He exists "not in the realm of nature, but in the realm of the ethical." Souls dedicated to liberty, that is to revolution, are "a contribution to the being of God." Here, therefore, is a new religion and a new god. Together they answer perfectly to the aspirations of Marxian socialism.

Joseph Husslein, S.J.

The Daily Paper

THE discussion on a Catholic daily newspaper, which has been going on in America, has shown among other things how little Catholics have thought of such a project and how embryonic most men's ideas are on it. Every one must admit that from the premises laid down by most of the writers only one conclusion can be reached, namely, that a Catholic daily newspaper is impracticable and unfeasible. The premises, however, are wrong. It would not cost as much to run a daily Catholic newspaper as most of the writers seem to think. Approximately it would cost about $400,000 a year to maintain a daily newspaper of ten pages with a circulation of 100,000. A New York publishing house equipped to produce a daily newspaper has given an estimate on the cost of producing and circulating such a paper of ten pages, 100,000 copies a day, as $1,000 a day. This would include everything from inception to delivery. That the estimate is approximately correct can be shown from internal evidence of newspapers successfully published.

On a one-cent paper the publishers get one-half cent a copy. A paper with 100,000 a day circulation would, therefore, get a return of $500 a day from the sale of the paper. The cost of advertisements in newspapers ranges from ten to forty cents an agate line according to quantity and quality of circulation. Newspapers average approximately 2,000 agate lines to the page. The advertising value of a page of newspaper therefore ranges from $200 to $800 a page. Successful newspapers carry from thirty to sixty per cent. advertising matter. A ten-page newspaper would therefore have to carry about three and a half pages of advertising matter.

A newspaper with three pages of advertising matter at the minimum rate, namely, ten cents a line, would have an income of $600 a day from advertisements. Such a paper could easily command fifteen cents a line, at which rate three pages of advertising matter would give it $900 return on its advertisements. Even at ten cents a line, however, $500 from circulation plus $600 from advertisements would give $1,100 a day income. Deduct $1,000 a day for the production and circulation of the newspaper, and there is left $100 a day for interest on investment and for replacements and renewals. Interest on $2,000,000 at six per cent. is $120,000 a year, or approximately $33 a day, thus leaving a margin of $67 a day for replacements, repairs and for fluctuations in income.

An analysis of successful newspapers in Philadelphia and New York will support the approximate correctness of the estimate here given and the deductions drawn from the data just related. Many of those papers have less circulation than 100,000 copies a day and some of them have even less than 50,000. The amount of advertising they carry averages from twenty to sixty per cent. of the printed matter. It goes without saying that these papers do not pay a lower rate of interest on the investment than six per cent., as they would not remain in existence long if they did. Many of the existing newspapers which are capitalized at from one to three million dollars carry real estate in those parts of cities where real estate has a very high value, and obsolete machinery and equipment for which money has been paid but which no longer has much value as part of their capital. Their capital does not always represent the actual amount of cash put into them. They pay interest on the full capitalization and some of them a very much higher interest than six per cent. New conditions have arisen since most of them were established and new facilities for gathering and transmitting news have come into existence. In consequence a plant and equipment for the production of a daily newspaper could be gotten up now for less money than is invested in older papers. It is probable that a plant and equipment for the production of a daily newspaper could now be established at an outlay of $1,000,000 which could compete successfully with newspapers capitalized at $3,000,000.

A factory for a newspaper would no longer have to be located in the most central part of a large city, where land has an extremely high value and where everything which enters into the production of the paper has to be hauled backward and forward at a heavy expense. The factory could now be located on a railroad siding where land is relatively cheap and where everything which enters into the production of the paper could be gotten from the cars without a second handling. An office could be maintained in the newspaper section of the city for business purposes, and this could be so intimately connected with the factory by telephones, and perhaps even by conduits operated by compressed air, that the space between them would be inconsequential. With a completely modern equipment for the production of a daily newspaper the cost of its production could be materially reduced.

A newspaper of ten pages with a circulation of 100,000 copies a day would be a good business enterprise, perhaps even a better business enterprise than one of a larger number of pages and a much larger circulation. In the newspaper business there is a limit upward as well as downward at which a paper is a first-class business. When the circulation becomes too low the paper can not get advertisements, and when it goes too high the return in advertisements becomes disproportionate to the increased cost of paper.

The heaviest item of expense in a newspaper, and the one which does not change much in its ratio with increase or decrease of circulation, is the paper. Paper costs about one-twentieth of a cent per page. For a ten-page paper of 100,000 circulation the approximate cost of paper is $500; for a twenty-page paper of 100,000 circulation it is $1,000; for a twenty-page paper of 200,000 circulation it is $2,000. As the price which can be gotten for advertisements does not always increase proportionately with the circulation, and as the size of the paper has to be materially increased with the increase of advertisements, a point may be reached in both the number of pages and in the circulation at which a paper no longer is as good a business proposition as it was when it had fewer pages and less circulation. A newspaper which too far exceeds its competitors in circulation may suffer as much financially as a paper which is too far below its competitors.

Much of the matter which appears in the daily newspapers of this country could be improved by a condensation and orderly presentation. People want to know the news and to get it in a way in which they can understand it. An expenditure of a little more money on newspaper talent undoubtedly would reduce the cost of the newspaper itself. Since paper is the most expensive item it would be profitable to exercise economy in this item. European papers have much less bulk than American papers because they concentrate and put in order what they present to the public. Excision of the scandalous details given in our American papers would undoubtedly improve the papers and save money in their production.

In New York, Chicago, Philadelphia and St. Louis it would be relatively easy to establish a daily Catholic newspaper with a circulation of 100,000, and to secure from thirty to forty per cent. advertisements at from ten to twenty cents an agate line for it. The population of all these cities is over thirty-three per cent. Catholic. This Catholic population reads the daily newspaper the same as the non-Catholic population and contributes its share to everything which goes into the newspaper business.

A careful study of the population of Philadelphia shows that approximately forty per cent. is Catholic. For thirty years over thirty-three per cent. of the marriages entered into in Philadelphia have been Catholic; for ten years about forty per cent. of the interments have been Catholic and, in 1913, forty-three per cent. of the births were Catholic. As the population of Philadelphia is over 1,600,000, it is fair to assume that there are nearly 700,000 Catholics in the city of Philadelphia. Approximately eighty per cent. of the parochial school children of the Archdiocese of Philadelphia are in the city of Philadelphia, leaving about twenty per cent. outside of the city limits. Upon this basis the Catholic population of the Archdiocese is nearly 900,000. There is, therefore, in the Archdiocese alone a large enough Catholic population to give a circulation of 200,000 out of the Catholic population for a Catholic daily newspaper. Besides, it is not unreasonable to expect that many non-Catholics would take a daily newspaper of the kind which a Catholic daily newspaper ought to be.

Could a Catholic daily newspaper get advertisements? The rank and file of the Catholic people are producers and therefore enter largely into the advertising problem. Surely fifty per cent. of the want ads. are from Catholics who are looking for employment or from people who need Catholic employees. While big business is not ordinarily in the hands of Catholics, it could not go on without them. Big business must have the patronage of Catholics and would have to advertise in a Catholic daily newspaper to get it. A Catholic daily newspaper with a circulation of 100,000 would constitute a good advertising medium because it would have a unity of thought back of it. Big business could not disregard either the sentiment or the needs of forty per cent. of the population of any large city.

Is a Catholic daily newspaper feasible? Many of those who have participated in the discussion have presented views of a Catholic daily newspaper which would make it unfeasible, but they have wrong ideas about what such a paper ought to be. Modeled on a Catholic weekly paper a Catholic daily paper would not be feasible. This is not derogatory to our Catholic weekly papers. Catholic weekly papers have a function far different from the function of a Catholic daily paper. One must put the Catholic weekly paper out of one's mind in trying to form a conception of what a Catholic daily paper ought to be.

A daily newspaper which would keep the public informed upon every subject without transgressing the commandments of God by scandal-mongering, backbiting and disedifying, would be a Catholic daily newspaper and would be welcome in every Catholic home. It would be in the newspaper world what a good, practical Catholic is in the business and social world, nothing more and nothing less. It would present to its readers what is going on in the world, through Catholic minds in harmony with Catholic principles and morals.

Men for the production of a Catholic daily newspaper exist and are now employed on non-Catholic papers. They often have to work against conscience and principles because there is no field in which they can work in harmony with them. What they are doing now under difficulties they could do better were a field open in which they could engage themselves without making such a sacrifice.

The chief difficulty in the way of establishing a Catholic daily newspaper is want of understanding and comprehension on the part of the rank and file of our Catholic people of what such a paper would mean to Catholics, what resources they have for it and why apparently they can not come together on it. Most Catholics think that a Catholic daily newspaper would be a good thing and that there ought to be such a paper. Many think that it could not be established because it would not be supported by Catholics. Individually these will tell you that they themselves would support such a paper, but they do not believe that anybody else would. As a matter of fact, every Catholic would support such a paper without being solicited to do so and without even knowing why he did it. Psychologically all of us take the daily newspaper which comes nearest to looking at the important matters of life in the same way in which we look at them ourselves. None of us takes a paper long which quarrels with our religious principles and our ideas upon ethics unless there is no other paper less offensive to us to be had. A daily newspaper which would look at the important subjects of life from a Catholic viewpoint would soon find its way into every Catholic home.

Catholics may not read books and magazines as much as some of us would like to have them do, but they do read the daily newspapers. If we wish to reach and influence their minds we must get at them through what they read and not through what we would like them to read. It is preposterous to assume that they would not read Catholic daily newspapers. According to every principle which governs human conduct and every psychological law which actuates human beings, we have a right to assume that they would read them and we discredit ourselves in everything which we hold sacred when we assume that they would not read them.

Catholics build churches, schools and eleemosynary institutions without a moment's hesitation because they understand what these mean to them. When they have grasped the idea of what daily newspapers would mean to them they will establish them also. In establishing churches, schools and eleemosynary institutions they are led by men in whom they have confidence and for the rest they trust in God. It is their faith which operates. They are tied together in this faith into a force which can not be stopped by any obstacle, and the man who leads them applies the force for the end which he seeks to accomplish.

The establishment of a Catholic daily newspaper in a large city would really be easier than the organization and building up of a new parish with all that goes with it, did our people but realize their strength and have leaders for such a work in whom they would have confidence. It is, however, the work of laymen and as yet Catholic laymen do not quite fully realize their duties and responsibilities as laymen and do not sufficiently understand and sympathize one with another to enable them to accomplish such a task easily. When they have grasped the idea more fully and have gotten a better comprehension of their strength and resources, Catholics will establish Catholic daily newspapers as easily as they build churches and schools.

A Catholic daily newspaper ought to be established out of the resources of the rank and file of the people rather than out of those of the wealthy classes. The capital should be subscribed by the many rather than by the few. The faith necessary for such an enterprise is oftener found in Catholics of moderate means than in those of great wealth. Faith is often corroded by material prosperity and unfitted for such a superstructure. Besides there is a stability and a permanency in numbers which in a work of this kind would mean a great deal for its success. A Catholic daily newspaper in a large city owned by the rank and file of the Catholic people would not only find in the number of its stockholders a guarantee of its success, but also a protection against the temptation of sacrificing the ethical interests of the paper to its pecuniary interests.

The establishment of a Catholic daily newspaper is feasible, but only through efforts which have as part of their object an education of the rank and file of the Catholic people in what such a paper means, what resources Catholics have for the establishment of it and how they can apply the resources to the accomplishment of their undertaking. It may take some years to do it, but the beginning of the movement should not be postponed any longer. Pessimism and lack of confidence, one in another, should be left out of the undertaking. Pessimism is a good brake-shoe on enthusiasm, but it should never be permitted to be more than a brake-shoe. There are enough self-sacrificing men and women of strong faith among us to do the work. What we must do first, however, is to crystallize ourselves into one force.

LAWRENCE F. FLICK, SR.

COMMUNICATIONS

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

"A Ludicrous Anachronism"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It would appear to me that the last critic of Father Bull's "A Ludicrous Anachronism," while far too severe, has altogether mistaken the purpose of the article. Father Bull shows in "A Ludicrous Anachronism" wide reading, keen observation and deep thinking. He never contended that the Church is not hated and persecuted in many ways by its enemies. I am sure he has read "The Present Position of Catholics in England," knows something of their position in America, and is well acquainted with all the facts told by his latest critic.

His theme, as I took it, was to prove that methods pursued by the enemies of the Catholic faith two hundred years ago are ludicrous at the present day. The Titus Oates plot would certainly be an anachronism even in England to-day. The methods that succeeded in burning the Ursuline convent in Boston could scarcely hope of success at the present moment. Nor do we expect the Menace methods to succeed here in Philadelphia in a second burning of St. Augustine's Church.

Calumny, lying, forgery may succeed when the victim is unknown. We Catholics were unknown when such methods succeeded. We are not known now in some parts of the country east and west, but how much better known are we to-day than in the days of the Know-nothings? We are some sixteen millions. To vilify one-eighth of our population is a most absurd method and altogether out of time in view of modern methods of intelligence. With our present forces for correcting the falsehood it is a laughable anachronism, in a certain sense, because of its futility. It may succeed in "Tom" Watson's country, or in the backwood towns of Pennsylvania or Vermont, but in general the method can not succeed. Every Catholic has some Protestant friends, say three, who know that the vile sheets attacking us are plainly lying. Most of the intelligent Protestants deprecate and regret such methods, even those who forward and encourage other methods mentioned by Father Bull's latest critic.

Holiness is a visible mark of Christ's Church as well in America as elsewhere. Our Catholic forbears builded well in this country, and their children of to-day, whatever defections have taken place, however much more the faithful could do, are not as a body unworthy of our ancestors. In the face of this example of Catholic virtue, piety, sacrifice, how vain are lies and calumny, wherever we are at all numerous. A certain brand of bigotry thrives on the ignorance of those who do not know us. This was possibly successful years ago. To-day it is impossible of success. The Church will always suffer opposition; as in the past so to-day and to-morrow. The kind of opposition will vary with conditions. Father Bull is right in saying that opposition that succeeded when we were only a handful is an anachronism when we are one-eighth of the population of a country for which we have bled and died. We want to be known just as we are. We are kept before the public mind by this brand of bigotry. The American public, noted for its fairness, in the endeavor to verify before condemning, will see us as we are. What will be the consequences? The campaign of lying and forgery will fail. No Catholics will become Protestants. Many who are to-day Protestants will become Catholics. Consequently this particular phase of bigotry may well be termed an "anachronism" and is well described as "ludicrous."

Philadelphia. J. O'H.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Is Father Bull in earnest or is he playing a game of intellectual hop-skip-and-jump? I interpreted his first article as a statement that bigotry was a bygone fad. I further contended that bigotry was as rife in our land to-day as ever in the history of the past. He answers and admits implicitly my interpretation. (AMERICA, March 20, p. 563.) He then goes on to tell me that I have made an assertion, the largeness of which it is impossible to prove. I give facts (Id., April 3, 1915, p. 617) which must have caused him a doubt, for forthwith in another letter I am informed that my "last letter has made this indisputably clear: that our discussion is not upon common ground." Why not have said this in the first reply to my objection?

Here is the latest distinction: "The question is not, 'Is there bigotry?' but, 'Is American public opinion bigoted'?" This is hair-splitting of the finest kind. What Father Bull has said about public opinion may be all true in the abstract, but it is not to the point. What we want is public opinion in the concrete, the public opinion expressed in the everyday life of America. Would Father Bull kindly inform us by what process of logic we can reason: "We have proved bigotry to be widespread in America, but American public opinion is not bigoted." If Americans are rational beings, their actions ought logically to follow their opinions. I think we may argue that, unless Americans are perfect hypocrites, their actions manifest their opinions. If their actions are anti-Catholic, then where is the fallacy in concluding that their opinions are anti-Catholic, or bigoted?

Let us not be dubbed pessimistic and unAmerican if, looking at the state of our country, we are forced to question the assertion that men who are striving to raise the religious issue are misfits with the spirit of the twentieth century. American mentality may be broadened to skepticism, but it is a skepticism which attacks first and foremost the Catholic Church. Its forerunners are telling the people of our land: "Eat, drink and be merry; for to-morrow we die." For decent, honest, God-fearing non-Catholics, who according to the light of their conscience are striving to gain Heaven, they represent the Catholic Church as a Mother whose children have long since learned the secret ways of lust. For those who care naught for law and order they unfurl the banner: "Kill! Murder! Annihilate!" And their deadliest weapons are aimed at the heart of the Church and at her children.

New York. L. RONALD.

[This controversy is closed.—Editor, AMERICA.]

The Time of Death

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Father Coppens, in his very courteous reply to my letter in your issue of April 10, writes in the last sentence of his communication: "When there is no solid reason for an opinion, we can not call it probable." I suppose the contradictory proposition is as theologically incontrovertible, viz., when there is a solid reason for an opinion we can call it probable. The point at issue is whether Father Coppens in his criticism of Mr. Watkin's book stated too much when he wrote the following in your issue of March 6: "It is certainly not revealed that no one who is lost would not have been saved by God's grace if he had lived longer, nor is there any argument from reason to make such a statement probable. Rather the contrary is the case." Therefore, according to the learned Jesuit, there is no argument from reason to make the statement probable, "that no one who is lost would not have been saved by God's grace if he had lived longer." On the contrary it would seem that there is a solid reason for thinking, that some are lost who would not have been saved by God's grace if they had lived longer. Now, there is nothing revealed by God, defined by the Church, or theologically certain as to what would be the fate of any particular individual of the human race who has died in mortal sin if that individual had lived longer. So there is room here for a little speculation, and there is nothing doctrinally objectionable if a person holds that when God cuts off a sinner in his sins He has been leaning toward the side of infinite mercy, by not waiting to cut the thread of the sinner's life when his sufferings in hell would be all the greater for greater guilt. Of course, nobody, even Mr. Watkin, would be so absurd as to say that it was a better thing for a sinner to die in his sins than to die in the state of grace. But assuming that the individual is lost, then we can surely say, and reasonably, too, that perhaps it was better for that individual to be cut off then and there, than to have lived longer and to be cut off when he would be more guilty. For there can be such a thing as the best of bad places even in the eternal abode of the wicked.

If a person who is actually damned had lived a little longer, one of two alternatives should have been true: He would have been saved or he would not. God by His infallible foreknowledge (scientia media) knows which of these alternatives is the true one, since He knows infallibly whether the sinner would freely cooperate with His grace or not. We know that God is infinitely merciful. If God then cuts off a sinner—and this will hold for every individual sinner, past present or future—it is a far more benign opinion to hold that He has cut him off because He saw that if he had lived longer his punishment would have been all the greater, rather than to hold, He cut him off in his sins while He knew infallibly that if He had allowed him to live longer he would have saved his soul by cooperating with the grace of God, which is always sufficient as long as the sinner lives in this life.

We can not, of course, conclude from this that if God does cut off sinners who would be saved if they lived longer He would be doing an injustice. Not at all. God is free to do so if He wills. All we claim is, that since we know nothing for certain about what He actually does, or why He does it in the case in question, we are free to hold what seems to be the more benign and less harsh and rigorous opinion, viz., that God in cutting off a sinner acts in accordance with His mercy rather than any other of His attributes.

Again in Father Coppens' communication, in your issue of April 10, is the following:

> The question is not what God in His mercy might do if He wished, but what He has let us know He actually does in the present order of Providence. Now He has told us clearly, in equivalent terms, that Judas was eternally lost after a number of mortal sins, while his life might have been taken from him after fewer sins or before he committed any mortal sins at all. The statement, then, or opinion, that God always cuts short the career of a sinner who, as He foresees, would only increase his sins and his eternal punishment is not even probable, for Christ has told us it is not true.

Christ has told us nothing of the kind. He has told us that Judas died in his sins. We do not need any revelation to know that a person who dies in his sins is worse off than if he died in the state of grace or when he had committed fewer sins. But what we want to know is, What would have been the fate of Judas if he had lived a little longer? Christ did not tell us anything about that. Father Coppens asks also, "If his critic would consider it probable that all the Jews who exclaimed, during Christ's sacred passion, 'Crucify Him!' are better off for all eternity than if they had died some years sooner?" They may or they may not be better off if they had died before the crucifixion. God in all probability in answer to the Saviour's prayer, "Father forgive them for they know not what they do," converted some of them and they may be in Heaven now, though had they died before the prayer of Christ they might have been lost for other sins. If some of them are lost they may be better off than they would be had they died before the crucifixion, because it is possible that they had committed greater sins earlier in their life for which they did penance before Christ's death, and so they are not as deep in the pit now as they would have been. But the point under discussion is not touched by the question at all, viz., What would have been the lot of some of those who cried out, "Crucify Him," if they had lived a little longer than they did? Would they do penance or would they not? We can only speculate about that point. Father Coppens asks: "There are a vast number of obdurate sinners in all ages: is it probable that all of them die when it is best for them?" I think this question is answered fairly completely above. Anyhow, the proposition I am arguing against is not this one, but the proposition which Father Coppens enunciated in the number of March 6, viz., That there is no argument from reason to make the statement probable "that no one who is lost would not have been saved by God's grace if he had lived longer." If I have shown that it is probable "that some one who is lost would not have been saved if he had lived longer" my case is proved. The population of the world as estimated by Ravenstein, 1890, exclusive of polar regions is approximately 1,487,600,000. The population of the belligerent nations, including all their possessions, is about 800,000,000. A very small fraction of these are at the front. A very small fraction of those at the front fall in battle, and a very small fraction of those falling in battle, let us hope, die in their sins. So only a very small fraction of the obdurate sinners of this age are really falling in a blood-drenched field of battle. Anyhow, since I am not defending Mr. Watkin's position at all, but simply showing that one can take exception to the proposition of Father Coppens as enunciated above, this question as to whether all the obdurate sinners of all ages die when it is best for them is beside the point, and to it we say transeat, let it pass.

St. Paul. J. C. HARRINGTON.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Father Faber says that every one dies at the very best time, place and manner for his eternal happiness; even though he be lost. I think Father Faber is taken as good authority. I think, too (at least philosophically), that existence in hell is better than no existence, because existence is a bonum. However, Our Lord's words about Judas would seem to deny this. "It were better for that man if he had not been born." But this problem carries us back into the eternal decrees of God. We know, however, that God's predestination and our freedom would explain all the difficulties of the permission of evil, death-bed graces and other problems, could we see them as they are. God had either to withhold freedom of will or permit evil. The freedom was a greater bonum than all possible evil was a malum. But why? Because freedom is necessary to love. And God must have angelic and human love, created love, which is the union of one intelligent, free being with another. It is unfortunate, however, that the expression, "permission of evil," is, I think, misunderstood by many people. It does not mean that God approved or sanctioned evil, but that He foresaw it, and rather than forego the love of His creatures left them free. I think the question of dying at the best moment could be simplified by stripping it of all details, and showing how in the councils of the Divine Mind prior to all creation it lay in God's mercy as an orderly whole: And He said, "It is very good."

St. James, Minn. J. J. DURWARD.

A Chain of Catholic Dailies

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A great deal has been said and written on the question of the Catholic daily paper. I would like to add my quota for what it is worth. Of course there is no doubt about the desirability of a Catholic daily paper. Its advent, or at least its permanent stay, would, however, cause a loss to the merriment of nations, for there would no longer be the statement in black and white that "at the incipient fire at the church, the Reverend Blank threw the sacristy out of the window," or, "that evening he performed a six o'clock Mass with a terra cotta on his head." It is a cause of wonderment that the reporter's copy, going through the hands of copy reader, city or managing editor, and even the proof reader, does not fall under the eye of at least one individual familiar with Catholic ceremonies and Catholic terms. This defect is not peculiar to the East. I have seen blunders of this nature in papers of the South, the Middle West and the Far West. With the Catholic daily as a model in the use of proper terms the secular dailies would correct their blunders, to the diminution of amusement or annoyance according to the temperament of the Catholic reader. This phase of inaccurate reporting is quite unimportant in comparison to establishing a Catholic daily. I consider a Catholic daily an absurdity, doomed to failure. I consider the establishing of two, or three, or four, an almost equally ridiculous proposition. The only way to establish a Catholic daily press is to have at least twelve Catholic dailies in our twelve largest cities. Then the Catholic press would be a power in the country. Should one Catholic daily be established, say in New York city, its circulation and its influence would be merely local. With a chain of papers this much-desired influence could be made national.

Another angle of this proposition is very important. These papers would necessarily require their own cable service. It would be extremely doubtful if any one of them would be able to secure the Associated Press service, and if this were accomplished it would scarcely be satisfactory. If ten or twelve, or twenty, Catholic dailies were to band together it can easily be seen that ocean cable tolls would be reduced to a minimum for each. The same can be said for domestic news, and even for foreign correspondence. All this would necessitate the forming of a sort of Catholic Associated Press company, and this would require an immense sum of money in order to receive adequate service with which to compete successfully with the A. P. and the U. P. associations.

Every one will admit that the Catholic daily will have to be, salaciousness excepted, equal in every respect and in every department to the really wonderful daily papers of our age. This means a large and efficient editorial and reportorial staff, and this means a very large outlay. This is only one phase of the expense of production.

Not necessarily, then, in a spirit of pessimism, but in view of the fact that a Catholic press, to be effective, calls for a chain of Catholic papers, and that one, or two, or three would be as mere drops in a bucket in influencing a nation toward a fairer understanding of the Catholic position; in view of the enormous capital that would be required for such an undertaking to be successful, and remembering that fanciful theories will accomplish nothing; and, finally, in view of the fact that there is the smallest possibility of obtaining the many necessary millions, is it not fair to presume that the whole matter, at least for the present, is regrettably chimerical? As a business proposition is it at present practical?

Milwaukee. J. E. COPUS, S.J.

Dean of the Marquette School of Journalism.

Prohibition vs. Temperance

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The pen that wrote, "No priest who celebrates Mass can be a total abstainer," was a reckless one; and why did it not add "or who eats mince pie"? There has been no trying "to marshal the Fathers of the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore into the ranks of the prohibitionists," but only to have their admonitions and instructions with regard to intoxicating liquors followed, and those persons take part in the organized Catholic total abstinence work, who the late Pope Pius X hoped would do so. If you can not make a horse drink, you can at least lead him to the water; but some persons can not be got out of an atmosphere tainted with the odor of alcohol. There are writers and speakers justly indignant in their denunciation of anti-Catholic literature, who at the same time so write and speak on the subject of drink as to raise in not well-informed Protestant minds a suspicion that there must be some sort of necessary connection between rum and Catholicism. They seem never to consider that any responsiblity attaches to such inconsiderate utterances; or that the good name of the Church and the salvation of souls for whom Christ died are at stake. Even if Federal statistics and court records showed "that, on the average and in proportion to population, there is more drunkenness, vice, crime, misdemeanor, poverty, divorce and insanity in dry territory than in wet territory," it would prove nothing against prohibition as advocated by the party. Prohibitory law, with other than a prohibition administration to enforce it, is not prohibition; and that is all there has been had in any State until within a few years, and even now there is nothing else except in a couple of States at most. Before prohibition can be judged honestly, it must have an impartial trial for a reasonable time. It is safe to predict that then in a very short time there will be marked lessening in the number of commitments to penal, reformatory and charitable institutions in the States covered by the law. Heretofore the prohibition movement has generally been supported by candidates, not for itself, but for votes; when they got them, they lost all interest in the matter. It failed because there was no will to enforce it. Country-wide prohibition, which is all that is worth the name, would not increase vice and crime, but lessen it. However, the improvement might not perhaps justify the change; but if the evils arising from drink are to be removed, country-wide prohibition is the only thing that will remove them. "Maine has had sixty years of prohibition 'blessings';" and the Catholic population of the State rose from 70,000 in 1890 to 123,638 in 1910, while the population of the State rose from 661,986 in 1890 to 742,371 in 1910. By all means let us have prohibition "blessings" in all the States.

Let those writers who are so concerned, lest personal liberty and Catholic freedom of choice be infringed and sin occasioned if the campaign against drink be allowed to go on unchecked, turn to the pages of Holy Writ a moment. Their assertion that wine is one of God's good creatures, can be passed over for the present; however, He provided the Garden of Paradise, not with a wine-press, but with a stream of water. To encourage the children of Israel to desire the Promised Land, He did not represent it to them as a land flowing with wine and honey, though it had most excellent grapes, but with milk and honey. Then, too, when He commanded Moses to strike the rock to provide drink for the famished people in the desert, it was not wine but water that burst forth and followed them. So when He commanded the ravens to feed the Prophet at Carith, they brought him bread and flesh twice a day, but not wine, for God had ordered him to drink of the torrent. Again, when the thirsty Prophet met the widow of Sarephta, he did not ask her to get him wine to drink, but to bring him a little water in a vessel. And when he waked from sleep under the juniper tree, it was not a hearth cake and wine which he saw and which the angel told him to eat, but a hearth cake and water; when, too, he rose from sleep after partaking of it, he did not fall to cursing as Noah did when he waked from the drunken stupor after drinking the wine which he himself had made; but in the strength of that water and hearth cake the prophet walked forty days and forty nights to the Mountain of God. That is one difference between the beverage provided by our Heavenly Father and that made by fallen man. So when Christ was thirsty, He did not ask the Samaritan woman for wine, but for water, just as the Psalmist had said of Him, "He shall drink of the torrent, therefore shall lift up the head." So water is the drink God provides, whether naturally or miraculously; and the total abstainer is satisfied with it. Fallen man made wine and at once got drunk on it, and God has been warning us against it ever since. To say that God is the author or maker of wine is no more true than to say He is the author or maker of the assassin's dagger or the anarchist's bomb, though, of course, it sounds harsher; but why should it? They have not destroyed a hundredth part as many as drink has. And the friends of drink must remember when they appeal to the Bible in justification of its use, that the alcoholic beverage of the Bible which God allowed is wine, not beer or whiskey; and the fermented pure juice of the grape, not a concoction of alcohol, logwood, syrups and flavoring extracts, and that the drink God made was and is water. The first time wine is mentioned in Holy Writ it is clearly the product of man's ingenuity and labor; and the first and second times its use is mentioned it is as the occasion of most shameful sins. Even if God had made wine, that is no reason why its use might not be prohibited; He certainly made swine, and yet Moses prohibited their use even to the touching of the carcass; and so effectively that more than one thousand years afterward, Eleazar suffered a frightfully cruel death rather than taste swine's flesh.

Scottdale, Pa. M. A. LAMBING.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Prohibition does not prohibit. This slogan of the anti-prohibitionists is pretty wide-spread. Perhaps it is true, but the following incident gives reason for doubt:

Some years ago I asked a Catholic priest, in whose town prohibition had existed for two years, what was the effect from his experience of prohibition. He answered: "They say prohibition does not prohibit, but in this parish there is an inebriate asylum and a large conference of the St. Vincent de Paul Society. The effect of prohibition has been that we have half the number of inebriates in the asylum and half as many applications for assistance from the St. Vincent de Paul Society. If facts like these could be multiplied they might weaken our faith in the dictum that "prohibition does not prohibit."

New York. GEORGE CARVER.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Most Catholics regard a temperance movement as a prohibition movement. This is not so. Prohibition is neither feasible nor fair in a large city like New York. It means confiscation without compensation. The writer has the opinion that the clergy of this diocese are not doing their duty in organizing to reduce intemperance. It is rarely remarks are made from the altar against intemperance. Why? Many consider that the "drink" element has silenced the pulpit and has terrorized the Irish in the Church and in politics. The statistics in the public institutions of this city relating to tuberculosis, insanity, poor house inmates, arrests for intoxication, etc., show such a movement is needed in New York. The writer believes an aggressive, intelligent movement would reduce the number of Irish names on these lists. Professional Catholic politicians would shun such a movement like the smallpox, but it could be successful. Why doesn't a courageous body like the Jesuits start such a movement? They are not afraid of the contributions of the "drink interests." The "drink interests" would not be offended or oppose a sensible movement against intemperance which would not mean prohibition and the confiscation of property, etc. In New England many cities have buildings owned by the Father Mathew Societies. Commercially the Irish occupy an inferior position in New York. Our best salaried positions are political sinecures. Look at the directorate of business institutions, banks, etc.: about the only Irish names found there are those of Irish Protestants. While there are exceptions to my statements, yet in the main they are true, and the causes are not English tyranny, but "drink."

New York. THOMAS P. BURKE.

The Y. M. C. A. and Catholics

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I hesitate to appear as a devil's advocate. Yet the very poor arguments that have been printed against the letter of Mr. Farrell force me so to do. It is indeed upon the consciences of all to persuade Catholic young men to shake the waters of the "Y" swimming pools from off their limbs; yet I think we could preach at them all day in the tones of Mr. Hume, or Mr. Ryan, or Mr. Jones, or Dr. Sears and the young men would continue enjoying their bath and only laugh at us.

To put it briefly, I think they are all hurting what we regard a very good cause by a very poor argument. Mr. Jones of New York, for instance, began to administer to us a course in formal logic, and treated us finally to a little spicy rhetoric and some very thin soup. Does he not know that it has been a standing laugh with the Irish to tell of their faithful and witty brethren who took the English soup and kept their faith besides? Dr. Sears, too, is content to substitute vehemence for argument; he lightens his guilt by his apology. Mr. Ryan comes nearer to the true position; he too, however, clouds the issue slightly, as Mr. Hume has done from the beginning. The question is not, indeed, would a Catholic do a better thing by segregating himself from the "Y," but whether he has done something positively harmful or forbidden by the Church in taking advantage of the athletic or educational equipment of this organization? As yet I do not think that any persuasive or convincing argument has been advanced for this position. Every one of these contributors admits that such action has not been condemned formally by the Church; Mr. Hume, to evade this difficulty, says that the natural law itself and the positive divine law are against it. And yet another master in this new Israel, Mr. Jones, says that confessors have given their penitents permission to fly in the face of such terrible prohibitions. Mr. Hume finally tries to bolster up his first philippic by proclaiming that the Catholics who attend the athletic or night school gatherings of this organization are submitting themselves thereby to a proximate danger to their faith. How in the world can he ever prove this? I am of the opinion that every true Catholic should sacrifice himself to the extent at least of a bath, rather than increase the funds or the roll of the Y. M. C. A., but I do not think that we should hurt this good cause by proposing an argument of this kind. Confessors throughout the land are allowing young people to attend these night-schools. Would they do so if they considered it a proximate danger to the faith of their penitents? It may indeed be a remote danger; it certainly can not be shown to be a proximate one. To study shorthand or French or German under the training of a Catholic, for instance, which I am assured is possible and has happened in the "Y," does not seem to be a proximate danger to a man's faith. I believe that the Church is going to forbid the entrance of her people into this organization, because the general good of the Church would seem to demand this course of action; but until she does so I do not think that we can do any good by tirades against the Catholics who are not yet ready for sacrifices of which they see no need.

Is it of interest to know that a great number of Catholics who had been attending the night schools of the Y. M. C. A. left that organization when the Young Men's Catholic Association of Boston established and conducted so successfully, their rival night classes?

Boston. K. More.

To the Editor of America:

As a reader of your excellent review I have been extremely interested of late in the discussion of the merits of the Y. M. C. A. I feel that I must take exception, however, to the question propounded by Mr. McCloskey: "Has any Catholic member of the Y. M. C. A. ever heard his religion belittled in their halls?"

Four years ago while a student at Brown University a gentleman whose name I believe was Hurry lectured under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. The lecture given in the Brown Union, a building which was donated to the university by John D. Rockefeller, Jr., was on the subject of opportunities for young Americans in South America. The lecturer was a social worker who had just returned from the field. Speaking of conditions in that continent he said that when he entered the office of the editor of a leading newspaper in a South American city, the editor blurted out, "Young man you must fight the Jesuits." The speaker cast a few slighting remarks about the immorality of the country due ostensibly to the State religion. Now, although this happened four years ago, I remember the incident quite distinctly, because it was the first of many slights which I heard against my religion while a student of that college. And I remember this incident even more distinctly because it was the means of keeping me from joining that "educational institution." I could go on and mention other lectures given under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. while I was in Brown, but time and space will not permit me, except to ask you what you think of one under the salacious caption of "Notre Dame: Worshiping in Shades"?

What is the remedy? What are Catholic young men to do who care not for the halls of the Knights of Columbus? Well, it lies not with the clergy, but with the laity. Let the laity organize such an association as the Y. M. C. A. and I assure you that it will be well patronized by our Catholic youth.

Newport, R. I. John H. Greene, Jr.

To the Editor of America:

Here in New England we have no doubts about the nature of the Y. M. C. A. Our papers are literally dotted with notices of this kind: (1) "Evangelistic week in charge of Y. M. C. A. begins to-morrow night in Baptist and People's Church. Two churches will unite for the services, which will be conducted by a band of evangelistic workers from the Fisher's Club of the Y. M. C. A." (2) "Union evangelistic service conducted by the Y. M. C. A. at 7." (3) "The institute for Religious Education has been held under the cooperative auspices of five organizations, the Interchurch Federation, the Worcester District Sunday School Association, the Worcester Ministerial Association, the Y. M. C. A. and the Y. W. C. A." Clearly, then, the "Y" is a militant, Protestant organization, saving souls now through preaching, now through bathing.

Worcester. A. Waters.

To the Editor of America:

One Leo Paul McCloskey has given in America for March 13, a vigorous defence of the Y. M. C. A., coupled by a venomous attack on Catholic societies. Whatsoever may be his own opinion as to the present stability of his faith, it is evident from his letter that he is thoroughly imbued with Y. M. C. A.-ism, which implicitly, if not explicitly, frowns upon the Knights of Columbus and the Irish Ancient Order of Hibernians. We wonder if Mr. Leo Paul McCloskey would sacrifice the gymnastics of the Y. M. C. A. to walk in the plebeian Holy Name Society parade. This gentleman may gain a little notoriety by a snarl at Catholic societies which insist upon the Easter duty of cleansing the soul, even if they have not a big bathtub to wash the body in. One sentence of his, viz., "Now, take the K. of C. More benefits living and dead; weekly inundations of tickets for amateur theatricals, which are the despair and shame of the educated." That is about as exquisite a piece of arrogance as has yet come from the pen of a Catholic. It could emanate from none but a product of the Y. M. C. A. Perhaps Mr. McCloskey will follow his contribution with another one in defence of "eugenics" which is practised by some "educated" people who look with pity and contempt on the large families of the poor and "ignorant."

Mr. McCloskey may stay in the Y. M. C. A. as long as he pleases. But it is to be hoped that his venomous attack on Catholic societies, the result of Y. M. C. A. "culture," will not have the effect of poisoning the minds of our Catholic young men.

In contributing his article on the Y. M. C. A. he has furnished a splendid and concrete argument in his own person against Catholics joining the Y. M. C. A.

Cantley, Que. Geo. W. O'Toole, P.P.

To the Editor of America:

In his last pitiable communication to America, Leo Paul McCloskey asserts that the "Church looks with sorrow on those self-complacent societies affiliated with the Church who pay no attention to the physical education of our young men." Now, Mr. McCloskey is either talking arrant nonsense or else he is wilfully shutting his eyes to the splendid work that the various parishes are doing for the welfare of their young men precisely along the lines of physical training.

Again this same gentleman upbraids our Catholic laymen for establishing only "second-class" clubrooms, and argues that "our youth must seek physical training in gymnasiums supposedly tainted with Protestantism." I can not speak for Philadelphia, but as far as my knowledge of clubrooms goes here in New York, I deny flatly the sweeping statement of Mr. McCloskey when he affirms that these clubrooms are only second-rate ones. I should strongly urge the gentleman to leave his home city and get in touch with Catholic activities elsewhere before speaking in such a derogatory manner. Moreover, does not the gentleman realize by this time that the Y. M. C. A. is not only "tainted with Protestantism," but is Protestant through and through?

Why, the very first question put by that Protestant Association, namely: "What is your religion?" leads one to suspect it at once as a proselyter. Moreover, I should like to inform the gentleman from Philadelphia, as a matter of fact, Catholics have heard their religion belittled in the halls of the Y. M. C. A.; and as a matter of fact, also, Catholics have been approached argumentatively by Y. M. C. A. officials. If not in Philadelphia, certainly here in New York. Besides, Mr. McCloskey, it is not so certain that any good Catholic can safeguard himself against the wiles of Protestantism. Others have fallen victims to their wiles; why not you? Toward the close of his letter, Mr. McCloskey speaks of forcing the organization of the Y. M. C. A. to give us (that is, Catholics), a just share in its government. Will the gentleman kindly inform us through the pages of America just what force he is exerting on that distinguished body? He evidently feels that an injustice is being done to him, and yet he is an ardent supporter of an unjust cause. What folly! Mr. McCloskey, you owe an apology to every Catholic society and organization, not only in Philadelphia, but throughout these United States, for your open defence of an association that is against the spirit of the Catholic Church, of which you claim you are a member. You question the baneful influence of that association, do you? Well, then, I think you are more to be pitied than censured.

New York. A. Clery.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, APRIL 24, 1915

Entered as second-class matter, April 15, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Contributions for the Mexican fund may be sent direct to AMERICA.

The Pope's Letter on Mexico

To Our Beloved Son,
James Gibbons,
Cardinal Priest of the Holy Roman Church,
Of the Title of St. Mary beyond the Tiber, Archbishop of Baltimore.

Our Beloved Son,

Health and Apostolic Benediction:

We are in constant receipt of information about the efforts that Catholics, and especially the Catholics of the United States of America, are making under the guidance of the venerable bishops, to carry out Our wishes and to alleviate the sorrow and distress which for so long have been the heavy portion of many of Our brethren in Catholic Mexico, a country sorely harassed by revolution. And in particular We are not unaware of the widespread, active charity, which has manifested itself in so many ways: through assistance given by the press and by public meetings, by subscriptions and collections, and the inauguration of good works of all kinds. Different men have helped on the cause in various ways, some by lending to it the prestige of their high position as citizens, others by giving it financial assistance, and still others—and to these We call especial attention—by devoting to it their best qualities of head and heart; but in every case the motive power of their action has been charity. This has made it possible to shelter and afford assistance to the exiled bishops, priests, and religious of both sexes, and has given Us the great consolation of seeing the young Mexican aspirants to the priesthood, notwithstanding their poverty, continuing their education in the seminaries. The result is that here in Europe all are beginning to recognize that the love, care and protection thus shown the exiles, are among the most beautiful characteristics of Christian and civil life in America.

Many have had a share in this good work, but over and beyond yourself, Our Beloved Son and the two other Cardinals who have been conspicuous for their generous participation in the matter, it gives Us pleasure to mention by name Our Venerable Brothers, the Archbishops of Chicago, and New Orleans, the Bishops of Springfield, Matanzas, Toledo, St. Christopher in Havana, and of San Antonio who has already been praised by Us; also Our Beloved Sons, Fathers Francis C. Kelley, President of the Church Extension Society and Richard H. Tierney, S.J., Editor of the review "America."

On all these and the others we bestow praise, both as a recognition of their past efforts and as a spur to fresh endeavor, for it is Our hope that not they alone, but all "generous and willing souls" as well, will not only continue their successful labors in behalf of this work of piety, but will even increase them, until the restoration to our beloved Republic of Mexico of civil order and Christian liberty has been accomplished, a consummation which We trust will not be long deferred.

For the present, as an earnest of the blessings of Heaven, and as proof of Our good wishes, with all love in the Lord, We bestow on you, Our Beloved Son, and on your entire archdiocese the Apostolic Benediction.

Given at Rome in St. Peter's, March 17, 1915, in the first year of our Pontificate.

Benedict PP. XV.

A String-Pulling Jesuit

IN its London cablegram, the New York Times, conspicuously inaccurate in reporting matters of Catholic interest, solemnly avers that "there is reason to believe that Father Ledòchowski has been pulling certain strings," i. e., in the interests of Austria against the Allied Powers. Much light would be thrown on this alleged string-pulling of the General of the Jesuits, did the sapient Times condescend to state the reason of its belief. But no. Cable rates are high. The General of the Jesuits is a picturesque person, famed in fiction and pseudo-history, one who will lend color to the dullest tale of war and intrigue. "There is reason to believe," while a cowardly phrase, may fitly prelude any story, however cruel or improbable and, at any rate, if any one is hurt, it will be only a Jesuit. But what of that? After these centuries, Jesuits, especially Jesuit Generals, ought to be used to slander.

Thus is history made. Jesuit Generals are not fain and, despite the novelists, were never fain to meddle with political affairs. To care for the internal concerns of the Society, is in itself a task to strain the powers of any man. Besides, such political meddling is strictly forbidden, not only by the tradition and the organic law of the Society, but by the higher authority of the Church. Of this, the New York Times probably knows nothing. "There is reason to believe," says the Times, with the air of a conspirator in a cheap melodrama, "that Father Ledòchowski has been pulling certain strings." "There is reason to believe," avers the unknown author of a book of verse for infants, "that the cow jumped over the moon." But here we have an attempt at proof. The cat saw this remarkable feat, and so did the little dog, who laughed heartily over the unique incident. The Times, however, can not cite even the cat and the dog.

Last month an unfortunate woman, once sheltered in a convent, testified before a Boston committee. Her health, she alleged, had there been destroyed by electrical experiments conducted by Catholics. Pressed for proof, she stated that it was well known (or, "there is reason to believe") that the Jesuits make a special study of electricity. As an expert witness on Jesuit activities, the New York Times may now step into the box lately vacated by the Boston unfortunate.

Spreading Catholic Books

A NEW solution of that knotty problem: How can Catholic books be brought to Catholic readers? is offered by Father John Talbot Smith in the April Catholic Book News. Few of our people in his opinion "read anything Catholic except prayer-books, they rarely think on Catholic subjects, and they do not understand even the particular necessity for a Catholic literature and journalism." "Catholic books are so absurdly dear!" is the complaint. "But that is because you do not buy enough of them," comes the prompt rejoinder. If Catholic publishers, without losing money, could get out large editions of their books, single volumes could be bought at a low price. But the average issue of a Catholic author's book is now about 2,000 copies, so neither the writer nor the publisher profits much by the work's sale.

To remedy this state of things, says Father Smith, the members of Catholic reading circles must promote a vigorous revival and wider spread of that excellent movement. Each circle, moreover, should be made a book league whose members would pledge themselves to buy four books a year in the Catholic market. Catholic authors are now writing books which are superior in literary value to many a work that persistent advertising makes "popular." The members of reading circles should be familiar, themselves, with the books of these Catholic writers and then work zealously to interest friends and acquaintances in them.

The only expenditure would be a little labor in securing a list of authors and books. Already in England the bishops have requested of the Catholic Women's League that they take up this work in earnest, and secure subscribers to Catholic publications and buyers for Catholic books; and the women are now going from door to door in this pioneer work, succeeding admirably. I can see no better way to deliver our people from their present indifference to Catholic printed matter. If the parish priests could be specially interested in both the reading circles and the book league the whole question would be settled in a few years. I think they can be by degrees; some of them have shown that interest always; and indeed what little interest the people take in Catholic publications is largely due to them.

With pastors recommending from the altar the best Catholic periodicals, or calling the congregation's attention to articles of special interest in current issues, and with the members of reading circles bringing to the knowledge of friends the books of contemporary Catholic authors, both the publisher and the writer would be encouraged to do better work.

Reno's Joy

THERE is joy in Reno, not over one sinner doing penance but over many committing crimes. Wine is flowing: "cafés have special features scaling up from the familiar cabaret to serpentine novelties and hoola hoola dances." Reno is delirious with mirth. Why not? Two years since corrupt legislators struck a blow at Reno's very norm of morality, money. These abandoned fellows dared to insist on a year's residence as a condition of divorce. Since then, virtue has languished in Reno. There had always been 500 in the divorce colony: during the two years previous to the passage of the wicked law, 1,281 suits were filed: each divorce brought $2,500 to the town, exclusive of money spent on wine suppers and so on. Virtue ran high those days. Legislators destroyed it, but it is running high again. A new law breaks the marriage bond, "while you wait." Roués in love with other men's wives, dames in love with other women's husbands can step off a train, tarry six short months, appear before a judge and in an hour or less, be ready for a life of adultery under the sanction of law. Reno's joy is great. Her norm of morality was lost and has been found again. And the children? The girls may walk the streets at dusk: the boys may go to perdition in another way. Who cares? Souls are not worth twopence to Reno. Sins are worth $2,500 a piece. Reno is not in Central Africa or Thibet, but in Nevada, U. S. A.

Peace, Hatred, Arms

THE distraught world is hungry for peace: our own country is ringing with a cry for it, clergymen are preaching about it, statesmen are praising it, many folk are praying for it. This is admirable and, best of all, Americans are sincere in their desire, but not all. On Sunday some lift up their voices in ringing appeal to the Prince of Peace, imploring Him to compassionate the suffering of His brothers in the field and the sorrows of the women and children at home; on Monday these self-same men who the day before put up the strong prayer to Heaven, are foremost in movements that tend to prolong the heart-breaking warfare. Some strive to stir hatred anew by fierce and unjust denunciations of one or other of the belligerents; others contract with gleeful soul to sell to combating nations materials of war, with which the soldiers, for whom they prayed, are slain like sheep in the shambles. True this latter act does not violate human laws: but what a pitiful commentary on sincerity, on idealism. Sunday a prayer for peace: Monday, joy over lucre obtained from the sale of munitions to one or other belligerent, it does not matter which.

The Pilgrim Fathers, said a distinguished American, were pious people: first they fell upon their knees and then they fell upon the aborigines. The Pilgrim Fathers are not all dead.

Carrying His Point

A STUDENT was determined to worst his rival and let everybody think it was done easily. He flung himself into all the sports and amusements while the rival kept steadily at his books. But when all were asleep, the reckless, unconcerned athlete arose and stole from the night the hours of study which a petty vanity would not give during the day. This is no fable but a fact. "I ruined my eyesight and injured my health and in general made a fool of myself," said the night-student, but despite his contrition, there was a ring of exultancy perceptible in his tone, as he continued, "I won the prize, however, and I carried my point." In many respects the phrase is an appropriate one. Carrying one's point represents an immense amount of toil for an insignificant trifle of results. To carry a point is like unlimbering a battery to swat a fly. The wife carries her point, and the lampshade of red instead of yellow is finally purchased and waves anarchistic defiance ever after in a once happy home. The husband carries his point and has, as he conceives, effected admirable order at the dinner-table by creating remarkable disorder in chastened children, rebuked servants, and humiliated wife.

Most of the point-carrying rampant in our unregenerate world is plain, ordinary selfishness, or militant pride masquerading as strength of character and lofty assertion of one's rights. The little boy who said to his little sister on the hobby horse, "If one of us got down, there would be more room for me," succeeded in carrying his point and riding his hobby, but the ostentatious disinterestedness of his supposition does not completely disguise the opposite tendency of his conclusion. It may be doubted whether the poor, sneaking satisfaction which a man hugs to his soul and over which he smacks his lips is really any lasting gratification when he looks back on the smoking ruins along the path he has carried his point. It was a donkey in the old story that would not heed the restraining rein and insisted upon making for the precipice. The abused master finally helped the beast over the cliff. On the other hand a door-mat or porridge would not be considered adept at carrying a point. But the great Father Tom Burke laid down as the ideal religious—perhaps too excessive for ordinary mortals: "Be as humble as a door-mat and as pliable as porridge."

"You carried your point," mutters the automobilist who has been left the dust, and in the rear, and now sees the ambulance coming back with the successful speeder. "You carried your point," decides the court in the successful law-suit, which breaks up a family, rends hearts, disgraces an honorable past, and blackens a hopeless future with undying hate. "You carried your point," declares the infinitely Just Judge, as He gazes sadly on the disastrous abuse of His precious gift of free will, an abuse marring His sublime handiwork by mean and minute pertinacity. "You carried your point," echoes the keeper of the outer darkness, "and now having carried your point, you lose all else. There is a place prepared for you."

Peace hath her victories, yea, and retreat and surrender and soft answers and condescension. He who loses his point shall gain it. It was a modern madman who invented the superman, and a modern zany who dramatized the superman. The reformed gospel of diseased philosophy or topsy-turvy buffoonery is no satisfactory substitute for the gospel of the supreme man and of divine paradox: "The last shall be first." The superman shall be the infra-man.

LITERATURE

Was Shakespere a Catholic?

SHAKESPERE'S birthday, April 23, 1915, begins the three hundredth year since the poet's death which occurred on April 23, 1616. As a fitting preparation for the observance of this tercentenary celebration Catholic students of Shakespere should examine thoroughly all the evidence that can be adduced to prove that he was a Catholic, and in a special way belongs to us. In the following paper the main heads of that evidence are presented:

There is no doubt that Shakespere's mother lived and died a Catholic. Her name was Mary Arden and many of the Ardens continued to be staunch Catholics even during the dangers of Elizabeth's reign. Indeed, one of the prominent members of the family suffered death for the faith. Shakespere's mother, moreover, made a will in which there is a mention of the Blessed Virgin, a custom that had gone out of vogue in England at this time except among Catholics. Shakespere's father, too, is on the list of Stratford recusants who were summoned by the court for not attending the Anglican service on Sundays. Shakespere's immediate surroundings, likewise, were distinctly Catholic, for the spirit of the old religion had not died as yet in England. Indeed, it was very much alive in the central portion of the country.

It is sometimes said, however, that there can be no question of Shakespere's being a Catholic for he was married, baptized and buried in the Anglican Church. But these facts, it must be remembered, have in themselves no such significance as they would possess at the present time. There was no way of having the birth of a child properly registered then in England except by having it baptized in the church by law established. Obsequies also had to be observed according to the Anglican rite, for the only cemetery was close to the parish church. As for Shakespere's marriage, in recent years the interesting suggestion has been made that the real reason for the circumstances attending the ceremony, which are supposed to carry a hint of scandal with them, is because he was originally married by a Catholic priest. As it was then very perilous for a priest to show himself in public or to perform any official church service, the marriage was, of course, performed secretly. Anne Hathaway's family, moreover, was Catholic by tradition and about the time of the marriage it is known that a priest, not entirely without the knowledge of the local authorities, used to say Mass privately, in the loft of one of the houses at Shottery.

But if Shakespere was a Catholic should not his plays show it? Unquestionably. And I maintain they do. Commentators have pointed out, for instance, that Shakespere in "Romeo and Juliet" follows Arthur Brooke's "Tragical History of Romeo and Juliet" very closely. He has, however, changed the whole of the play's attitude toward the Catholic Church. Confession instead of being a source of sin actually protects the young people from their own passion in the most difficult circumstances, and almost succeeds in rescuing them from an unfortunate complication. Instead of being "superstitious," Friar Lawrence is pictured as a dear old man interested in his plants and what they can do for mankind, but interested still more in human souls, trying to care for them and quite willing to do everything that he can, even risking the displeasure of two noble houses rather than have the young people commit sin. Friar Lawrence is represented in general as one to whom Romeo and Juliet would naturally turn in their difficulty.

But "King John," it is maintained, represents an altogether different attitude toward the Church. In that play they assert there are passages which make it very clear that Shakespere shares the general feeling of the men of England in his time. King John protests, for example:

> That no Italian priest
> Shall tithe or toll in our dominions.
> But as we, under heaven, are supreme head,
> So under Him that great supremacy,
> Where we do reign, we will alone uphold,
> Without the assistance of a mortal hand:
> So tell the Pope, all reverence set apart
> To him and his usurp'd authority.

In this play, too, there are some bitter comments on monks which would seem to prove that Shakespere shared the opinions of many of his contemporaries regarding monasticism. But let us see: "The Troublesome Reign of King John," from which Shakespere made his play, was probably written in the year of the Spanish Armada when English national feeling ran very high and there was bitter antagonism against Catholicism as the religion of England's greatest enemies. The dramatist—we are not quite sure who it was—shrewdly took advantage of this political situation in order to gain favor for his play. He tickled the ears of the groundlings and attracted popular attention by stimulating the prejudice of his audience. Shakespere modified all this to a very marked extent when he rewrote the play seven years later, though it can be seen that he used many of the words of the original version and was evidently following it very closely. But for some good reason he was manifestly minimizing all the anti-Catholic bias in it though letting stand whatever sentiments were suitable for such characters as King John and his entourage. In the matter of monks and nuns and their treatment in the original version of "King John," Shakespere has been even more drastic in the changes that he made.

But the best evidence of Shakespere's attitude toward the Anglican Church is to be found in "King Henry VIII," one of the poet's greatest plays and the last he wrote. Some of the Wolsey speeches in it are the finest examples of English that were ever penned. It is conceded by all the critics to be the ripest fruit of his mature years. Therefore, if a play can be considered the expression of Shakespere's settled opinion, that play is "Henry VIII." Now it so happens that the subject of "Henry VIII" is exactly the story of how the change of religion came about in England. But it is sometimes urged that the fifth act, with its culmination in the birth of Elizabeth, and the high prospects for England and the rejoicings which this occasions, indicates that the writer considered that the marriage of King Henry to Anne Boleyn and the birth of a daughter by that union marked a great epoch in English history and, above all, that the steps that led to this happy termination, though dramatically blameworthy, must be condoned owing to their happy consequences. It is well known, however, that the fifth act by every test known to Shakesperean commentators was not written by Shakespere at all, but by Fletcher.

Our knowledge of Shakespere's relations with people in London would indicate that a great many of his friends and intimates were Catholics. It is possible that the Burbages, the actors with whom he was so closely joined during most of his dramatic career, belonged to the Warwickshire Catholic family of that name. One of Shakespere's dearest friends, the Earl of Southampton, who was his patron in early years, and his supporter when he bought the Black Friar's theater, was closely allied to a Catholic family and, as Simpson has pointed out, was cradled in Catholic surroundings.

The conversion of Ben Jonson about the middle of the last decade of the sixteenth century showed how easily men might be Catholics in London at this time. Ben Jonson was in the Marshalsea prison on a charge of murder in 1594 and found himself surrounded by priests who were charged with treason because of their refusal to take the oath of supremacy. By associating with them Jonson became a Catholic and when released from prison married a Catholic wife. His child was baptized Mary, and Shakespere was chosen as her sponsor. This choice of a godfather seems to indicate that Shakespere was a Catholic at this time for, in his ardor as a new convert, Ben Jonson would scarcely have selected an Anglican for that office.

One more proof of Shakespere's Catholicism in conclusion: About the close of the seventeenth century Archdeacon Davies, who was a local historian and antiquarian in the neighboring county of Staffordshire, but who was well acquainted with Stratford and its history, and who could easily have had very definite sources of information denied to us, declared that Shakespere "dyed a papist." It would have been perfectly possible, it must be remembered, for Archdeacon Davies to have spoken with people who knew Shakespere during the years that the poet spent in Stratford at the end of his life. After this review of the evidence I can not but conclude that Shakespere not only "dyed a papist," but also lived as one.

James J. Walsh, M.D., Ph.D.

REVIEWS

History of the Catholic Church from the Renaissance to the French Revolution. By Rev. James MacCaffrey, Lic. Theol., Ph.D. Dublin: M. H. Gill & Son. Two Volumes, 12s. 6d.

The hope entertained by not a few readers of his "History of the Catholic Church in the Nineteenth Century," that the learned Professor of Church History in Maynooth would apply his scholarly research and discriminating judgment to the period from which the thought and movements of the modern era germinate, has been happily realized in the present work. Commencing with the humanistic renaissance of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, both sets, of two octavo volumes each, cover the last five centuries of the Church's life, the period which is perhaps, for us, the most important and instructive in the entire Christian era, inasmuch as it bears most directly on the needs and interests of our day.

It is essentially a history, not an apology nor a chronicle. As in his history of the nineteenth century, the author takes an objective viewpoint of facts, persons, motives and causes, and sets down with equal freedom the mistakes and faults of the Church's friends, and the grievances and exculpatory claims of her enemies. He overlooks no facts that have a bearing on the march of events; but the distinctive value of his work lies in his masterly and impartial analysis of causes and motives and their relation with consequences. A good example of his method and capacity is the opening chapter on the "Causes of the Reformation." They are, in brief, the undue toleration by the "political" popes of the extreme humanists' paganistic propaganda and the condemnation by the extreme and then decadent scholastics of the moderate humanists' sane program of educational reform; the centralization of power in the hands of the ruler, enabling him to tax the people into discontent, and impose his creatures and other abusive influences on the Church; the abuses regarding benefices, taxation and unworthy appointments which the Church authorities permitted or imposed, and the failure of the Lateran Council to remedy them; the Western Schism, and the suspicion or reality of national favoritism occasioned by the papal residence in France; and the natural capacity of Luther to exploit unscrupulously, for his own ends, every national, political and religious grievance or prejudice and attune himself to the temper of the times. There follow the political progress of Lutheranism and its derivatives; the counter Reformation of the Council of Trent, the reforming popes and the missionary, charitable and educational orders, notably the Jesuits; the Thirty Years' War, in which France turned Catholic victory into defeat, and the consequent monarchical absolutism that had its religious expression in Gallicanism and Josephism, and cooperated with Protestant principles in fostering rationalism, Freemasonry and the forces that made the French Revolution. Interspersed are chapters on the theological controversies and studies, the religious, scientific and educational progress and the position of the papacy in the various periods, chiefly on the European continent.

The second volume, which is devoted exclusively to the British Isles, opens with the religious condition of England before the Reformation, and traces from the absolutism established by Henry VII the feasibility of the religious despotism and ruthless persecutions of his son and successors; and a similar luminous and comprehensive review is given of previous conditions in Scotland and Ireland and the subsequent woful developments. Some 175 pages trace the fortunes of the Englsh, and 50 of the Scottish Church, to their lowest ebb in 1750, and 215 sketch Ireland's story during the same period, leaving its Catholicism also swathed in penal laws, banned and persecuted and robbed of all its possessions and external glory, but as flourishing as before in the numbers and devotion of its adherents. The proportions, here as elsewhere, are just, and the skill and judgment with which the author utilizes every available source make his work not only an invaluable contribution to history, but an object lesson to the student and historian in how history should be written. Each chapter is preceded by a copious bibliography and a table of contents, and the 900 pages of the two volumes are supplemented by a very full index, which, with form and printing, complete satisfactorily an exceptionally satisfying work.

M. K.

Comedy. By JOHN PALMER; Satire. By GILBERT CANNON; History. By R. H. GRETTON; The Epic. By LASCELLES ABERCROMBIE. New York: Geo. M. Doran Co. $0.40 each.

These booklets of "The Art and Craft of Letters" series are timely and welcome. Suggestive and vigorously concise, they give us a clean-edged outline of their four respective classes, their laws, their historical development and general tendencies.

In "Comedy," Mr. Palmer is appropriately epigrammatic and racy, though he tries, a little too evidently, to be pungent and clever. Now and then, he slips into an unpleasant crudeness of expression. But he gets to the sinews of the subject. His analysis of Molière's vis comica is especially good. His statement, however, that Congreve treated sex as something dryly impersonal, is false in its fundamental assumption and contrary to fact. The author of "The Double Dealer" and "The Way of the World" is not quite so brutally coarse or indecent as Wycherley or Vanbrugh, but his Maskwells and Plyants are sorry company.

Mr. Gilbert Cannon finds the chief exponents of "Satire" in Swift, Butler, Juvenal and Voltaire. He sees in satire "the glass to concentrate the heat of the sun on all who attempt to rise on wings of wax." His view of the scope and the history of satire is a little narrow, and it is a real pang to miss the name of that genial censor morum, Horace. And Dryden, the Dryden of MacFlecknoe and of "Absalom and Achitophel," is forgotten. Is it philosophical to speak of the "tyranny and obsession of religion"?

According to Mr. R. H. Gretton, "History" is for the first time genuinely looking backward. This change of outlook, traceable to Adam Smith, followed, in its full development, the revolution in historical method ascribed by our author to Wolff's "Prologomena to Homer." The French Benedictines, he tells us, were prejudiced, though unconsciously, by the Church's influence. Such an influence can not have greatly handicapped them. It only kept before them those great principles of morality and law, which are at the root of sound historical research. A clear, connected narrative, disencumbered of footnotes, references, etc., was Lord Acton's ideal history for the general reader, and Mr. Gretton takes the same position. But must the historian be a passionless chronicler of facts, a neutral gauger of intellectual, moral and social forces? If we do not always agree with the writer's suggested answers, it must be owned he has handled the question fairly.

"The Epic" has fallen into skilful hands. For Mr. Abercrombie shows an intimate acquaintance with this fascinating subject. He clearly distinguishes the full-orbed epic like the "Iliad" and "Paradise Lost," from "epic material" such as the Finnish Kalevald, and the "glorious" Irish stories of Deirdre and Cuchulain. These noble masses, he tells us, "just missed the final shaping which turns epic material into epic poetry." The author's critical appraisals are sound.

His verdicts on the "Pharsalia," Beowulf, "Sigurd, the Volsung," etc., will meet with general approval. Answering the question: "What is the future of epic?" he suggests as unlikely that, after Milton, "objective epic" can revive again. Nor does he believe that the inroad of the epic into the territory of the drama, exemplified in Goethe's "Faust" or Hardy's "Dynasts" can effectively and permanently hold the invaded province. Granting that the epic can never be didactic, he seems half-inclined to admit that the Lucretian or Wordsworthian will be the presiding influence and that Milton's objective treatment will yield to a subjective symbolism. Hugo's method, vigorously, sometimes magnificently, vindicated in "La Légende des Siècles," may come in here. If Mr. Abercrombie writes a little volume on "Tragedy," it will surely meet the welcome which his present booklet so fully deserves.

J. C. R.

The Rise of the Dutch Kingdom. By HENDRIK WILLIAM VAN LOON. New York: Doubleday, Page & Co. $2.50.

In this neat, well-printed volume of 280 pages Mr. Van Loon gives an interesting account of the most inglorious and disastrous period of Dutch history: that from 1795 to 1813. For fifty years dissatisfaction with the plutocratic oligarchy, which had managed or mismanaged the affairs of the State, had been growing among the people. Hence when the French revolutionary army made its way into Holland it found a welcome from the malcontents, especially from those who had nothing to lose or hoped to improve their lot, no matter what change should take place. The alluring cry of liberty, equality and fraternity was taken up in

The Hague and other cities and towns. The sound was pleasant, but its accompaniment of extravagance, fraud and incompetence, familiar from Paris to Mexico, from Danton to Carranza, was not equally relished. The Stadholder had to fly before the emancipation, and then the troubles began. Assemblies, provisional and national, followed one another with bewildering rapidity; coup d'état succeeded coup d'état to undo what was effected or hoped for from the assemblies. Constitution came after constitution so closely that the thoughtful and patriotic were driven to despair. But the most humiliating phase of the whole chaos was that all these proceedings were directed from Paris. The only stable items in the Batavian republic's life were taxes, loans to the French, donations and deficits in the revenues. The colonies were lost, commerce was destroyed, manufactures ceased, schools and universities were neglected or closed. Napoleon's brother Louis was imposed on Holland as a king; but his position, owing to the domineering policy and ruthless exactions of the Emperor, became impossible, so he resigned after a few years. Finally, the Allies won in Saxony, and a ray of hope came to the Dutch. The French were then called back from the northern sections, a semblance of authority existed before the arrival of the Allies, and the choice of a king, William I, son of the last Stadholder, was ratified by the powers. P. J. D.

The Song of Roland. Translated into English Verse. By Leonard Bacon. New Haven: Yale University Press. $2.35.

Among the great metrical romances which have had the most striking effect upon the literature of the world, the "Chanson de Roland" holds a prominent place. The author of the original poem is not known, but it was probably written in the early part of the eleventh century. The plot of the story briefly told is this: On the fifteenth of August in the year 778, the rear-guard of the army which Charlemagne was leading back into France after a victorious expedition into Spain, was cut to pieces by the Basques in the Pass of Roncevaux in the Pyrenees. In this disaster Roland, Count of the March of Brittany, owing to the treachery of Ganelon, a brother-knight, was slain. Charlemagne returned and wreaked vengeance on the enemy, and Ganelon was tried and condemned to a cruel death. When the Norman-French came over to Anglo-Saxon England, they brought with them three noteworthy things: a lively Celtic disposition, a progressive Latin civilization, and a Romance language. The last-named fastened itself upon the Saxon tongue with such vigor that for three centuries the really superior native literature was almost entirely obliterated, and the English writers, even when they did not use the French language, slavishly copied French models. So "The Song of Roland" became very popular. Consecrating the pursuit of the feudal ideal, and celebrating the heroic virtues of courage and patriotism, it inculcated respect and reverence for greatness, justice and culture. The original poem is one of the finest of the French epics, and even to-day is read in the schools of France. None of the translations have reached the height of the original French, and the present work is hardly to be classed with some of the previous English versions. In an attempt to preserve the archaic form of the primitive poem, the language is often stilted and the lines run harshly. Perhaps Mr. Bacon should have kept to prose. F. J. D.

Who Built the Panama Canal? By W. Leon Pepperman. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $2.00.

The author of this volume was chief of the office of administration of the second Isthmian Commission. This was the commission that succeeded the first board of army and navy engineers in 1905, and which was under the presidency of Mr. Theodore P. Shonts. So quickly does history make itself nowadays that it is probable that most people have quite forgotten the wave of fear that swept over the country when, early in 1905, it looked as if the canal would never be built. Conditions in Panama from both a constructive and sanitary standpoint were not much better than they had been under the French régime. To make matters worse, an epidemic of yellow-fever broke out, and a stampede back to the United States began, both among officials and workmen, that threatened to put an end to everything. In the midst of these difficulties Mr. Shonts agreed to become president of the commission, with Mr. John F. Stevens as chief engineer. The change they made within eighteen months in conditions on the Isthmus was wonderful, for within that time the administrative, constructive and sanitary machine was perfected.

So Mr. Pepperman is the Boswell of Mr. Shonts and his associates, and withal a restrained and veracious Boswell. He gives due credit to the French engineers whose plans were used, and shows how much the success of the work owes to the invention of the steam-shovel. The author would have as much trouble, no doubt, in authenticating his ridiculous story about Philip II of Spain and his spiritual advisers in the first chapter of this book, as Mr. Lind had in tracing a certain papal bull. Mr. Pepperman does well to record something of the work of the Sisters of Charity who were the nurses in the hospitals on the Isthmus during the French and until well into the American régime. They, too, had their share in building the canal, and not a few became martyrs to their charity. Out of one band of twenty-five, twenty died of yellow-fever in the service of the sick. Incidentally Mr. Pepperman recalls that the Panama Canal was not the greatest engineering achievement of history from a technical standpoint. In this respect the New York subway, the Keokuk water-power plant on the Mississippi, and especially the rebuilding of the Grand Central Station in New York far surpass it. The volume is finely illustrated. M. J. A.

A History of the United States for Catholic Schools. Prepared and Arranged by the Franciscan Sisters, St. Rose Convent, La Crosse, Wis. Chicago and New York: Scott, Foresman & Co.

There are omitted from ordinary school histories of the United States many points which it is desirable that Catholic children should know and which it would be profitable for children who are not Catholics to know, too. A grasp of a few of these facts would broaden the minds, open the eyes and modify the views of many an honest citizen. Some of these are supplied in this history. The work of presenting the history of our country from a Catholic standpoint has been undertaken before now, sometimes poorly—and therefore unfortunately—sometimes well. Some of the books are better adapted for private reading than for recitation in the classroom and later remembrance. The Franciscan Sisters seem to have kept the latter end in view. They have carefully divided the work into periods, chapters and paragraphs, taking care not to overcrowd their paragraphs with unrelated facts, but forcing the pupil and older reader to grasp the main idea presented. Order and clearness is the main merit, particularly from the close of the colonization period. The southern group of colonies is first described, next the central, and finally the northern. Hence Georgia's settlement is narrated before that of New York or the New England colonies. It will be difficult for the pupil, who studies the last of the colonies among the first, to coordinate his facts and keep an intelligent grip on his chronology. This defect is remedied to some extent by an excellent chronological review. These summaries at the end of each period are a valuable aid in seizing the leading ideas. A good number of illustrations and twenty maps add to the value of the work. P. J. D.

Arundel. By E. F. BENSON. New York: George H. Doran Co. $1.25.

As a study of the Tory, orthodox, English upper class there is no presentation more true to life than Mr. E. F. Benson's latest novel, "Arundel." The story revolves around Mrs. Hancock, a wealthy, comfortable—and Protestant—widow, possessed of a daughter. The gospel of her life is to make everybody comfortable, and this she carries into effect by a careful elimination of everything that might come into conflict with this gospel of comfort. Narrowed down to facts, it is a gospel of supreme egoism and selfishness; a condition of life in which one avoids, as far as possible, all that might interfere with a comfortable routine.

This outlook upon life is a heritage from the Victorian age, and still lingers in a remnant hide-bound and rooted in conventionality, represented chiefly by the squirarchy and the landed gentry. Self-satisfied in all their works and immovable in their prejudices, against them have been arrayed all the modern English movements of revolt in art, literature, ethics, and even religion. To them respectability is a counsel of perfection, and enthusiasm the unpardonable sin.

Into such a circle comes a young girl from India. A girl in whose eyes burned the joy of life; from the tips of whose fingers oozed the spirit of music. Edward, a proper and respectable young man, who had grown up wadded in the cotton wool of English conventionality, is engaged to the daughter of the wealthy widow; and then the girl from India comes into things. There is a small love tragedy, which Mr. Benson manages to straighten out at the end.

The love story which runs through these pages is of no great concern. The two things of importance are the author's fidelity in portraying a certain aspect of the British temperament, and the honor to which the average Englishman considers himself bound by his pledged word. Between these lie all the vices and virtues of the British race, a brief study of which is apparently the purpose of Mr. Benson's novel. H. C. W.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

As April 23 marks the beginning of the three hundredth year since Shakespere's death, the inquiry regarding the poet's religion which James J. Walsh, M.D., makes in the current Catholic Mind is quite seasonable. Part of his paper is published in this number of AMERICA. "A Grim Fairy Tale," by Daniel A. Lord, S.J., and "Euphemia," by Francis P. Donnelly, S.J., are other papers that will amuse and instruct the readers of the latest Catholic Mind.

AMERICA welcomes cordially the first number of the Catholic Historical Review, a quarterly magazine for the "Study of the Church History of the United States," published at Washington by the Catholic University. After a gracious foreword from Cardinal Gibbons, Bishop Shahan makes the new periodical's bow to the public in an excellent paper on "The Spirit of the Catholic Historical Review." The quarterly, he promises, will be "national in scope and character" and "devoted to the discussion of Catholic history on a scale corresponding to the importance which Catholicity has assumed in the life of the nation." Bishop Maes then contributes the first of a series of papers on "Flemish Franciscan Missionaries in North America," Father Englehardt tells about "The First Ecclesiastical Synod of California," and Charles H. McCarthy, Ph.D., has an interesting article on "Columbus and the Santa Hermandad in 1492." Father V. F. O'Daniel, O.P., in his sketch of "The Rev. John Ceslas Fenwick, O.P. (1759-1815)," gives a good summary of all the services the staunch Fenwick family have rendered Church and State, but the author is a little inaccurate regarding the name and status of the line's present Jesuit representative. "Miscellany," "Documents," "Book Reviews," "Notes and Comments" and "Bibliography" are other departments in the quarterly. We wish the Catholic Historical Review a very prosperous career.

Mr. Erskine Childers' "The Riddle of the Sands, a Record of Secret Service" (Dodd, Mead, $1.35), is a book that appeared in England a dozen years ago and has now been republished because the great war has made of special interest the theme with which the volume deals. The work is very well written, and is said to be an account of the actual adventures an Englishman and an American had during a yachting cruise in the North Sea. The book's purpose is to show what long preparations Germany made for the present conflict, and the publication of Mr. Childers' discoveries is reported to have "altered the whole plan of England's defence."——The industrious Ethel M. Dell, whose readers, it seems, were once Marie Corelli's, has lately written 590 pages about "The Keeper of the Door" (Putnam, $1.40). Olga, the heroine, has three men dangling after her, and helps an insane friend through the "door" of death by purposely giving her an overdose of medicine. Misunderstandings, of course, ensue.

Katherine Tynan's "The Curse of Castle Eagle" (Duffield, $1.25), a story that appeared serially in the Catholic World, is eery and Irish enough to please and interest the author's many admirers. There is a smuggler's cave, a secret passage, a starving recluse, a lame lover and an ancestral curse, which Meg Hildebrand, the fair heroine, has the privilege of lifting from the house of Turloughmore. So when the shipwrecked Baron dies peacefully in his bed, and the handsome Lord Erris comes home cured, the marriage bells, of course, begin to ring.——Mary Agatha Gray's latest novel is entitled "Like unto a Merchant" (Benziger, $1.35), and tells how several groping Anglicans found their way into the Church. A reformed convict and his double add to complications of another kind, which for a time make matters disagreeable for the hero. More sharply drawn characters and a stronger plot would have improved the story.

The "Fairyland" (Yale University Press, $1.00) that delighted our childhood with its elves, goblins and queen's coaches with "waggon-spokes made of long spinners' legs" has by Brian Hooker been made into a grown-ups' fairyland filled with some wonderful sights. No Cinderella is introduced, but instead a young novice-nun is found on the abbey balcony sighing for life and a lover. She gets away from the convent and, after a narrow escape from being burned as a sorceress, is crowned with her lover in fairyland. A Yale professor of English finds that this drama seems to teach that "the rose of passion is a holier thing than the lily of virginity." Here, then, is the false lesson of Brian Hooker's "Fairyland"; it is founded in the flesh. Catholic instinct shrinks from this rhythmically-clothed fling at what it holds so sacred. If Brian Hooker can not see the beauty of a life consecrated to God, he should cease handling such themes.——"Homeric Scenes" (T. J. Gomme, New York), by John J. Chapman, contains a collection of famous episodes from Homer, including "The Embassy of Achilles" in two scenes, "The Death of Patroclus" and "The Death of Hector." The scenes are thrown into a dramatic form, are described in stirring lines and might readily serve as an active means of making Homer live for the boy in class.

The Boston Evening Transcript's witty "Librarian" has petitioned the president of the American Library Association to "bar, ban, cut out, delete and excise" from the next meeting of that body the following words and phrases:

> "Inspiration"; "inspirational." "Browse among" (still useful in regard to cows browsing among the herbage, but worn out in reference to readers in a library). "Helpful." "An example of intensive work." "Strike the key-note." "The library is the university of the People" (pronounced "peepul"). "The true university . . . is a collection of books." "Cooperation." "Values" (meaning vague, but used widely). "Missionary work." "Evaluation." "Uplift." "Yeoman's service." "Books as tools." "Along these lines." "Along educational lines." "Along inspirational lines." "Along [any old] lines."

A good list, but very incomplete. Why, the sociological department alone of a modern public library yields so luxuriant a crop of "bromides" that a page of America could not hold them. And who can enumerate the hackneyed terms the readers and publishers of "best sellers" habitually use?

BOOKS RECEIVED

Richard G. Badger, Boston:
Sanpriel. By Alvilde Prydz. Translated by Hester Coddington. $1.25.

Benziger Bros., New York:
Like Unto a Merchant. By Mary Agatha Gray. $1.35; The Friar Preacher Yesterday and To-day. Translated from the French of Père Jacquin, O.P. By Father Hugh Pope, O.P. $0.75; A Garland for St. Joseph. Compiled by a Member of the Ursuline Community, Sligo. $0.75.

Bobbs-Merrill Co., New York:
Happy Pollyooly. By Edgar Jepson. $1.25.

Cambridge University Press, New York:
A Short History of Classical Scholarship. By Sir J. E. Sandys. $2.25.

Dodd, Mead & Co., New York:
The Riddle of the Sands. By Erskine Childers. $1.35; American Women in Civic Work. By Helen Christine Bennett. $1.25.

Duffield & Co., New York:
The Curse of Castle Eagle. By Katherine Tynan. $1.25; The Will to Live (Les Roquevillard). By Henri Bordeaux. $0.75.

Henry Holt & Co., New York:
Hillsboro People. By Dorothy Canfield. $1.35.

Houghton, Mifflin Co., Boston:
The California Padres and their Missions. By F. Smeaton Chase and Charles Francis Saunders. $2.50.

P. J. Kenedy & Sons, New York:
Men Not Angels. By Katherine Tynan. $1.10.

Little, Brown & Co., Boston:
A Girl of the Blue Ridge. By Payne Erskine. $1.35.

Longmans, Green & Co., London:
The Westminster Version of the Sacred Scriptures. Vol. IV. Part III. The Apocalypse of St. John. By Rev. Francis Gigot, S.T.D. One shilling.

The Macmillan Co., New York:
Ruysbroeck. By Evelyn Underhill. $1.00.

Fr. Pustet & Co., New York:
Kriegs-Predigten. Von Bernhard Duhr, S.J. $0.35; Ein Ehrloser Feigling und andere Kriegserzählungen. Von A. Hruschka. $0.30; Bunte Bilder aus dem grössten aller Kriege. Von Fritz Mielert. $0.30; Erklärung der Psalmen und Cantica. Von Prinz Max. $1.65; Die Exerzitien des Heiligen Ignatius. Von Peter Vogt, S.J. $1.75.

G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York:
The Keeper of the Door. By Ethel M. Dell. $1.40; James Russell Lowell as a Critic. By Joseph J. Reilly.

Schwartz, Kirwin & Fauss, New York:
The Dream of Scipio. Translated from Cicero De Re Publica VI 9-29. By James A. Kleist, S.J. $0.50.

Chas. Scribner's Sons, New York:
The French in the Heart of America. By John Finley. $2.50.

Volksverein, M. Gladbach:
Bayerisches Staatskirchenrecht. 40 pfg; Jungwehr-Anleitung. Von P. J. Busch. 40pf; Vorträge für die Kriegszeit. 35pf; Kriegs-Gesetze und Verordnungen 1919/15. 40pf; Landwirtschaftsfragen zur Kriegszeit. 40pf; Deutsche Gedichte. Zusammengestellt von Dr. Feldmann. M2; Mädchen-Turn-und- Spielbüchlein. M1.20.

EDUCATION

The Jeanne d'Arc Club

THE whole trend of public entertainment is toward the pictorial. Human nature is eager to see, and picture exhibitions thrive on that curiosity. The great majority of them display little that is even instructive, less that is edifying, and a vast amount that is dissipating and vitiating. The real heroes are being more and more relegated to oblivion. To rescue some of them and place their inspired example before the eager eyes of Catholic youth in a striking and attractive manner is the purpose of the Jeanne d'Arc Club, of Loyola University, Chicago, which thus makes an effort to meet a problem that is vexing pastors and teachers everywhere. Hence a brief account of its origin, development, subjects and success may be of interest. The account will show what a religious and social influence a few Catholic students have exercised by their eloquence and zeal, and thus indicate what a mighty power for good is latent in the hundreds of young men who compose the student bodies of our colleges and universities.

About five years ago, a Jesuit Father teaching in St. Ignatius College became convinced that a graphic portrayal of the life and vocation and character of Jeanne d'Arc would be a revelation and an inspiration to the vast majority of Catholics, especially the young. From the Maison de la Bonne Presse of Paris he secured nearly one hundred beautiful views, copies of the best works of art on the life of the Matchless Maid. The story of her tragic life and death was cast in the form of a stirring lecture to accompany the illustrations. The effect of this combination, when given by the best speakers in the College, inspired with her spirit, surpassed all expectations. The example of the young peasant girl, doing such grand things for God and country, awakened nobler desires in the breasts of thousands and led not a few to become consecrated soldiers of Christ. People were especially impressed and delighted and edified by the grace and eloquence and unction of the youthful lecturers. From the first the experiment was a success and encouraged the development of the plan.

Lourdes and the Early Church

Lourdes was the next subject added. The history of its beginning and development, from the first apparition of our Blessed Lady down to the vast pilgrimages of our day, was so completely and perfectly depicted that this lecture has been for more than a hundred audiences a veritable pilgrimage in spirit to the world's greatest shrine. It is especially worthy of note that, among the most interested and appreciative of those audiences, must be numbered various councils of the Knights of Columbus, who gave hearty expression to their enthusiastic appreciation by a rising vote of thanks. The director of the club was especially gratified and encouraged to hear from those Catholic men such comments as: "Father, that is the kind of entertainment we want. We've learned something. We now understand the significance of Lourdes and the reason for all those great pilgrimages." It is a great mistake to imagine that genuine piety does not appeal to men.

By the variety of subjects and widely different periods touched upon, the club has endeavored to give concrete evidence that sanctity is a characteristic mark of the Church in every age, our own included. A remarkable series of views from tableaux de maîtres and actual photographs carry the auditors back to the Church of the Catacombs and make them witnesses of the sublimest Christian heroism in the martyrdom of Saints Cecilia and Tarcisius. There could be no more eloquent or impressive sermon on devotion to the Blessed Sacrament and frequent Communion than the boy martyr laying down his life for his Eucharistic Lord.

STORY OF THE LITTLE FLOWER

The next lecture is a sudden transition from those far-off days to our own and delights us with the sight of "The Little Flower of Jesus" unfolding before our very eyes. It almost startles people into the realization that, now as ever, "God is wonderful in His Saints." The effect of this lecture is in keeping with the marvels recorded of this "Strewer of Roses." The impression it makes on all classes can not be better expressed than in a letter from the Superior of one of the largest educational institutions in the Middle West:

> The lecture was a perfect success. The pictures were beautiful, the stereopticon worked faultlessly, and the story of the Little Flower was given with the art, the faith, and chivalry of Catholic gentlemen. It would be difficult to estimate the influence for good that lecture had upon the audience. Our College students were greatly edified to hear young men discourse with so much faith, reverence and enthusiasm about the saintly young religious; the younger girls and the children were delighted, and the people who came up from the village received a fresh impetus to their faith. Some of them who had never heard of the Little Flower have become interested and are asking for further information about her.
>
> May I ask you to congratulate the members of the Jeanne d'Arc Club upon their eminent success? They speak anew and confirm what we have always known of the Jesuits' training of young men. To the Sisters and students, they were as interesting and admirable off the stage as they were while lecturing. Please accept our congratulations on this opportune plan for winning souls to the Divine Master, and our thanks for making this pleasure possible to us.

COLUMBUS

"A renaissance in the veneration of Catholic women of the past is sorely needed," says Mr. William H. Leary, in a recent issue of AMERICA. The work of the Jeanne d'Arc Club thus far described seems to be a movement in that direction. But men, too, need the inspiration of the high ideals their sex affords. From among the splendid models the Church offers, the club selected Columbus. The patronage of the previous lectures by the Knights of Columbus determined the choice. Familiarity with the mere fact of his discovery might seem to make the choice a poor one. But the genius and character of the man, the motives that animated him, the obstacles he surmounted, the transformation his unparalleled achievement wrought upon the world, and finally the debt of gratitude due to him from all men and from us Americans in particular, are considerations by no means too familiar, as Mr. William N. Brown, State Deputy of Illinois, declares in a letter commending this lecture to the Knights of his jurisdiction:

> I have noted, with special interest and satisfaction, the preparation and presentation of your elegant and elaborately illustrated lecture on the life and character of Columbus. This is an enterprise that must appeal very strongly to all Knights of Columbus who desire to see the noble Patron of our Order worthily portrayed. The unparalleled achievements of Columbus are unappreciated because practically unknown and misunderstood. Your treatment of the subject is characterized by a vividness, freshness and brilliancy that can not fail to arouse new interest and delight. There is evidenced a depth and thoroughness of study and research that have brought to the surface, not only the authentic facts, but the peculiar genius and character of the prince of discoverers, the spirit that animated him, the motives that rendered him indomitable and the virtues that make him a model of Christian Knighthood. Then, too, all the important incidents of his career are made most graphic and realistic by the great number and beauty of the artistic illustrations.

The test of the pudding is the eating. The Columbus lecture has stood that test not only with the members of the Order, who glory in the great Catholic discoverer as their patron, but even of such critical audiences as a college faculty and students. "I am confident," writes a faculty member of Campion College, in reference to the lecturer, "that he can not realize the full meaning of the demonstration which applauded his splendid efforts." The Jeanne d'Arc Club can rightly, therefore, be said to have justified its existence and to have realized its twofold object: the training of Catholic speakers and the imparting of Catholic instruction and inspiration to thousands of gratified hearers.

F. G. DINNEEN, S.J.
Director of the Jeanne d'Arc Club.

SOCIOLOGY

Tannhäuser and Radical Feminism

WHEN the minstrel Knight Tannhäuser tuned his golden harp in the great hall of the Wartburg and prepared to do his knightly best as an aspirant for the chaplet of laurel at the tournament of song in praise of nature and love, he was stimulated and inspired by the breathlessly expectant attention of the Landgrave Hermann, surrounded by his brilliant court of nobles and fair ladies.

"PLAIN PHRASES"

Once launched upon his theme, our knight boldly cast all reticence to the winds and, striking impassioned harmonies from the vibrating strings, plunged with ready gusto into vivid recitals of the joys of Venusberg, the memories of which flooded his very soul with burning pictures.

In plain set phrases he hymned the joys of "seeking self-expression," "living out your own life" and the other shibboleths of the poets, essayists and dramatists of the flesh, sojourning in the delectable land of Venus.

When his hearers awoke to a realization of the drift of his immoral and defiant appeal to the unfettered elementary powers of animal instincts, that tournament came to a sudden end. The ladies, stopping their horrified ears, incontinently fled, their men folk, with dour, set faces and fiery glances, drew their menacing swords to avenge the sacrilege. Tannhäuser's life was saved, but in the end after the pilgrimage of penance, he still saw the light from the grotto of Venus and heard her alluring voice.

THE UP-TO-DATE EROTICIST

In aiming to achieve practical success in their propaganda, our modern feminists have found it profitable to take a leaf from Tannhäuser's book, by avoiding the tactical errors of the minstrel knight.

The up-to-date eroticist, who has written copious and explicit volumes of polemics in advocacy of informal divorces, informal marriages following probationary relationships, experimental excursions by novices in the fields of sex, in a word, the reign of "free love" does not placard our streets or exploit the novelty shelves of our book-stores with his naked propaganda set forth in words of one syllable that all who run may read. He bethinks him, rather, of the trite quotation beginning: "Vice is a monster of so frightful a mien," and veils his nasty wares in delicate euphemisms.

The actual contemporary policy pursued by the professed amorist is that of tactful opportunism, an adroit poisoning of the wells. Some charming woman of exceptional social and literary gifts, a sort of petticoated carpet anarchist, visits the larger towns and cities of our land, heralded as the advance agent of some writer known to fame as a radical and a sciolist in the field of sex relationships, a true forerunner of the newest evangel.

Peeping Pandoras

She seeks to impress her intellectual charm upon the motley feminine element who have been attracted to her soirées by the rumored daring and novelty of her master's views, through readings and recitations of poetry, romance and drama, hinting of "more to come" for the benefit of the initiate. Thus she sows her wayside crop of tares, some of which may mature disastrously to those poor, misguided souls which are led to embrace the cult proclaimed by the professor of the arts of love, who is concealed in the background.

There need, perhaps, be no fear that these evil-minded apostles will convert any considerable number of decent Christian people to a practical acceptance of free love and so on, but the fact that there are so many gentlewomen of good repute who lack the moral stamina to protest against the woman and her works, or who themselves flock to her lectures or readings, is a humiliating and saddening spectacle, an ominous sign of the times. These gatherings at private houses and women's clubs are composed of a sprinkling of good, ignorant souls, who attend for social reasons, and with the professed motive of seeking an opportunity to broaden their culture; others are of the class of pallid vestals uncertain of age, but just wistfully curious to know what the void past might have meant for them; or they are mere peeping Pandoras who, under the thin pretext of seriously weighing all that may be put forth on either side of every question in the universe, insist upon lifting every lid and peering into every dark and noisome corner, possessed of idle and unchristian curiosity unworthy of the dignity and purity of high-minded womanhood.

Itching Ears

Still another type of itching ears frequenting these gatherings is to be found in the weaker vessels, those secretly guilty ones who are grasping at some shred of philosophy which, they hope, will in clear terms palliate or gloriously justify their evil lives to their own uneasy consciences.

Let us not despair. These migratory minstrels may cry aloud in the land: "Unbar the gates for triumphant Eros' feet!" but God in His mercy will not permit our youths and maidens to hearken to the siren call, or to fall into the pit prepared for them by Satan and his ministering spirits.

O. H.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Several Catholic Congresses have been announced for the coming summer. The meeting of the Catholic Educational Association will open in St. Paul on June 28, and the Central-Verein will convene in the same city from August 8 to August 11. The National Federation of Catholic Societies will hold its annual meeting in Toledo during the week of August 15. A rather unique Congress will open in Greenwood, South Dakota, on July 30. The delegates will be Catholic Indians and their missionaries, and the Congress will commemorate the seventy-fifth anniversary of the coming of Father De Smet, S.J., to the Sioux. Greenwood is said to be the camp near which the famous missionary received his first converts into the Church.

Boston recently witnessed an intercollegiate oratorical contest, held under the auspices of the Massachusetts Peace Society. Four colleges participated. The first prize was won by F. W. Wennerberg of Boston College, the second by Alfred Lane of Holy Cross. Mr. Wennerberg will represent Massachusetts in the contest of the North Atlantic States to be held at Clark University on April 30. A similar contest was held in Baltimore recently and the first prize was won by Mr. Codd of Loyola College. At a time when the inferiority of Catholic colleges is insisted upon in some quarters, victories of this kind constitute an argument of value.

"Who are the best citizens in France?" asks the Catholic Register. Surely not the petty officials who even in these perilous times are doing all that they can to make the position of Catholics in France more intolerable. Some of these gentry have recently figured in courts-martial and other legal investigations. On the other hand, up to the middle of February, sixty-seven priests and one hundred and twenty-seven nuns had been decorated with the ribbon of the Legion of Honor, for deeds of heroism on the field of battle. In war time, as always, France, great in potencies for good or evil, gives the world a striking example of inconsistency. Priests and nuns whose patriotism is so marked as to be thought worthy of official recognition, can hardly be considered undesirable citizens. Yet that is precisely the case in twentieth-century France.

On April 15, the Catholic University of America celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of its foundation. Taking part in the commemorative exercises were the three American Cardinals, eight archbishops, thirty bishops, thirty monsignori, sixty representatives of colleges and universities, and more than three hundred of the clergy. Addresses were delivered by Cardinal O'Connell of Boston, President G. Stanley Hall of the American Association of Universities, and Dr. John Cavanaugh of Notre Dame. Cardinal Gibbons preached at the inaugural Pontifical Mass which was celebrated by Cardinal Farley. In a letter addressed to the American hierarchy, the Holy Father implored the blessing of God upon the work of the University.

Is it an abiding tinge of Protestantism in the fabric of the English language that makes "old maid" a term faintly suggestive of failure and of something akin to disgrace? After listening to the artless talk of a crowd of non-Catholic girls, the observer might conclude that the be-all and end-all of a girl's life is marriage. It need not be Christian marriage, nor even what plain folk would call a happy marriage, but it must be an alliance which will give or secure social station, a certain amount of independence, and complete freedom from the carking cares of financial difficulties. The practical acceptance of this ideal by many, may explain the increased number of divorces in the United States during the last decade. Certainly it explains, in part at least, the impression, fairly common among non-Catholics, that the girl who does not marry, has necessarily made a failure of life. "Is there a saint in your parish?" asks the Catholic Columbian. "See if she be not an 'old maid'." This is presenting the Catholic ideal. Unmarried life in the world is a difficult vocation, but embraced from proper motives, it often leads the soul along the way of the cross, straight to Christ.

According to a Bulletin recently issued by the Bureau of Education, one hundred and twenty-three American colleges and universities, out of a total of nearly five hundred, have adopted some form of the "honor system" in conducting examinations. Of these institutions, thirty-seven per cent. are east of the Mississippi and south of Mason and Dixon's line, while only four per cent. are in New England. No Catholic colleges appear on the list. Rev. John P. Chidwick of St. Joseph's Seminary, Yonkers, states that in an institution "where conscience receives such attention, the honor system is not required." Rev. William F. Dooley, S.J., of Detroit University, is quoted as saying that "there is no likelihood that it will be adopted" at that university. Princeton, Cornell, Barnard, Washington and Lee, are the most prominent which have adopted the system, while Brown, Ohio State, Vassar, Bowdoin and Trinity frankly oppose it. A few schools, Franklin and Marshall and the University of Iowa, for example, are cited as having tried the system and found it a failure. Bryn Mawr and Mt. Holyoke favor it "in spirit but not in its present form." President E. C. Sanford of Clark College, Worcester, writes that "to ask a student to sign a statement that he has not cheated at an examination is like asking a reputable man to hang up a sign in his store that he does not use short weights." Probably the majority of Catholic colleges would align themselves with Bryn Mawr in favoring the honor system in its spirit, but not in its present form.

There are persons who believe that Catholics are doing very little in practical social work, just as there may be found from time to time benighted individuals who are surprised to learn that the Catholic Church supports thousands of foreign missions. One reason of this ignorance is the aversion of the average Catholic institution to publicity. While non-Catholic social agencies employ "publicity men" for the very laudable purpose of interesting the community in their work, Catholics, as a rule, so dislike advertising that they seem to forget the scriptural injunction of letting their light shine before men. This tendency is greatly to be regretted. In almost all large American cities, splendid Catholic institutions are doing noble work in the field of social service, unknown to thousands of Catholics in their own communities. If these institutions do not adopt proper means of bringing their activities to the notice of the public, it is hard to see with what right they can complain that the Catholic public does not support them. Blatant, untruthful forms of advertising are, of course, harmful; but a clear statement of an institution's purpose and needs would not only be most valuable to the social worker, but would, in many instances, win substantial support for the institution itself. It has been well said that Catholics never know what Catholic institutions are doing for the outcast members of society, until some municipal judge visits a Catholic hospital or reformatory, and proceeds to let the public know, through the medium of the daily papers, what "our Catholic brethren are doing." There is much truth in this criticism. If Catholics do not support Catholic institutions as they should, the reason may be found, occasionally at least, in an unwise self-effacement on the part of the institutions. One of the strongest arguments in favor of a public inspection, properly conducted, of Catholic reformatories and social agencies, is the fact that this inspection would let the world know the great good which Catholic institutions are effecting all over the country.

Writing in the New Republic, a weekly which in a very short time has won a reputation as a retailer of the tag-ends of cheap modern thought, Mr. R. S. Bourne notes that the Gary school system allots a certain time for religious instruction, to be given outside the school premises. Just why Mr. Bourne's youthful enthusiasm should betray him into a sneer at "the imagined necessity" of the parochial school, is hard to say. Mr. Froude defends the thesis that Elizabeth racked and butchered Catholic priests not because she wished it, but because the said priests took a perverse pleasure in being put to death. Mr. Bourne assumes the impossible attitude that millions of American Catholics have so little intelligence that they insist upon devoting, at the cost of great self-denial, millions of dollars to a system of schools which are wholly unnecessary. Mr. Bourne's sneer argues neither good manners nor good sense. Years of experience have proved the value of the parochial schools, while the Wirt system is as yet but an untried system, which a decade hence may top the scrap-heap of other educational systems which have been tried and found wanting. Mr. Bourne betrays his utter ignorance of the fundamental purpose of a parochial school, when he announces that because of the Gary system, a certain Polish school "has lost its reason for being, and vanished." Religious education does not mean to the Catholic, as apparently it means to Mr. Bourne, an occasional period grudgingly allotted to the teaching of religion outside the school premises. This is just a little better than nothing. Religious education means God in the school from the opening prayer in the morning to the dismissal of classes in the afternoon. Catholic schools do not put God on the doorstep, where the children, passing out, may turn to Him or not, as they choose.

Simeon Strunsky, a true philosopher in cap and bells, once summed up the burden of the modern play and novel in a set of verses, of which the refrain was, "Nothing remains to be told." By their active ravings during the last ten years against the "conspiracy of silence," crack-brained clergymen and addle-pated sociologists, aided by magazine writers with a taste for the prurient, have almost succeeded in setting up moral nastiness as a proper subject of discussion in all circles of polite society, from the nursery to the drawing-room. "Nothing remains to be told." Everybody knows it now, even the school children, who have been subjected to a course in what is named sex-hygiene, but which the Eton boys of a few generations ago, more properly termed "smut talks." "There seems to be nothing in reserve in modern society," writes the Baltimore American. "Frankness is the key note of modern knowledge and discussion. May it not be that this induces too slight a regard for the serious and sacred responsibilities that rest upon matrimony?"

> The question arises as to whether the so-called campaign of frank discussion of sex and vice subjects is to be approved, or whether familiarity with such topics does not itself breed a sense of looseness with respect to obligations whose sacredness rests upon their inviolability from vice gangrene. It remains true, as always, that vice is a monster of so frightful mien as to be hated needs but to be seen; but the poet adds that, seen too oft, familiarity with its face induces one first to endure, then pity, then embrace.

There is much common-sense and virtue in these remarks.

Apropos of the editorial, "Lessons in Decency," in the issue of AMERICA for April 3, Mr. Anthony Matré, the National Secretary of the American Federation of Catholic Societies, calls attention to the energetic efforts made by the Federation in many cities, in the interest of morality. The following figures chronicle the results of the labors in St. Louis alone:

> The Federation there caused the elimination of 26,983 improper postcards; had nearly 1,000 improper pictures and statues removed from saloons and stores; caused the confiscation of 200 indecent stereopticon views; caused the suppression of all White Slave Films and several objectionable moving picture films; had 6,500 indecent blotters destroyed and 2,000 improper pennants suppressed; one "black-listed" play was not permitted to show in St. Louis on complaint of Federation, and objectionable features in other plays were eliminated; suggestive animal dances were ordered stopped by the police on complaint of Federation and 1,174 indecent books and pamphlets were destroyed or delivered up to Federation, besides a wagon-load of uncounted objectionable books. The Public Morals Committee of the St. Louis Federation has subdivided its work in keeping St. Louis clean and has sub-committees on "Saloons," "Press," "Advertisements," "Drug Stores," "Dance Halls," "Theaters and Moving Picture Shows," "Penny Arcades." The members of these sub-committees are ever on the alert and are cooperating with the city authorities.

In Cincinnati and Hamilton County the Federation has succeeded in suppressing black-listed plays and is keeping a vigilant eye on every form of vice, while cooperating likewise with other agencies toward the general public betterment. In Erie, New Orleans, Dayton, Grand Rapids, Toledo, Kansas City and St. Joseph, Mo., it has made its power felt in the same direction, contributing effective "Lessons in Decency" to those who care more for gold than virtue. In the Federation, properly supported and fully developed, Catholics should possess one of their mightiest influences for good.

AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

VOL. XIII, No. 3
WHOLE No. 316

MAY 1, 1915

PRICE 10 CENTS
$3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE

The War: Bulletin, April 20 p. m.-April 27 a. m.—Important Events in Flanders—The Carpathians and Dardanelles. Austria-Hungary: A New Triple Bond. France: The Pope's Answer—Catholic Study of Birth-Rate. Germany: Admiral von Tirpitz—Uniform Newspapers. Great Britain: Intervention of the Holy See. Ireland: Political Happenings — Ecclesiastical News. Mexico: Mr. Bryan and Dr. Kelly—Rome: The Pope and Peace.....53-56

TOPICS OF INTEREST

Simplicity, Sociology and Religion—Common School Education in the Middle Ages—Periodic Drunkenness and Tobacco—A Methodist Quarterly and the "Ne Temere"—Holland's Neutrality—Old St. Patrick's, New York.....57-64

COMMUNICATIONS

South America's Catholicism—A "Sanely Sensational" Catholic Daily—Prohibition—Dowson's Conversion—"E. C.'s" Inconsistency with Regard to Russia—Y. M. C. A.—Judas and Salvation 64-69

EDITORIALS

Howells and the Jesuits—"Save Us, We Perish"—"Religious but Creedless!"—Annihilation or Immortality?—Pantaloon and Slapstick Legislation—The Veneration of Relics—Make-Ups 70-73

LITERATURE

Lafcadio Hearn.

REVIEWS: The French in the Heart of America—What Ought I to Do?—Paris Waits: 1914—Four Weeks in the Trenches—Victory—Sanpriel—The Little Mother Who Sits at Home—The Dream of Scipio—The Jester.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: Martha—The April Month—The Little Flower in the Trenches—"Happy Pollyooly"—"Ruggles of Red Gap"—Hilaire Belloc's Popularity—"Beautiful Ireland"—Some German Books on the War.

BOOKS RECEIVED.....73-77

EDUCATION

Are Catholic Lectures Feasible?.....78, 79

SOCIOLOGY

"A Bag of Stick Candy".....79, 80

NOTE AND COMMENT

Catholic Colleges Win in Oratorical Contest—"Pastor" Russell's Sermons—Universal Reform through Legislation—War a Benefit to Russia—"Stage Fright"—The Mother's Pension Law..80

CHRONICLE

The War.—Slight successes are reported by the French in the St. Mihiel district where, however, the Germans have been making furious attacks in the vicinity of Les Eparges. In Alsace the Germans have recaptured Hartsmannweiler Kopf. The principal event of the week has been the resumption by the Germans of a series of offensive movements in Flanders, that have been as vigorous as any fighting of the war. For some time there have been rumors that the Germans were preparing for an onslaught on the Allied lines near the coast, and railroads both in Belgium and Germany were said to be occupied exclusively in the transportation of troops to the west. The attack was precipitated by the capture by the British, after three days of severe fighting, of the hill to the southeast of Ypres, which is known as Hill 60. This hill dominates a great portion of the surrounding plain. The Germans made repeated attempts to recapture it, and in spite of failure, they have not desisted; but their operations have gradually extended to the south and especially to the north of the hill itself.

Bulletin, April 20, p. m.-April 27, a. m.

Important Events in Flanders

Both the Germans and Allies record initial success for the German operations, that started from a line extending from Steentraete through Langhemarck to Zonnebeke, and carried them in a southwesterly direction to a line stretching from Lizerne and Het Sas, both west of the Yser Canal, through Pilkelm to Zonnebeke. British and French reports state that the victory was largely due to the fact that the Germans began by throwing into the midst of the Allies, and especially the French, bombs filled with asphyxiating gases. The final results of the engagement are not yet clear, because fighting of the most desperate character is still in progress, and also because the statements of the different sides are contradictory. Berlin claims to have held all the ground she captured; Paris claims that the French and Belgian troops have not only recaptured Lizerne, but have driven back the Germans a considerable distance. The Canadian troops are given great praise by both the French and British reports.

In the east there have been many attacks and counter attacks by both sides, especially in the vicinity of the Lupkow and Uzsok passes, but the deadlock still continues. Vienna reports that the Russians have been compelled to evacuate Tarnow. This move, together with an attack on Gorlitz, would seem to indicate the inauguration of the advance by the Austrians and Germans from Cracow that has long been talked of, and would threaten the Russian communications. It has not, however, as yet assumed such proportions or momentum as to be dangerous for the Russians. A number of engagements are said to have taken place in Bukowina without decisive results. Elsewhere along the Russian lines there have been only skirmishes.

The Carpathians and Dardanelles

In the Dardanelles there have been no developments of any importance. The Allies have landed troops on the Gallipoli peninsula, and report that an attack is being made on the forts both from land and sea.

Austria-Hungary.—Since the first weeks of the war there has arisen before the eyes of Austria the possibility of a German, Austrian and Hungarian alliance of which the present war is only to mark the beginning. The intimate relation between these three Powers has suggested the desirability of an economic as well as a political union of the most perfect kind. The idea had already existed in the mind of Bismarck but had been impracticable under the previous triple alliance. The war for the first time made men realize the solidarity of Germany and the Double Monarchy. Hungary as well as Austria has entered most sympathetically upon this great plan which would unite into one mighty central power the 116 million inhabitants of Germany, Austria and Hungary. This would be accomplished without loss of individuality or independence, but would bring about a close bond of economic interests. In a recent deliberation on this subject among German, Austrian and Hungarian spokesmen the agrarian interests of Hungary were too much overlooked. Hungary, it is now realized, will be the granary of this new triple alliance, and consequently Hungary's agrarian interests must hold a foremost place in the new unified Central Power of Europe which it is hoped will arise after the war and as a consequence of it. Austria looks forward to gaining much from the strenuous but friendly competition which such a relation with Germany will call forth. It realizes that it falls far short of the intense industrial, commercial and agrarian development of Germany, while Germany might gain much from the natural resources of Austria and Hungary, which in turn would find a ready market at Berlin. The three Powers realize that they will be largely dependent upon one another for help in any future emergency, and that, with a complete development of their resources, they can in a crisis like the present be independent of assistance from without.

A New Triple Bond

France.—The French prisoners restored to their country through the interchange of captives, brought about by the intervention of Pope Benedict XV, gratefully addressed to him a letter of thanks. In answer the Holy Father, through the Cardinal Secretary of State, expresses himself as deeply moved by this, as well as by other tokens of gratitude which have come to him "from all sides and in the most diverse ways, proving that his intention was rightly understood, and that his efforts have been crowned with happy success." Addressing himself then to the Bishop of Orleans, to whom the letter was directed, the Papal Secretary writes:

The Pope's Answer

> But the thanks, so simple and confiding, which your Lordship has gathered together have particularly touched the Sovereign Pontiff. He was pleased to see in them that spontaneity of soul which gives a kind of instinctive nobility to the most humble sons of France; that sincerity, too, which makes them render homage to the truth as soon as they comprehend it and which, so to speak, explains in a large measure the highly consoling reawakening of religion in your dear country.

The Holy Father then affectionately sends his blessing to the men "who have procured for him this real satisfaction."

Several important articles have appeared in La Croix of Paris, dealing with the decreasing birth-rate and the necessity of a "reconstruction of the family." On the eve of the war, writes the paper, the number of births still exceeded that of the deaths, but by a very small margin. "The excess for the years 1912 and 1913 was approximately a fifth, a fourth, a third, a half, and finally, two-thirds of the corresponding excess in births over deaths ninety, seventy, fifty, thirty and ten years before." The gravity of the situation is then brought home still more strikingly by comparison with other European nations. Fifty-five years from to-day, if the present death and birth-rate were to remain stable, "France would not have more than 18 for every hundred of the population of Russia, 33 for every hundred of Germany, 45 for every hundred of Austria-Hungary, 54 for every hundred of the United Kingdom, and 57 for every hundred of Italy." There is only one remedy, as the writer argues: a return to Christian morality, and an effort on the part of public authorities to encourage and facilitate this return instead of hindering it.

Catholic Study of Birth-Rate

Germany.—On April 24 the entire German press commemorated the fiftieth anniversary of the entrance of Admiral von Tirpitz, as a cadet, into the Prussian marine. He is a man who by hard work and genuine ability finally attained to the high position now occupied by him. The work begun by Caprivi and Admiral von Koester he has brought to perfection. The torpedo boat and submarine service is entirely his organization. He is in great favor with the Emperor, who long ago recognized his ability when the Admiral was only captain. Admiral von Tirpitz is of commanding appearance, tall and impressive, an experienced speaker and a skilful diplomatist. During the years that he was withdrawn from the navy he held high official positions. He was successively Secretary of State for the Navy and Prussian Minister of State. In 1900 he was raised to the ranks of the hereditary nobility and will now receive, it is thought, a higher title. His service for the German navy has been compared with that rendered to the German Empire by Bismarck. It is noteworthy that Emperor William in his congratulatory telegram speaks of him as "the preserver of the German realm."

Admiral von Tirpitz

It has been remarked in the American press that the war "has killed off 864 newspapers in Germany." This statement refers to the discontinuance of a great number of weekly and semi-weekly papers in the smaller towns. A substitute has been furnished for them by the Government in the shape of uniform newspapers. The "patent outside," which is supplied to the newspaper offices, contains the entire war news. The local editor then fills in the empty spaces with items of local interest, and the issue is ready for publication.

Uniform Newspapers

Great Britain.—"The advantages of having a British Minister accredited to the Vatican," says the Tablet,

"are apparent." It is to the intervention of the Holy See, reports this authority, that the release of physically unfit civilians, detained in Germany, is due. When it seemed that the negotiations pending between the two Governments were about to fail, the good offices of the Holy See brought about a result satisfactory to all parties. On March 1, Sir Henry Howard, British Envoy to the Holy See, sent the following telegram to Sir Edward Grey:

Intervention of the Holy See

> I hear I shall shortly receive official note from the Cardinal Secretary of State, informing me that the Pope has received telegram from the German Emperor to the effect that in deference to His Holiness' expressed wish, His Majesty accepts proposal for exchange of incapacitated civilian prisoners without reserve and independently of question of military age.

On March 3, an official note was written by the Envoy, confirming this information. In return Sir Edward Grey sent the following telegram, dated March 3:

> Please convey to the Cardinal Secretary of State the warm thanks of His Majesty's Government for the action of the Pope in obtaining the consent of the German Emperor, as reported in your telegram of March 1st. As soon as you receive the official note from the Vatican to the above effect, we propose to inform the United States Ambassador here.

The reason of asking that the details be carried out by Mr. Page was merely one of convenience, as the American Ambassador had been given the lists of the English and German invalids before the negotiations between the two Governments broke down.

Ireland.—Lord Wimborne, the new Viceroy, is said to have been well received on his formal entry into Dublin. A majority of the Dublin Corporation, contrary to its former usage, voted to present him an address on the ground that Home Rule was on the Statute Book, overruling the protests of the minority that it was rendered indefinite and inoperative by the Amending and Suspension Bills, which Lord Wimborne had favored. His reputed leaning toward the Ulsterite scheme of national mutilation evoked a warning from the Independent. A careful analysis of recruiting figures by the Times' Dublin correspondent makes them out larger and smaller than is claimed by partisans on either side. Up to March, 1915, the new Irish recruits totaled 51,000, of which 31,000 came from Ulster, 7,000 of the latter being Catholics, who joined largely through the influence of Mr. Devlin, M.P. Almost the entire number came from the cities, especially Belfast and Dublin, the proportion of farmers' sons being declared negligible. The police have been ordered to distribute recruiting leaflets in every household in Ireland, explain the advantages of joining the army, and report the numbers available.

Political Happenings

Archbishop Walsh of Dublin has issued a letter warning the people that the recent Decree on the Irish Martyrs has only authorized the opening of canonical proceedings for their beatification and canonization, which may be prolonged for years, and that meantime religious veneration of any public kind is forbidden. The Episcopal Standing Committee on Education, Cardinal Logue presiding, adopted a report stating that the Teachers' Salaries Grant Bill and the rules attached go counter to the terms agreed upon, fixing the salaries and their distribution in a way that discriminates against Catholic schools; but nevertheless they will cooperate with the Catholic headmasters so as to make the grant available for their lay teachers. On the occasion of his golden jubilee as a Christian Brother and a teacher, a notable public tribute was paid to Rev. Brother O'Mahoney, Principal of the famous O'Connell Schools of Dublin, which have almost invariably led the Intermediate schools of Ireland.

Ecclesiastical News

Mexico.—The Secretary of State has addressed to Reverend Dr. Francis C. Kelly, President of the Church Extension Society and official representative of the Mexican bishops, a letter concerning "the attitude and acts of the Administration in the matter of the protection of the rights of conscience and of worship in Mexico." The communication is in five parts. Mr. Bryan declares (1) that the question "which has bulked largest in political discussion in connection with the present revolution in Mexico and in connection with the revolution which preceded it, is the land question." (2) "A democracy must be sustained by education, by the education of the people, and her schools will be as valuable to Mexico as her acres of fertile land. It will be as necessary that she have them as that she break the monopoly that has controlled her land." (3) Above and beyond all other questions is religious freedom. Part four of the letter contains four State messages sent to Mexico on July 23, 1914, on December 16, 1914, on January 21, 1915, and on February 20, 1915, respectively. The first and most important message, which was intended for Generals Villa and Carranza, is as follows:

Mr. Bryan and Dr. Kelly

> Not only the United States, but all the world, will watch with the greatest interest and concern the course now to be pursued by the leaders of the Constitutionalist cause in effecting a transfer of power at Mexico City. This Government feels that the critical time has come when the choice which is now to be made by the Constitutionalist leaders will practically determine the success or failure of the government they mean to set up and the reforms they hope to effect.
>
> We venture to say this because of our earnest sympathy with the main purpose of the Constitutionalists and our desire to be of permanent service to them in bringing Mexico out of her troubles. We have been forced by circumstances into a position in which we must practically speak for the rest of the world. It is evident that the United States is the only first-class power that can be expected to take the initiative in recognizing the new government. It will in effect act as the representative of the other powers of the world in this matter and will unquestionably be held responsible by them for the consequences. Every step taken by the Constitutionalist leaders from this moment on and everything which indicates the spirit in which they mean to proceed and to consummate their triumph must of necessity, therefore, play a very important part in determining whether it will be possible for the United States to recognize the government now being planned for.

In the most earnest spirit of friendship, therefore, this Government wishes to call attention to the following matters of critical consequence:

First, the treatment of foreigners, foreign lives, foreign property, foreign rights, and particularly the delicate matter of the financial obligations, the legitimate financial obligations, of the government now superseded. Unless the utmost care, fairness and liberality are shown in these matters the most dangerous complications may arise.

Second, the treatment of political and military opponents. Unless there is to be a most generous amnesty it is certain that the sympathy of the whole world, including the people of the United States, now the real friends of the Constitutionalists, will be hopelessly alienated and the situation become impossible.

Third, the treatment of the Roman Catholic Church and of those who represent it. Nothing will shock the civilized world more than punitive or vindictive action toward priests or ministers of any church, whether Catholic or Protestant; and the Government of the United States ventures most respectfully but most earnestly to caution the leaders of the Mexican people on this delicate and vital matter. The treatment already said to have been accorded priests has had a most unfortunate effect upon opinion outside of Mexico.

You can not too earnestly urge these matters upon the attention of those now in the counsels of the Constitutionalists. It is obvious to us that the whole future of what the Constitutionalists are attempting will depend upon the way and the spirit in which they deal with these questions. Nothing ought to be overlooked or dealt with hastily which may result in our being obliged to withhold the recognition of this Government from the new government to be created in Mexico City as we withheld it from General Huerta. Our ability or inability to serve them they must now determine.

The last part of the Secretary's letter, which is taken up with a somewhat detailed statement of the Administration's attitude, has this closing sentence: "The Mexican leaders will certainly know that in order to command the sympathy and moral support of America, Mexico must have, when her reconstruction comes, just land tenure, free schools, and true freedom of conscience and worship. We know of no other foundation stones upon which to build the economic and spiritual life that makes political freedom a reality and a blessing."

Dr. Kelly, in answer, first thanks the Secretary of State for his assurance, and then proceeds to point out that the present Mexican revolutionists, like all Mexican officials of the last fifty years, interpret religious liberty in a way that "must clash with the ideas of a majority of the people of the United States." In support of his contention he cites from a pamphlet just issued by the Villista agency in Washington. He then shows that even the land problem is due directly to anti-religious laws. These laws broke up the communities in which the Indians lived happily under protection; the land was divided up among them before they were ready to assume responsibility; they sold and bartered the fields, thus creating the present difficulty. This point established, Dr. Kelly shows that, although there are millions of acres of Government land which will be distributed to those paying a nominal registration fee, yet the revolutionists are urging confiscation of property, regardless of individual rights. He then brings forth the well-known and oft-repeated fact, that the anti-religious laws are also responsible for the lamentable state of popular education. This he proves convincingly. In conclusion he says among other things:

Your declaration of policy may and, I hope, will force upon revolutionary leaders in Mexico a knowledge of the fact that there can be neither stability nor justice in any country where there are basic injustice in laws: where men and women are persecuted and where individual liberty is trampled upon. . . . We look forward with hope to the day when those who aspire to lead a government for Mexico, shall realize that their country can count on American recognition and American sympathy, only when their actions conform to the principles of justice and morality.

The Pope and Peace

Rome.—"Pray and work untiringly, unceasingly and unitedly for peace," was the Easter message the Holy Father is reported to have sent to the people of the United States. The return of peace to Europe is the one wish of his heart. In a letter recently addressed to Mgr. Heylen, Bishop of Namur, His Holiness writes:

From the bottom of Our soul We beg of God to cause the day of peace so ardently desired, to dawn at length, and to deign, in His sovereign mercy, to grant the abundant and precious fruits of peace, to you, above all, who have suffered so many afflictions.

And in another letter sent in the Pontiff's name by Cardinal Gasparri to Henry Sienkiewicz, the famous Polish novelist, Pope Benedict said that:

He feels for the sufferings of all the combatants and bears the burden of the sorrow of all their families. He entertains the same love for all the unfortunate, without distinction, and, as he said at the last Consistory, his heart is particularly moved at the thought of the troubles of those of his children who are the most terribly tried by this fearful catastrophe.

Moreover, by the Decree issued April 9, prayers for peace are enjoined for this year's May devotions:

His Holiness Pope Benedict XV, moved by the pious desire to increase more and more devotion to the Blessed Virgin, to whom the month of May is consecrated, and animated, moreover, by the consoling confidence that through the powerful intercession of the Mother of God, who, amongst her titles, possesses that most noble one, Queen of Peace, the end of the present most grievous war can be brought about as soon as possible, has ordered that throughout the whole Catholic world shall be recited every day during the sacred functions of the month of May the Prayer for Peace composed by his Holiness; to which prayer the Holy Father has been good enough to attach an indulgence of three hundred days, to be obtained once in the day, and a plenary indulgence, to be obtained in the customary form of the Church by the faithful who shall have taken part for not less than twenty days in the recitation of the said prayer.

The enjoined prayer is the one that was recited in all our churches on Peace Sunday, March 21.

TOPICS OF INTEREST

Simplicity, Sociology and Religion

IT is beyond parley that, if all men lived in absolute accord with Gospel precepts, social problems would not have an inch of ground on which to sprout. Labor would not clash with capital, "the richest would be poor and the poorest would live in abundance." Nations would not fall under the weight of their own excesses: men's lives would "glide on like rivers that water the woodlands, darkened by shadows of earth, but reflecting an image of heaven." Human affairs would be as simple as the most vehement pacificist could desire; as serene as Pastor Wagner of Paris earnestly depicts.

But in this materialistic age, faith has so far decreased that the abundance of the world's harvest of social problems is already appalling. Steady diet on the "dry husks of facts" has hindered the healthy metabolism of men's minds. Hearts have atrophied.

For "Progress" was the slogan of the practical and sprightly nineteenth century. Darwin had done so much toward mastering the mysteries of earth that his disciples were emboldened to besiege those of the skies. Spencer found the wall of metaphysical belief too high to be scaled; he did not care to crawl underneath, disliking "mud"; so he rammed a considerable hole through the center, with flattering ease. At the snap of potent scientific fingers, God vanished into the realm of the irrational. Then was inaugurated, indeed, the era of temporalities. Sceptical of ultimate reward, men readily forgot all about it. Determined on having their heaven somewhere, they built it here. What wretched architects they were, however, is becoming daily more manifest.

Happily, by the close of the century, sentiment in not a few quarters of the thinking world was ripe for a reaction against the positivism of Comte and the agnosticism of Spencer. Carlyle had observed that man lives by believing something, not by arguing and debating many things. Newman protested: "As well can there be filial devotion without a father, as religion without the fact of a Superior Being." "The belief in God," Fiske averred, "is indispensable to the rational and healthy working of the human mind." Many students candidly doubted the prudence of deeming LaPlace's nebular hypothesis, Newtonian gravitation, and Darwinian evolution, as having swept the supernatural out of the external world. They perceived that such tremendous forces as the great scientists had detected, were far more awesome than, and ought to be quite as conducive to belief in a Divinity as, the gentle truths of Christian Faith and the Elder Brother's sweet miracles of mercy. The earth evolving out of a nebular circlet; a "simia" sprouting into a soul-bearing man: these were marvelous claims! The ironclad fact flared forth that science asked men to take as much on faith as religion.

But unfortunately the twentieth century, yet an infant, is being swathed in a tragedy which at least temporarily shuts out the signs of religious renaissance that attended the nativity. Europe, in the grasp of Mars, can do little toward evolving lofty schemes. Her duties in this line have devolved on America. It is for us, in our comparatively peaceful land, to take up the scattered threads of noble public thought and weave them into a plan for the betterment of humanity. Though we begin by benefiting ourselves, we shall end by aiding the world. For, if we succeed in settling our own multifarious and grievous social ailments, we shall have shown other nations how to deal with theirs.

It is inspiring to note that, just at present, Miss Columbia seems to be much alive to the subject and necessity of religion. The stir which our base-ball evangelist has been creating is decidedly more eloquent than the spectacular preacher himself: it evinces the underlying hunger of our countrymen's hearts for spiritual bread. We are a commerce-swept people, merged in temporalities. But already we are seeing the error of our ways by experiencing their dire physical effects. Already we are frenziedly blaming this, that, or the other circumstance as the cause of our ebbing vitality. But the real reason is ourselves: the real remedy is religion.

Across the stormy sea of history quivers a gleam of unquenchable light from those early Christian communities which, so faithful in the following of the Master, flourished in a social simplicity and felicity which are the despair of modern theories. Would not the simplest solution to our problems be a return to the faith which knew no problems?

It is not so much the eventful and progressive career of our nation that has shattered its nerves and branded it with premature decay. Peace comes from within, and can reign even when fiercest tumult is raging without. Ten great persecutions failed to shatter the calm of the early Christians. To be sure, we have not had their spiritual stamina to buoy us up; but, as Münsterberg aptly, if prosaically, reminds us: "The miller does not hear the noise of the mill. No one feels the touch of his clothes. In the same way, we have become insensitive by adaptation to our tumultuous surroundings." So, if we are a weakened people, let us not blame the abundance of physical energy with which we have made our country exteriorly glorious, so much as our lack of moral grit, on account of which we have so seriously and steadily violated the Law.

To the truly religious, and to them alone, is life always simple. For, no matter how replete it may be with labor and trial, it is pure, wholesome and purposive. With them, vicissitudes of war, pestilence, famine and catastrophe are not causes for despair, but permissions of God's inscrutable wisdom: seeds from which an infinitely good and tender Father can and does make benefits spring forth. They do not view their allotted span as a season in which as much enjoyment and emolument as possible should be crammed, but as a period of probation during which eternity must be earned. Such is the doctrine of Christ: simplicity itself, and much more capable of producing the calm, which we so badly need, than any theory which mere men can invent. Nor can it be improved upon.

As a remarkable exponent of genuine simplicity, the Catholic Church should engage the attention of reformers. Her social results, if nothing else, could give these avid leaders of men some very valuable information. She claims to have preserved pure and complete the peerless doctrine of the Master, and, what is more, shows fruits which substantiate her claim. Simply by swaying their hearts, she has directly safeguarded her children's morals and indirectly their bodies. To-day Catholic nations can boast much more physical and moral health, than most others. Irreligious or only partly religious countries flare brilliant with the fire that consumes its source; startling indication abounds that fuel to feed the flame will not hold out much longer. In Catholic lands, however, the elements that make for lasting mundane as well as spiritual success are plentifully present. One good corroboration of the fact is: If foreign blood (and this is chiefly Catholic) did not flow into American arteries regularly, Miss Columbia admittedly would be a social anemic.

Anent the relation of Catholicism to sociology, Dr. Meyrick Booth couches stirring sentences in the Hibbert Journal. With sundry able statistics, he shows the magnificence of the rôle which this grand old religion is enacting in the great modern drama of national life-saving. Protestantism is declining, on account of unproductive marriages. For the opposite reason, Catholicism is prospering. Who will not concede that Catholics are supporting the true ideal of Christian wedlock and are thereby conferring on nations an inestimable boon? The Catholic Church, affirms M. Leroy-Beaulieu, naturally promotes increase of population because it condemns "egoism, materialism and inordinate ambition for self and family." Plainly, with the same noble policy, it vanquishes every other menace to modern society.

In a word, religion is the secret to health of mind and heart, which in turn inspires simplicity of life, which results in the vigor of nations. And the Catholic Church points to accomplishments in the world which give strongest testimony to her abilities as a teacher of religion.

If American sociologists would only wipe away a certain mist of prejudice from their mental vision, perchance they would find that the solution which they seek has been in the world for two thousand years and is even now under their very noses. But who so blind as they who will not see? In time their eyes atrophy with their hearts.

EDWARD F. MURPHY, M.A.

Common School Education in the Middle Ages

DURING the five-hundred-year period ending with the fifteenth century there was an extraordinary advancement in learning, in art and in everything that goes to make up what is termed the civilization of mankind. This progress became so marked about the middle of the fifteenth century, that many historians set that time as the beginning of modern history. There is a widespread impression among Protestants, which, strange to say, is shared by some Catholics, that the wonderful progress made since that time in knowledge, in personal and social discipline and in the lordship of the natural world was in some way brought about by the so-called Reformation in the first half of the sixteenth century. The period ending at that time is loosely referred to as the "Dark Ages," and represented as a time when education was suppressed by the Church or confined exclusively to the clergy, who flourished and fattened on the ignorance and superstition of the people until the champions of Protestantism struck off the shackles and permitted men to act and think for themselves. This absurd claim reminds us of the rooster that strutted around in the belief that the sun would not have risen had he not crowed in the early morning.

The real "Dark Ages" began in the fourth or fifth century, when western Europe was overrun by swarms of barbarians from the North who destroyed all learning and civilization except such as could be held and preserved by the Church in the monasteries and other secluded places. The real reformation began in a general revival of wealth, manners, taste and learning five centuries before the advent of Protestantism, which tended to retard rather than accelerate the movement. Two events in the last half of the fifteenth century contributed much to the progress of that period; the invention and development of printing in Catholic Germany and the discovery of America under the patronage of Catholic Spain. Long prior to the introduction of printing there had been a great demand for reading matter among all classes of people and the work of copyists had developed into a regular industry.

Green, in his "Short History of the English People," notes the creation of a reading public wanting books before printing was invented and says, "It was in fact this increase of demand for books, pamphlets or fly sheets, especially of a grammatical or religious character that brought about the introduction of printing."

From Janssen's "History of the German People" we learn that a similar condition prevailed in Germany. "This German book trade," he says, > was a continuation and development of the trade in manuscripts which had already grown to large and extensive business proportions in Germany, where there was so great a demand for books long before the invention of printing. . . . The collection of German writings of the fifteenth century which are still extant gives an extremely favorable impression of the culture of the period and shows how greatly the habit of reading prevailed among all classes.

Under such favorable conditions printing, aided and encouraged by the clergy, spread rapidly. Within a few years after its introduction, there were printing establishments all over Europe and before the close of the fifteenth century Rome alone counted no fewer than 190 presses. Learning thus how large masses of the common people had acquired a taste for reading before the introduction of printing and how the universal demand for books caused a quick development of the art, we are led to inquire what means had been provided for the education of the people during the earlier ages. It has been easier to find out what the universities were and what they did than to trace the extent and growth of the obscurer common schools. While we possess but few authentic reports of these schools during the Middle Ages, enough remain to prove not only that such schools existed but also that they were esteemed highly as mediums for Christian education and that the education of the people was greatly encouraged by the Church. As far back as the year 826, Pope Eugenius II in a Roman Synod enacted that schools should be opened in cathedral and parish churches and wheresoever they might be deemed necessary. Primary schools were at that time established in many places for the instruction of the young. Primary or rural schools were at first frequently held in the church and it was only after a long struggle and repeated synodal decrees that they were located elsewhere. The following facts gathered from the archives of Paris give us some idea of the extent of primary teaching in the later medieval period.

"Independently of the schools attached to churches, eleven masters and one mistress figure in the roll of the land tax levied on the inhabitants of Paris by Philip the Fair in 1292. In the fourteenth century we find record of forty-one masters and twenty-two mistresses; in the fifteenth century there are one hundred." In Larned's history it is stated "that secondary schools, grammar schools, were really plentiful in most parts of western Europe during the later Middle Ages seems abundantly proved." Secondary schools, of course, imply the existence of primary schools and if the former were numerous the latter must have been more so. M. Simeon Luce, whose authority on matters connected with medieval France is unquestioned, says:

It is a grave mistake to imagine there were no primary schools. Mention is made of rural schools in all the documents, even in those in which we could least expect to find it, and we can scarcely doubt that, during the most stormy years of the fourteenth century, most villages had their masters teaching children reading, writing and some arithmetic.

A writer in the Contemporary Review, who seems to be well informed, does not hesitate to say in reference to England:

There is not the smallest doubt that the provision for secondary education was far greater in proportion to population during the Middle Ages than it has ever been since. Education was, if not a first charge on the endowments of the Church, at all events a well-recognized part of the duties for the performance of which the endowments were given. During the whole time, from the introduction of Christianity to the Reformation, education was an ecclesiastical concern. It was conducted by the clergy and was a matter of cognizance in the ecclesiastical courts. Every village parson was, or ought to have been, an elementary schoolmaster. Secondary schools were found in almost every place in which they were required. It may be said broadly that wherever there was a cluster of houses which could be dignified with the name of town there was a grammar school in the midst of it.

The same writer, referring to modern conditions in England, quotes from a recent Schools Inquiry Report:

In at least two-thirds of the places in England named as towns in the census there is no public school at all above the primary schools, and in the remaining one-third the school is often insufficient in size and in quality. He goes on to explain that the Aristocratic Reformation in England destroyed, to a large extent, the public provision for the advancement of education.

Germany and the Netherlands were in all probability more advanced in common education than either England or France. Janssen, the historian of medieval Germany, says:

Outside the Mark of Brandenburg there was scarcely a large town in Germany in which, at the end of the fifteenth century, in addition to the already existing elementary national schools, new schools of a higher grade were not built or old ones improved. In the district of the Middle Rhine there were whole stretches of country where a national school was to be found within a circuit of every six miles. Small parishes even, of only 500 or 600 souls, were not without their village schools. Throughout the empire, indeed, the number of schools was generally considerable. The ultimate control of the town schools was usually in the hands of the municipal authorities, but these institutions were also closely connected with the Church, not only because most of the masters belonged to the clerical profession, but because the supervision was either practically left to the clergy or formally made over to them.

Thus we have seen, as the French historian, Brèmont expresses it, "the Church not only had a monopoly of teaching during the Middle Ages but used all her power in its favor."

So in this 20th century, while we are far advanced in many directions, we can hardly echo, so far as common school education is concerned, the Homeric boast that we are much better than our forefathers.

EDWARD BROWN.

Periodic Drunkenness and Tobacco

PERIODIC drinkers, those that remain for a time without taking any alcoholic liquor whatever, but who break out into temporary debauchery, are quite common as every one knows, but Dr. Alexander Lambert of New York City, who has had a wide experience in the treatment of inebriates, recently reported the discovery of a connection between the peculiar symptoms of these persons and the excessive use of tobacco. Very many of his patients in this class are heavy smokers. An intemperate man is intemperate in many ways—when he does not drink he overeats, or oversmokes, or offends by moral ballast-shifting of other kinds. I have observed fanatical anti-alcoholics overeating themselves to death and posing as martyrs. The folk Lambert mentions are susceptible to the poison of tobacco, and they so saturate themselves with this in a year or two that nothing but alcohol, in their opinion, will quiet the irritation of the toxine. They think the craving is alcoholism, whereas it is really caused by tobacco. They go crazily drunk for a while, and after the exhaustion and recovery they start in again to load up their bodies with tobacco toxine until another explosion occurs. To keep these persons sober they must be cut off from tobacco.

We are likely to look upon tobacco either as a harmless thing, or the root of evil. It is neither one nor the other: truth, virtue, and similar goods, are tight-rope walkers who tumble if they lean to one side or the other a little too much. It is doubtful that the hairs on Satan's tail are cigarettes, but it is just as doubtful that the use of tobacco is an unmitigated blessing. Any agent which can tie up the will of a human being so tightly that a man has extreme difficulty in shaking himself loose from thraldom is an evil, even if the thing is only an itch for shallow banter. Tobacco can bind any regular smoker's will almost as firmly as alcohol does. The man who tells you he can quit smoking at will is an amateur at the business, or a romancer. In my medical experience it has been much easier always to persuade a patient who is a tippler to quit alcohol than it is to get a regular smoker away from his pipe. The reason an alcoholic must drink after he has acquired his vice is to quiet his toxic irritation—exactly the same reason holds for the smoker. The effects of the two forms of bondage differ, of course, but the essences of the two forms are as like as unioval twins. The good citizen who thumps his chest and perorates about his dignity as a human being while he is tied fast to a cigar-box may be harmless, but he has an obtuse sense of humor. Yet, these alcoholic liquors and tobacco are gifts of God—certainly; and so are rattlesnakes and rats, but that is scarcely a reason for putting any of them into your mouth.

The middle-aged man who tells you he has been a heavy smoker all his life and has not suffered the slightest damage from his indulgence is talking in his qualification as amadan, a human characteristic as prevalent as noses. Tobacco in excess is injurious to any one, and excess is a relative condition. Even three mild cigars a day can be excessive smoking for some men after middle age. In men who drink whiskey once or twice a day a use of tobacco to a degree that is not deemed excessive not seldom causes even blindness. Blindness from the use of tobacco is somewhat frequent, but in my experience this tobacco amblyopia has always been found in smokers who are also whiskey-logged: I have never seen a case of tobacco blindness in a man who was not also an alcoholic, but I have had as high as six cases under treatment in private practice within two months where tobacco with alcohol caused the injury to the optic nerve. These cases go on to total and incurable blindness if the use of tobacco and alcohol is not stopped, but sight is commonly restored when these poisons are withheld. Such patients are as a rule heavy smokers, but they need not be what are popularly called excessive drinkers. A person that drinks whiskey twice daily becomes a chronic alcoholic in a few months, but this is not the popular notion of the chronic alcoholic. It is so difficult to get these men free from the tobacco vice in certain instances that we have to put them in a hospital and treat them as we should morphinists. You may assure them most solemnly that they will certainly go hopelessly blind if they do not cease smoking; they believe you; but they do not stop.

There is an old yarn to the effect that such a patient was told the outcome of his abuse of tobacco and alcohol, and was forbidden the use of either drug. The man asked:

"Do you mean to say I can't take a single drink or smoke one more cigar?"

"I certainly do," answered the oculist.

"Well, Doc, I've seen 'most everything. Good morning."

I have had exactly the same thing happen in my own office and the patient is now voluntarily in the twilight.

Among the periodic drinkers we find a rare condition called dipsomania, which is a periodic insanity taking the form of an uncontrollable desire for alcoholic drink. It is a mania excited in a disposed subject by auto-intoxication, and possibly tobacco might be a contributing factor in some instances. Several forms of insanity, the etiology of which is obscure, are now attributed with much probability to toxemias, and are affected favorably by removing the intoxication.

The unstable neurotic person, who has no desire for alcohol until he has taken a drink with companions and then goes off on a temporary debauch, is not a dipsomaniac. The first time the accident happens to him he is merely an unfortunate weakling, the second time he is a plain ass.

AUSTIN O'MALLEY, M.D.

A Methodist Quarterly and the "Ne Temere"

UNDER the presidency of Bishop Joseph F. Berry, the Board of Home Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church publishes in Philadelphia The Home Mission and Church Extension Quarterly Bulletin. The purpose of the Quarterly, expressed on its first page, is to win "America for Christ." The "fundamental" of its work is the "spirit of neighborliness." Its aims are to be attained through "a conquest by righteousness." In the first issue of the present year, a contributor, discussing the topic, "Breaking Down the Home," thinks himself justified in making the following remarks:

Only representatives of that Church (the Catholic Church) can perform the marriage ceremony. Only that Church can grant divorces. The Ne Temere so declares. All marriages other than those performed by the Church of Rome are illegitimate. We need only turn to Mexico, the South American States, and the Philippines to judge what sort of a domestic situation Romanism produces. Infidelity and Romanism, where both are unrestrained, break up the family life. Sound Christian principles alone are adequate as the foundation for the home. (Italics inserted.)

Now in these neighborly and righteous lines, there are several assertions and insinuations to which the ordinary Catholic, without doubt, will take immediate exception. But apart from these "flings," dictated by an overheated imagination, the passage contains a direct reference to a very real and tangible thing, the Ne Temere. Here we have a legal document. What it says or does not say is a point of fact to be determined, not by an appeal to sentiment or to religious bigotry, but by an inspection of the document itself, and of the decisions issued by the tribunals qualified to interpret it. Hence, passing over the "flings" and slurs, an inquiry was directed to the editor of the Quarterly, asking him to cite the text of this decree dealing with the matter of divorce, and requesting precise authority for the precise statement that "All marriages other than those performed by the Church of Rome are illegitimate." After a lapse of two weeks, the following remarkably illuminating answer was received from a secretary of the Board, Mr. Freeman D. Bovard. It is quoted in its entirety:

> The answer to both your queries may be found in the text of the Ne Temere decree. The case was tried in Canada and carried to England and decided against the Ne Temere decree.

Now, as will be noted, the Quarterly had stated categorically, that "All marriages other than those performed by the Church of Rome are illegitimate," had mentioned the Ne Temere with an impressive show of learning, and had instanced, presumably as horrible examples, Mexico, the South American States and the Philippines. When challenged, however, for direct proof, the secretary shifts the scene to Canada and England, and again refers airily to the Ne Temere. It may be mentioned in passing, that this decree says precisely nothing on the power of the Church to grant "divorces."

Mr. Bovard's reply gave rise to the suspicion that he had not even read the decree which he so glibly cited as his authority. A second letter, from which the following passage is quoted, was then addressed to Mr. Bovard:

> I fear you do not quite grasp my point . . . I had asked you . . . to refer me to authority for the statement that "All marriages other than those performed by the Church of Rome are illegitimate." You again refer me to the decree. Under paragraph 11 I find that this decree binds (a) all persons baptized in the Catholic Church; (b) Catholics who contract marriage with non-Catholics. But in section iii of the same paragraph, it is expressly stated that the decree does not bind non-Catholics contracting marriage among themselves. Since the original statement in the Quarterly was that "All marriages other than those performed by the Church of Rome are illegitimate," your passim reference to the decree does not solve my difficulty. May I therefore again ask you for your authority for the statement that "All marriages other than those performed by the Church of Rome are illegitimate"?

But Mr. Bovard evidently thought that this insistence was too much harping on one string, for although this request was made on February 7, no answer has been received.

Mr. Bovard had been confronted with undeniable evidence that the Catholic Church did not hold a doctrine which he had publicly imputed to it. The very document which he had named in support of his wild statement had refuted him. Charity forbids the supposition that Mr. Bovard intended deliberate misrepresentation. It must be concluded, then, that Mr. Bovard like many another non-Catholic who has attempted to tell the world what the Catholic Church teaches, was merely indiscreet in making an odious charge against a large body of his fellow-countrymen, and in offering as proof a document which he had never read.

In itself, this incident is of no particular importance. What Mr. Bovard personally may think of the Ne Temere or the Catholic Church is of little consequence. But what of the effect on the Protestant readers who learn from the Quarterly, a reputable magazine, published by a society of missionaries, that "All marriages other than those performed by the Church of Rome" are held by that Church to be "illegitimate"? This alone invests the incident with some importance. For the Quarterly is but a type of the "religious" press, which knowingly or in ignorance is seeking "to preach the Gospel of Christ" by stirring up discord in communities in which Catholics and Protestants, with men of no faith at all, are living in harmony.

Throughout the country, but particularly in the remote districts, there are thousands of Protestant men and women who are doing their best to serve God in spirit and in truth, and to live in peace and concord with their neighbors. From childhood, many of these men and women have been taught to hate, not the Catholic Church, but that monster of iniquity which they conceive to be the Catholic Church. Years of prejudice have culminated in a kind of insanity. It is impossible for them to see anything good in the Catholic Church. To suffer Catholics to dwell in the same community, is to them an exercise of the highest Christian forbearance. For what they may think or say of the Catholic Church, such persons are hardly responsible. They know not what they do. They fulfill our Lord's prophecy that the day would come when men should believe that they served God in persecuting Christ's followers. Others, again, living in communities where the Catholic Church is almost unknown, regard the Church with simple indifference. They neither love it nor hate it, for they know little or nothing about it.

What will be the effect of the Quarterly's statement, and of similar statements, upon these men and women? The invincibly ignorant Protestant will be confirmed in his execration of "popery," as the neighborly Quarterly terms the teaching of the Catholic Church. To the minds of those who hitherto have known but little of the Church, suspicion, dislike, perhaps even hatred, will be suggested. Few of the Quarterly's readers will question the Quarterly's knowledge or truthfulness. "Of course it's true. The Quarterly is issued by Bishop Berry's associates, the Methodist Missionary Board. These good men would not circulate a falsehood. They are learned men, too, and we can trust them to tell the truth about Romanism." Is this "winning America for Christ"? Is it a legitimate maneuver in a "campaign of righteousness"? And when attention has been called to what is obviously a grievous error, is it manly or even decent to take refuge in silence?

In the early days of the Oxford movement, the good Keble exhorted his coreligionists, many of whom in time entered the Church, to "speak gently of our fallen sister, Rome." For the benefit of publications like the Quarterly, the advice may be repeated. Mud-slinging is always a dirty, ineffective method of promoting Christian truth. But the Quarterly stands in need of further advice which shall not be omitted. "Do not make charges against the Catholic Church which you can not prove. Above all, do not quote papal decrees which you have not read."

JOHN WILTBYE.

Holland's Neutrality

IT would seem that the war now dragging along is gradually assuming the character of a profit-sharing business. The neutral countries of Europe are badgered by both sides to join in the fray. The bait is suitably garnished to attract covetous glances and whet the appetite of each particular nation. Italy and the Balkan States have had the siren song poured into their ears almost from the beginning. It would be little short of the miraculous should neutral Holland escape attention altogether. French and Belgian journalists ere this have urged upon Holland to take sides in behalf of their kinsmen and southern neighbors. Some time last fall the English press likewise voiced similar sentiments. One of its organs—the London Observer—averred that public opinion in Holland veered toward the Allies. At the same time it was conceded that a large percentage of the population felt even more distrustful of England than of Germany. Holland's main concern was neutrality. To rush headlong into the fray would evince poor judgment on the part of a small nation. But would it be a "safe and sane" policy for the Dutch, under any and all circumstances, to maintain a neutral attitude? Such were the problems discussed.

Meanwhile the war has not been progressing as smoothly nor as fast as had been calculated. Discouraging obstacles are looming ahead and, small though her forces are, Holland's aid under the circumstances is not to be disdained. So a new decoy has been sent forth in the shape of an open letter to the Dutch nation. In some quarters the communication is considered semi-official. After a few complimentary remarks about Dutch fighting power, national strength and well-known caution, the document referred to leads off with the question: "Is Holland in reality as well off by remaining neutral as she believes herself to be?" Public opinion in England is convinced, so it proceeds, that the war will be protracted for another year at least unless Holland should make up her mind to join the Allies. Reference is then made to German methods, and lest both these arguments, viz.: England's interests and the German peril, should not suffice to persuade the Dutch, a third is added, to the effect that Holland would eventually profit by joining the Allies. This point is elaborated at some length. We are told it would prove an excellent bargain for Holland. First, the English fleet could for ever guarantee the integrity of the Dutch colonies, particularly those in the East Indies. For that purpose a treaty, both offensive and defensive, could easily be arranged between England, France, Belgium and Holland. As regards the latter country's eastern frontier and the vexatious question concerning the mouth of the Rhine, it would be an easy matter to settle the frontier problem and thus create a greater Netherlands! So far Mr. H. G. Wells, the widely-famed writer and novelist, who stands father to the document, which after its many promises, ends in a threat: Should Holland persist in remaining neutral, she can expect no consideration whatever at the hands of the Allies.

The letter has been distributed broadcast over Holland and, so far, no official disclaimer in regard to it has appeared in public. The Dutch press shows considerable feeling at some of the suggestions made in the document. It is pointed out that a slight acquaintance with the character of the Dutch people would suffice to show that they are total strangers to any imperialistic dreams or tendencies. Their well-known caution certainly would never lead them into serving as a catspaw for other nations. If the author of the open letter, they continue, rightly opines that Holland in this war will never lend her active support to German aspirations, it is equally correct that neither will she do so in regard to England's claims.

It can not be disguised that many contingencies might arise in the present war that would greatly imperil Holland's neutrality. Were the German armies, for instance, forced back from the Meuse and the Yser as far as the Rhine, it would throw the danger line across the Dutch frontier. Again, were Italy, the Balkan States and Rumania to cast their lot with the Allies, it would seriously weaken the position of all neutral countries, Holland included. Or should, perchance, a war between China and Japan set the Orient ablaze, the sparks might easily fall as far as the Dutch East Indian archipelago. But whatever does happen, there is ample reason for holding that Holland will continue to stand on her guard; and no matter what pressure may be brought to bear from the outside, or what irritating events may develop later on, neither the Government nor the Dutch people will ever engage in this war for the sake of mere profit.

V. S.

Old St. Patrick's, New York

OLD St. Patrick's Church, Mott and Prince streets, New York, was dedicated by Bishop Cheverus of Boston, on May 4, 1815. The centenary of this ceremony will be commemorated with an imposing program, on Sunday, May 2. This was the second church in the United States placed under the patronage of St. Patrick; the first was at Fell's Point, Baltimore, Md., which was dedicated on November 29, 1807. The happy choice of the patron of New York's cathedral church was made at the suggestion of Archbishop Carroll of Baltimore. It might not be too poetic a supposition that he foresaw the coming of the millions of the exiled spiritual children of the great apostle through New York, the gate of their new land of prosperity.

St. Peter's, Catholic New York's first church, opened November

4, 1786, had become inadequate for the needs of the city, so it was determined, in 1808, to build a second church and make it the cathedral for the newly created see. The pastor of St. Peter's then was that great Jesuit Father Anthony Kohlmann who, a short time before, had been sent by Archbishop Carroll to straighten out the tangles in New York's ecclesiastical affairs.

> I have sent Mr. Kohlmann to New York, the archbishop wrote, December 3, 1808, to Father William Strickland, S.J., the English Procurator, where a zealous pastor was much wanted, and he is accompanied by a countryman of my own, lately ordained and out of his novitiate, of great promise, and with four scholastics who have begun a school from which much good is expected.

The "countryman of my own" was Father Benedict J. Fenwick, S.J., who was in charge of St. Patrick's when it was dedicated, and later became Bishop of Boston. The four Jesuit scholastics were James Wallace, a fine mathematician; Michael White, James Redmond and Adam Marshall. "Father Kohlmann," says one of his brethren, "is to be ranked among the lights of the new Society, and among its most celebrated members in America where he spent twenty-one years of his laborious and saintly life." During his pastorate at St. Peter's (1808-1814) the first American Cardinal, John McCloskey, was his pupil. In 1824 he was called to Rome to take the chair of theology in the Gregorian University, and there among the students at his lectures was Joachim Pecci, afterwards the great Pope Leo XIII.

The trustees of St. Peter's resolved to begin building operations on the new church at their meeting of May 24, 1809. The site selected, at Father Kohlmann's instance, was the burying ground belonging to the church at Mott and Catherine (now Mulberry) streets. Nine lots had been purchased there for a cemetery, on May 23, 1801, to which ten lots adjoining were added January 14, 1803. Interments began at once and show even then the cosmopolitan character of the congregation, as for instance, Peter Kelly, died July 2, 1801; Peter Eisenberg, October 31, 1801; Nicholas Louis Edouard, September 8, 1803. The use of this cemetery was continued until it was officially closed in 1833, and during that period there were 32,153 burials within its enclosure.

Joseph F. Mangin, the leading architect of the city, drew the plans of the new church, which called for a Gothic structure 120 feet long, 80 feet wide and about 80 feet high. Peter Morte, master mason, was made superintendent of the work, at a wage of $2 a day, with Patrick Mullaney as his assistant at fourteen shillings a day, and Michael Roth, clerk of the work, at $2 a day. The stone was drawn from the quarry of Patrick McKay and put in shape by two firms of master stone-cutters, Moses Miller and McDonough & McGuire. The corner-stone was laid on Thursday, June 8, 1809, by Father Kohlmann who, with the assistant priests, choir, trustees and about 3,000 of the laity, walked in procession from St. Peter's, Barclay Street, to the new site.

New York then had Canal Street for its northern limit and its growth in that direction was slow. Farms and country villas were scattered about in all directions. The new church site was so far in the fields, and so surrounded by thickets that as late as 1820 a fox was caught in the churchyard. Father Kohlmann, writing on November 8, 1808, to his friend Father Strickland in England, tells him his "congregation consists of Irish, some hundreds of French and as many Germans; in all, according to the common estimation, of 14,000 souls." The commercial disasters following the Embargo, and the subsequent troubles of the War of 1812 with England, hampered the progress of the new church. On account of lack of funds it was not ready for dedication until 1815. In the meantime, however, Father Kohlmann, in June, 1809, started the New York Literary Institution, New York's first Catholic college, in a house opposite the new church with Father Fenwick and the four above-named Jesuit scholastics in charge. Here he soon had, as he tells us, "About thirty-five of the most respectable children of the city, both of Catholic and all other persuasions, among them four are boarding in one house, and in all probability we shall have seven or eight boarders next August." In March, 1810, this school had so outgrown its original limits that he moved it to the suburban village of Elgin, opposite the State Botanic Garden, now Fifth Avenue, Fiftieth and Fifty-first streets, the present location of St. Patrick's Cathedral, the trustees of which took the property for a cemetery, when the school project was abandoned after the withdrawal of the Jesuits from New York in 1817.

New York's first bishop had died in Naples, June 10, 1810, without ever seeing his diocese, and his successor, Bishop Connolly, consecrated November 6, 1814, had not yet arrived from Rome. Father Kohlmann shortly after this was recalled to Georgetown by his superiors. It was Father Fenwick who finished the building of St. Patrick's and arranged for the dedication on Ascension Day, May 4, 1815. As Archbishop Carroll could not be present, Bishop Cheverus of Boston officiated and also preached the dedication sermon, the Mayor and corporation of the city and an assemblage of over four thousand being present. Bishop Plessis of Quebec, who visited the new church in September following, described it as

> At the extremity of the city toward the country. It has already cost $90,000, but as yet has no steeple or sacristy or enclosure, or annexed buildings. Besides there is no roof casing or penciled joints, although the very ordinary stone of which it is built requires both. To make up for this the interior is magnificent.

In spite of the general poverty of the relatively small number of Catholics of the community, it was the most impressive looking church in the city and the finest Gothic edifice in the country.

When Bishop Connolly arrived from Dublin, on November 24, 1815, after a stormy passage of sixty-eight days, he immediately took possession of the church which for more than sixty years following remained the cathedral of the diocese. During this period it was the scene of a long series of great ecclesiastical functions: ordinations, consecrations, synods, councils, the imposition of the scarlet biretta on the first American cardinal and other ceremonies. Owing to difficulties over the trustee system the joint incorporation with St. Peter's was dissolved and a separate incorporation effected on April 14, 1817. When the new cathedral on Fifth Avenue was opened May 25, 1879, old St. Patrick's became the parish church of the neighborhood in which a remarkable social change had taken place. Once the strongest Irish section of the city, it is now almost exclusively Italian. The roof and interior of the church were destroyed by fire on October 6, 1866, but it was rebuilt at once with many improvements, and rededicated March 17, 1868.

> The elders of the congregation, said Bishop McQuaid, writing of the restored building, whose memories go back to that which this church edifice was before its extension under Bishop Hughes, remember, no doubt, the high, straight-backed pews constructed apparently with a view to uncomfortableness, the freezing temperature of a winter's morning in a building without a fire and the dim light at a Lenten evening's service, that came from the candles in tin sconces hung on the columns and just enough to show the darkness. The methods and arrangements of those times and of our fathers were more remarkable for simplicity and economy than for comfort and brilliancy.

After Fathers Kohlmann and Fenwick, who were the pastors of St. Patrick's from 1809 to 1815, the succeeding rectors were Very Rev. John Power, 1825-26; Rev. Thomas C. Levins, 1826-34; Rev. Andrew Byrne, 1836; Rev. John D. Urquhart, 1836-40; Rev. Williams Starrs, 1841-44; Rev. John Loughlin, 1844-53; Very Rev. William Starrs, V.G., 1853-73; Right Rev. William Quinn, V.G., 1873-79. Mgr. Quinn's successor was the present incumbent, the Right Rev. John F. Kearney, who was born in the parish, and has spent his whole sacerdotal career of almost half a century there, since his ordination in 1866. He had the gratification of having the old church solemnly consecrated, on March 17, 1885. In its century of existence it has seen its rural environment evolve into a fashionable residential section, then later on into a busy mart of commerce, and lastly, at this day, into a swarming aggregation of the crowded habitations that make the East Side of this great metropolis one of the social wonders of the universe. In the graveyard of the old church peacefully rest under the shadow of its cross, the bones of its founders and their immediate descendants. When this graveyard was closed, that in Eleventh Street was opened and was the place of burial until 1851. In that time 41,016 burials took place there, making 73,169 for these two old graveyards. The authority for these figures is the late Archbishop Corrigan who gave them from the official records in a paper on "The Catholic Cemeteries of New York," which he prepared for the United States Catholic Historical Society. The Eleventh Street cemetery site, except one corner, where an Italian church is building, is now a public playground. As much of the contents of the old graves as could be found was transferred to Calvary Cemetery in 1909, and the ground itself was sold in November, 1912, for $357,000. Let us hope that when another century shall have passed, the bicentenary celebration will find old St. Patrick's still standing guard over the undisturbed graves of the sturdy pioneers who worshiped within its hallowed walls. THOMAS F. MEEHAN.

COMMUNICATIONS

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

South America's Catholicism

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A few comments on the article on "South America's Catholicism" in a recent AMERICA suggest themselves. As to Ecuador, Mr. Earl is a little behind-hand in his history. Some fifteen years ago the so-called Liberal party got the upper hand, and then proceeded to terrorize the Catholics, banishing bishops and persecuting priests. These people have had in their sole control the education of the country during these years past and, of course, if it is backward, the responsibility is clearly not with the Conservative party, the so-called Catholic element.

As to the Inquisition, inasmuch as the Santo Oficio in Spain, in the four hundred years of its existence, had justice done on less than ten thousand persons, it is scarcely possible that in the same period "tens of thousands" could have perished in South America, especially since the Indians, forming the mass of the population, were exempt from its rule because they were catechumens. The principal sufferers were the Portuguese Jews, who pretended Christianity and who, while observing Christian practices to be seen of all men, in secret worshiped after the Jewish manner. Of course, it should be remembered that the Spaniard had no love for the Portuguese, so in any case they were victims elect, either on the ground of recantation or of treason. But, even so, the number that were tried by the tribunal did not exceed hundreds, and those executed did not pass the tens.

Of course, the missionary element is to be congratulated on its champion, Fray Mocho, one of many sheets published in Latin countries, so low and vile in its alleged humor that no clean-minded man, Catholic or Protestant, and especially no priest or decent missionary, will befoul himself by so much as looking at it. Other missionaries do not understand that the reason such vile sheets support them is because they believe that, by introducing dissension into the Christian camp, the ranks of the believers will be thrown into confusion and the infidels will therefore be the more easily able to overcome them. In fact, I have read the substance of this very statement in Spanish-American newspapers of the Liberal stripe. One Costa Rican Liberal paper put it in much these words:

> We welcome these Protestant missionaries to work among us, not that they are any more truthful than the lying priests and friars, but because their preaching will confuse the minds of the illiterate, thus making it easier for Liberal teachings to overcome the superstitions of these ignorant religionists. In fact, Protestant missionaries and Catholic priests are all wolves of the one pack, and they make their living by playing on the ignorant fears of the multitude which both equally deceive.

This is the way unbelievers regard Protestant missionary effort. An acquaintance, commenting on certain activities in Puerto Rico, after the Americans took possession, said about them:

> Of course, the Protestant missionaries will make no impression on intelligent men, who scorn all these superstitions; nor will they make any converts among sincere Catholics. They may gain some converts from among those who think they are going to get something out of it or else curry favor with the Americans; or they will wheedle and trick some children, but no man of sense will listen to them.

The Latin unbeliever has the Latin acuteness of mind and, to him, to deny and reject some things and to hold and accept others, which can be rejected by the same line of reasoning, seems a ridiculous absurdity. What I say above reflects the opinion of this element, my information being derived from the reading, over a considerable period of time, of some eighty or so newspapers from all over the Americas south of the Rio Grande, newspapers of all shades of opinion and belief and representing many aspects of political and social thought.

My own knowledge of Protestant missions in South America relates principally to Peru, where their activities have resulted in a number of unpleasantnesses. The case of a Bible society agent in Peru, some years ago, is typical. This man, as is usual with his tribe, instead of going into the unexplored headwaters of the affluents of the Amazon, in the Peruvian Montana, among the naked, wandering semi-cannibal Indians, stayed in Callao, the gateway to Lima, and distributed his Bibles and his talk. At that time it was unlawful to practise openly any other than the Catholic religion but, as a matter of fact, Protestants openly had their services and their chapel, without any interference. This missionary had his chapel and his preachings; books were sent to him nearly every month and, although he was breaking the law, he was permitted to carry on his activities of insult and attack. At length he grew so bold that his ignorant hearers began to get riotous and, in fact, there was some trouble. Here the authorities stepped in and arrested him. He appealed to the American Minister, who replied he could do nothing further than secure him a proper trial, inasmuch as he had broken the law. This did not suit him, and as he was of Italian birth (and one of those shining converts from Catholicism), he appealed to the Italian Minister, who in substance said to him that since he had renounced his allegiance to Italy, it was a rather cool proceeding to appeal to that country as soon as he was in trouble. To make a long story short, he had to stand trial and, pending a disposition of his case, he was incarcerated in one of the casemates in Callao Castle for eight months. Some newspapers here made a fuss about an American citizen languishing in a South American dungeon, but it had little effect, as it was shown that the dungeon was a large and comfortable room, used ordinarily as a place of confinement for political prisoners, and that the prisoner could enjoy the company of his friends. The trial resulted in a Scotch verdict, practically, as, while the court held he had violated the law, his detention pending trial was considered punishment enough. He was accordingly released and, so far as I know, he is there still, convenient to all the comforts of civilization, to which he would be a stranger if he followed in the footsteps of the Franciscans and went into the wilderness to bring souls to God.

Another commentary on educational conditions in Latin America is this: A couple of days ago I received a publication from Bogotá, the capital of Colombia. Be it known that the Colombians are without doubt a very religious people and, as is well known to students of literature, a highly-cultured people. They are overwhelmingly ardent Catholics. Of course, under this religious condition, these people are, according to the argôt of the would-be uplifters, in a state of dense ignorance, uncivilized, backward, owing to the obscurantist character of the debased religion that oppresses them. The journal I have before me is called the Bulletin of the Natural Science Society of the La Salle Institute. It was founded two years ago, by Rev. Brother Apolinar Maria, and is published in Bogotá. Its motto is, of course, an unscientific abomination. It reads: Magna et mirabilia sunt opera tua, Domine Deus omnipotens. The Society has a roster of eighty-seven names, of which two are benefactors, these being the President of Colombia and the Minister of Government; there are three donors and five honorary members, three of the latter being Colombians, two of them ex-Ministers of Education and one the Director of the National Museum. Of the seventy-seven regular members, seven are Brothers of the Christian Schools and one a priest. The second volume contained 304 pages, which carried thirty-five articles on various phases of science, including anthropology, botany, zoology, etc., with ten plates. It gave a list of new species of Colombian plants and animals recently described, some in this publication and others elsewhere, to the number of 148. It also gives a resumé of the collections of the La Salle Institute, which number 54,466 specimens of natural objects, including over 23,000 insects, 418 vertebrates, over 4,300 molluscs, nearly 6,900 botanical specimens, nearly 15,000 mineral and geological specimens, besides some anthropological material and birds' nests and eggs. This is an inland city, difficult of access, among a people whom our hypercivilized are wont to consider poor ignoramuses; the work described is under the auspices of a Catholic Order. I do not think it is necessary to comment further on this, except to say that a very prominent Academy of Sciences in the greatest of our cities—a world capital, a city in which there are two of our greatest and largest Universities, besides an imposing City College, some half dozen high schools with large teaching staffs, and which besides draws on a contiguous territory containing about five million people—a scientific body established in 1817, and which therefore has an existence of nearly a century, has only 476 members on its rolls after this long existence.

Some might think, perhaps, that I am obsessed with the greatness of my own people and, therefore, a little blind to their faults, to put it mildly and without exaggeration. As a matter of fact, my grandfather came of a long line of Long Island Quakers and, so far as descent goes, I can hold my own with the most American of Americans. But it makes me warm to read all these attacks on peoples who for real culture, warm hospitality and true Christianity, can, and do, set an example to their would-be evangelizers who, after all, more often than not sow the seeds of discord and engender anything but a Christian spirit in their converts.

J. R. DE LA TORRE BUENO.

White Plains.

A "Sanely Sensational" Catholic Daily

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I would like to have a talk with Mr. MacDermot's Catholic millionaire who says he is ready to finance a Catholic daily at any time, if he can get ten bishops to back him up. I would say to him: Call on the Cardinal or the Archbishop, as the case may be, of any one of our very large cities, and propose the following plan to him: I will finance and operate a Catholic daily for you if you will get for me the active support of all your clergy and of all the Catholic organizations—Knights of Columbus, Ancient Order of Hibernians, Central Verein, St. Vincent de Paul Society, sodalities, Catholic colleges and schools—in your diocese. If you can obtain the support of your suffragan bishops for the same, so much the better. I will organize a stock company in which I will hold the controlling number of shares. I will get as many of your clergy, of the Knights of Columbus, etc., and as many business and professional men as possible to take one or more shares of stock and thus become interested in the success of the enterprise. A discount from the regular advertising rates will, if necessary, be offered to stockholders.

The paper will be independent in politics. One-half of the editorial page will contain the views of the editor. In this we will strive to reach and maintain the high standard set by the editorials in our great Catholic weekly, AMERICA. The other half of this page will be assigned to capable representatives of the great political parties. This is essential, for the great body of Americans, Catholic and non-Catholic, are strongly partisan in politics.

This Catholic daily—we won't call it that—will be "sanely sensational"; nothing short of that can possibly succeed till the tastes of the people change. It will contain all the news which our respectable dailies print, but will strike out whatever is subversive of morality. In short, whatever is innocent and attractive in our best dailies, pictorial section, comic section, pink or green sheet, etc., will find a place in our daily. "One issue per day, extras later," will be our slogan till we get well under way. The price must be the same as that of the regular dailies. Failure is inevitable for the Catholic daily which charges more than its competitors are charging. Besides being sold in the ordinary way at newsstands and by newsboys, we will, by your leave, sell it at the doors of all Catholic churches throughout the city.

Mr. Catholic Millionaire, if you get the backing above referred to, I don't see how, under competent management, your Catholic daily could fail to succeed. What daily paper in the country has such backing? Of course you could not and would not count on perfect cooperation from all the sources indicated, but not all of that would be necessary to insure success. If Christian Scientists and Jews, neither of whom have anywhere near our numbers, have their dailies, why is the same impossible or impracticable for Catholics? A good story is told of two men who were trying to carry a long beam crosswise through a narrow gate. They were about to give it up as impossible, when a sparrow came sailing along that way with a long straw held lengthwise in its beak and flew lightly between the palings of the fence. "That's a bright idea," said the men as they turned the beam lengthwise and passed through the gate. Catholics need some one to show them how to get the Catholic daily through the difficulties real and apparent which lie in its pathway, and I believe you're the man to show them the way.

St. Louis. F. J.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In the matter of Catholic daily papers, would it not be helpful if each writer would first make clear his own conception of that much-discussed object? "What d'ye mean Catholic daily?" a seven-fold acceleration of AMERICA, or a "Yellow" minus the vileness but with some of the sensationalism retained? If he must choose between these extremes, the present writer would, contrary to his personal inclination, unhesitatingly choose the "expurgated Yellow." Why? Because of what seems to him to be the second point of the discussion, viz., the very need of a Catholic daily paper. This, in his mind, resembles the necessity of avoiding poisonous food and of securing pure food. Give people a clean paper, but one which they will buy because they like to read it. Offer it to all the world, not to Catholics only; all need it. It is the part of worldly wisdom to offer the market what the market will take readily, not what they must "learn to like." But, it is objected, such a paper would be very undignified; it would involve a lowering of the standard; the hierarchy would never approve it. Well, it is exceedingly doubtful if the hierarchy would put its Imprimatur even upon an "accelerated AMERICA" let alone an "expurgated Yellow." As a business venture, being entirely a layman's undertaking, the paper should be entirely free. Would it not suffice if our good bishops, being in nowise responsible for the contents of the daily, found in it nothing contrary to faith or morals but did find therein an honest effort to sterilize the actual evil of every-day life? It is my belief that they would give to such a paper the same smile of approval which they give the devout layman while wisely withholding their spoken praise. It is objected, too, that such a paper could not be called Catholic; that it would offer a merely negative solution of the problem. Most of the Commandments are negative, yet they are essentials of Catholic life; but what is to prevent a little positive Catholicism even as a regular feature? The "Yellows" occasionally print a Catholic retreat or mission sermon and "Billy" Sunday is a daily infliction. It is also objected that Catholics do not desire sermons every day. But why should a Catholic who is not affronted by the daily sermons of one who is not sent balk at the authorized word of God?

Will not some one who knows the advertising game throw some definite light on the advertising revenues of a metropolitan daily and Sunday paper of about 100,000 circulation? Therein is the crux of the whole question. Clean dailies would enjoy a large circulation, not only among our 16,000,000 Catholics but among all kinds of non-Catholics, and circulation means advertising income. Courage and enterprise is lacking; it is a libel upon the "vast bulk of our people" to assert that they are too ill-educated to be interested in a respectable newspaper, or to imply that they would prefer to delve in the sewer for the news rather than to gather it in the open thoroughfare of clean journalism.

Boston. C. I. FITZGERALD.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Mr. George Carver's letter in regard to a Catholic daily, published in your issue of April 10, although evidently written in a kindly and helpful spirit, hardly does justice to a large portion of the Catholic laity. His question referring to AMERICA, "Is it read by the layman?" I think might be answered by another, "How many laymen have heard of it?" For my part, although I am not a college woman, and have for some time been forced to turn my energies to the commercial rather than the intellectual side of life, I must say that I eagerly look forward each week to the arrival of AMERICA and read it almost from cover to cover. It is not clear to me how any amount of money could "put it in the power of the editors to get and to give the best," for if what they give us is compared with the product of the high-class magazines of the country, which certainly do not suffer from financial embarrassment, it seems evident that AMERICA surely more than holds its own. In my mind, any benefit accruing from an increased circulation of AMERICA would be gained by the people who were fortunate enough to know of the paper and read it, rather than by this splendid weekly, whose editors do not appear to have waited for financial prosperity "to get and to give the best." I fully agree that what we need is to "push and popularize" AMERICA, but it seems that the perfecting of it is already well taken care of.

Los Angeles, Cal. S. D.

Prohibition.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have followed with much interest the discussion relative to voluntary abstinence vs. legislative prohibition, and I have found occasion for wonderment at the promptitude with which certain eastern Catholics take up the cudgel in defence of John Barleycorn. The information (or misinformation) which these gentlemen exhibit with regard to conditions in far-off prohibition States is amazing indeed, and it is decidedly grating upon the nerves of persons who are really informed to read their nonsensical tirades against conditions prevailing in such States as Kansas. Kansas seems to be satisfied—others ought to be. Whether or not legislative prohibition is theoretically wrong, it is coming swift and sure. All the talk about prohibition conducing to a nation of drug fiends has been amply refuted by the new federal statute regulating the sale of habit-forming drugs. Men are not likely to become addicted to the use of cocaine if they can not get it. Personal liberty? Yes, prohibition interferes with personal liberty. There are fewer wife-beaters in dry than in wet territory according to statistics. Verily, man's rights have been encroached upon! But how about the rights of the women and children? John Barleycorn has been losing ground steadily. The Catholics of Kansas and Oklahoma do not want to see the saloons back again—I refer to the native-born American Catholics who reside here. Conditions are better under prohibition from every standpoint, and national prohibition will seal the doom of the Church's worst enemy—alcohol.

Henryetta, Okla. VICTOR MCKEE.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Have those who favor prohibition, particularly those who favor nation-wide prohibition, ever stopped to consider the question from every angle? They say we must discontinue the manufacture of intoxicating liquors to remedy the evils that result from the over-indulgence of the cup that cheers. Let us apply their arguments to another "evil":

Suppose a fanatic were to hold that the manufacture of automobiles ought to be prohibited by law because they are a grave menace to the country. Many people who can not well afford doing so purchase automobiles and consequently are unable to meet their butcher and grocer bills, thus causing creditors great distress. Other owners of automobiles kill and maim their fellow citizens by reckless driving. Then recall how many young people are brought to ruin through the agency of the automobile. Therefore these dangerous vehicles should not be manufactured.

Rochester, N. Y. I. F. RAUBER.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The discussion of prohibition in your columns should produce some results. Hitherto the opponents of prohibition merely dismiss the question by ridicule, but the issue has outgrown this means of suppression. The writer of this communication is not by any means a prohibitionist and has actively opposed every measure tending toward prohibition, but he realizes that Catholics must take some stand, with some definite measure, in order to stem the onward march of prohibition. In the Panama-Pacific International Exposition the greatest feature displayed in hundreds of different exhibits is prohibition. Wireless telegraphy and wireless telephones, gas and electric engines, phonographic reproductions and countless labor-saving devices attract attention, but prohibition intrudes itself at every turn. Prohibition is wrong, but what else is there to stem the tide of drunkenness? It is time that we Catholics should awaken to the possibility of having State and nation-wide prohibition. The pendulum swings between the extremes of drunkenness and prohibition. Can't the level-headed people of America regulate the swing of the pendulum so that it may not go to either extreme? We hear so much of regulation of the liquor question, but I have failed to see any measure other than granting license to the sellers of liquor. Not a single effective plan has been formulated to regulate the sale and use of liquor. Many of our people cry temperance; they might as well cry "wolf, wolf."

In several States prohibition has prohibited the importation of altar wines, and we hear spasmodic objections from press and pulpit. It would seem that we should realize the importance of the question of prohibition which is merely a wrong attempt to solve a great difficulty and arouse ourselves to provide a remedy for the evil which we must admit has developed with the free use of liquor. We can not allow the justice of prohibition, but what do we offer in place of the ever-rolling waves of "dry" which will engulf the whole country? We must not take our stand by the side of the whiskey seller; if we do we are doomed to defeat. The right thinking people of America will not uphold us if we are found in bad company. Whiskey must be curtailed. Now, then, how are we Catholics to act? On one side there are fanatics, on the other, in many cases, law breakers.

San Francisco. SILAS WENTWORTH.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Your paper is to be congratulated on its frank and fearless statements in regard to prohibition; especially so, because in the mind of the prohibitionists, to arrange oneself against the "cause" is to declare an alliance with the opposite interests. The prohibitionist continually refuses to see the stubborn fact that legislation alone can never make for morality. The Catholic Church is, after all, the only successful advocate of temperance. If Protestantism could exercise the strong hold on its people that it perhaps once did, there would be no need of such drastic measures as prohibition. The Catholic priest in the confessional can accomplish more for temperance than all the laws in the land.

Let me quote part of a statement made by Inspector Richard H. P. Matthews, head of the criminal investigating department of the Liverpool police, who was recently in Washington:

> The mistake made in this country by those seeking to bring about reforms lies in the belief that morals can be corrected by legislation. The largest personal liberty consistent with the safety of society makes for a better community. Take away the liberties of the people and you encourage violation of the law. . . . It is recognized that it is unwise and impossible to keep men from drinking, but it is wise and possible so to regulate the sale and consumption of intoxicants that there will be a minimum of evil resulting. It is for this reason that a woman is permitted the same liberty of entering a public house in England and having her glass of ale or other drink. Indeed there is very little drunkenness in England. The thing to be desired to make the race better is not prohibition, but education that will teach the people that which is good for them and that which is not.

Baltimore. J. F. W.

Dowson's Conversion

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The controversy about Ernest Dowson, his friends and enemies, bids fair to become a considerable literature. Mr. Joyce Kilmer's contribution to it, in your issue for April 17, is pleasant reading, except that I am afraid he is unintentionally belittling Mr. Victor Plarr's book, for Mr. Kilmer found in it a sneer about Dowson's conversion. I believe Dowson's faith was true, but I think Mr. Plarr was sincere in stating things as they seemed to him. He qualifies what he says in that way. We must remember that Mr. Plarr is not a Catholic; how can he be in perfect sympathy, then, with a convert to the Faith? But he does avow respect for sincere Catholics, and regretted only what seemed to him a short-lived conversion. To me there is plentiful evidence in Dowson's writings, both prose and verse, of his love for the Catholic Faith I am glad to have my copy of Mr. Plarr's little memoir, for it seems the most human and loveable picture of Dowson I have found anywhere.

Grand Rapids, Mich. A. K. GIBSON.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Mr. Joyce Kilmer, in his excellent review of Ernest Dowson, has, I am inclined to think, hardly done justice to Victor Plarr in accusing him of sneering at Dowson's conversion to the Catholic religion. Temperamentally both these persons, Ernest Dowson and Victor Plarr, were poles apart. The very scanty details of the life of Dowson show that he was blessed—or cursed—with what is generally known as a "temperament," with the inevitable result that he was more or less of a poseur. Mr. Plarr, on the other hand (whether he is an Englishman or not I do not know), appears to possess a great deal of British stolidity, and it is quite possible that, to him, Dowson's conversion was a more or less superficial affair. His attitude appears to show impatience rather than contempt; an impatience with what must have seemed but another phase in the somewhat erratic moods of the poet, and the misunderstanding is not one that is confined to Ernest Dowson and his biographer alone.

New York. H. C. WATTS.

"E. C.'s" Inconsistency with Regard to Russia

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In answer to your correspondent E. A. W., who accuses me of inconsistency with regard to Russia, and asks is he to believe E. C. or E. C., I hasten to advise him to believe E. C. and E. C. all the time, for E. C. will never be written below a plea for Turks or tyranny.

That I have criticized Russian autocracy is true; that I have lauded Russian democracy equally so. What I wrote of past Romanoff rule I maintain; what I wrote of the Russian peasant soldier I likewise maintain. The two are not identical, in spite of E. A. W's endeavor to fuse them, so as to prove discrepancies in my statements. They are separate, different and opposed. One stands for despotism and one for meekness.

Not that I would for a moment deny that the course of the present war has modified my sentiments toward political Russia. There have been such alterations in the desirable direction that I rejoice to meet them, and in this I have goodly company: the majority of the great Polish nation to whom Russia at last offers justice with no niggard hand.

I am very honored at being quoted as a contributor to the "Catholic Encyclopedia," but must disclaim any part in the compilation of Russian criminal statistics and deductions therefrom. The protest against Russia's advance in Persia and England's tolerance of the same was excusable in one who did not foresee Prussia's advance in Belgium and Austria's (planned) advance in Serbia. More important opinions than those of E. C. or of E. A. W. have veered during the last twelvemonth and may veer again. Russia, annihilator of the Kurd butchers in Armenia, would be to me glorious Russia; while America, ally of the Sultan, would lose my allegiance.

Surely in affairs of this kind there is no permanent "objective truth." Mutable man is concerned. The despot of yesterday may be the liberator of to-morrow. Objective truths are applicable to principles not to nations. Constancy does not mean clinging to one notion about an individual or a people, but rather following the same ideals wherever they flourish or develop. Should Austria, instead of joining with the ancient foe of Christendom, throw in her lot even now with the Balkan Slavs and start to rout the Crescent and restore the Cross in Southeast Europe I would be the first to cry: Hail, Austria! Meantime I shall continue to admire virtue wherever it is found, whether in the zeal of E. A. W. or the abnegation of the Russian peasant.

London. E. CHRISTITCH.

Y. M. C. A.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

My letter resenting the impeachment of Mr. McCloskey's faith has provoked sufficient epistolary evidence from Messrs. Hume, Jones and Ryan to disqualify them as casuists. Their sound and thoroughly Catholic sentiment is not proof against false and exaggerated reasoning. Nor does it assure their methods of any immunity from error. Mr. Hume's statement that any affiliation with the Y. M. C. A. is prohibited to Catholics by the natural and divine positive law is an exaggeration. If true, it would banish the associate members into the exterior darkness of heresy. Mr. Jones appropriates Mr. Hume's categorization and bases his five alleged fallacies on its correctness. By his final admission that confessors may permit individual penitents to join the Y. M. C. A. he rejects Mr. Hume's erroneous classification and demolishes the basis of all his previous argumentation. A priest could not sanction a penitent's affiliation with the Y. M. C. A. if it involved the apostasy of entrance into a Masonic order; or the repudiation of faith demanded of the recipients of Protestant supplies in the famine days; or the open defiance of Synodal decrees such as forbade matriculation at Oxford or Cambridge. Mr. Ryan correctly interprets universal Catholic opposition to the Y. M. C. A. as a certain sign of the organization's ungodliness. He errs in presuming a similarly universal acceptance of the unreal and exaggerated form in which an attempt has been made to crystallize that opposition.

Only confusion can result from identifying complete incorporation in a heretical society and the limited affiliation with a gymnastic or educational department of an organization with the manifold activities of the Y. M. C. A. Active membership in a Protestant sect requires the express denial of some or all doctrines of the Church and participation in false religious services. The prescribed and customary affiliation of Catholics with the Y. M. C. A. in some utterly non-religious department involves no abandonment of faith and is compatible with pronounced opposition to every Y. M. C. A. religious activity. The argument that associate membership constitutes a proximate danger to faith is often defeatful of its purpose. Young men whose experience belies its truth conclude that their parents and instructors have been misinformed and are apt to consider all other opposing reasons as manifestations of the same misconception.

Perhaps the failure to arrest the increasing enrolment of Catholics has been due to the overstatement and exaggeration of the opposition. On this as on all questions Catholic sentiment is sound. And there is no doubt that it is overwhelmingly against our young men affiliating with the Y. M. C. A. It can not rest validly on any assumed or constructive perversion of faith or on a proximate danger that is not necessarily incurred. The constitution of the organization and the deeds of its officials and active members furnish a complete and thorough vindication of the Catholic attitude.

Drawn with a skill that the Jesuit of fiction might envy, the Association's constitution appeals to evangelical bigotry for the support of its proselyting; to Protestant sincerity for uplifting the morals of young men; and to Catholic, Jew and Buddhist by offering physical and material advantages. It delineates an organism with as many heads, as capacious a belly, as sturdy legs, as stinging a tail as the Cerberus of the ancients. To the religious indifferents of moderate means and epicurean tastes the Association appears a very good and a very cheap boarding and lodging house. To the frenzied and fanatical bigot it shows its proselyting head with its wolfish, menacing teeth. To the Catholic, Jew and pagan it presents only its gymnastic and athletic aspect. To the bigot's query why Catholics are not excluded, the constitutional experts would reply that their annual dues are material support, and their enrolment a most useful moral help to the organization's proselyters among poorer Catholics. To the Catholic, reluctant to join, the same experts would give assurance of the respect and consideration always to be accorded to his faith. Thus irreconcilables are reconciled, opposites united, and the antipodes of faith and principle and ideals are welded into a living organism, monstrous, it is true, but powerful and apparently long-lived. Standing securely on its four legs of education, moral uplift, social enjoyment and physical exercise; its belly the common recipient of the bigot's gold, the associate member's modest dues, the often princely contribution of the humanitarian, the boarders' and lodgers' fees, the beast grows fat and wags violently its serpent's tail of the Bible only. It is no honor to the humanitarian, no credit to the epicure, no cause of self-congratulation to the Catholic to be associated with bigots and hypocrites in feeding and thus prolonging the life of such a monster.

The deeds of the officials and active members who constitute an esoteric circle are more easily analyzed. Purporting to spread Christianity, the Association is actively engaged in subverting Catholicism. The religious voice of its officials is silent or respectful in the presence of Catholic members. It is audible and offensive enough at the meetings of the Bible circles. It gains a surprising vibrancy and volume in the mission rooms, where the Catholic children of poor aliens are enticed by promises of food, clothing and instruction. The change of voice is the outward expression of a hypocritical mental change. The Catholic religion is eminently respectable in the business office, the swimming pool, and in all athletic and public departments. In the inner sanctum, where the Bible classes meet, the Catholic Church becomes a purely human institution modeled on the old Roman governmental system and evolved from the fusion of pagan rites and Christian superstition. It is a perversion of the Gospel purity, forced upon ignorant credulity by a tyrannous priesthood. In the mission stations of the city's poorest sections, where there is no fear of financial reprisal from indignant associate members and no danger of physical assault from the half-starved children who compose the audience, the Church is an abomination, the harlot of the Apocalypse, the cause of all the world's physical and moral ills. Its most sacred traditions, its holiest sacraments, the Mass, Confession, Holy Communion, loyalty to Pope and bishop are misrepresented and maligned and held up to the scorn and ridicule of Catholic children.

The Association maintains a training school for the development of its future workers, where the triple-voice tones are cultivated and the more insidious and contemptible triple attitude toward Catholicity is instilled and mastered. From the graduates are recruited the secretaries of the home banches, the slum and trans-Atlantic liners' proselyters, and the missionaries for association work in foreign countries. The most promising subjects are reserved for home associations, whose large Catholic membership calls for the most diplomatic handling. The less sly and more blatant are sent to the aid of the associations in foreign countries, where there is not the same need of masking the religious character and more demand for less subtle and more violent agitation. By virtue of its international alliance and the actual training of foreign missionaries, the Association in the United States directly participates and cooperates in the vile slanders of Pope and Church which are periodically reported from Rome, the Philippines and South America. In European Catholic countries the Association's workers are in close and active accord with any and all anti-Catholic agitators, be they socialists, liberals or atheists.

The Y. M. C. A. gives unmistakable indication of its bitter anti-Catholic animus by its fundamental religious doctrine that the Bible only is the rule of faith, by its unprincipled proselyting among our Catholic poor, its slanderous insults of our Sovereign Pontiff in Rome and its constant and consistent alignment against Catholic forces in foreign countries. Our young men who affiliate themselves with this triple-headed organization are not perverts, nor are they always and necessarily in danger of losing their faith. But they don't belong in such a heterogeneous religious gang. They are unrecognizable in such a company of religious indifferents, bigots, hypocrites and sincere but mistaken believers. They can have no sympathy with the spirit and purpose of the Association's mongrel constitution, no respect for the unprincipled tactics of its officials and workers. Their affiliation with an educational or athletic department unfortunately but necessarily gives some degree of countenance and recognition to its objectionable Cerberean constitution, and includes some measure of material support and consequently of cooperation in the wicked and slanderous campaign against their Church which the Y. M. C. A. is constantly waging. In the light of these facts there is no reason to have recourse to speculation or exaggeration to sustain Catholic sentiment against our young men joining the Y. M. C. A.

Baltimore, Md. J. A. FARRELL.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have been very much interested of late, as a Catholic and a member of the Association, by the controversy in your review concerning the Y. M. C. A. Mr. McCloskey's letter has certainly given rise to a storm of criticism. From an outsider's point of view, some of this might perhaps be regarded as not unamusing. The officials of the Y. M. C. A. will scarcely neglect the rare opportunity, the pointing out the sour grapes, for they are there, indeed, unmistakably evident.

To speak of the insidious atmosphere of the Y. M. C. A. is frankly absurd to any one at all familiar with the place. (I have Central Branch in mind.) One ranks the statement at once as a matter of incorrect information. We hear of the proselyting influence, the danger of loss of faith and an armory of other evils which, as far as my personal experience goes, are quite without foundation. True there are services on Sunday and, I believe, other religious exercises; it is, however, incumbent on no one to attend them should one not so wish, and as for discussions on religious matters among the members themselves, I agree with Mr. McCloskey. So far I have seen nothing of it. The atmosphere of the place strikes me as distinctly and briskly businesslike, not without a certain club-like spirit. I personally go there to swim and meet other fellows of kindred tastes.

The young man who would endanger his faith by an environment such as is existent at Central must be indeed of the most tepid variety of a lukewarm Catholic. The contention that the Y. M. C. A. atmosphere is impregnated with the spirit of Protestantism and that proselyting is rampant is fallacious. It is emphatically not so. Doubtless it is theoretically wrong for a Catholic to become a member of a non-Catholic organization. The fine points of the argument I leave to those versed in such matters. We are concerned with the fact of main interest, namely, the impossibility of enjoying physical training elsewhere than at the Y. M. C. A. and the not-to-be-exaggerated importance of such training to every young man. There is, indeed, a lot to be said for this phase of what some will, no doubt, term the essentially pagan point of view, the fuller realization of the joy of youth, with its boyishness and riot of color and motion, the very uttermost grasping and enjoyment of youth's licit pleasures. Age comes upon us but too soon with its disillusions and resultant descent into the grays and drabs of existence. Mr. Jones' phrase, "the cost of being Catholic," is reminiscent of Puritanism and the State. It savors of a perching of oneself on the, in this case, quite futile pedestal of self-sacrifice. That one can be a good Catholic, without taint of disloyalty, and yet be a member of the Y. M. C. A., using and paying for its conveniences, is not to be doubted for a moment. Indeed, under existing conditions, it is the only course open to the fellow who feels the need of and delights in violent exercise. This surely should be apparent to all of an unprejudiced and open frame of mind.

Philadelphia. A. ROMANO.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It is undoubtedly true that the Y. M. C. A. is attracting too many of our young men, with the consequence that there are numerous defections from the Church. The evil is a crying one. Why doesn't the Church remedy it? Unless we supply the deficiency, our young men, needing as they do both sports and exercise, will seek them where they can be obtained.

An addition could easily be built to our new Catholic schools, or at least included in the plans for future schools, consisting of a gymnasium and a billiard and reading room. Many of our churches could afford a club house. At present it is necessary to hire lodge rooms for society meetings, and ballrooms for dances and euchres. A club house would save the expense of all this and give our young men a place to spend their spare time without danger to their Faith. The same need is felt of Catholic libraries. Many churches have them, but owing to lack of room, the books have not the circulation they ought to have. If each parish library had a room or two that would be open every afternoon and evening, more of our Catholics would use it instead of the public library. To keep our Catholics close to the Church we ought to give them what they can now obtain only outside the Church.

New York. AN INTERESTED READER.

Judas and Salvation

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Father Coppens, in answering J. C. H. in your issue of April 10, states that "He (God) has told us clearly, in equivalent terms, that Judas was eternally lost after a number of mortal sins. . . ." I do not presume to enter into controversy with the learned Father Coppens, but I am desirous of seeking further information. I heard a very distinguished theologian, the Rev. Pietro Rossi, C.M., professor of theology at the Collegio Brignole Sale, Genoa, Italy, say that the Church had never declared any individual to be in hell, not even Judas. As a proof to the contrary, he cited a decree of one of the Sacred Congregations permitting Masses to be celebrated for the repose of the soul of Judas.

Trenton, N. J. E. C. G.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, MAY 1, 1915

Entered as second-class matter, April 15, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Contributions for the Mexican fund may be sent direct to AMERICA.

Howells and the Jesuits

CALUMNY dies hard; sometimes it does not die at all. That which is hurled against Jesuits is immortal; it is too smart, too popular, too profitable to be allowed to die; it will live. There will always be country preachers to tickle ignorant ears with gossip, unfit for polite company, about the Jesuits; there will be panders to passion who will bind tales of sordid love and Jesuit intrigue between yellow covers, for the delectation of languid youths and gum-chewing dames. Then, too, the world will never be without its "Helbeck of Bannisdale," its "Wandering Jew," its "Italian Notes," and, shall we say it? its William Dean Howells. It has been said;—and with reason, as the following letters will show:

MR. W. D. HOWELLS, March 13, 1915.
Care of North American Review,
Franklin Square, New York City.

DEAR SIR: In your article, "The Plays of Eugène Brieux," in the current issue of the North American Review, there occurs the following sentence:

> I can not make out that there is any straining for effect, any lying, even in a good cause, or for the purpose of enforcing a principle; there is no doing evil that good may come, in him: and as far as one may safely say he is not a Jesuit, not that I think Jesuits are invariably and altogether bad. (Italics inserted.)

As a Jesuit I wish to protest most emphatically against your stricture on the Order to which I have the honor to belong. Your statement is not only untrue, it is unworthy of a man with pretension to scholarship and courtesy to others. It is a sad thing indeed, to find a man of your literary ability flinging a hideous charge into the faces of men quite as honorable as you, and apparently more careful than you of the reputation of others.

This, sir, is my protest against your unwarranted insult, but protest is not the sole reason of this letter. You have made an accusation, surely you should be willing to offer evidence for it: such is the part of an honest scholar. I invite you to submit to me, a Jesuit, passages, or even references to passages, wherein Jesuits teach:

1. That lying may be done in a good cause, or for the purpose of enforcing a principle, and
2. That evil may be done so that good may come of it.

I am, sir,
Respectfully, etc.,
R. H. TIERNEY, S.J.
Editor of AMERICA.

Mr. Howells did not deign to answer. He made a serious charge; he was challenged for proof; he remained silent. This second letter was sent him:

MR. WILLIAM DEAN HOWELLS, April 15, 1915.
130 West 57th Street,
New York City.

DEAR SIR: Some time since I wrote you relative to certain remarks that you made in the March North American Review about Jesuit morality.

As your charges are serious I am writing once again to invite you to make good your assertions, either by authentic citations, or by reference to the books in which Jesuits teach the doctrines you attribute to them.

I am, sir,
Respectfully, etc.,
R. H. TIERNEY, S.J.,
Editor of AMERICA.

Mr. Howells is still silent, a piteous spectacle of a man who, when caught in an attempt to put the stigma of infamy upon the brow of honorable folk, takes to cover and remains there. His darkness is his; may he enjoy it! The explanation of his conduct may be found in his own words: "A man, especially a dramatic author, ought not to be too honest; he unfits himself to comfort the tired business man."

The incident is closed, unless Mr. Howells cares or dares to reopen it.

"Save Us, We Perish"

THERE is a more or less prevalent impression that the disastrous effects of the war are confined to the belligerent countries, and to those neutral nations whose commerce has been seriously interrupted. The tendency to restrict the losses to material conditions is emphasized by the stress which is constantly placed on the necessity for contributions to alleviate physical suffering. Meanwhile the spiritual effects of the war are felt in a very acute way in the Catholic Foreign Missions. From South America, Japan, China, India, Africa, the Philippines, Oceanica, and from almost every quarter of the globe where there are missionaries, letters are pouring into the offices of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith, with heartrending accounts of the calamitous consequences of the European struggle which the missions are experiencing. The work of saving souls is seriously hampered by lack of funds. Many a good work has come, through want of assistance, to a standstill, and souls that might have been saved are left in the darkness of superstition and sin. It seems a dreadful thing that those for whom Christ died should never hear of His Gospel or receive the saving grace of His Precious Blood, merely for the lack of silver and gold. Yet such is the fact. The countries from which the Foreign Missions received their principal support are utterly powerless to continue their benefactions, and the result is that once flourishing missions are languishing, and are in danger of failing altogether.

The Catholics of the United States, therefore, who have always shown themselves generous, should make a vigorous effort to redouble their contributions, and to support, as far as they can, until the end of the war, a part of the burden which their European brethren have stories above the basement, on the superstructure of "freedom of thought," "progress," "modern conditions," and a host of other props. There is, of course, always the possibility of the borrower failing to comprehend the proper use of that which he borrows, and the ten thousand pilgrims of Mount Rubidoux, as they greeted the rising sun with the Catholic Our Father and a recitative from the Catholic Scripture, may have fancied that Pater noster qui es in cœlis had some intimate connection with Dr. Van Dyke's "God of the Open Air," which, while certainly fundamental, is scarcely creedless.

Annihilation or Immortality?

A CORRESPONDENT of the New York Sun writes to say, that for twenty-two years, he has thought, studied, prayed, and "even curiously followed those distinguished scientists" who believe that they have presented irrefutable evidence of man's survival in another world. "But now," he adds, "to-day I am finished. Within me lives the unalterable conviction that death ends all. Yet there remains the horror of annihilation. I had rather go to hell. Why is this?" Thus ends the communication of one who signs himself "Puzzled."

There is a world of sadness in that "Why is this?" "Puzzled" writes his present conviction that man's existence is as fleeting as the vagrant breeze of spring, as a little smoke that lingers in the sky and is gone, as a glorious sunset that darkens into a starless night. He has traveled a long road through thought, prayer and doubt, but he has not, as he thinks, reached an "unalterable conclusion that death ends all." He has but reached a "horror of annihilation." Beyond the expressed conviction of his intellect is another conviction that God did not make him to destroy him utterly. From this conviction, present though unrecognized, does his horror of annihilation rise. So rooted is it in his very nature, that he yearns to be, longs to be, even if existence be bought at the price of hell.

Melius est esse quam non esse, the medieval schoolman argued. To be is better than not to be. In the pages of a twentieth century newspaper, "Puzzled" reechoes the axiom of the schools, the conclusion of Plato and Aristotle and Cicero, the hope that was laid up in the bosom of the Gentile who dwelt in the land of Hus, the cry of the poet:

> Thou wilt not leave us in the dust;
> Thou madest man, he knows not why,
> He thinks he was not made to die;
> And thou hast made him; thou art just.

A desire so universal, a conviction so deeply graven in the heart of man, throughout the ages, can not be frustrated. The very horror of annihilation in the soul of "Puzzled" finds its cause in his participation of mankind's general conviction that the soul is immortal. Merely to cease to be is not in itself painful. But it is unnatural. The consent of mankind so designates the passing from human existence into non-existence. Poetic fancy, not truth, pillows the dreamless head o'er which rose-petals fall unnoted. There is no annihilation. What is, shall be. When "Puzzled" records his horror of annihilation he but restates the moral argument for the immortality of the soul.

Pantaloon and Slapstick Legislation

MR. JONES must have thought deeply, ere he introduced into the New York Senate, "An Act entitled an Act to amend the education law in relation to compulsory teaching and study of moral hygiene in the public schools." Mr. Jones has drafted, not a Bill, but a small treatise on education, and a very silly one. He tells the teacher what she is to teach and how she is to teach it, delivering himself, ever and anon, of sapient reflections on the philosophy of pedagogy, science, morality, and of human life in its larger and more general aspects.

According to the provisions of the proposed law, essays on moral hygiene are to be written by the children. These are to be read aloud in class on the following day, and "discussed at length, thus," philosophizes Mr. Jones, "concentrating thought on the subject, by this reasoning process of mind, this self-analysis, indicative to the teacher's mind of the state or status of the child's mind, as expressed for correction or disapproval." Apparently, these essays are likewise to be exacted from the teetering tots in the kindergarten; for while it is ordained that they are to "receive such instruction more or less continuously" (poor dears!) no provision expressly exempts them from the fatiguing labors of the pen. However, the natural law would, of course, excuse from authorship such children as can not write, and from the "lengthy discussion" of "questions of right and wrong," the smaller pupils of limited vocabulary and indistinct enunciation.

Nor does this marvelous law lack an appropriate and effective sanction. Failure on part of the teacher "to rightly interpret the thought of or to faithfully comply (there goes another infinitive!) with the law . . . shall be regarded as an evidence of incompetency to teach, or as being unfitted to instruct children," and her resignation shall be required forthwith. Should any provision of the law be violated "in any school district of the State, or by any officer, person or body," everybody's pay, it would seem, ceases in the said district. It thus appears that the offending teacher shall first be required to resign, and should this remedy prove ineffective against her iniquity, be deprived of her pay. In this case, however, the superintendent and the janitor, in consequence of not being obliged to resign, are expected to render their services gratis.

As a framer of laws, Mr. Jones is clearly entitled to the palm. Colorado, it is said, wisely requires all chickens to be on their roosts at 7 p. m., and all bulls using the public highways at night to carry lights. Nebraska forbids free lunches, and Kansas frowns on the use of cosmetics by the already fair sex. North Dakota ordains a uniform thickness for sleigh runners, while Minnesota secures to the hardworking lumberjack his inalienable and constitutional right to an individual bathtub. All these benighted commonwealths may now retire with blushes to the defeated rear. New York has outdone them all, or may, if the Committee on Public Education reports Mr. Jones' most extraordinary Bill favorably. It is the triumph of pantaloon and slapstick legislation.

Make-Ups

TEACHER, have you a boy who snarls out "Naw," instead of saying "No," who plunges his hands into his pockets, as though he was trying to dig a mine, who throws his chin out and his chest in, and who resents the correction of those and a number of other sad traits? He is an actor. He has put on that character before the audience of his block, and he is too cowardly to dare to be right. The gang will laugh if he drops his make-up. Experience in the classroom shows that a chief difficulty in all corrections is shame. The inventive ingenuity of man has devised many new and deadly explosives and many terrible engines for hurling them with dread accuracy, but all this destructive machinery has not yet attained to the fatal effectiveness of a laugh. Human respect is an army made up of the first-line troops of Satan, and its armament is a laugh. Your incorrigible pupil peers over his shoulder anxiously, cocks his ears fearfully; he shudders in anticipation of a volley of cachinations and refuses to be corrected.

A recent catalogue advertised grease-paint at twenty-five cents per stick in a cardboard tube, and gave a long list of make-ups it was prepared to supply. Among the first on the list were the following: pale juvenile, very pale juvenile, juvenile hero-flesh, juvenile deeper shade, juvenile robust, sallow young man. All the schools exemplify these make-ups, but the price for such character make-ups is more than twenty-five cents per stick. The pale juvenile with his collar turned up and his shoulders hunched; the very pale juvenile, bearing the tell-tale yellow stains, he of the shifty glances; the juvenile hero-flesh, who apes his elders in swagger and profanity; the juvenile deeper shade, who haunts the back alleys and dodges the truant-officer; the juvenile robust, bragging and bullying and keeping late hours and rapidly degenerating into the anemic flabbiness of the sallow young man, all these you have seen; but did you ever think that much of this was make-up, the stage traditions of some crowd, the little impersonations before the little audiences of youth? The boy goes out a plain, ordinary, healthy boy, and he comes back a pale juvenile, or very pale juvenile, or dons one of the other make-ups which mark his entrance upon a larger life, and is his passport with the gang.

Before you unmercifully berate the shame-faced lad who fears the laugh and dares not drop his make-up, take your own position before the glass and see whether you can behold there any make-ups at so many laughs a piece. You may find a faultlessly perfect exterior reflected to your gaze; no swagger or slouch or shiftiness there, but what of the mind and soul? Any pale or sallow, or robust, or hero-flesh, laid on thick there? Some of the popular intellectual make-ups of the day, all very cheap, are: agnostic pose, Christian Science affectation, irreligious braggadocio (given away with one work of Shaw's), evolutionary enlightenment, altitudinous thought and skeptic snobbery (won as a premium on graduating from Piffley), the higher-criticism strut and the blasé nonchalance of indifference.

"But I can never give up evolution," asserted a woman. "What fact, for example?" asked the priest. "What fact?"—There was a remover of make-up.—"What fact? Why, honestly, Father, I don't know of any, when I come to think of it." Her conversion followed. Evolution had been for her a bogey-man, a make-up which intellectual snobbery had smeared and sneered upon her soul. Evolution was like the fearsome polariscope which, according to a Texan politician, was threatening the farmers through the machinations of his wily opponent. "What is a polariscope?" asked his horrified audience. "You will know," replied the astute politician, "when you see your flocks of sheep laid low."

Are you a teacher in Israel, frightened into wearing a false-face upon your soul; have you a fear of the Jews? Well, come at any rate by night and learn how to be born again, at least, to the extent of doffing the mask which daytime cowardice has fitted upon you. Nicodemus, finally, through childlike humility and through courage, arrived for the burial of his Master.

LITERATURE

Lafcadio Hearn

WHAT was the matter with Lafcadio Hearn? No American has written prose more delicate and vividly beautiful than his, nor has any one else—not even Yone Noguchi—put into English so clear a revelation of Japan's soul. Yet after an hour with "Kwaidan" or "Glimpses of Unfamiliar Japan" the normal reader is wearied and, instead of being grateful to the erudite and skilful author, regards him with actual dislike.

Why is this? Is it because Hearn had a morbid fondness for the tragic, and loved to dwell on mental, physical and spiritual disease? This is partly the reason, yet De Quincey and Edgar Allan Poe inspire no such aversion. Is it because Hearn's style is too rich, exquisite and precious? Walter Pater had the same fault, but Walter Pater is read with delight by Hearn's enemies. Is it because of Hearn's ridiculous religious prejudices—his hatred for the Jesuits, for example? No, Hearn's hatred for the Jesuits is simply a bad little boy's impudence toward his schoolmaster. He had none of George Borrow's fiery, romantic passion against the "Man in Black." And Borrow's "Lavengro" and "Romany Rye" were loved even by so un-Protestant a writer as Lionel Johnson.

No, the reason lies deeper, and is simpler, than any of these. Hearn failed, not because he was precious, not because he was morbid, not because he was prejudiced, but because he had no imagination.

Lafcadio Hearn was, in the worst sense of the word, a realist. He had thoroughly the materialistic attitude toward life; he could see only the dull outside of things, not the indwelling splendor. An imaginative man would have delighted in his mixed Greek and Irish blood, would have realized that as a newspaperman he was a member of the most romantic profession the world has known, would have seen that New Orleans was no mean city. But Hearn was so prosaic and matter-of-fact that he saw only the forms and outlines of the things about him, and so sentimentally credu-lous that he believed that Japan contained greater wonders than Louisiana. Dr. George M. Gould, in his interesting but unpleasant work, "Concerning Lafcadio Hearn," blames many of his dead friend's faults on his defective vision. But Hearn's myopia was spiritual as well as physical: he could not see the soul.

What terrible results came from this spiritual myopia! Of course, its worst result was the unspeakable tragedy of Hearn's rejection of Christianity for that cruel burlesque on religion called Buddhism. But the minor results were many and dreadful . . . chief among them was the loss to the world of a great writer.

He might have been a great writer. A recently published book, "Fantastics and Other Fancies," proves this. It is a collection of Hearn's earliest writings, resurrected from the yellowed files of old New Orleans newspapers by Charles Woodward Hutson, and made into a beautiful volume by Houghton, Mifflin Co. The brief essays in this book are as charmingly phrased as anything this master of charming phrases ever wrote, and they are—unlike his later work—imaginative. That is, they are interpretations and idealizations of the things naturally familiar to Hearn. He had not yet committed the artistic heresy of confusing strangeness with beauty. He was not yet deluded into the belief that romance belonged exclusively to Nippon. He still was loyal to the traditions of his own civilization.

Hearn did not ruin himself as a writer by writing about Japan. He ruined himself by trying to be a Japanese. Now, one can write about Japan without being a Japanese, just as one can write about hell without being damned. But Hearn was not sufficiently imaginative to perceive this.

So he gave up European civilization for that of Japan. His Irish father's faith held all that was noble of his Greek mother's pagan tradition, but Hearn chose the novelties of Buddhism. He went to Japan: he devoted the gifts that God had given him, and the technical skill that the Jesuits had taught him, to the celebration of anti-Christian legends and ceremonials. But cherry-blossoms bloom only for a season—unlike Sharon's rose. And the tragic letters published after Hearn's death show that this fantastic adventurer learned at last that he had forsaken the splendid adventure first appointed for him. His bitter revilings of the people and customs of the land he had spent years in praising show that within Nippon's golden apples, too, are ashes.

Hearn has been held up by the sentimentalists as a shining example of humanity's cruelty to great artists. He is instead a shining example of the minor artist's cruelty to humanity. He was not rejected of men. His was not "divine discontent," his was the pernicious "desire for new things." Therefore he became merely the maker of fair and futile decorations, and he who might have been a poet, a creator, became a clever wordsmith.

The essays in this little book of Hearn's earliest work show a strange resemblance to the prose of Francis Thompson. What a contrast the lives of the two men present! Both were vagabonds, both were physically handicapped. But Francis Thompson was imaginative enough to be himself, so he wrote "The Hound of Heaven." And Lafcadio Hearn was so lacking in imagination as to want to be somebody else—so he wrote "Gleanings in Buddha Fields."

It is not for a mere journalist to point out the moral significance of the tragedy of Lafcadio Hearn. But I venture to suggest that the young American and English poets who are kissing the silken hem of Mr. Rabindranath Tagore's garment might profitably read Lafcadio Hearn's later correspondence. Fame and happiness are not always the reward of him who gives up the Occident for the Orient. Orientalism has its own truths, its own splendors. But the writers whose words we cherish, whose names are graven on our hearts, the makers of our literature, did any one of these sell his birthright for a mess of—rice?

JOYCE KILMER.

REVIEWS

The French in the Heart of America. By JOHN FINLEY. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

The author is careful to inform us that the title has a merely geographical connotation; yet the subject is so generously treated that the reader, whatever his origin, will voluntarily superadd the figurative interpretation, without the slightest prejudice to American neutrality. Skilfully spliced and dovetailed into historical unity from lecture, essay, memoir and review, the book may be called a connected series of pen-pictures of the pioneer exploration and settlement and the economic, political and educational development of the vast domain that stretches from the Alleghanies to the Rockies and from the St. Lawrence to the Gulf, "the Heart of America," with occasional diagnosis of the pre-cordial regions on its northern and eastern borders. Following Parkman's glowing story of the lords and vassals and black-robed priests of France who, "in plumed helmets and priestly vestments, conquered an untamed continent for civilization," President Finley is still more eulogistic of those "men of courtly culture who, with dauntless hardihood, put to shame the boldest sons of toil." From Cartier, who had explored a thousand miles of the St. Lawrence before the Plymouth Pilgrims were born, and Champlain, who had founded Quebec and Montreal and opened the Great Lakes to the world before that pilgrimage was accomplished, and La Salle, whose "thoughts made alliance with the sun" and whose steps linked the Lakes to the Gulf, and who, unlike the Pilgrim and Puritan, despised gain for glory, and the Black Gowns, who, not for gain or glory but for love of souls alone, made and wrote the pioneer history of the North and West, of whom it is written: "Not a cape was turned, not a river entered, but a Jesuit led the way"—from these to Iberville and Bienville and other valorous sons of France we are led through many picturesque and some tedious highways and by-ways to the absorption of New France by the United States; and then to a many-paged glorification of our present civilized enlightenment as measured by secular education and material productiveness.

It is a disappointing bathos after the fine glow caught in the earlier chapters from the halo of holy and heroic men. In the light of "The Relations" the President of New York University can etch aright the noble figures of Brébeuf and Allemant and Jogues and Marquette and their religious and lay associates, but when that light goes out he returns for inspiration to the shades of the Puritan. He attributes the settling and development of the Mississippi valley solely to the "Scotch-Irish," who evolve forthwith into "Anglo-Americans," and even the Missouri basin can catch no glimpse of the Germans or the Irish, not one of whom by word or hint adorns his pages. He is equally silent on the indispensable services of Père Gibault and his people to Clark, and of the New Orleans French to Jackson, in the winning and holding of the West. The religious exclusiveness of the French is frequently, and untruly, emphasized, but the bigotry of the New England colonists, whom he goes out of his way to laud, is unscathed of his pen. The secular universities and the Protestant preachers are made the heirs of the Jesuit pioneers, but of the Catholic universities and colleges and the countless cathedrals and churches from the St. Lawrence and the Lakes to the Gulf, that have risen in the scenes of their labors, and the missionaries and bishops, many of them French, that maintained the continuity of their Faith and teaching, his pages have no knowledge. It is a fascinating, stimulating book and honestly conceived; but it is rather impressionism than history. M. K.

What Ought I to Do? By GEORGE TRUMBULL LADD, LL.D. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $1.50.

The readers of this "inquiry into the nature and kinds of virtue" are sure to disagree regarding the book's moral value. The author's adherence, consciously or unconsciously, to the theory of immanence, when he speaks (p. 96) of "the Will of the World (the will of God as immanent in man's physical and social evolution)"; his application of modernistic development to the ideals of morality, by the dogmatic statement (p. 29): "There has been an evolution in morals," and his vague yet unconcealed pantheism in the statements that cluster about his words (p. 295): "The Universe . . . is at least . . . an infinitely intricate and wonderfully balanced and knowingly self-controlled (sic) piece of mechanism"; all these will receive the warm grasp of friendship from men who accept any solution of life's problems except the logical one. But other readers of this book, who represent a class of men, some five hundred million strong, know with certainty that the only world-ground of actuality and morality is an infinitely perfect, unchanging personal Creator and Lawgiver, really distinct from the universe we see.

On page 28 are two of the author's postulates, or lack of postulates, to his conclusions: "The message of a moral obligation . . . comes out of the whole man, and is addressed to the whole man," and again, "It is from my whole Self that the message, 'I ought,' arises." . . . This is as far back as Dr. Ladd traces the origin of moral consciousness. He takes for granted that the law is present, but not a hint is hazarded about any lawgiver. To the critic who might deny any binding force corresponding to such an "ought" there is no answer. An emancipated superman might jauntily declare that his whole Self is not the superior of his whole Self and therefore has no more power to declare to his whole Self "Thou shalt not steal" than the same whole Self has to answer "I may steal as much as I like." The author gives no solution of the difficulty. For the whole man, of himself, can not be imposing an obligation and submitting to that obligation, can not be commanding and obeying at the same time and under the same aspect, unless it is possible for black birds to be wholly black and wholly white at the same time.

Passing over numerous encomiums upon the virtues, and much advice about duty-doing, we read, on page 234, this vital passage: "Genuine morality is in the individual a certain type of personality. It is in the large a certain type of society composed of individuals loyal to this type of personality. And loyalty to the type does not consist in being precisely like, or in following precisely the same maxims, or in doing on like occasions precisely the same things, as others . . ." But if such a standard as the foregoing were our practical guide, how could A ever accuse B of being immoral? A's personality differs from B's. So A's morality may differ from B's. And A is not bound to follow B's maxims. The sabotage which may appear immoral to capitalist B may seem quite moral to anarchist A. If any appeal is made to a more ultimate court of morality, scant heed is paid to Dr. Ladd's injunction to pursue one's own personal ideal.

Enough has now been said to show that the author's principles, if reduced to practice, would sweep away all law and order and the choicest fruits of civilization. Of course he would repudiate any such acts. And indeed his own high regard for courage, self-sacrifice and the social virtues, shines forth in many a passage. But Descartes found followers to abuse his dictum, and Malthus others to misapply his doctrines. With far more logic the principles of this book could justify men in the destruction of all that the majority of plain men hold dear. J. M. F.

Paris Waits: 1914. By M. E. CLARKE. Illustrated. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.25.

Four Weeks in the Trenches: The War Story of a Violinist. By FRITZ KREISLER. With illustrations. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Co. $1.00.

These are books of war experiences. The first is made up of nineteen papers, some of which appeared in the London Times and the Queen, written by an English woman who remained in Paris during the first five months of the present war. The author records sympathetically her impressions of what she saw and heard and felt while France was arming, while the capital was threatened and when the Government retired to Bordeaux and subsequently came back to Paris. Mrs. Clarke bears testimony to the reawakening of faith among the men of France: "It is a well-known fact that, since the mobilization order came, men have been in hundreds to confess before leaving for the front." The women, too, have grown more religious: "Even among the most free-thinking social sets the women have turned to the Church for consolation." "France is irrevocably and innately Catholic, and the war has proved it so," is this Protestant observer's conclusion. The clergy have acted so nobly that their influence over the people is likely to be very strong when peace is restored to the country. As for the civilians, they have all become church-goers. "Never have the churches been fuller than they are in these days, and never have the men and women who fill them gone with such single purpose to pray. Even in daily intercourse this spirit of reverence permeates, and the spirit of mockery is no longer heard." So the war appears to be actually regenerating France.

The fact that Fritz Kreisler, "the world's greatest violinist," was summoned by his country to the colors and for "Four Weeks in the Trenches" fought desperately against the Russians, was severely wounded and narrowly escaped being left for dead on the battle-field, proves how merciless in its exactions the Great War is. Among the other men of eminence in Mr. Kreisler's battalion were a sculptor, a philologist, two university professors, a prince, a civil engineer, a physician with an international reputation, a painter and a singer. The author's musical training helped him a little in detecting the path of shells, but his bow-arm was useful only for firing a revolver or waving a sword. This seems to be the first book to appear from the pen of a man who was actually serving at the front in the present conflict. Mr. Kreisler writes vividly, but modestly withal, of the hardships he had to bear and proves, from his own experiences, how easily a soldier in the trenches "becomes a primeval man, nearing the cave-dweller in an incredibly short time." Happily the author has now been exempted from further military service. W. D.

Victory: An Island Tale. By JOSEPH CONRAD. Garden City: Doubleday, Page & Co. $1.35.

Sanpriel: The Promised Land. By ALVILDE PRYDZ. Authorized Translation from the Norwegian. By HESTER CODDINGTON. Boston: Richard G. Badger. $1.25.

The Little Mother Who Sits at Home. By the COUNTESS BARCYNSKA. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $1.00.

Here are three recent stories that are being read widely. "Victory," while not exactly a sea novel, still has a flavor of the sea, and has all that vividness of characterization for which Mr. Conrad is so well known. The principal actors in the story are drawn with a strong hand, but are mostly villains; and the plot itself laid in scenes that are rather sordid. Those who like adventure and action will find it interesting, but most readers will probably consider it inferior to Mr. Conrad's best work.

"Sanpriel" is an excellent translation of a clever novel. The story has a weird atmosphere about it with a very remarkable power of suggestion conveyed through descriptions of nature. Neither in matter nor manner does it conform to the usual type, and the education in self-forgetfulness which is the path along which two unhappy souls are led to happiness is delicately and cleverly handled. There are passages of much beauty in the book; and happily the authoress, who is counted among the foremost of the writers of Norway, avoids the extremes of her native school.

"The Little Mother Who Sits at Home" is a series of letters, some posted and many unposted, written by a widow to her son during his boyhood and early manhood, and covering a period of twenty years. Apart from its views on religion, which though sincere are entirely unorthodox, the little book has the ring of truth. It is an artless, intimate record of that mysterious thing called mother love, and bears unconscious testimony to the heroism of the sacrifices which are the heart of every true mother's life. J. H. F.

The Dream of Scipio: From Cicero's "De Re Publica." With Introduction, Notes and English Translation by JAMES A. KLEIST, S.J. New York: Schwartz, Kirwin & Fauss. $0.50.

"By providing a practical illustration of Latin style, this small book aims primarily to help the freshman." How? Well, there are footnotes referring to rules, to examples of sentence structure and to idioms which occur in the author's simple but practical earlier work, "Aids to Latin Prose Composition," in conjunction with which, this book is especially useful. The second aid to the floundering freshman is the English version facing the Latin text. The introduction, too, is enlightening and the notes, though a little crowded, are helpful. The aim of the work, a series of object lessons in contrasts of style, is admirable and effective, especially if the suggestion in the preface is carried out of making independent reversions into Latin and of using the "deadly parallel." The teacher and the class are advised to comment freely together on Father Kleist's translation, for even indifferent students awake to differences when the Latin and English perpetually challenge each other and them. The translation is careful, often neat, not seldom happy. But do we say loud harmony, or sweet? How can spheres that touch not, cause friction? Sometimes there is excess in intensifying epithets, e.g., "colossal revolutions." Father Kleist's way of coordinating the dependent clauses of Latin periods is very judicious. A. P. M.

The Jester. By LESLIE MOORE. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.35.

Those who have had the pleasure of reading "The Peacock Feather," a delightful novel by this author, which was reviewed in our issue of May 9, 1914, will be eager to begin "The Jester." It is the story of all that befell Peregrine, the fool of Lady Isabel. He wore his motley with a difference, for he was wiser than his calling indicated. Not too wise, however, to avoid being led on by the fair chatelaine until he was banished the castle for his presumption. He then begins a quest for the woman of his dreams and has adventures innumerable with all kinds of interesting medieval people. Such a refreshing spirit of Catholic piety and mysticism pervades the author's pages that "The Jester" is quite unlike most novels of to-day. Pippo, Brigid, Cardinal Falconieri, the Lady Abbess of Sangdieu, Abbot Hilary, Aelred and divers others will become in turn the reader's friends, and carry him back with them to the England of six hundred years ago. Though the author's new story is doubtless equal in wit and poetry to its predecessor, "The Jester" is not so well constructed a novel; many of its characters are introduced only to be dismissed, and the allegory that seems to run through the story will probably escape the "general reader." W. D.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Martha is the name of a little quarterly magazine that has recently been started by the Women's Auxiliary of the Catholic Church Extension Society of the United States. The periodical is to be the organ of the "Order of Martha," the object of which is "to arouse interest in the work of Catholic education, especially among the poor and for the pioneer and poverty-stricken sections of the Church in America." The contents of the first number of Martha include a paper on "The Real Woman Movement," by Ethel Barrymore, a prospectus of the Order of Martha, Cecilia M. Young's "First Ladies of the Land," Dr. Kelley's "Saints and Service" and Dr. Anna Dwyer's "Education and Domestic Relations." Mary Synon, 750 McCormick Building, Chicago, is the editor of the new publication, the subscription price of which is fifty cents a year. AMERICA heartily welcomes Martha to the ranks.

The April Month opens with a paper on "The New General of the Society of Jesus," the writer of which wisely finds amusement in the way certain newspapers have detected in the election of Father Ledóchowski, an Austrian Pole, an event of "profound political importance," for the latest successor of St. Ignatius is, of course, "a man of Berlin" and will now be occupied, not so much with the administration of the Society's internal affairs as with "politics, diplomacy, the setting of nation against nation, the furthering and foiling of international plans"; the activities to which Jesuit Generals, as is well known, have always devoted most of their attention. In this respect Father Ledóchowski, presumably, will not find it hard to outstrip the late Father Wernz. For the latter, though a German, deliberately refused to separate Alsace-Lorraine from the French Province of Champagne, upheld France's protectorate in the Levant and, just before he died, early in the present war, was actually simple enough to appoint a French Jesuit his ad-interim successor. In "There Remaineth a Rest" Father Garrold has contributed to this number of the Month a beautiful story about a mission priest of penal days.

Another pamphlet has just been published at Lisieux, containing a number of authenticated accounts of material and spiritual favors granted by the intercession of the Little Flower to those engaged in military service in the French armies. The beneficiaries are for the most part soldiers and, what is more remarkable, almost exclusively those of about her own age. Protection on the battlefield, escapes from circumstances that made death seem inevitable, cures in cases that the doctors declared hopeless, conversions and apparitions, make up the wonderful story, and testify to the continuance by Soeur Thérèse of her work of predilection. Her heaven, it would seem, still consists in doing good on earth. Among the many ex-votos at the Carmel of Lisieux, a late one is a Cross of the Legion of Honor, offered as a token of gratitude by one who was the object of her especial kindness. Over the battlefields, through the trenches, among the wards of the hospitals, the Little Flower is passing like an angel of consolation, bringing help, health, faith and happiness to the brave soldiers of her beloved France.

Edgar Jepson's "Happy Pollyooly" (Bobbs, Merrill Co., $1.25) and Harry Leon Wilson's "Ruggles of Red Gap" (Doubleday, $1.25) are light and amusing stories from the spring output of fiction. The first has a very clever twelve-year-old girl for a heroine. Though she has been rescued from the slums Pollyooly is successfully substituted for the daughter of a duchess, and being a "red Deeping" is not afraid to prevent a little Hohenzollern prince from domineering over free-born British children. Evidently the book was written since the war began. The hero of the other novel is the traditional English man-servant, very true to type, as types go. His adventures, from the day he is lost by his master to a party of American tourists as a set-off to a poker debt, until his final settlement as social arbiter in Red Gap, are many and varied, and told with a fine wit combined with shrewd observation.

The Boston Evening Transcript's London correspondent thus describes the opportunity the war has brought a Catholic publicist:

> Mr. Hilaire Belloc is filling Queen's Hall with delighted audiences, who, in their desire to get the latest intelligent information or theories about the great conflict, are even willing to pardon Belloc's rather monotonous platform delivery. . . . His success since the war began has been extraordinary. I have already told you of the vogue which resulted from a two years' old prediction of the German invasion of Belgium. That gave him a fine standing among writers on the war. A weekly paper called Land and Water, devoted to the outdoor life and at that time enjoying a very small but respectable circulation, had the happy thought of turning itself into a war weekly, and of enlisting Belloc to write for it on military affairs. The circulation jumped up, some say, from almost nothing to seventy or eighty thousand in a few weeks, and Belloc's reputation jumped with it. Then came Belloc's first public lecture at Queen's Hall—a project that must have been born in fear and trembling, but was justified by astonishing results. All London flocked to hear the lecture, at top prices, and people were actually turned from the doors. Other lectures naturally followed, and Belloc, instead of being, as he was when the war began, a comparatively poor man, is now, with the proceeds from books, lectures and magazine articles, in comparative affluence. That he deserves all the good fortune that has come to him is acknowledged by every one, for he has made a fine fight for recognition, and has never debased his talents before the crowd.

Mr. Belloc's experience in the French army and as a student of strategy well qualifies him for writing and lecturing on the present war. The only marvel is that he has not as yet produced at least three books on the subject.

Three years ago the Rev. T. L. Crowley, O.P., of Louisville, made a tour of Ireland with his uncle, the Rev. D. O. Crowley, LL.D., a venerable priest now residing in San Francisco, and has gathered into a small book called "Beautiful Ireland" (The Rosary Magazine, New York) his "reminiscences of Erin and her children." The author's jottings are of a very intimate character, and nearly everything he saw gave him pleasure and edification. The volume is full of pictures.——Four interesting little books of love and adventure, lately received from Pustet, are sure to meet with hearty acceptance by readers of German. In "Barfüssale," von Berthold Auerbach, a peasant girl, through strange ways, wins happiness at last in love. "Der Loder," von Hermann Schmid, tells of one on whom the insulting name fell, but who lived down the calumny with a courage born of innocence. "Frühlingsstürms," von Hans Eschelbach, is stormy indeed with the passion of two loves that can not die. "Seltsame Lent," von Anton Scheff, tells of a rare sort of people, perhaps rarer for their firm faith.——"Pulpit Themes," Rev. Dr. Beecher's adaptation of Father Schouppe's famous "Adjumenta Oratoris Sacri," favorably reviewed in our issue of March 13, found in six weeks more than 1,100 purchasers. B. Herder, of St. Louis, is the American agent for the work, which sells for $2.75. That house also publishes in this country Dr. MacCaffrey's "History of the Catholic Church from the Renaissance to the French Revolution" ($3.50), the excellent work AMERICA noticed last week.

In Germany as in England a vast war literature has already been produced. German Catholics have been conspicuous for their activity in this line, and the Volksverein in particular has given much of its attention to the work of preparing Catholics for their duties at home and in the field. Among its latest contributions are "Kriegs-Gesetze und-Verordnungen, 1914, 1915," "Landwirtschaftsfragen zur Kriegszeit" and "Jungwehr Anleitung." The three volumes deal respectively with the laws and regulations passed for the time of war, the agricultural problems which have arisen, and the military drill and tactics to be studied in preparation for war (40 Pf. each). Besides the brochures published by the Volksverein's Verlag of M. Gladbach, the firm of Pustet has issued a collection of five interesting war stories "out of the great days of 1914," under the title "Ein Ehrloser Feigling und andere Kriegserzählungen," by A. Hruschka, together with "Bunte Bilder," a collection of war scenes and anecdotes gathered by Fritz Mielert ($0.30 each). The same firm offers an excellent set of war sermon sketches, entitled "In der grossen Shicksalstunde," by B. Duhr, S.J., which will be of value even in neutral countries, since such practical themes as "Love of Fatherland," "Why Does God Permit the War?" "The War of Falsehood against the Clergy," "Conquering National Hatred" and similar subjects have been selected ($0.35).

BOOKS RECEIVED

Abingdon Press, New York:
The Heart of Blackstone. By Nanette B. Paul. $1.00.

Edward Clode, New York:
Betty-All-Alone. By Meg Villars. $1.25.

Doubleday, Page & Co., Garden City, N. Y.:
The Man Who Forgot. By James Hay, Jr. $1.25; The New World-Religion. By Josiah Strong. $1.50.

E. P. Dutton & Co., New York:
The Solitaries of the Sambuca. By Daniel Mauldealey. $2.00; The English Essay and Essayists. By Hugh Walker. $1.50.

The Emmet Press, New York:
Memoirs of Thomas Addis and Robert Emmet. By Thomas Addis Emmet. Two Volumes. $10.00.

Harvard University Press, Cambridge, Mass.:
Mediæval Spanish Allegory. By Chand-Rathfon Post. $2.50.

Houghton, Mifflin Co., Boston:
Japanese Lyrics. Translated by Lafcadio Hearn. $0.75; Four Weeks in the Trenches. By Fritz Kreisler. $1.00; The Road toward Peace. By Charles W. Eliot. $1.00; The Whole Year Round. By Dallas Lore Sharp. $2.00; Little Bird Blue. By William L. and Irene Finley. $0.75; Discipline as a School Problem. By Arthur C. Perry. $1.25.

Longmans, Green & Co., New York:
Spiritual Letters to One of His Converts. By R. Hugh Benson. $1.00.

McBride, Nast & Co., New York:
What of To-day? By Father Bernard Vaughan, S.J. $2.00.

A. C. McClurg & Co., Chicago:
Her Majesty the King. By James Jeffrey Roche. $1.00.

Moffat, Yard & Co., New York:
Memories and Milestones. By John Jay Chapman. $1.25.

G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York:
Tabular Views of Universal History. Compiled by George Palmer Putnam. $2.50; Paris Waits 1914. By M. E. Clarke. $1.25; America and the New World State. By Norman Angell. $1.25; The Jester. By Leslie Moore. $1.35.

Sands & Co., London:
The Ven. John Ogilvie, S.J. By Daniel Conway. 6d. The Proto-Martyr of Scotland, Father Francis of Aberdeen. By Matthew Power, S.J.

Chas. Scribner's Sons, New York:
Outdoor Sketching. By F. Hopkinson Smith. $1.00; A Cloistered Romance. By Florence Olmstead. $1.25.

G. Arnold Shaw, New York:
The Need for Art in Life. By I. B. Stoughton Holborn. $0.75.

Fred'k F. Stokes Co., New York:
Still Jim. By Honoré Willsie. $1.35.

University of Chicago Press, Chicago:
Religious Education in the Family. By Henry F. Cope. $1.25.

EDUCATION

Are Catholic Lectures Feasible?

AN editorial in a former issue of AMERICA very well expressed the value of illustrated lectures as a means of bringing before the eyes of the faithful, in a graphic and impressive manner, the splendid and inspiring Catholic ideals presented by the lives of God's heroes, the saints of the Church:

> There is nothing more interesting to us than the history of our religion; no love of man half so beautiful as the love of God that swayed the breast of Agnes, no bravery in the battle like the gay fortitude of Lawrence, like the thrilling adventures of Sebastian and his friends in the Catacombs. Catholics are proud of their undying line of saints; they are real heroes, who mark the Catholic Church for true. But we do not know them as we should. Reading the story of a saint's life is one thing; seeing it pictured before you is quite another. Few people read biographies, but we are all curious to see.

It was just this conviction that gave rise to the organization described in the previous issue, the Jeanne d'Arc Club of Loyola University, Chicago. It was this that impelled its founder and director to prepare and present illustrated lectures such as would be highly entertaining and at the same time would instruct, edify and inspire all classes of our Catholic people by a vivid portrayal of the lives and deeds of the heroic men and women who have labored so nobly for God and humanity in the Catholic Church.

MOVING PICTURES vs. LECTURES

But the question will naturally be asked, "Have not moving pictures destroyed all possibilities for the success of illustrated lectures?" They have not and never will. Motion picture films have immense advantages in certain subjects, which may be utilized for the benefit of lectures; but they also have their limitations which are being more and more recognized as the novelty wears off and the craze subsides. Christian art has portrayed sacred subjects in a way that the moving picture can never hope to rival. Get the best possible copies of the masterpieces; combine with them the power of the spoken word and personal magnetism of a speaker thrilling with his message, and you have a form of entertainment that will hold its own with any fairly intelligent audience. It would be a lamentable mistake to abandon this field, with all its possibilities for good, to the moving picture theater.

Probably the most serious objection or difficulty is the disinclination of Catholics to patronize lectures. Experienced pastors vouch for this fact, and lecturers bewail it. The former say that a negro minstrel entertainment will attract a throng, where a lecture will fail utterly. The latter point to crowds at Chautauquas, and similar popular courses and contrasts them with their own futile endeavor to get a following of Catholics. Are lectures too intellectual for our people? Such an admission would be a sad reproach.

PARISH CENTERS OF POPULAR EDUCATION

Certain it is that popular lectures are generally tabooed as parish entertainments for the sake of something of a lighter character which may draw better. This is a mistake. It is catering to lower tastes and yielding to that vicious tendency toward what is utterly frivolous, cheap and low in all forms of public amusement. There is serious need of an educational campaign to save our people, especially the young, from such debasing influences and to elevate their tastes to what is not only entertaining, but instructive and ennobling. In this campaign every Catholic college can supply enlightenment and inspiration by an organized plan to utilize the talent, energy and zeal of its students, and thus prepare laymen who will be a power on the lecture platform. Every parish school hall can be made an educational center, not only for the children, but for adults as well. People want to learn. Let our motto be, "To grow old learning." In many large cities there is a well-organized movement along this line by a wider use of the public schools in providing popular lecture courses. The report of the supervisor of public lectures connected with the department of education of New York City shows the magnitude and importance which this movement has assumed there. "Beginning October 1, 1913, and closing May 1, 1914, lectures were delivered in 174 lecture centers, by 673 lecturers, speaking on 1,695 topics, before 5,405 audiences. The total attendance was 1,154,066." Such a record fully justifies the term applied to the lecture platform, "University of the People."

The Jeanne d'Arc Club has in its own way been even more successful. It has not only met with enthusiastic patronage, but has made manifest the possibility of opening vast opportunities for the latent talent, energy and zeal pent up in every Catholic college in the land. Here at Loyola students are more eager to participate in the activities of the Club than in those of any other organization, athletic or otherwise. Hence it has furnished a strong incentive to excellence in public speaking. The results are evident. People are astonished and delighted to hear students rivaling and often excelling professional lecturers on the platform. A hundred times over the director of the Club has heard the enthusiastic comment: "Father, you have reason to be proud of your boys." No stronger argument or inducement could be given to parents for patronizing Catholic higher education.

NO ORDINARY COLLEGE EFFORT

But to carry on this work successfully a most thorough preparation is required. An ordinary college lecture will not suffice. To select the right theme, and then to illustrate it in a worthy manner, is not an easy matter. Material for the student lectures at Loyola University is collected with the greatest care from the various parts of Europe, as well as from the resources at hand in our own country. The genesis of the Columbus lecture is described in the Columbiad. What is said of it here might be repeated, in its own way, of the lecture on the Little Flower, and other subjects. The organ of the Knights of Columbus writes:

> What a treasure a Columbus gallery would be, and what a source of delight, especially to the members of the Great Order, who are doing so much to win for their patron and beau ideal the recognition and glory which are his just due! Over a year ago the director of the Jeanne d'Arc Club began work upon a plan that approaches as near as possible to the idea of a Columbus gallery. He has collected copies of the best works of art on this subject in this country and Europe, with a view to an illustrated lecture that would portray as perfectly as possible the whole life of Columbus and his influence in the world down to the present time. The undertaking, though difficult, has succeeded beyond all expectations, and experts on the subject of stereopticon views declare that the club now possesses the most complete and perfect set of slides on the subject that have ever been gotten together. In making this valuable collection, the director of the club has been favored by fortunate circumstances and aided by the helpful cooperation of many persons at home and abroad. The lecturer handles his subject with rare skill, and those who have been privileged to be present at the presentations of it declare that he makes the most of the dramatic scenes in Columbus' life.

The Jeanne d'Arc Club is not boasting of its record. It has made a beginning only and touched upon the magnificent possibilities in the wide field of educational activity and religious and moral influence through popular lectures adapted to the needs of our Catholic people and delivered by students from Catholic colleges and universities. But the plan is developing and spreading. Creighton University has taken it up and others are preparing to do so. May every alma mater in the land let the light of her sons shine from the lecture platform, thus utilizing the talent of her students in a most effective way.

F. G. DINNEEN, S.J.

SOCIOLOGY

"A Bag of Stick Candy"

I WOULD be understood to announce that I am not a Manichean. I take serious issue with Mr. "Billy" Sunday whose favorite dogma is that your honest yokel, who now and then looks at the ceiling through the bottom of a beer glass, is on the broad and easy path to hell. I think that quite as often he blows, or may blow, the foam away, while his heart fills with gratitude for God's useful if humble creature, beer. Further, I will venture the statement, that even the man whose business in life is to plough the fields of the world to make two whiskey drinkers blossom where, before, one merely bloomed and blushed, can save his soul. However, lest this doctrine smack of laxity, I take my stand with the Baltimore Council, and say that, personally, I should advise this person to seek, if possible, some safer if less lucrative means of gaining an honest livelihood.

KELLY POOL

Having declared my principles, let me next confess my ignorance of the precise nature of "Kelly pool." Concerning poolrooms, to continue this autobiography, I frankly admit that I do not like them. There may be, doubtless are, most excellent poolrooms somewhere, poolrooms wherein even a Saint may with propriety chalk an occasional cue; poolrooms where the balls rattle and click and chairs are banged on the floor to the accompaniment of raucous and innocent honest laughter. There may be. But in those specimens which have been thrown, as it were, across my casual path, I have commonly noted an excess of bad air, bad language, bad art, bad manners and bad company.

You, of course, Madame, have never seen these "parlors," although there is one in your neighborhood, around the corner, on the next block. Come to think of it, this parlor, with a nice sense of convenience, is located between a saloon and a dance-hall. I should not recommend it for your Johnny. There were fifty like him in it, as I passed last night. Johnny, you say, was at his club? I am sure he was profitably and agreeably occupied. Singularly enough, Officer Reilly tells me he is going to "clean out" that "gang"—or is it "club"?—which has been meeting there.

THE STORY BEGINS

No, I do not like poolrooms for boys. As an abstract proposition, I admit them. As a concrete reality, I regard them much as I do nitroglycerine: useful on occasion, but hard to manage, and always ready to blow up. Possibly, they may have their uses. Even a rattlesnake serves some purpose in this world. My dislike has been intensified since I read the paragraph in the Los Angeles Courier-Journal which I herewith submit. All names, including the Courier-Journal, are fictitious.

> If the price of another can of beer and one more game of Kelly pool had not been paramount to the poolroom gang, Francis Ignatius Brady would have knelt as usual Sunday morning in St. Mary's Catholic Church, where he had made his devotions since childhood. As it is, young Brady, not yet eighteen, will fill a felon's grave. A bullet jumped from the darkness in the interests of the law [Query: Have we come to the stage when the law's first aid is a bullet?] and crumpled the boy as he fled up an alley. In his pocket were found three cigars and a bag of stick candy, for the sweet tooth of his childhood, scarcely past.

Now, of course, the poolroom and the can of beer had as little to do with this boy's death, as the cigars and the pitiful "bag of stick candy" found in his pocket. Of course. But let us listen to the story told by Bill, one of Frank's companions. His language has been straightened out a bit, and slightly Bowdlerized.

BILL AND THE DESK MAN

"We was in the poolroom all evenin'. The gang was there too. Then we started to rush the can till all our money was gone. Huh? Oh, we was drinkin' for two hours I guess. You get it next door. You go in through the poolroom. Then they threw us out. Somebody said, 'Let's loot a store.' I guess we was all kind of drunk. Somebody said, 'Sure, there's old lady McCarthy's candy store.' So we busted a window or two. Oh, Frank was boozy all right, but not as bad as us. Then I saw the cop comin'. I yelled and tried to run, but couldn't. Gee, I was drunk. I just fell down. Then I heard the cops shootin' and I said, 'Well, I guess they got Frank.' But it's lucky, ain't it, we couldn't run? We couldn't hardly walk."

Let it be reiterated that the poolroom is not to be blamed for this boy's death. The saloon-keeper who sold these boys liquor in quantities sufficient to intoxicate them, certainly can not be arraigned for murder. The officer who pulled his gun was but doing his duty. The only cause which can be ascertained with certainty, of the death of this boy with "a bag of stick candy in his pocket," is an instrumental cause, the gun itself. The deskman at the police station, however, brushes this aside as too metaphysical for this wise and wicked world. "It's another case of the poolrooms," he says, "with the saloon next door. We've had lots of them this winter. All the boys mixed up in this affair have been hanging out in just such places."

THE STORY ENDS

Let us put another witness in the box, Frank's old father. "This is going to kill his mother. Frank was always a good boy. I didn't know he was hanging around these tough places. I don't get home from work till late. I didn't know. The police say he's been in 'em right along, do they? Then why didn't they clean these places up? That's what I want to know. My boy is gone now, but I hate to see the cops killing half-grown boys, and letting the places that make them outlaws run wide open."

Save to say that some of us share his sense of bewilderment, I do not see that we can add much in the way of philosophical reflection to Mr. Brady's testimony. I haven't the heart to suggest—well, Frank's gone now, and his mother may soon follow him. His soul we may safely leave to a merciful God who, though infinitely merciful, has said some fearful things, touching those who scandalize His little ones. And so this sorrowful and sordid chapter closes.

"PERSONAL LIBERTY"

I have forgotten what I started out to prove. I believe I said that I was not a Manichean. But let me add, if you care to follow, that I am an ardent advocate of "personal liberty." As far as the law is concerned, I hold that a man is at perfect liberty to drink himself to death, provided the process does not offend the outward peace, dignity and decorum of the commonwealth. I suppose he may also induce Tom, Dick and Harry to join him, if he can; for they, as he, are the masters of their own destiny. Likewise his personal liberty permits him to run a poolroom, connecting it, in some benighted communities, with a saloon. Furthermore, he is at liberty to admit into it, any one who avers that he is over sixteen. Sometimes there is no age limit. I hope your community does not send little girls around the corner to get a dime's worth.

Yes, by all means, let us preserve our high sense of personal liberty, for which our fathers died. But Frank Brady is dead, too. And he was only a boy, a hobbledehoy boy, with a bag of stick candy in his pocket, preserved doubtless for a secret debauch. Remarkably like Johnny, Madame, with his occasional rebellions, his desire for a "gang," and his awakening desires "to see life." It is just possible that the policeman's bullet cheated the gallows of its fair game, but it is also just possible that a turn might have come in the tide of Frank's life. "He might have been." Let the phrase be his epitaph. "He might have been," and he lies in a felon's grave now, reports the sentimental Courier-Journal, in figurative language.

SUMMING UP

This story, which happens to be true, does not seem to conclude. But, somehow, I can't get out of my head the testimony of the man at the desk:

> It's another case of the poolrooms with the saloon next door.

And the story of Frank's companion:

> We was drinkin' for about two hours. You get it next door. You go through the poolroom.

And the mild plaint of Frank's father:

> Why didn't they clean those places up? That's what I want to know.

So do I. What does your community think about it? Are you letting your boys go to similar destruction? What do you think, you mothers who are not yet called upon to mourn a dead Frank with "a bag of stick candy in his pocket"?

That's all. The case is closed. But somewhere a mother's heart is aching. I can't get that out of my head either.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Last week AMERICA recorded the success attained by students of Catholic colleges in the intercollegiate oratorical contests held in Maryland and Massachusetts. This week the success has been duplicated in Pennsylvania and Missouri. In the former State Mr. Clare Gerald Fenerty of St. Joseph's College, Philadelphia, won first place over rivals from the University of Pennsylvania, State College, University of Pittsburg, Juniata College and Bucknell University. In Missouri Mr. Joseph Francis Goeke of St. Louis University won first place over a large number of competitors from the colleges of his State. Catholic colleges have something to recommend them after all.

According to the Fortnightly Review, the St. Louis Republic has followed the example of the Chicago Tribune and the Chicago Herald, in asking the venerable "Pastor" Russell to take his advertising elsewhere. The New York Evening Post, it would seem, has likewise discovered that the Brooklyn Tabernacle sermons are unsuitable for its pages, but admirers of the Pastor can find them in the columns, strangely enough, of that usually sane and well-balanced daily, the New York Sun. One wonders how Dana would have regarded the Pastor and his works. There is no Dana on the staff of the Sun to-day but, in his absence, it is suggested that an appreciation of the Pastor by "Hermione," who occasionally contributes to the Evening Sun, would be decidedly interesting.

The speech of Mr. Elihu Root at the opening of the New York Constitutional Convention was marked by a wholly admirable spirit of conservatism. Mr. Root recognizes clearly that the "intervention of Government in the complicated and interdependent life of the people" is now more necessary than in former periods. But the changes which are now found necessary, are not so much in our theory of, as in our application of, principles of government.

> The burden of proof ever rests upon the advocates of change. It is our duty, so far as our powers go, to improve as well as to change. No wise legislator will undervalue the power for peace, order and progress which lies in the traditions, respect, the conformity of custom, and the habit long-established in a people, of obedience. It is not for us to tear down institutions growing out of the life of a people whom we serve, merely for the purpose of substituting in their place, creations of our own devising, however confident we may feel in the success of the experiments we contemplate.

These wise words may well be pondered by the advocates of universal reform through legislation. That social legislation, in some degree, is now necessary, few will deny. But legislatures may easily go too far in placing upon the statute-books, laws which either aggravate the evil against which they are directed, or for an undoubted evil, substitute disorders of a graver nature.

The Russian Minister of Finance announces, through the Associated Press, that from an economic standpoint the war has been a benefit to the people of Russia. The Government allowance to soldiers, he asserts, is greater than their earning capacity in time of peace. The Minister neglects to state, however, whether any change has taken place in the purchasing power of money. At any rate it seems true that the savings deposits are greater than at a corresponding period in 1914. The reason given by the Minister is that the peasant is not spending his money on vodka. "It is the prohibition of the sale of vodka which is primarily responsible for the ameliorated condition of the peasant. The sieve through which all his available earnings formerly disappeared has now been closed."

Young and ambitious speakers who grow pale at the thought of facing an audience, may take courage from the example of the late Monsignor Benson. According to his brother, Arthur Christopher, this accomplished pulpit orator suffered from "stage-fright" every time he had to preach. The London Chronicle notes that this affliction is not uncommon even among seasoned speakers. "Bobby" Lowe, once a ready parliamentary debater, on one occasion in the midst of an important speech, happened to misread his notes. He floundered incoherently for a few moments, sat down in confusion, having utterly forgotten the very subject of debate, and never mustered courage to address the house again. Sir George Grey, Home Secretary under Lord Palmerston, never rose to speak, even on routine matters, without betraying painfully obvious symptoms of imminent nervous prostration. The Chronicle closes its comment by instancing the case of John Stuart Mill who, on one memorable occasion, suffered an utter collapse while addressing a public meeting.

The mothers' pension law was intended to secure the child the advantage of a home training. This is the strongest claim to recognition. But it is somewhat disconcerting to learn that in Oregon this result has not been secured. According to the Seattle Post-Intelligencer, "the law has filled the children's homes very nearly to capacity through the giving up to institutional charge, of the children of unsuccessful applicants." It is also unpleasant to note that perjury, in the form of false affidavits as to financial condition, has been fairly common among the Oregon applicants.

> Prior to the taking effect of the law, mothers made every effort to hold the children of the family together. When it was discovered that absolute penury is a condition precedent to the granting of a pension, families began to break up.

This unfortunate result is obviously due to a defective provision in the law. To refuse to help a mother before she is reduced to beggary, is equivalent to the action of the physician who refuses medical attention to all save those in imminent danger of death. On the other hand, it is absolutely necessary to guard against encouraging public mendicancy by granting pensions to applicants who are not really in need of this assistance. The results in Oregon, if as reported, merely indicate a difficulty inherent from the beginning, in the matter of public relief. But they do not refute the principles involved.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XIII, No. 4
WHOLE No. 317

MAY 8, 1915

PRICE 10 CENTS
$3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE
The War: Bulletin, April 27, p. m.-May 4, a. m.—Operations in the East—The Dardanelles—Other Items. Austria-Hungary: Religion and German Alliance. France: Loyalty and Bigotry. Germany: Socialists Patriotic Citizens—Treatment of Prisoners. Great Britain: Censorship — War Babies. Ireland: General Items. Mexico: The McManus Murder—Famine—Interesting Letters 81-84

TOPICS OF INTEREST
The Real Thing—Wine in the Holy Sacrifice—Lodge, Hyslop and Telepathy—The Real Menace—The Daily Paper—The New Woman after God's Heart.....85-92

COMMUNICATIONS
Black Death and Equal Pay—Vaudeville—Prohibition vs. Temperance—Catholics and the Y. M. C. A.....92-97

EDITORIALS
Saint Francis and His City—Moving Picture Censorship—Dynamite, Christian Science and Lourdes—Why Pray for Peace?—America's Vocation—Signs of Superior Civilization—"Society's" Conversation — Micrometer or Megaphone? Which? 98-101

LITERATURE
"Quotes," Italics and Parentheses.

REVIEWS: Pioneer Laymen of North America—Spiritual Letters—Hugh: Memoirs of a Brother—James Russell Lowell as a Critic—The Rediscovered Country—Introduction to the Science of Ethics—Hillsboro People—The Need for Art in Life.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: The Current Catholic Mind—March's Popular Novels—"Her Majesty the King"—"The Belgians at Home"—"The Man Who Forgot"—"Socialism as the Sociological Ideal"—"A Dealer in Empire"—"The Will to Live."
BOOKS RECEIVED 101-105

EDUCATION
School Children's Health.....106, 107

SOCIOLOGY
All Work and No Play.....107, 108

NOTE AND COMMENT
New York Catholics and Secondary Education—Father Maturin Returns to England—The Educational Value of Spelling—Methodism's First Pope — Tribute to the Catholic Parochial School 108

CHRONICLE

The War.—There have been no developments of importance in the western theater of the war. In Flanders the offensive has passed over to the side of the Allies, while the Germans seem to be content to rest on the defensive and to consolidate their recent advance to the north of Ypres. The French claim that the Germans have been forced back beyond the eastern bank of the Yser. This statement is probably true except that the possession of Lizerne has not yet been definitely settled. East and south of Ypres the Germans and British are at a deadlock. In the Champagne district and at Le Mesnil, there have been slight gains by the Germans, which, however, have been offset by French gains on the Les Eparges front in the Woevre, and by the recapture of Hartmannsweiler Kopf in Alsace.

Bulletin, April 27, p. m.-May 4, a. m.

In Poland there has been comparative quiet, no considerable advantage being recorded by either side. The Germans, however, seem to be more active than of late. A German invasion of the Russian Baltic provinces is reported to have started from the vicinity of Polangen and to have made some progress in the direction of Mitau. West of Warsaw, on the Rawka, and further south on the Pilica, the Germans after five weeks of inactivity have resumed the offensive. In neither case, however, is the movement on a large scale. In the Carpathians the thaw has flooded the country and put a stop to the furious fighting for the passes. Western Galicia has been the scene of recent Russian reverses. German official dispatches state that the Russian lines have been pierced and crushed along the entire western Galician front from the Carpathians to the Vistula. In East Galicia the Russians report a victory near Stry, but it it is not of such a character as to affect the situation.

Operations in the East

During the week the interest of the world has shifted from Flanders to the Dardanelles, where the Allies have been attacking with great energy both by sea and especially by land. In the report of the British Admiralty, it is stated that the Allies have landed on both sides of the Strait, and are converging on the forts at the Narrows from many points. Under cover of the fire of the Allies' warships, a landing was effected at six different points, in spite of the most determined resistance offered by the Turks. On the Asiatic side the French succeeded in getting on shore near the entrance to the Dardanelles at Kum Kaleh and, according to unofficial dispatches, have advanced as far as Hessarlik. The Turks admit that the French effected a landing, and that very sanguinary fighting followed, but they claim that at present the Asiatic side has been entirely cleared of the troops of the Allies. On the European side, the British disembarked troops at the extreme southern point of the Gallipoli peninsula. So far the two reports are in agreement. The British claim that they have driven back the Turks as far as Krithia, and that they are in possession of about five miles of the tip of the peninsula from one coast to the other. The Turks deny this advance. Further north on the Ægean side of the peninsula the Australian and New Zealand divisions landed at a point north of Gaba Tebeh and advanced on Sari Bair. The presence of this force and the desperate character of their resistance to the Turks is admitted officially at Constantinople. Still further north, troops are engaged with the Turks. Their operations have not been announced by the Allies, but it is stated by the German official dispatches that uninterrupted fighting for two days has been in progress in the vicinity of the town of Gallipoli. Unofficial reports from Athens state that Gallipoli is already in the hands of the Allies. Still further to the north, but far to the west of the peninsula, the British have disembarked troops on the mainland at Enos. They are said to have fought their way to the east, a distance of some twenty miles. This advance, should it be eventually successful, would bring them to the north of the fortifications at Bulair. The Turks declare that they have everywhere been successful in driving back the Allied land forces, and are now bringing up fresh troops to the coast of the Sea of Marmora. They also claim to have sunk a British destroyer, to have damaged three British battleships, and to have set a French cruiser on fire.

The Dardanelles

Refugees from many places in Armenia have given circumstantial accounts of many massacres of Armenian Christians by the Turks. The conflict between the Kurds and Armenians is still in progress.

Other Items

The French armored cruiser Leon Gambetta was sunk by an Austrian submarine. Dunkirk has been subjected to a bombardment of indirect fire by German guns at a range of twenty-two miles, and Metz by the French guns at a range of ten miles. An American steamship, Gullflight, has been torpedoed by a submarine. Three lives were lost. The situation is regarded as serious.

Austria-Hungary.—The new economic alliance proposed for the three Central Powers, Germany, Austria and Hungary, in order to strengthen their union and render it more intimate than before, has already been referred to in AMERICA. The religious aspect of such a relationship is evidently of supreme importance. It far outweighs any mere economic advantages that might be gained by the breaking down of tariff barriers between the three nations. At the request of a prominent Hungarian editor a declaration has therefore been made upon this subject by no less an authority than the Cardinal Prince Primate of Gran. His views are all in favor of the alliance. Men will not look to him, he says, "as Primate of the Hungarian Catholic Church," for a discussion of the political, economic and cultural interests involved in this question, but will desire to learn "the specifically ecclesiastical points of view which recommend the alliance with Germany and which at the same time must give it still greater intrinsic stability." Considering the freedom enjoyed by the Church in Germany, as well as in the Dual Monarchy, he expresses his conviction that the Catholic Church in Hungary as well as in Austria must be "greatly interested in making this alliance more strong, lasting and intimate." He refers to "the extraordinary religiousness" of the German race as based upon deep feeling and profound thought. "The constructive civic talent of the German," he continues, "is perhaps the greatest in the world, and for this reason he likewise understands best what an important rôle religion must play in public life." He therefore concludes that a most intimate alliance with Germany "can bring with it only advantages for the Hungarian and Austrian Catholics" and believes that the united Central Powers "will ward off many dangers from the world-Church."

Religion and German Alliance

France.—The situation of the Church in France is still very complicated. Catholics are setting an example of loyalty, heroism and sacrifice that is unsurpassed. They are yielding up for the country, with joy and enthusiasm, all that is most precious. They have led all others in founding solid works of charity for the soldiers at the front, the wounded and the prisoners of war. They are uniting in prayer as never before within recent years, and the League of French Women has called upon all Catholic women of France to receive Holy Communion on May 16, the feast of Blessed Jeanne d'Arc. On the other hand, violations of religious liberty still continue on the part of Government authorities. A patriotic lecture on "The Pope and the War," which explains and praises the attitude of the Holy Father, and which had been given at Bordeaux and elsewhere, with the authorization of the military Government and the prefecture, was forbidden at Valence by the military governor of Lyons at the instance of the Prefect, though the Bishop himself had invited the speaker, M. l'abbé Desgranges. The Bishop then arranged to have the conference given in his cathedral, since even the law of Separation safeguarded this liberty. Again the Prefect interfered and 300 policemen were placed on picket duty. The Bishop yielded to force, strongly protesting against this infringement of "the sacred and inviolable right of the word of God." Catholic papers call attention to the disastrous effect which past acts of bigotry have had in making "Catholic opinion among the neutral nations for the most part unfavorable to France," and the need of establishing a solid religious peace after the war. "Men see too plainly," writes B. Labre, "the impious sect which persecutes religion, and not sufficiently the Christian nation which is devoting itself to the preservation of the Faith even to self-sacrifice."

Loyalty and Bigotry

Germany.—For the first time in many years there was no waving of the red flag, no revolutionary oratory, no socialist celebration in Berlin, on May 1, the international socialist labor day. Wolfgang Heine, the most prominent party leader now in the city, said in explanation of this silence:

Socialists Patriotic Citizens

> A million and a half of Socialists are fighting in the trenches with three million other voters. Those who are not fighting are at work making war materials. All our leaders and speakers are fighting or working and there is none left to observe the day. . . . Russia always dreamed of conquering the world. For a million German workers and their families this Russian invasion has meant death. But Germany has to fight. We Socialists hope that this will be the last war. We wish that this savage business of killing everybody were ended. Everybody in Germany desires peace when it can be secured with honor.

Socialists, for the time at least, have become patriotic citizens.

An interview with the American Ambassador, James W. Gerard, in regard to the treatment of English prisoners by the Germans was recently printed in the Berliner Lokal-Anzeiger. After mentioning the various grievances he thus concludes:

Treatment of Prisoners

I can only say that the lot of prisoners of war is not enviable, but that, in accordance with existing circumstances, it is entirely tolerable. The German officials will give consideration to all representations we make to them. In regard to the food dealt out to the prisoners a new decree has been communicated to me from the war office in which their menu is increased by additional items and made far more varied than formerly.

The prisoners, according to the reported interview, received whatever is necessary and are given the same food as the troops in the barracks.

Great Britain.—The press is still somewhat agitated over the censorship. Not long since Lord Bryce invited the Government to present to Parliament "a list of the persons employed in the censorship of news, other than naval and military intelligence, and in the censorship of private correspondence between this country and foreign countries." To this he added the request that Parliament be furnished "with copies of the instructions given to the censors to guide them in the discharge of their duties." Lord Crewe, speaking for the Government, declined to publish the names requested, but under pressure promised to consult further "those who are more especially affected." The Times presses for information on the ground that the work of the censors is unsatisfactory. The specific complaints are that a late official French report was mutilated: a series of facts quoted from Sir John French's dispatch about Neuve Chapelle was forbidden publication: "reproduction of Italian newspapers, dealing with events in the Dardanelles, and easily accessible to the Germans, was stopped." Added to these are some minor complaints which evidently exasperated the "Thunderer" which sums up its editorial in this way:

Censorship

The whole working of the censorship is full of such muddled inequalities. We hear many complaints, too, about the methods adopted in dealing with private correspondence. Letters plainly addressed by eminent and patriotic men to each other seem to be opened for no other reason than that of curiosity, while the correspondence of obscurer persons passes unmolested. The public have at least the right to know the names of those entrusted with this enormous power.

The agitation over the large increase in illegitimacy has called forth various opinions, some shocking, some highly sensible. A correspondent in the Times puts the discussion on rather a lofty plane by denouncing the glorification of human frailty as though it were praiseworthy. He points out that the "abnormal situation" has disclosed the weakness of parental control, the decline of faith, the lowering of ideals and the partial failures of the "Churches." He insists in the sanest manner that means of alleviation should be studied with the utmost care declaring: "We have already gone a long way in the direction of undermining the special recognition of the marriage tie, on which the whole structure of the State largely and in reality depends." He adds:

War Babies

Much misconception prevails regarding the normal prevalence of illegitimacy in this country. It is not specially the product either of poverty or of city life. It is far more common in rural districts than in urban areas. In cities it is by no means the poorest parishes which produce the most illegitimate children. The urban artisan class as a whole is far more rigid in observing the sanctities and prescriptions of marriage than any other class of the community. Only in a great period of national upheaval, such as the present, have ordinary conditions been upset.

A great deal that the Times correspondent says is in striking and consoling contrast to the twaddle of many of our advanced women who are more pagan that Christian.

Ireland.—The trial in Dublin of John Hegarty, a post-office clerk who was dismissed as an Irish Volunteer of anti-recruiting sympathies, gave the activities of what is called the seditious element a wide advertisement. Mr. Hegarty was charged by the Crown with spreading and writing seditious literature and was defended by Mr. T. M. Healy, M.P. His acquittal on one charge and the disagreement of the jury on another proved an obstacle to the Government's further procedure in such cases which had recently been numerous. Referring to the Carsonite statement that when the Ulster Volunteers returned from the war they would put an end to Home Rule, Mr. Dillon said that in order to come from the war they must first go to the war. This was met by the announcement that 16,000 of the Carsonites are going to the front. They have not yet gone. Messrs. O'Connor and Devlin presented an address of sympathy to the French Government, and M. Viviani, the Premier, who had taken down the lights from the heavens, replied sympathetically in the name of liberty. Mr. Lloyd George's projected legislation against the liquor traffic has been opposed and supported by different classes in Ireland.

General Items

Mexico.—This week's chronicle contains a letter just received from Mrs. McManus, describing the murder of her husband, an article written by a Mexican for a Mexican paper on the famine now rife, and portions of letters from one of AMERICA'S correspondents.

The McManus Murder

This is my first opportunity of getting mail to you since the occurrence of March 11. I was staying in Tacubaya at the time with the children, as the place was hardly fit for so many babies. At a little before nine, on the morning of the eleventh, John telephoned that the Zapatistas were attacking the place. Mr. Fuller rushed immediately to the Legacion, and I telephoned everyone who could give assistance. But before anyone could get to him Azano telephoned that it was all over. I took a machine and rushed to the house, hoping against hope—even telephoning Prestley to go out. The Zapatistas got word that men were coming from the Legacion and fled before our arrival. John was on the roof and had been hit from behind. Some of the Zapatistas had either sneaked onto the roof or had climbed the trees. Evidently the bullet was a dum-dum, as the wound was frightful. They pulled Manuela's wife to the foot of the ladder, insisting that she was John's wife, and saying they wanted to kill her beside her husband. The other servants finally saved her. But if I had been there, there is no doubt as to the nature of my fate. They drove off the mules and horses, nine in number, which makes a total loss, in this and the November raid, of twenty-five animals. The house was indescribable: there wasn't a room which one could walk through, the debris was so thick. There were bullet holes in every wall. The Brazilian seals were on the door, but they said they had no respect for these. They fired on our flag, but of course didn't hit it, and finally climbed on the roof and pulled it down.

Telegrams and correspondence emanating from various places in Mexico make known that famine begins anew with more or less intensity in different towns of our unfortunate Republic. For the space of four years and some months the country and the towns have been laid waste by a civil war which has paralyzed all commerce, industries, railroads, mines, etc., destroyed all good and beautiful and artistic possessions of the country, and caused the emigration to foreign lands of all who are unwilling to contribute of their substance for the purpose of bringing about the complete collapse of the natives and the ruin of the country—a war which has brought all these calamities and which, like a viper, has entwined itself around our compatriots, has taken forcible possession of the country, and in the end will bring the physical and moral exhaustion of the combatants, and famine also, which already has prevailed for some time and to-day returns with its unfailing retinue of misery and horror. In many cities I myself have seen immense caravans of families going to establishments and departments of government, soliciting the daily necessities of life. I myself have seen mothers with little children begging for food. I have seen them begging because they had naught with which to buy. I myself have seen little children asking for a piece of bread to alleviate their hunger when there was none to give them. How many will have fallen by this cruel blow of destiny, suffering the bitter pangs of hunger!

Famine

Famine! Many tentacled, insatiable, swift, triumphant! Going abroad over the Republic, its one and only conqueror, leaving a trail of human skeletons behind! Four years of war without quarter! Four years of feeding the insatiable maw of death! Four years of living in constant danger from the bloody struggle in which thousands of compatriots have died, some offering their lives on the altar of an ideal, with the day of realization very far, and others pressed by necessity, or driven on dizzily by the impetuous waves of revolution. Is it not enough! Has there not been given sufficient time for slaying citizens who at no distant date would be needed for the reconstruction of the nation and the defense of its integrity? Have not enough of the great and the good been destroyed, and have not enough towns been wiped out by fire and shell, that now we begin to think of building instead of destroying?

The first of these subjoined letters gives a picture of the battle-field of Matamoras; the second, gives an estimate of the character of the "Chiefs."

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Interesting Letters

The Villa forces have retired from in front of Matamoros and left behind the terrible aftermath of war. Imagine if you can, a plain many miles in extent covered with the bodies of men and horses which have been lying there for three weeks! Six hundred horses and about three hundred men were killed in the first skirmish on March 27, and scarcely a day during the three weeks that followed but added to the number. Owing to the fact that the field was exposed to fire from both armies it was impossible to bury or burn the dead as is their custom. Somewhere on that battle-field lie the bodies of a father, mother and three children. They lived in a hut a few miles distant from Matamoros. Nobody knows where they came from, mere helpless human atoms driven before the hurricane of war. During the siege their food gave out. It was a question of starvation or a journey across the plain lying between the two contending armies. Imagination can scarcely conceive a situation more dramatic. They were well on their way toward the city when the armies opened fire and all went down together. Some of the refugees have returned to their homes but many remain on the American side, believing that it is only a question of time when the attack will be renewed. The important problem is how to provide employment, for, in the main, they are able and willing to work. During the past two months I have had at my disposal work for fifty men on an industrial enterprise. I had hundreds of applications from men in the army who were compelled to fight or starve or beg, and who were on the alert for any peaceful occupation at which they could earn enough for a bare subsistene. For several years wise and learned men have been laboring together to devise a plan for bringing peace to Mexico. The trouble is they have addressed all of their efforts toward the men who are promoting the war, not to the fighters. If they will go to the men in the ranks with an offer of work at fifty cents a day they can do it. And the money which is being spent in convening peace conferences and sending special personal representatives almost would pay it! By this I do not mean to say that the Mexican soldier has no convictions, or is willing to sell them so cheaply, only that most of them are convinced the present struggle will bring them no good, and are ready to quit on any terms short of starvation. Concerted action in opening recruiting offices for laborers throughout the Republic would cause the revolutionary army to melt away and literally the swords would be turned into ploughshares. . . . During my entire association with the active participants in this revolutionary movement, two things have impressed me, one is the sincerity of the men who are doing the actual fighting, and the other is the insincerity and trickery of the men who are keeping it up, following the army from a safe distance on the American side. While men of the type of General Rodriguez and his followers are living like dogs and dying like dogs, dapper, well-dressed men, calling themselves by one official title and another, occupy the best rooms in the best hotels, cultivate the acquaintance of useful Americans at wine suppers, and in various ways prepare to take over the revenue-producing offices when the city is taken. One is often reminded of the experiences recounted by Mexico's satirical poet, Antonio Plaza, who, "returned from his military triumphs walking on flowers with a wooden leg, and covered with wreaths of glory, to starve unless he turned into a donkey and ate laurel."

E. C. HENDRIX.

TOPICS OF INTEREST

The Real Thing

UNDER the title "England's Experiences with the Real Thing" in the April number of the Yale Review, Professor L. P. Jacks of Oxford, writing of the rude awakening of the English people under the awful shock of war, says:

> I have not the slightest doubt that our present contact with the Real Thing will involve many modifications in those "views of life" which have hitherto been current among us. "I admired Bernard Shaw," said a friend the other day, "but now—well, he makes me sick." It would not surprise me if henceforth we attached less importance to "views of life" in general, no matter who their author may be. Life at the present moment is too big and terrible a thing to be merely "viewed." I am not prepared to predict what the changes of our thought will be; but I do predict that changes will take place. So much that seemed wisdom to us before seems nonsense to us now. Some of us, it is true, are fighting manfully against the unpleasant necessity of having to eat our former words. But sooner or later, we shall have to eat them.

The bubbles of fads and fancies fade away at the first breath of grim reality and silly poseurs shrivel before the blast. "A year ago," says Professor Jacks, "we were all writing books and articles about the 'religion of the future.'" And lo! the roar of the trenches dissipates the "religion of the future" into the thin nonsense it always was, and the academic dilettanteism which had dogmatized God into a myth, dissolves into the airy nothings from which it drew its form and fashion. "What if after all," queries Professor Jacks, "there is something in the world which has gone altogether wrong? What if some trace of original sin yet remains? What if the devil and his works are more than a myth? Every day there is something in the newspapers which suggests these questions: and there are heart-breaks to press them home." The thunder of battle along the Aisne, slaughter, rapine, pestilence, famine, death stalking about the land and lurking under the sea, the agonizing nations in the grip of conflict from the Dardanelles to the North Sea are no uncertain answer to Professor Jack's queries.

An English poet once sang:

> God's in His Heaven,
> All's right with the world.

The modern world has been trying to pluck God from His Heaven—witness Viviani's blasphemous words in the French Chambers some years ago—and now it is finding all is wrong with the world. It has taken some awful reality to teach the lesson. The great nations pitted in a death struggle against one another are finding indeed that some trace of original sin still remains.

The dream of Internationalism founded on the hollow boast of man's brotherhood without the fatherhood of God has withered like flax in the fire. The army of isms, which flouted creed and dogma and prated of the divinity of man, are now only wandering ghosts upon the wind. Heaven without God has proved to be but sounding brass, and the nations on their knees are not supplicating the divinities spun out of the vanities of human speculation. The moral of the great war is obvious enough. It is the old story, the people were forgetting God. Man was becoming self-sufficient. He was spinning philosophies and theories by the hour, extravagances, follies, absurdities, blasphemies, obscenities woven and rewoven into a fantastic skein to allure, dazzle and to corrupt. The storm breaks and the idols of the hour are shivered like brittle glass.

Europe is learning the lesson that God is in His Heaven and that all is not right with the world. Summoned to judgment, man is now on his knees in acknowledgement of his creatureship.

And what about ourselves on this side of the Atlantic? The dreadful bruit is constantly in our ears. Our newspapers teem daily with ensanguined narrations of the maelstrom of violence, with which a whole continent quakes. How impossible it all seems in the face of modern civilization, we whisper to ourselves. It must be the obsession of some hideous nightmare from which we will shortly wake. To-morrow's and to-morrow's and to-morrow's newspaper will chronicle fresh horrors and the end is not yet. We ourselves breathe freely and easily behind the three thousand miles of ocean which divides us from Europe's catastrophe. Our physical well-being is only lightly disturbed. We are even reaping some economic benefit from the old world's disaster; but is all well with us—have we nothing to fear?

When England was celebrating with pomp and acclaim the triumph of her imperialism, one of her poets whose vision went beyond the flare of her battalioned banners and the blare of her regimental trumpetings, struck a loftier note in his great "Recessional."

> If, drunk with sight of power we loose
> Wild tongues that have not Thee in awe—
> Such boastings as the Gentiles use
> Or lesser breeds without the law—
> Lord God of Hosts be with us yet,
> Lest we forget, Lest we forget.

England did forget, had even then forgotten. France, Germany, all Europe forgot. Are we remembering? What wild tongues have we not loosed. Only the other day the President of Columbia University in an address before an educational convention at the University of Pennsylvania gave utterance to the following significant indictment:

> We feel thousands and millions of lives are made better by education. But what have we to prove it by? What has scholarship done to broaden the human sympathies? What has it done for the world? The history of the last six months shows we are falling short of our ideals.
>
> With all our schools, with all our theories and our philosophies, there is something lacking. We have lost the church and family. Schools can not stand up under the burden being thrust upon them.

Dr. Butler sees but he does not understand. The Church (within Dr. Butler's purview) and the family have been lost, because the schools have failed, and the schools have failed because they have forgotten God.

We have been and are educating the generations without God, and the generations thus educated become parents who have never known God. What chance have their children to know God, if indeed such folk do not shirk parenthood. Out of such sapless material is built, not the family, but what the New York Sun recently stigmatized as the "High-ball Marriage." Out of this corroded material is built not a Church but a lecture hall from whose rostrum is expounded the creed of sexual affinity and not the doctrines of Christianity. The open record of divorce and the hidden record of race suicide witness to the corruption of a people who have forgotten God. The schools can not stand up under the burden! Heaven spare the mark! they are the roots of the disease.

With all our theories and philosophies, there is indeed something lacking. Socialism, Feminism, Cubism, Futurism, Pragmatism, Bergsonism and the hundred and one other isms, that shrill and fume, clash and rave in this witches' caldron of confusions, are only evidence of an intellect which has abandoned the sure foundation of knowledge, God. When men forget God, they forget themselves. Reason itself, has become anathema. Bergsonism repudiates human intelligence and apotheosizes the Vital Urge, a geyser-like spontaneity pushing forward somehow in vacuo and spraying off (i. e. creating) matter by reason of the resistance of something. Thought is fatal to this spontaneous push because it limits and congeals it into fixity. Maeterlinck evokes the Unconscious and sentimentalizes over the human bubbles we are, floating irresponsibly on the surface of the Abyss. Pragmatism scorns the past, contemning human history, experience, tradition and reason at one fell swoop, and measures truth by the actuality of the moment; the poison in the pudding is proved in the eating thereof, though at the expense of the eater. Futurism smashes everything incontinently, past and present, and plunges headlong into chaos. So the wild dance of intellectual folly goes on through a thousand and one gyrations and contortions—"Our theories and philosophies" in which, Dr. Butler tells us, "there is something lacking."

> For frantic boast and foolish word
> Thy mercy on thy people, Lord.

Wild words we have indeed loosed, and wild deeds follow upon them. We are pleasure-mad, dance-mad. Consider the last symptom: it has become universal. It is natural for young people to dance, but when the old and decrepit tango like frenzied mænads night and day, we realize that nature herself has been violated. In theater and cabaret Venus Epistropheia goes unrebuked. The studied abandon of woman's dress would put a naked savage to the blush. All this not in the hidden ways of vice fearful of the light, but in the broad open courting the eyes of all the world. If these be the open things, what about the hidden, the abominations before which speech hushes its abashed tongue? Europe is having its dies iræ, when will be ours and how? Will it be volcanic upheaval from within or the grim disaster of invasion from without? We have forgotten, but we are not forgot.

CONDÉ B. PALLEN.

Wine in the Holy Sacrifice

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The writer has long wished for authentic information on the following questions: Is ordinary wine (a beverage containing several per cent. of alcohol) absolutely necessary for the celebration of the Mass? Why could not unfermented grape juice be used? If for some good and sufficient reason wine could not be obtained, would the Holy Father, or the Church Universal, have the power to eliminate wine from the Holy Sacrifice and make use of some other liquid? Is there any conceivable condition in which Mass might be celebrated without wine?

New Orleans. V. N. DASPIT.

TO answer our correspondent, whose letter is only one of many similar inquiries occasioned by recent prohibition legislation, it will be necessary to divide his query into two parts, and it will be more convenient to discuss these parts in the reverse order to that in which he has proposed them. First, therefore, we shall inquire whether wine is necessary for the Mass, and secondly what the Church understands by wine?

The answer to the first question is a categorical affirmative. There is no conceivable condition under which Mass might be celebrated without the use of wine. The reason is not far to seek. Without wine there can be no transubstantiation of wine into the Blood of Christ. Without the transubstantiation of wine into the Blood of Christ there can be no Mass, because the twofold consecration is essential to the sacrifice. The Mass is a sacrifice that of its very essence represents the Passion of Christ. It is the carrying out of Our Lord's command, "Do this in commemoration of me." On the cross Christ shed His Blood; at the Last Supper, according to His own statement, His Blood was poured out. Clearly, therefore, in the Mass also the Blood of Christ must be shed. In no other way, however, is the Blood of Christ shed in the Mass, except in so far as by the words of consecration the Precious Blood is placed under a species different from that under which the Body of Christ is constituted; that is, under the species of wine. From this it follows that the consecration of both species is necessary for the essence of the sacrifice. Otherwise there would be no shedding of the Blood of Christ. In reality the Blood of Christ is not separated in the Mass from His Body, because Christ is present, whole and entire, under each species. There is, however, a mystical separation of the Blood when the species, which by the words of consecration contains the Blood of Christ, is placed apart from the species, which by the words of consecration contains the Body of Christ. If a priest, therefore, either through malice or mistake, should consecrate the bread and not the wine, the bread would indeed be changed into the adorable Body of Christ, but there would not be Mass, for the simple reason that one of the essential elements of the Mass would be lacking.

Our correspondent asks if wine might, by papal authority, be eliminated from the Holy Sacrifice. The question has already been answered. Such an elimination would do away with the very essence of the Holy Sacrifice. Perhaps, however, he means to inquire whether the Church would ever permit the single consecration of the bread, knowing at the same time such a consecration would not constitute a Mass. The answer to this question is perfectly clear. It is strictly forbidden by both ecclesiastical and divine law for any priest, under any circumstances, to consecrate the species of bread without also consecrating the species of wine. To do so would be to commit a grave sacrilege. The Church has never given a dispensation to consecrate one species without consecrating the other; she will never give such a dispensation; and Suarez gives it as his opinion that not even the Pope could validly give such a dispensation. The reason he assigns for his statement is, that by so doing the Pope would change the institution of Christ.

That some liquid other than wine might be used for the Mass is simply unthinkable. Suarez scouts the very idea of such a thing. Christ's command was, "Do this in commemoration of me." He not only commanded the sacrifice, but prescribed the manner in which it was to be offered. If, therefore, it can not be offered in the manner He prescribed, it must be omitted altogether. Christ took wine and changed it into His Blood, and He said, "Do this." The great High Priest gave His priests power to do what He had done. He gave them power to celebrate Mass, as He had celebrated it. They have no power to do anything else. Ceremonies and prayers may, indeed, be changed, but the essence of the Mass is fixed forever; to change or modify this, neither priests nor bishops, nor even the Pope, have any power whatever. Wine, and wine alone, can and must be used in the Holy Sacrifice. Such is Christ's law, and the Church has insisted jealously on its observance. As early as the time of St. Augustine there had been heretics who wished to change what Christ had instituted, and to substitute other substances for wine. Thus, for instance, some wished to use cheese, others blood, others water, others milk, and still others grapes. Against them all the Church set her face, and strictly observed the command of her Founder.

Nor has the Church been content to prescribe merely the use of wine, she has been more scrupulous in her interpretation of the words, "Do this." The wine used by Christ at the Last Supper was wine of the grape, the Church insists that the only wine that may be used for the Mass shall be wine of the grape. She has excluded, therefore, not only all those concoctions which are not derived from the grape, although they are so cleverly made as to deceive even the connoisseur and to defy detection by chemical analysis, but such also as are not purely artificial but are derived not from the grape, but from berries and fruits of various kinds. By the word wine she also excludes those beverages which come from the grape, but are not wine, vinegar, for example, which is a corruption of wine, and the liquid which has been made from grapes that have not yet ripened.

What the Church requires for the licit celebration of the Mass is perfect wine, that is to say, pure juice pressed from the grape, and naturally and properly fermented. This fermentation, which is essential for the making of what the Church calls wine, takes place when the natural sugar of the grape turns to ethylic alcohol. A greater or less proportion of alcohol is therefore necessary in the wine that the Church declares to be licit for use in the Mass; and non-alcoholic wines, as they are termed, are not valid matter for consecration. It is true that in cases of necessity the Church does not insist that the process of fermentation shall have been completed, but permits the use of must, or of the pure juice that has recently been pressed from the grape. Must, however, is truly wine, though not perfect wine. But for ordinary cases the Church demands that the sacrificial wine shall be perfect, that is properly and naturally fermented, and she prohibits under pain of mortal sin, the use of any other.

This makes it clear why unfermented grape-juice can not be used in the Holy Sacrifice. It is not the perfect wine which the Church requires. The commercial grape-juice is probably not wine at all. Unless it were certain that it was pure unadulterated juice of the grape, it could not be used under any circumstances; and even if this fact were ascertained beyond all doubt, it would still be illicit for use in the Mass, for the sole reason that it is unfermented. Many canons of the Church deal with the subject, and leave no doubt on the matter. Nor would any say at present that the difficulty about obtaining suitable wine, which has been created by the passage of prohibition laws in certain States, falls within the exceptions allowed by ecclesiastical discipline for the use of unfermented wine. Until the Holy See has changed its legislation on the matter, and any change is extremely unlikely, the use of unfermented grape-juice for the Holy Sacrifice would involve grave sin. Indeed it is inconceivable that it should occur to any Catholic to ask for such a change in what has been the uninterrupted practice of the Church from the very beginning. That a Catholic, influenced by the fanaticism of a few ignorant legislators, should advocate the prohibition of perfect wine in the Holy Sacrifice is a deplorable scandal. J. HARDING FISHER, S.J.

Lodge, Hyslop and Telepathy

WHEN Sir Oliver Lodge, some few months ago, declared that a new world, the realm of the dead, had been opened up, science eagerly requested and awaited his reason for believing so. What was her astonishment to hear the eminent Englishman respond, "Telepathy!" The very word spells condemnation to the spiritistic hypothesis which he essays to uphold. Science is concernful for the apparent doddering of one of her prize thinkers.

Telepathy is the explanation of spiritistic information which opponents of spiritism have generally preferred. For, if there is any such thing as mental communication between the living and the dead, a pari there is such communication between the living and the living. But if the latter is so, who can ever be certain that the former is not false? On the supposition that living minds can furnish mediums with all required news, the hypothesis of discarnate souls becomes useless.

There are several explanations of the manner in which mediums get their knowledge of hidden things—such as fortuitous coincidence, face and muscle reading, "fishing," employment of detectives, consultation of directories, etc. Each one destroys much spiritistic data. But a few instances remain which seem to require a spiritistic or a telepathic interpretation. It is ironical that Lodge should prefer the telepathic.

Telepathy is intercommunion of thought, "independent of the direct channels of sense." Our own Hyslop objects: "Its laws and conditions are not even known." Lodge declares that the Society of Psychical Research has discovered it to be a fact, and he berates those orthodox scientists who deny it. If his contention is true, then the much criticized and opposed psychical society has indeed covered itself with glory. With so much progress already made, there can be little doubt that knowledge of its "laws and conditions" will follow in time. Meanwhile the spiritistic hypothesis is receiving death blows. For telepathy, as will be shown, can be explained naturally, and consequently offers a natural explanation of spiritistic information, thus making the mocking refrain of Puck and Ariel, "What fools these mortals be!" ring with a startling note of truth in the ears of all who believe that the wonders of spiritism are due to discarnate souls.

The simplest clarification of telepathy is, of course, "thought-waves." To this explanation, Hyslop takes vehement objection. At first blush, his querulousness seems justified. Analogies are indeed too often the sins of science. Every one admits that the likening of telepathy to telegraphy presents difficulties; appreciates that "thought-waves," as viewed from a gross material standpoint, should be too delicate for effectual transmission; agrees that communication implies interpretation, and confesses, too, that without a previously arranged code, all telephonic and telegraphic vibrations would be useless noises. But "thought-waves" are still far from incurring a reductio ad absurdum. Their comparison with telegraphy may not be so erroneous after all. That vibrations are only a hypothesis in physics is no reason why they should not be postulated in telepathy, but rather a reason why they should. They have done excellent service there; why not here? That we have not been able to prove vibratory consciousness proves nothing against vibratory telepathy—the latter deals with transmission, not production, of thought. Since the brain, however, is the seat of thought and consists of cells, there is no obvious reason why the activity of those cells could not cause a subtle wave and eject it into the outside world. It is plain, of course, that such a wave would incur speedy annihilation if air were the only means of transit. But ether—indicated by electricity, roentgen rays, radio energies, and so on—is a supersensible substance; from this follows its worth as a "thought-wave" medium.

To explain how "thought-waves" can be more than mere meaningless vibrations, we might advance the theory that cerebral cells are respectively suited to every variety of idea. Sensation commands the occipital lobes of the brain; thought, the lower frontal regions. In the thought section, each cell is capable of receiving and retaining (so to speak) a particular idea. May it not be that a "thought-wave" from the cell in which resides the power of thinking "man" for instance, can reach the corresponding cell in another brain, where the same power resides? May not the impact arouse the idea "man" in the second cell?

The question justly rises: Why does not every one in range of the wave receive its message? The answer would be: Every one's senses are not sufficiently acute for receptivity, and perchance every one has not developed the cell or cells which the wave seeks. For example, if one were to think "Mahomet," a child, no matter how sensitive, could never tell the thought; because no cell in the young mind has ever felt the influence of this idea. If even when the requisite conditions are present, the "thought-wave" fails to deliver its message, it would then seem that it is not sufficiently intense. Semi-successes may be due to partial presence of conditions.

If this explanation offers many difficulties, it presents fewer than spiritism and dispels more. Hyslop sceptically asserts: "It would be very desirable to know something about this i. e., telepathy's mode of acting, but I know nothing about it and I doubt if anybody else does." Such being so, why does he confidently attribute the phenomenon to spirits? He seems to regard "unknown" as a synonym of "supernatural"; as if men's puny minds had conquered one tithe of the natural mysteries about them! Such a sentiment as Hyslop's—tinged with prejudice and pessimism—never blazed the way to truth. The only means we have for plumbing the occult is theory. Hence we should theorize diligently, as the Columbia professor himself does; but so long as that which we seek is likely to be on earth, there is no good reason for bounding with Hyslop and Lodge off the globe.

Nor may the naturalistic explanation of telepathy, which has just been advanced, be censured as savory of materialism. We do not say with old Cabanis, "La pensée est une secretion du cerveaux." We believe with Tyndall that the "chasm" between thought and cerebral activity is "intellectually impassable." But no one will deny that, when the mind is at work, motion takes place in the brain. This movement quite authorizes the assumption of "thought-waves." And surely there is as much reason to believe as not to believe that the impingement of a wave on a particular brain-cell may be a condition on which a particular thought arises. Thought affects the nerval substance of the brain; may it not be that affectation of the nerval substance stimulates (we do not say generates) thought?

To be sure, it is hard to understand how telepathy can possibly work through the immense distances which it must often cover, if we are to believe that it gives such mysterious information as forewarnings of death, and so forth. Science, however, has experimented on long-distance telepathy with much success. Nor let us forget how wireless telegraphy has annihilated space and the definiteness with which it delivers its message even at most astounding distances.

Says Hyslop: "If telepathy acquires them (the facts), it certainly has an amazing power to select the right ones from the memories of sitters and other living persons at a distance." But it may be retorted that mediums do not always give the right facts. The element of truth in their message is, more often than not, lost in a hodge-podge of incoherencies and falsities. Besides, a modicum of fact (and surely psychical researchers will concede that mediums can acquire that from the sitters), with a portion of accidentally correct guessing, and an abundance of clever handling, could constitute a message at whose uncanny accuracy even a much less spiritistically inclined person than Hyslop would shudder.

To our complaint of the error that flecks, if not characterizes, almost every spiritistic message, Hyslop haughtily tells us there is no reason to suppose that spirits are omniscient. True. But there certainly is much reason to expect them, if they be at all, not to be imbeciles. Freed from the body, which, by its very nature, must hamper the soul, should not the latter in all reasonableness possess an intellect less clouded than before?

Even the mistakes and confusions of spiritistic messages are to Hyslop's mind, a point in favor of spiritism. It is quite to be expected, he asserts, that the spirits' memories of carnate doings should fade away. Separated from the body, the soul forgets its past imprisoned existence. Granted that he is right: then we can never expect spirits to prove their identity sufficiently or satisfactorily. Since, therefore, they are not able to prove themselves to be the souls of the dead, Sir Oliver Lodge is wasting energy and ink by trying to make them prove the doctrine of immortality. If there were no greater authority on this momentous topic of a future life than the English knight and his galaxy of lesser lights, despair would be the logical state of men's minds.

Fortunately there is an authority, incomparably greater. The eyes of the civilized world turn, and have turned for centuries, to Palestine, not to England, America, or any other country, for the consoling truth of eternity.

EDWARD F. MURPHY, M.A.

The Real Menace

THE bill recently introduced in the California legislature to appropriate $5,000 for the support of quadruplets, born to the wife of a citizen of Shasta County, is indicative of the drift of modern thought. To the student it serves the same purpose as statistics showing the increase in divorces, the growth of militarism, more frequent festival days, paternalistic legislation looking toward the amelioration of the condition of the starving, and super-luxurious living. It certainly recalls pagan Rome and her vain attempts to save the State without supernatural aid of any kind.

The decline of the Roman Empire had set in as early as the time of Cæsar Augustus. The tendency not to marry, and when married to refrain from having children, was as much a problem then as now. The Romans, in order to rectify the evil and maintain their citizenship, legislated upon the subject by awarding prizes and inflicting penalties. The Emperor said, "My only view is the perpetuity of the republic. I have in mind the penalties of those who have disobeyed (i. e., the law to marry), and with respect to the rewards, they are such as I do not know whether virtue has ever received greater. For less will a thousand men expose life itself, and yet will not these engage you to take a wife and provide for children?"

The modern world, from its vantage point of approximately 2,000 years, can look back upon these words of the Emperor with more appreciation than his hearers probably had. History tells us that because those words were not heeded, the most perfect civilization, from a legal point of view at least, which ever graced this sphere, crumbled into dust. The idea behind the legislation was correct. The methods adopted to secure results were wrong. Pardonably wrong for the Romans who had not yet known Christ and His Church; ignorantly, sinfully wrong for Americans who should know better.

The truth is that this question of marriage, and its attendant duties and obligations, is one that the State as such, alone and unaided by the Church, can not adequately handle, not even to the extent of protecting itself. Yet we have the spectacle of States often ignoring the Church and in many instances actually hostile to her. Not pessimistically, but just as sensible men, willing to look history squarely in the face, can Americans feel any too sure as to the lasting qualities of their own republic, when methods once tried with failure are being resorted to again, and when the evils sought to be eliminated are unmistakably present and immanent?

A true conception of the State, its functions, and the position of the Church in respect to it, is urgently needed. Antagonistic bigotry on the part of statesmen must be replaced by constructive, legal, philosophical thinking. This can not be secured through the columns of a Catholic daily newspaper, even if one were forthcoming. It grows in a deeper, richer soil. Our schools and universities must be looked to, virile pens of stalwart writers must be enlisted, Catholic philosophy must be studied, understood and promulgated.

If personalities are pardonable, there is a dearth of laymen with the thorough training acquired for strong leadership, and sadder still is the recognized fact—and it might just as well be recognized—that our priests are not the leaders they should be. The real "menace" is not published in Missouri, it is spread broadcast throughout the country by our own ignorance. There is a storehouse of truth, law and right living locked in our Catholic treasure-house. But the doors are barred. Some one must throw them open.

Why should we expect the Protestant public to accept our institutions, our philosophy, our attitude toward life, our remedies for the amelioration of present conditions upon our platitudinous say-so. The mob scenes may add "go" to the drama here and there throughout the evening, but there must be the leading characters to carry the action along. These leading characters can not be developed in a day. In fact the future of America does not depend upon the present but the coming generations. The seeds must be sown in the young. Catholic education must be supported if the future is to take care of itself. This is not a debatable question. Neither does it take an outlay of a million dollars to start the machinery. Good schools and universities are now open and running. It behooves the parents to see to it that their children attend. Lack of means is no excuse in this age and generation. No boy with the proper spirit, and the right encouragement, need lack a college education. A thousand avenues are open to him. The rewards are large, and the future of the Church depends upon it.

WILLIAM H. LEARY.

The Daily Paper

MOST of the correspondents who have contributed to AMERICA'S instructive discussion on the subject of a Catholic daily agree on one point, that a national Catholic daily or a Catholic daily press in the English language is highly desirable. But they differ widely as to its feasibility. We might distinguish between a metropolitan daily with the big circulation of a typical sensational sheet, a quasi metropolitan daily enjoying a comparatively modest popularity, and a small-scale daily preparing the way for a more ambitious publication and steadily undermining the undisputed sway of its objectionable rivals.

The case against the first is rather strong. Unless our people, inspired by their leaders, bring to the solution of the press problem the same unanimity and energy they displayed in building up our excellent school system, for example, a metropolitan daily with the subscription list of a Chicago Tribune or of a Hearstian "yellow peril" seems practically impossible. As Messrs. Michael Williams and Horace Foster showed in former issues of AMERICA, such a publication would require a two or three-million-dollar corporation or an enormous endowment.

It is true that since the hierarchy declared the public schools inadequate for the education of our children, we have raised hundreds of millions of dollars for our schools. We are building million-dollar cathedrals. Generous Catholics annually give to churches, schools, convents, hospitals, etc., public bequests and donations amounting to at least $4,000,000. Why then could we not endow a few large dailies? As soon as we shall have been taught by sad experience that the ruling press, a jellyfish affair from the standpoint of true Christianity, is the continuation school of our youth, we will either do this, or form the requisite stock companies, or imitate our enterprising brethren in Austria by putting back of our press the power of organized activity. Perhaps Pope Benedict XV gave us a hint in this direction when he recently founded the Good Press Society in Italy.

The resulting dailies would not need to be official organs. They could be managed by good Catholic laymen, imbued with due respect for ecclesiastical authority and submitting theological and knotty moral questions to an experienced priest connected with the staff. This arrangement would not expose the Church to additional vituperation, and the respective bishops would not be responsible for possible blunders or the publication's attitude on even civic affairs.

But it appears doubtful whether any amount of endowment could give a circulation, rivaling that of our sensation-mongering dailies, to even the best edited, live and genuinely American daily, taking a keen interest in industrial, civic, economic, and social as well as religious and educational questions and happenings the world over. The management could not figure upon the subscriptions of even the majority of Catholic newspaper readers who would come within its normal field of appeal. If all our people relished clean reading matter, the ruling dailies of our larger cities would not count their subscribers by hundreds of thousands. Moreover, human nature is much the same here as in Europe. Even in Belgium, Germany and Austria, where our coreligionists are well organized, Catholic dailies have comparatively small subscription lists. The Kölnische Volkszeitung, the world's leading Catholic daily, has only 27,500; the Augsburger Postzeitung, about 75,000; the Vienna Reichspost, 25,000. But the Liberal Vienna Neue Freie Presse boasts 66,000; the Munich Neueste Nachrichten, 118,000; Hamburger Generalanzeiger, 110,000 (Dr. J. Eberle, "Grossmacht Presse," 1912, pp. 146-148). Non-Catholic conservative organs fare even worse than Catholic dailies. The Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung has only 6,000 subscribers. Of 410 Center Party papers, 189 a few years ago gave their circulation as 1,309,550, an average of not quite 7,000 each! In general the ratio between the total circulation of Catholic publications and that of Liberal, Socialistic and "colorless" sheets is about one to ten! Still three out of every eight inhabitants of Germany are Catholics.

Evidently a Catholic daily intended as a sort of pulpit-extension for convert-making among non-Catholics looks like a chimera. If great popularity is to be the criterion of success for English Catholic dailies, we had better never launch any. The Church herself is not, comparatively speaking, popular. She is not of this world. Neither are Christian decency, truth and fairness most popular. Catholic dailies can never compete on an even basis with the ruling secular press, which has the world, the flesh and the devil as allies.

However, this unpleasant truth must not discourage us. To have thoroughly Christian dailies defending the Church effectively at every turn, is one thing; to boast popular organs commanding the attention of sensation-hungry multitudes, quite another. Without attaining to "great" dailies in the current sense of the term, American Catholics can develop their press into a tremendous power for good and an ever-ready instrument for telling organized activity. As the foregoing figures show, our Austrian and German brethren have only quasi metropolitan journals. But these hold the enemy at bay and do wonders for the Faith. How many souls now being corrupted by a salacious press could be saved if only half of our Catholics were given the day's news in a wholesome form!

For this purpose the "spread-eagle" dailies, so typical of our country, are not necessary. Look over the average daily and see how many columns are made up of useless repetitions, detailed accounts not fit for respectable company, and long-winded tales about odd happenings having no bearing on normal life! Do you not think that a large percentage of our workers and business men would, after a hard day at the factory or office, prefer to get the story of the world's doings in a condensed and well-balanced account, rather than in a caricature emphasizing the bizarre and prurient at the expense of virtue and true progress? That a large percentage of the newspaper readers are longing for a paper that will tell the truth, give real news in due proportion, and express sound, or at any rate honest, opinions on every subject of importance, is shown by the success of dailies like the Christian Science Monitor and the Springfield Republican. Started only six years ago, the former has 55,000 subscribers! Though its management sank some of Mrs. Eddy's money, the Monitor is now a financial success. This daily does not carry the Associated Press service, but "it covers the news of the world fully by means of the United Press dispatches and special telegrams from its own correspondence, both in this country and in Europe." (Fortnightly Review, Vol. XXI, No. 21.) The telegraphic reports are supplemented by special correspondence. The general tone and the typographical makeup of the Monitor is refreshing when contrasted with that of the average daily.

No doubt its success is in part due to the zeal of a well-organized religious sect. But how about the Springfield Republican? In the face of a strong drift toward sensationalism during the past decades, the late Samuel Bowles kept this daily on a conservative basis (New York Evening Post, March 15, 1915). And "it has been a steady and profitable commercial enterprise." (Outlook, March 24, 1915.) It gives "the local news of human interest without descending to ludicrous and futile trivialities." At the same time it brings "both national and foreign news in a form as good as, and sometimes even better than, the presentation of such news in the so-called great metropolitan dailies."

While not the ideal of a Christian daily, the Republican furnishes a strong argument in favor of launching Catholic dailies. True, our Catholics lack thorough organization. They suffer from nationality wrangles. But who will venture to assert that, all in all, they are as hungry for suggestive and obscene reading matter as is the average American? Would such a statement not imply inefficiency on the part of the pastors and hierarchy? Do supernatural assistance and the Sacraments not exert an elevating influence on a large percentage of our people? Does a good Catholic not consider indecent talk forbidden and salacious reading matter obscene?

Are we justified, then, in saying that all our people are blind to the need of a clean, Catholic press? If you answer, "yes," I ask: "Why could American Catholics of French, German, Bohemian and Polish descent build up a creditable weekly press and even launch a dozen Catholic dailies? Lack of familiarity with the English language does not explain this. In German, for instance, we have many Liberal and non-Catholic publications and dailies like the New York Staatszeitung, the Illinois Staatszeitung, the Germania, etc. Still the Catholic daily, Amerika (St. Louis), has nearly 20,000 subscribers.

The writer heartily wishes Godspeed to Dr. Lawrence Flick, of Philadelphia, in his partly successful attempt to raise $2,000,000. May the prospective Chicago venture too give us a first-class national Catholic daily, proving an incentive to a chain of truly Christian dailies in all our larger cities! But this fortunate outcome would be unique and nothing short of marvelous—a triumphant jump from a weakly weekly press to a metropolitan daily press. Neither Belgium, France, Austria nor Germany shows a similar gigantic leap forward.

The great Vienna Reichspost, for instance, which led our dailies during the first Balkan War, was a puny sheet until the great Piusverein, organized about eight years ago, put back of it an army of press apostles gathering funds and soliciting subscriptions. To-day it is a formidable rival of the Jewish Neue Freie Presse, but it has less than half the latter's circulation. Similarly the Neuen Züricher Nachrichten was in 1904 changed from a three-times-a-week into a daily publication. It is now the most widely read and influential Catholic organ in Switzerland. And its regular size is just four pages!

Is similar healthy progress, based on development from small-scale dailies, impracticable in this country? Do several dozen pages and hundreds of thousands of readers constitute the essence of a daily newspaper? Why can ten or fifteen thousand socialists publish in New York City—in addition to a German organ—a six-page daily, not living principally by dishing up social-sewer morsels tickling the public palate? The New York Call receives about $110,000 from its 19,800 subscribers ($6 per annum). Its advertising revenue is small when compared with that of the big dailies. Of course, generous comrades make up the deficit every now and then. But the total annual income of the Call probably does not exceed $140,000. Some of our Catholic weeklies take in over half that amount. Why should not some of the more promising of these be able to imitate the example of Mr. Nicholas Gonner who is trying to reach a vigorous but modest daily through semi-weekly and more frequent editions of the Dubuque Catholic Tribune? Why can not generous Catholics, who offer handsome sums to hospitals, colleges, etc., be induced for once to add their donation to some disinherited and promising weekly, to develop stock companies of several hundred thousand dollars? The thing need not be done in a day or even in a year. Systematic agitation would in a few years give us in our centers of Catholicism, corporations able to support four or six-page dailies. Such publications are considered by no less experienced a Catholic journalist than Mr. Arthur Preuss, the safest and most promising means of solving our burning press problem. (Fortnightly Review, mid-April issue.) We have sufficient financial resources and journalistic forces to attempt this solution in a practical and humble manner. God's blessing would do the rest. May He inspire us with half the enterprise of the socialists and Christian Scientists! May He teach us to quit rainbow chasing!

ANTHONY BECK,
The Dubuque Catholic Tribune.

The New Woman After God's Heart

THERE is one solution of the woman problem. It is simple and practical as it is world-embracing. It answers to the moral needs of woman, while it implies at the same time the respect which man is bound to show to her, and thus insures in fullest measure the consideration which she must merit and receive. Duly appreciated by woman herself, it would bring about a renewal of the hearts of men more mighty than any social revolution. It is the solution which God Himself has given, and which, therefore, can not fail. It is all summed up in woman's great ideal, the Virgin Mother.

The application of this solution depends upon woman herself. Let her return to the ideal which God has given and the world will follow after her. In her hands is placed, if she is true to duty, the training and formation of the future generations. Men will largely be what woman makes them. A saintly mother's influence, accompanied by her prayers, is all but sacramental. It is a divinely-intended means of obtaining God's blessings for the child of her love even from the moment of conception. And who shall estimate the silent power of a sister's purity or the all-transforming energy of a true wife's love and courage. Here, therefore, is woman's hope and here her sovereign task. Through Mary she will lead the world to Christ.

The ideal woman, the woman in whose heart God is living as an abiding presence and by whom His Word is ever brought anew to mankind; the woman who will ponder His counsels in her soul and will daily help to shape after His own eternal designs the destiny of the human race; the woman who will induce God Himself to anticipate the advent of His mercies because of her, as the water was changed into wine even before Christ's time had come, is she who in prayer, purity and labor will reproduce in her life the marvel of Mary, who in all her actions is moved like her by the Spirit of Love. Likest to Mary, she will of all mortals be likest to Christ in beauty and grace and power. If a virgin, she will be the mother of countless souls; if a mother, she will never lose the sweetness of her purity. Her sway will be unbounded not only over the hearts of men, but will reach even unto the counsels of the eternal Trinity. She will be the New Woman after God's own Heart.

Sweetly in that sweetest of pure love poems of modern days, "The Silver Wedding," has Alfred Gurney celebrated this ideal, singing the charms of the woman who has enriched his life and with him the lives of countless others; whose beauty, like Mary's, can never wither or grow old:

> If loving words make music sweet
> Whene'er we part, whene'er we meet,
> I hear the words that Mary said
> When she was angel-visited;
> If tender eyes return my gaze,
> I picture Mary's smile, and praise
> The Wisdom that was fain to make
> All women gracious for her sake,
> Whose was the plenitude of grace,
> The Chosen of the chosen race.
> I see her mirrored in your face.
> * * * * * *
> Beneath the love-light of your eyes,
> With homage, gratitude, surprise,
> I kneel your yielded hand to kiss—
> Our Lady's name be blest for this!

Woman, in the home, in the workshop or the office; amid surroundings most natural for her or under conditions thrust upon her by dire necessity, can still be true everywhere and all times to that sublime ideal, Mary, the Virgin and Mother. Whether in the service of the Temple, in the lowly house of Nazareth, in the stable of Bethlehem or in exile amid an idolatrous people; whether in prayer or labor, in contempt beneath the cross or honored in the assembly of the faithful; whether aiding the afflicted or counseling, encouraging and inspiring the Apostles; whether raised to the highest contemplation or engaged in the most menial occupations, she was ever the perfect woman. In her, pure human nature reached its highest dignity and the divine image of the God-Man lay reflected in her soul as the heavens in unrippled waters. Economic conditions may change, social relations and circumstances may vastly vary, but never the supreme ideal of Christian womanhood, Christ as seen in Mary. Creatures can reach no higher goal. Here, therefore, is woman's place, her ideal position in God's plan of the redemption, to be one with Christ as Mary was in prayer, charity and zeal:

> Numbered with those who learn of her
> To play the part of comforter,
> Whose lips, conversant with her song,
> Her lofty minstrelsy prolong;
> Numbered with those whose feet pursue
> Her footsteps all life's journey through,
> Her daughter and her sister too.

Through a woman came sin and through a woman salvation. Woman's influence for weal or for woe is unbounded. There must consequently be established an everlasting enmity between her and every form of evil. God has gifted her sex with a finer and more delicate perception of moral purity than man possesses. It is from her that in his earliest years he must receive his lifelong attraction for this virtue as for every other spiritual excellence. It is through her that he must be helped to his victory over temptation in youth and in manhood. It is by her, finally, that he will be heartened to do battle throughout life for every good cause, in despite of adversity and death itself, a knight without stain and without fear.

But how, amid the perversities of modern aims and aspirations, is woman to preserve her own heart and intellect uncontaminated by the impurities and errors of the day? By what other means indeed except by looking at that perfect model God has shown her upon the mount? To this likeness of Christ, as she beholds it in Mary, is the temple beautiful of her own life to be erected even to the holy of holies where the Divinity perpetually resides within her soul. So will she never wander afar, like that world denounced by Christ, in the way of the gentiles who know not God. So will she never err and, by erring, lead mankind astray with her. The less the dangers of the day are dreaded the greater is their reality, the more imminent is their peril, the stronger is the reason for returning again to that one ideal wherein alone can be found in highest excellence and tenderest humanity

> All, all, that is most pure, most good,
> In God-created womanhood.

It is a fallacy and a misapprehension of terms to speak of the ideal conceived by the modern paganism as the "new woman." We know it to be nothing more in truth than the type of the ancient Eve, unregenerated, defiant of the will of God, lusting to taste the fruit of the tree of knowledge of good and evil. It is only the old leaven of our fallen human nature reasserting itself. In its place the Church presents to the world the one true ideal, the New Eve, after whom is formed to the likeness of Christ the New Woman by the grace of God.

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S. J.

COMMUNICATIONS

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

Black Death and Equal Pay

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Seeing that the columns of AMERICA are quite often open to comments on the "silliness, shallowness and sentimentality" of the "fair sex," by all sorts and conditions of men, and when "Fair Play" (by a woman), in the current issue (April 10), takes up several columns trying to prove how inferior woman's influence is, and how incapable she is of taking part or having a voice in the business of life, and not neglecting the home, is it not time to call a halt and take stock, as it were, of the uselessness of such expenditures of energy, fighting something that is sure to win, viz.: a more active participation of women in public life? It is worse than foolishness to theorize about ideal conditions of society when we have certain actual conditions to face and adjust ourselves to the best we can.

Now, the relation and dependence of the sexes have not changed since the Garden of Eden's time, but conditions of social life are constantly shifting, and though the "good old days" of the past were in reality no better than these days, yet the world is progressing and opening its eyes to the fact that "I am my brother's keeper." This is witnessed to, even among the Catholic laity, by the spread and interest in federations of Catholic clubs, benevolent associations and charities. God never promised, when He made men and women, to carry on the work of the world, that there would always be sufficient men, capable and intelligent enough to do all the work outside of the home, leaving to women the more noble and greater task of bearing and rearing the children; laying the foundations in their hearts and souls of a finer generation yet to come. Neither did Leo XIII, who is quoted as saying that "the workman's wage should be sufficient to support a family in 'frugal comfort,'" say that woman should not receive equal pay with man, when she has to work by his side in the classroom, counting-house, factory and field. In fact, there are so many different branches of industry where woman excels man, and so many where men only can do what is required, that the question of equal work and equal pay is very hard to settle. To try to prove that those creatures who wear a coat and collar are trying more conscientiously to do their duty in and toward society than those others who wear a petticoat and frills is rank nonsense. Yet there stands "M. M. A." saying that black death promises to follow in the wake of "equal pay" and "equal rights," and that when such a theory advances from philosophical thought into practical life, the home will "die out" for want of economical support. It takes only a glance at one's immediate circle to see how many homes would "die out" annually, if the women did not become the wage-earners and keep them alive by earnest, sincere and persistent work, even sometimes under the hardship of less pay.

In spite of "M. M. A.'s" statement that the home would "die out," ask the successful business women of one's acquaintance if they would now, or at any time in the future, be willing to trade their economic independence for the companionship and love of some decent man, home and children, and see what per cent. you will get to answer in the affirmative. Ninety-nine women out of a hundred value love, home and children more than a career.

> I sought to win me a name
> That would ring in the ears of the world,
> How can I, work, with small pink fists,
> About my fingers curled.
>
> So good-by to name and fame,
> They are scarce worth at the best,
> One touch of this warm, red little mouth,
> With its lips against my breast.

More and more men value freedom, liberty and license than they do wife and children and home, so that must be the reason entitling them to more pay to care for that family which does not exist, and is not wanted. I never knew before that one's need was the basis on which wages were fixed, but supposed it was regulated by ability and intelligence given to the work, and also by the demand and supply. If women are not as good as men in the classroom, how strange that most Catholic children, boys as well as girls, should usually begin their school life under the supervision of the Teaching Orders of women. How remiss in their duty are our bishops in allowing the future race of men to be stunted and stultified in the innocence of youth, by being under a woman for instruction in "Geography." No one of intelligence ever thought that the influence of any two people was just the same, but may not each be equally necessary and each be deserving of "equal pay."

As for "equal rights," I suppose "M. M. A." is hitting at the ballot, or rather those who are working for equal suffrage. Now, none of them believe that the millennium will begin with equal, universal suffrage, but they do want us to be honest when we say: "A government of the people, for the people, and by the people." I do not intend to submit a brief for woman suffrage, but I must say that women, as a body, stand for peace.

Last summer, just before war was declared in Europe, a great body of women, many thousands, representing thirty different countries, met in convention in Rome and, among other resolutions voted on, they stood unanimously for peace, and voiced the belief that the best way to inaugurate peace was to begin with the disarmament of nations; they did not advocate the masculine idea that preparedness for war was the best way to insure lasting and permanent peace. In all meetings of women's clubs, peace is the dominant wish. "M. M. A." seems to forget that non-Catholics do not hear as often as we do the risen Lord's greeting: "Peace be unto you," and if the various clubs, teaching, as they do, the fellowship of man and the sisterhood of woman, make more clear the fact that we are not isolated atoms, but units in the great social body, whose strength and force is determined by the purity of those units (as no chain is stronger than its weakest link), then every means and cause that help that idea to fulfilment should receive all encouragement possible, since we are not claiming something of only passing benefit, but are striving to improve conditions of life for ourselves and our children's children. At present there is a convention of women's clubs in my city, and to hear the president-general of the federated clubs of the United States tell how many things have been done for the improvement of conditions in factories, for child labor, for the safety of girls and all others who are caught in the grasp of commercial civilization, and are unable to help themselves, makes one realize that the home is not dying out, because women are insisting on "equal rights" in order to work for humanity. These are only a few ideas for "M. M. A.'s" consideration on one or two objectionable points in an otherwise admirable article.

San Antonio. E. P. McG.

Vaudeville

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A copy of AMERICA under the date of January 30, containing an article by Dr. James J. Walsh with the caption "How Our Young Folk Are Entertained," was given me a week or so ago by a priest who goes to vaudeville shows because he, like many of his brother priests I know, feels pretty sure they will not be made uncomfortable by seeing and hearing offensive things.

I read the article with the same interest and respect that anything Dr. Walsh says merits but I can not help feeling that in this particular instance his deductions are not altogether correct. I have made my living as an actor on the vaudeville stage for the past nine years, and I have never in all that time seen or played on the bill with any such program as he saw on the occasion of his visit to a high-class variety theater on Twelfth Night, and which he says had in every number he witnessed some element of viciousness. And I am quite sure that the countless number of priests who find wholesome relaxation in the vaudeville theaters throughout the country will bear me out in the contention that what he saw was a notorious exception to the rule.

I have seen things on the vaudeville stage which were in bad taste, some which struck me as pretty vulgar and one or two that were inexcusable on any pretext, theatrical or otherwise. But the vast majority of "turns" which are presented in reputable vaudeville theaters are singularly free from viciousness. They may be common, they may not meet with our ideas of what constitutes polite entertainment and they may be sensational, but they are, as a whole, clean.

I do not agree with Dr. Walsh in the position he takes that even the type of acts he saw have any pronounced evil effect on the minds of the people who look at them. Vaudeville audiences do not analyze what they see and hear. Their enjoyment is purely superficial and they go to a show to be amused, not to hold a post mortem on the morals of the program, and they do not go through any sustained mental operation to see whether the things that entertain them possess theological or sociological or philosophical errors. So the people who laughed at the child making faces at her grandparent laughed at the face made, not the irreverent idea Dr. Walsh's analytical mind saw back of it; they were amused by the dream of the hop fiend and its finish with the policeman's night-stick as an alarm clock, without being tempted to take a "pull at the pipe." Personally I think the presentation of sketches like the headline feature Dr. Walsh saw, which by the way came from the legitimate stage, is altogether to be condemned and from actual count I believe there are not ten of that type in all that class of variety numbers. But after all, why make such a row over seeing women drinking and smoking on a stage when it is possible to see it done in the smartest and most popular hotels and cafés in New York or any other big city? Why hold the vaudeville theater responsible for making irreverence funny when the young people who go, should have been taught the virtue of its opposite, long before they were permitted to go to a theater at all? Why accuse of viciousness the girl who did her acrobatics in a union suit, and say nothing of the indecent dresses of the women of "high class" who sit in the audience, and criticize her for scant attire, when the safe performance of her tricks often makes such attire necessary? In her street attire she is, in all probability, more decent than a number of those who may be seen at many a so-called "Catholic" charity ball. Many a woman wearing tights in the theater would be ashamed to be found dead in gowns worn at social functions.

The blame for conditions in the theaters to-day can be laid at the door of the great public which goes to see nasty shows and having seen them goes out and says "Wasn't that awful!" And especially is this true of whatever evil there may be on the variety stage. Women make vaudeville, and if the women who go to vaudeville shows and find things unclean will protest to the management at the box office, the act complained of will be very short-lived. With all respect to Dr. Walsh, that is what he should have done instead of writing his article for AMERICA. He and every other man and woman whose name means something should make their objections to those who are in positions to administer the remedy, not indulge in the national pastime of "passing the buck" to some one else. The stage and the productions of the stage are made to meet the public demands and the place to start the housecleaning is outside the theater, not in it, and if it must be carried into the theater let it be confined to the auditorium, and the stage proper will take care of itself. I think if Dr. Walsh, or the editor of AMERICA, could stand behind the stage curtain and watch through the "peek hole" the faces of the young folk who are to be taken care of everywhere except home; by every one except their parents, and protected from every evil influence their elders stand for, they would learn very quickly that the vaudeville theater can teach them little in the ways of sophistication.

The most discouraging feature those of us in the variety world who are trying to do wholesome things have to combat, is the sight of people of so-called high class sitting in tacit approbation of "turns" that vigorous protests lodged in the proper quarter would make impossible, especially when the persons making them are of sufficient position in the public eye to render them of value to the managers. The practice of holding the actors and the manager responsible for unsavory conditions in the entertainment business reminds me of the story of the girl who was being snubbed socially because her father ran a saloon, and exclaimed with a good deal of justification: "I don't see why all the penalty should be paid by the people who sell the whiskey, and none at all by those who drink it."

Peoria. JAMES WILLIAM FITZPATRICK.

Prohibition vs. Temperance

To the Editor of AMERICA:

When I say that a little more charity should be shown the self-sacrificing, enthusiastic and desperately in earnest advocates of prohibition, and assert that their movement is not going to be overcome by his methods, but may be directed by sympathetic reasoning, it does not follow that its advocates are my friends, as Mr. Maurice says, whether fit subjects or not for the State Hospital. It would be a strange version of the Gospel that should imply that the Catholic priest is to treat only his friends with charity; but perhaps Mr. Maurice has studied some other version than that which contains the Sermon on the Mount. As to his pleasantry about "his friends," if I must make a choice, I should very much rather have for a friend a self-sacrificing, enthusiastic and desperately in earnest advocate of prohibition than a Catholic who writes in such a way as to lead the reader to infer that he would not give up alcoholic liquors for the sake of souls for which, his own included, Jesus Christ gave up His life-blood.

Mr. Maurice says that I ignore the real question; that his contention is: (1) that our present liquor laws are altogether too lax. He would abolish our present type of bar, and permit wines and light beers to be sold only in restaurants; and if anybody particularly wanted it, he would prohibit the manufacture of all other liquors altogether, notwithstanding that by doing so he would "trespass upon a fundamental human right." He considers that such a program of temperance reform would be practical and go far toward a real solution of the liquor problem. To a person who has given much study to the problem it does not seem so easily solved as that. At the first C. T. A. U. of A. convention that I attended, in Chicago in 1884, Bishop Ireland showed that a wine and beer license was not practical. Would not permitting manufacturers of liquors to sell or deliver to licensed retailers only, be a better program? It would abolish Saturday night and Sunday drinking in homes, boarding houses and clubs. Saloons are bad enough, but clubs and the delivery of liquor to private houses are worse. This plan would seem to be more practical than his and would appear not to trespass, as his does, "upon a fundamental human right." For any one by going to the retailer could get a drink if entitled to it, which would be more practical than having to go to a restaurant; and I believe it would go farther toward solving the liquor problem than his, though neither of them would go very far in that direction.

As long as the Catholic Church had control of the Latin countries and the Philippines they had no liquor problem; and if the admonitions of the Second and Third Plenary Councils of Baltimore and of the late Pontiffs were followed, they would go very far toward solving the liquor problem in this country. My plan is to follow them, and no other plan will succeed so well; and unless it is followed, national prohibition is only a question of time.

He contends (2) that our liquor laws are not properly enforced, which I suppose no one will deny; but he may not be assigning the real reason of their non-enforcement. For (3) that "our law officers in every city of the land are the ephemeral creatures of the lowest grade of politicians" is a rather sweeping assertion; it may have too many exceptions to prove true. As to his "idea in brief": since he is prepared, if anybody wants it, to prohibit the manufacture of all other alcoholic liquors except wines and light beers, although it would be "compulsory prohibition" and, according to him, "trespass upon a fundamental human right," and since "we most certainly" would not enforce the law, his idea seems of very little if any worth.

Just one more paragraph lest you invoke the clôture. Mr. Maurice would prohibit altogether the manufacture of all alcoholic liquors except wines and light beers if anybody particularly wanted it. This is more than I would do. I have said somewhere that local option will not solve the liquor problem, and that total abstinence is the ideal for the individual and prohibition for the country, but I have limited my activities to the former and such legislation as I thought would favor it. But if any one hopes to solve the problem by legislation short of country-wide "prohibition of the manufacture of alcoholic liquors except for medicinal and sacramental purposes," he is doomed to disappointment, if I know anything about the matter, and after thirty years' study I should. I have not advocated prohibition, but I have tried to make people understand that it is not against the teachings of the Catholic Church; for I believe there is a danger ahead that has not been publicly recognized so far as I am aware. I am not a theologian, but I have been teaching catechism for fifty years—a dozen different kinds, from that of Trent down—and have failed to find in any of them that to "prohibit the manufacture of alcoholic liquors except for medicinal and sacramental purposes" is contrary to Catholic teachings. If it were in any of them, half a century's teaching should have found it. I have no reason to suspect that the Catholic Church forbids prohibition; perhaps the day will come when I will advocate it. But whether it comes or not, those who advocate it should be treated charitably.

"Subscriber" must come out over his right name, if he wants to be noticed.

Scottdale, April 20, 1915. M. A. LAMBING.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I am much pleased to note that Mr. Maurice, in you issue of April 17, has given us some "brass tacks" instead of ridicule. He contends that our liquor laws are lax (in his original article he said, "Most of our States have passably good liquor laws"), that they are not properly enforced, and that our law officers in every city in the land are the creatures of low-grade politicians. I know nothing about Pennsylvania; but the liquor laws of our Western States are not lax. We have legislated on everything from free lunch to high license in our attempts to "regulate" the liquor traffic. I will agree that our liquor laws are not rigidly enforced; but the failure is due not so much to our law officers as to the fact that the open sale of liquor weakens the moral forces of a community. It was only last week that a fine young Catholic business man, who dared to come out in the open in a local option fight, informed me that he was waited on by a committee of liquor dealers who told him that he must either pull out of the fight or suffer a loss of business. "There's the rub." Men otherwise courageous, quake with fear when they are asked to take a stand against the encroachments of the liquor traffic. Law officers can not be expected to do their duty under such conditions. To quote Archbishop Ireland ("The Saloon") "It is a manifest, though a most lamentable, fact that the liquor influence in the cities of America makes void of effect restrictive liquor legislation, and establishes the violation of law as the normal condition of affairs." Take liquor out of our cities and men will be able to see straight.

But Mr. Maurice tells us that he, too, is opposed to the saloon. He says it is a "corrupting institution." And to cure the evil, he would change its name to "restaurant" and "permit wines and light beers to be distributed." He would prohibit the manufacture of other liquors if anybody wanted it; but he would prefer their sale under restrictions if not consumed on the premises. And he says he is practical. Why, doesn't he know that one of the worst evils we have is the liquor-selling restaurant? It is there that drinking is made "respectable." It is there that the girl learns to drink. A certain Chicago restaurant is advertising the fact that it does not serve liquors; and there will be more such restaurants. It is very evident that Mr. Maurice has never lived in a town where the bottle trade is good, or he would not offer as a solution of the problem the "not-to-be-consumed-on-the-premises" remedy.

To prove his contention that prohibition doesn't prohibit, Mr. Maurice avoids the States where it has been given some kind of a trial, and takes us statistically to the "moonshine" districts of the South, among illiterate negroes, and a backward class of whites who religiously believe that they have a right to make their own whiskey. Surely he doesn't want us to take him seriously. "Moonshining" in the Southern mountains was a problem before Mr. Maurice was born, and it will continue to be a problem until the people engaged in it are raised to a higher level. The mere fact that the illicit still is almost wholly confined to a few States in the South is evidence in itself that it has nothing to do with the question of prohibition. I do not know the South, but I understand that prohibition laws have been passed there to keep liquor away from the negro, who should not be allowed to use it under any conditions. That being true, Mr. Maurice's six million gallons are easily accounted for. The whites do not want prohibition for themselves.

Cities and States that have given prohibition a fair trial seldom or never go back into the wet column. If prohibition were such a failure as is claimed, this would not be true. The official records of Mitchell, South Dakota, show 158 arrests during the "dry" period from July 1, 1908 to April 15, 1909. Of these 48 were for drunkenness and 67 for vagrancy, as against 462 arrests during the "wet" period from July 1, 1909, to April 15, 1910, of which 258 were for drunkenness and 101 for vagrancy. Mitchell is again in the "dry" column, and I predict it will stay there. The Chicago Tribune of March 28 carries a Washington dispatch quoting Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Peters to the effect that "the revenue from whiskey has shrunk over $2,000,000 a year." On account of decreased consumption of liquor, the Government has found it necessary to discharge some of its employees in the Peoria distilleries. A large Ohio brewery failed recently and gave as a reason decreased consumption by the Southern trade. These are just a few of the straws that show which way the wind is blowing. Let Mr. Maurice turn his eyes on some of the successes of prohibition for a while instead of eternally picking out the failures.

Kansas is a State where most of the people believe in prohibition, and where an attempt is made to enforce the laws. I would not say that no liquor is consumed in the State—the mail-order houses of "wet" Missouri are still in business; but I do maintain that there is far less liquor consumed in Kansas per capita than in any "wet" State in the country; and I maintain, furthermore, that the beneficial effects of prohibition are in evidence everyhere in the State. AMERICA could be filled with a list of them. For my part, in two years' travel, I never saw a drunken man in Kansas. I have a pretty good pair of eyes, and when I first traveled the State, I was looking for "abuses." But why go farther? No better argument for prohibition could be offered than the statement of Mr. Wright, as quoted by Mr. Maurice, that in a Kansas city of 20,000 inhabitants, he couldn't find the "usual features" that mark the mustering in of the New Year: There was no drunken orgy such as disgraces our cities every year much to the pecuniary benefit of hotel keepers. The citizens of Wichita, Topeka and Hutchinson (one of these must be the city referred to) breathe the air of a free State, and are in the habit of taking their pleasures after the manner of Christians. They are not dominated by "big business, bad politics and booze" as are the citizens of Pennsylvania, if we are to believe Collier's of April 24.

In his original article, Mr. Maurice predicted that as a consequence of prohibition, we would be a nation of drug fiends in a quarter of a century. To prove that statement, he takes us down into Georgia again, and tells us about an increase of 700 per cent.. He will have to give us something a trifle more definite than that. It is not the lack of drink, but the taking of a "shot" of something or other the "morning after" to sober up on that forms the drug habit. But let him not worry. The prohibition law recently passed by the National Government will take care of the drug fiend.

Mr. Maurice questions my statement, "that the majority of men would never think of taking a drink if it wasn't under their nose all the time." Nevertheless, the gospel of prohibition is being spread by drinking men who have made the acquaintance of water in dry territory. He has twisted my statement, "alcohol is made to be sold, and it is going to be sold, law or no law." If it is not made, it will not be sold; but if it is made, "regulations" will not hold it back. I said very plainly to "throw the statistics of the liquor dealers' associations into the waste basket." He has twisted that statement. If he wishes to get at the force of it, let him read the articles that appeared recently in the Saturday Evening Post by William Allen White and a representative of the liquor interests; especially, Mr. White's rejoinder. Here is what Archbishop Ireland says ("The Saloon"):

> The most dreadful fruits of the evil are removed from the observation of the intelligent and orderly classes of society. They reach us only through dry statistics which say but little to us, or through words of temperance advocates, against whom we are more or less prejudiced. There is the power of the traffic which not only misleads public thought by false information, but makes it our interest, social, commercial and political not to discuss or agitate the question.

I have not charged Mr. Maurice with being a friend of the saloon. I grant his honesty of purpose; but he will never make an enemy of the liquor traffic with his "regulation" remedies. Prohibition may not be the best solution of the problem; but it is the best solution I can see at this time. "Regulation," which is about equal parts of talk and theory, having failed, prohibition is defensible "on the ground of public expediency." Archbishop Ireland has said:

> If Catholics everywhere preached and organized a strong and vigorous crusade against intemperance for the short period of a decade of years, the change would be too bright to attempt to portray. But God wishes it and He begs us to do what we can to bring about that era of peace and love and temperance in this country. If it is not accomplished, it will not be the fault of the weak Catholics, but the fault of those who call themselves strong and who are unwilling to take up the work.

Instead of following the advice of this great apostle of temperance, our "strong" Catholics have either been content to sit by with folded arms, or to busily engage themselves in the difficult feat of trying to balance the intolerable liquor traffic of the United States on the only straw that could be found among the admonitions of the last Council of Baltimore, "not in itself illicit." Arizona is the result.

Omaha. J. J. FITZGERALD.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A writer in your esteemed paper for April 24 takes me to task for having said that no priest who celebrates Mass can be a total abstainer. He calls my assertion "reckless." Wherein does the recklessness consist? My critic has for years been connected with a Total Abstinence Union; yet he does not know what total abstinence really means. According to Webster and every other standard dictionary, total abstinence means "the habitual and voluntary refraining from all intoxicating liquors." The priest is bound to use intoxicating wine every time he celebrates Mass. Whether he uses only three spoonfuls of wine or an ordinary glassful of wine, does not make any essential difference. Total abstinence is not determined by the quantity of liquor; it excludes the use of all intoxicating beverages. Would my critic consider the members of his Total Abstinence Union as total abstainers, if they consumed every day a glass of wine? I stand by my assertion until my critic proves that total abstinence does not mean total abstinence. The sneer of my critic at the "mince pie" is a cheap one. It has nothing to do with our question except in the sense that a man may eat too much mince pie just as well as he may drink too much wine. More people die every year from excessive eating than from excessive drinking. Every reliable and experienced physician will be ready to testify to this fact.

My critic has discovered men who "so write and speak on the subject of drink as to raise in not well-informed Protestant minds a suspicion that there must be some sort of necessary connection between rum and Catholicism." Must we cater to "not well-informed Protestant minds"? Not well-informed Protestant minds raised a rumpus against the Catholic Church because she ordained that laymen should receive Holy Communion under the species of bread alone. They called this "a half Sacrament." And now the Protestant minds in the "dry" camp are raising a rumpus against our Church because she commands her priests to use intoxicating wine in the Mass and thus to receive "the whole Sacrament." Consistency is a jewel which certain agitators can not afford to own. And we should accommodate ourselves to the opinions of preachers who change their views like a pair of shoes! The Catholic Church always allowed the manufacture, sale and moderate use of alcoholic beverages. She commanded the use of intoxicating wine in the holy Mass. In this respect there is "a necessary connection between rum and Catholicism," and we don't need to be ashamed of the said connection. By "rum" the "drys" mean beer and wine as well as real rum.

My critic says, further: I. "Even if Federal statistics and court records showed that, on the average and in proportion to the population, there is more drunkenness, vice, crime, misdemeanor, divorce, poverty and insanity in 'dry' territory than in 'wet' territory, it would prove nothing against prohibition as advocated by the party." The "dry" agitators have always and everywhere asserted that prohibition is the only efficacious remedy for drunkenness, vice, crime, misdemeanor, etc. Federal statistics and court records show that the assertion of the "dry" agitators is false. They prove a great deal against prohibition, unless we suppose that more drunkenness, crime, vice, misdemeanor, etc., mean a higher degree of morality.

II. "Before prohibition can be judged honestly, it must have an impartial trial for a reasonable time." Prohibition had an impartial trial in Turkey for the reasonable time of thirteen centuries. There it proved a "howling success." The Turks have for the last thirteen centuries been at the tail of culture and civilization, and at the head of brutality, polygamy, fanaticism, immorality, ignorance and poverty. An Oriental proverb thus expresses the wonderful effects of prohibition on the Turks: "The shadow of a Turk makes sterile for a century the ground which it covers." Let my critic prove that the people of "dry" Turkey are healthier, richer, more educated and more moral than the people of "wet" Ireland. Why do our "dry" agitators not emigrate to Turkey where they can enjoy the "blessings" of prohibition in their fulness?

III. "Country-wide prohibition, which is all that is worth the name, would not increase vice and crime." Witness Turkey where country-wide prohibition reigned for thirteen centuries!

IV. There was "no wine-press in the Garden of Paradise." From which we infer that Adam and Eve fell into sin and dragged the whole human race into ruin, without "a wine-press," when they were perfectly sober. Yet the "dry" agitators make "booze" responsible for nearly all the deviltries in the world. There was, however, prohibition of a certain fruit in the Garden of Paradise, and this first prohibition turned out rather fatal for us!

V. The Israelites in the desert cried for water, not wine, and they got what they wanted.

VI. "Fallen man made wine and at once got drunk on it." Man never made one ounce of wine. Every atom of pure wine is contained in the grape, and the grape is a creature of God. St. Augustine asked the Manicheans who forbade the use of wine: "Why do you not forbid the eating of grapes?" The inspired writer tells us that wine is a creation of God. "Wine was created in the beginning to make man joyful." (Eccl. xxxi, 35.) When Noé got drunk, it was not "the beginning" but the end of him till he "sobered up." God never blamed him for his intoxication; on the contrary, he blessed him and saved his life when there was an abundance of that stuff which the "drys" want us to drink. St. Chrysostom and every Church Father who spoke of wine, called wine "a gift of God."

VII. "The alcoholic beverage of the Bible which God allowed is wine, not beer or whiskey." The Israelites used, however, a drink which was much stronger in alcohol than beer and as strong as whiskey. It was called "shekar." And the Lord said: "Give strong drink (shekar) to them that are sad, and wine to them that are grieved in mind." (Proverbs xxxi, 6.)

VIII. "The drink God made was and is water." God made wine and milk as well as water. Milk is more necessary for the sustenance of a man's life than water. A baby can live on milk alone, but not on water alone. More people die every year from drowning than from alcoholism (i.e., from the abuse of alcoholic drinks), and while one person dies from alcoholism, 5,000 persons die from contaminated water. This it is that mortality statistics show.

We do not defend drunkenness. We stand for temperance first, last and always. Temperance is not prohibition. Prohibition is the deadly foe of both temperance and total abstinence as virtues. As a moral factor it proved a lamentable failure everywhere.

Mannington, W. Va. C. J. KLUSER.

Catholics and the Y. M. C. A.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Mr. McCloskey's first letter was an unwarranted attack on the Catholic societies which have done and are doing so much to further the cause of the Catholic Church. The princely gifts of the Knights of Columbus and the Ancient Order of Hibernians to the cause of Catholic education, the large sum of money set aside by the Knights of Columbus to investigate bigotry now so prevalent throughout the country, mean little to a man who claims that the "best means of obtaining morality is physical culture." If this statement of his holds, the recent bout conducted in Cuba gave to the world not only a new champion heavyweight, but also determined the most moral man in the world, although sporting writers tell us that one of the gladiators was not in physical shape because his morals in the past few years were sadly neglected. I hope Mr. McCloskey will not think I oppose physical culture, but I also hope that he will take out his notes on ethics and see in what morality consists. Physical culture aids, but is not the chief means of obtaining morality. Suppose the Knights of Columbus had devoted that $500,000 which they gave to a Catholic university to further Catholic education, to building gymnasiums; at least five well-equipped plants could have been inaugurated. Now I ask Mr. McCloskey, which course tends to prepare better citizens.

If it were true that Catholics build and maintain only second-class clubrooms, who is to blame? Mr. McCloskey tells us the Catholic laity; my answer is more specific. I say, Mr. McCloskey and the other Catholics in the Y. M. C. A., who deprive these Catholic clubs of the revenue they bestow on the Y. M. C. A. Further, I will deny that Catholic societies maintain only second-rate clubrooms. The Alphonsus Club of Boston is housed in one of the most beautiful homes in Boston; the Knights of Columbus in Worcester are in possession of a magnificent clubhouse and in addition—this will please Mr. McCloskey—they have a swimming pool. The college of which Mr. McCloskey is a graduate lately equipped a new gymnasium to which he is always welcome. Better athletes than Mr. McCloskey have found the Catholic clubrooms of Philadelphia congenial and beneficial. The basketball champions of his home city were recruited from and wore the colors of the Victrix Catholic Club, while the American runner who did so well at the last Olympic games gloried in the fact that he represented the Shannahan Catholic Club of Philadelphia.

Last year the Y. M. C. A., at one of the New England colleges, conferred a great favor on the Catholic students by admitting them to what might be termed the second degree. However, Catholic students have not yet reached so high a state of physical development and its consequent morality that they are deemed fit for office. Mr. McCloskey tells us that our young men are so well grounded in the Faith that they can resist all attempts at proselytizing. I will borrow a comparison from an athlete. No matter how well developed an athlete is, no matter how hardened his muscles are, if he throws himself against a steam roller, he will need the services of the ambulance corps. The quiet, insidious attacks of the Y. M. C. A. on our Church, the closed doors to the officers' chambers will sooner or later crush the Catholic young man who can not help feeling that he is begging favors and will probably yield, even if he is well grounded in the Faith.

In answer to Mr. McCloskey's claim that the Y. M. C. A. is not a religious institution, I would refer him to some of the back numbers of AMERICA, where his claim was disproved by the very advertisements the Y. M. C. A. used.

Blackstone, Mass. IGNORAMUS.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Several of Mr. McCloskey's critics apparently assume that a Catholic can not utilize the gymnastic facilities except he also take part in the social work of that institution. This is not the case. One need not make any acquaintances at the Y. M. C. A. or ever attend any of their lectures or social functions. He can make their athletic equipment serve his own purposes, and have no other connection with their organization.

It has been my observation that the crowd whom you will find using the gymnasium is a crowd very much like that at any good athletic club, intent upon diverting themselves rather than upon converting you. If a youth can keep away from the social side of the organization, where I think undoubtedly proselyting is attempted, no danger confronts him, and he is acting within his moral rights unless his conduct is wrong from an entirely different angle, to wit, that he contributes money toward the propagation of doctrines which he must regard as false. Is this the case? Frankly, I have not been able to reach a satisfactory conclusion. If one purchases the facilities which the Y. M. C. A. offers for sale, is it not just a commercial transaction? If it is not wrong to buy sporting good from Y. M. C. A. counters, it is not wrong to buy sporting facilities. It is certainly a substantially different situation from that presented by the donation of money for Y. M. C. A. purposes. I think the only moral question involved is whether a young man does wrong, when in using a harmless branch of an organization, he contributes money which is expended in another branch of the same organization, for purposes which he can not approve. Is it different, except in degree, from dealing with the United Fruit Company, knowing, (if such be the case: see contribution in a recent issue of AMERICA) that part of the purchase price will be used in proselyting in South America?

Los Angeles. DONALD GALLAGHER.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, MAY 8, 1915

Entered as second-class matter, April 15, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Contributions for the Mexican fund may be sent direct to AMERICA.

Saint Francis and His City

THERE appears to be a certain doubt in the minds of some historians as to whether San Francisco is actually named after Saint Francis of Assisi or Sir Francis Drake the Elizabethan filibuster, and this may account for the perturbation which has seized upon a metropolitan daily at the suggestion to erect a statue in San Francisco in honor of St. Francis. Any association, so it is urged, there may be with the saint is too remote to be obvious, and in support of the contention are cited the cities of St. Paul, St. Joseph, San Antonio and St. Augustine, which, if the daily be correct, have no connection with their namesakes or their works. The obvious thing, then, for San Francisco to do would be to erect a statue of the sea rover, and to change its name to Drakeville.

But the point of the grievance seems to be that it was not the Franciscan spirit which rebuilt the city after the devastation by fire and earthquake, which, in its degree, is true. For the Scriptural injunction "Sell all thou hast and give to the poor," is, of course, not symbolical of San Francisco, though it is hardly necessary to go through the columns of the daily press to gather this information. Whether the Franciscan spirit rebuilt the city does not greatly matter; what is important to ask is whether there would have been any city to rebuild had it not been for the Franciscans.

Curiously enough, and in spite of the fears which agitate the metropolitan daily, not only the city of San Francisco but the whole State of California have intimate connections with St. Francis and his works. A recent work on the California padres and their missions shows to how great an extent California is indebted to the Friars, and if the reading of a book be too severe a strain, even to a writer of editorials, a brief glance at the map of California will make it clear that not only is a statue of St. Francis appropriate in the city of San Francisco, but also that the present time, when the history of California is holding the attention of the whole world, is singularly opportune for the association of the city and the State with the saint to be made prominent.

It would be unjust to accuse the great daily of trying to belittle the Saint of Assisi. Indeed, it concedes that much of the Franciscan spirit might be discovered in San Francisco: there is doubt, however, as to whether the average newspaper man would make quite the most successful discoverer. But deep down there is the fear that if St. Francis be honored as the patron of San Francisco, there would be little to prevent some devout but hopelessly misguided persons seizing upon the idea that the cities of St. Paul and St. Joseph were founded by the Paulists and the Josephites, and insisting upon erecting statutes of the saints for whom the cities are named. There is even the making of a respectable feud among the citizens of St. Augustine as to whether their city was founded by the Augustinians or by Benedictines from St. Augustine's at Canterbury, which, for thrill would eclipse the symbolization of the character of Los Angeles "with an appropriate group of angels."

Moving Picture Censorship

THE enormous popularity of moving picture exhibitions and the vast influence they are consequently able to exert upon the general standard of morality are facts with which we have long been familiar. Yet the latest statistics, laid before the New York Theater Club by Commodore J. Stuart Blackton of the Vitagraph Company of America, may truly be called startling. According to his estimate 11,000,000 people daily attend the various moving picture theaters throughout our country. During the year 1913, for which he had gathered statistics, 40,000 miles of moving picture films were made, enough to engirdle the earth, or to provide thirty tintypes for every citizen of the United States. The figures become almost fabulous when we strive to estimate the number of persons who viewed these different films. The rental alone of such films during the year 1913 amounted to $25,000,000 and the small admission fees, made up mostly of nickels and dimes, amounted in the course of the same year to $275,000,000.

"What," we may well ask, "were the scenes and situations presented to the billions of spectators entertained and instructed for good or evil by this popular form of amusement, which combines the least expenditure of physical and intellectual exertion with the most intense emotional excitement?" Surely it is a vital matter of national importance that the strictest supervision be exercised here, and that censorship allow of nothing even approximating to laxity. Moving picture exhibitions are not patronized by the young exclusively, but boys and girls form a very large part of the patrons. The criminal carelessness which permits the exhibition of indecent or other morally harmful representations is therefore all the more unpardonable. While a greater or less degree of conscientious delicacy is exercised in certain cities or certain establishments, it is likewise true that in other instances the most seductive or perversive presentations are allowed. There is need of insisting everywhere, under the severest penalties of the law, upon strict censorship of all the films. Catholic societies have at times been laudably active in this matter, though much remains to be done. Parents above all have the duty of preserving at least their own children from the harm which enters the soul so easily through the eyes.

Dynamite, Christian Science, and Lourdes

"CAN Hair Turn White in a Single Night," is an important question recently discussed by Dr. John A. Wyeth in the New York Sun. Dr. Wyeth does not think that it can, nor, although a friend once earnestly propounded a contrary opinion, does he believe that hair can grow after death. "There was no use trying to do away with a conviction that had indelibly crystallized itself in his brain-cells," writes the learned doctor. "Dynamite, Christian Science, or Lourdes, or some powerful stirring up of the emotions might have done it, but reason in argument, never."

Although a man of science, it is not at all likely that the learned doctor attaches any particular emphasis or meaning to the word "Lourdes." It is quite probable that he knows nothing whatever about Lourdes. He has heard the phrase used as a synonym for superstitions, or something of the kind, and he repeats it, most unscientifically, without any reflection as to what it may really mean. Seeing that it is bracketed with dynamite, Christian Science, and "some powerful stirring up of the emotions," the learned doctor's ignorance of Lourdes, may fairly be said to be abysmal.

Science, Haeckel once said, is firstly experience, and then, inference. Dr. Wyeth's experience with hair, both in its natural state and after death, may invest his inference on this important matter with singular value. But should the doctor care to discourse more largely upon Lourdes, it is respectfully suggested that he take the trouble to base these inferences likewise upon experience.

Why Pray for Peace?

A NUMBER of our correspondents have professed themselves at a loss to understand why we should pray for peace. If the war, as is constantly asserted, is bringing back to God many who otherwise would live in sin, why try to hasten its end? The answer is so clear that it is startling to think that any could have put the question. War, though not always an evil in itself, brings with it calamities without number. It unleashes passions, stirs up hatred, thus running counter to Christ's spirit. "By this shall all men know that you are my disciples, if you have love one for the other." The Church fears and detests war. "From pestilence and famine and war, O Lord, deliver us!" Such is the petition that is daily on her lips. The very last thing that the late dying Pontiff tried to do was to avert the war, almost the very first thing that his beloved successor essayed was to bring back peace. Bishops the world over have ordered their priests to insert the prayer for peace in their Mass. The Bishop of bishops, Benedict XV, has commanded that wherever devotions are held during the month of May, there shall be recited his own touching prayer for the end of the fearful scourge.

War is indeed a great scourge. It is a cause of endless suffering to the guiltless no less than the guilty, it hurries many a soul unprepared before the dread tribunal of justice, it is an immense hindrance to divine worship, it pulls down what the Church with infinite pains has built up, it destroys the peace of souls that Christ came on earth to give to men of good will, it leaves famine and pestilence and despairing souls and mangled bodies in its wake. All these calamities and many others does war bring down upon men. "From pestilence and famine and war, O Lord deliver us!" May men make heaven ring with the prayer till at last God is constrained to take pity on warring man!

America's Vocation

GRIM accounts daily reach us from the trenches and the battle-fields; piteous scenes are pictured of the desolation left in the wake of war. With inexpressible feelings we dwell upon the sorrows of desolate mothers and orphaned children. But saddest of all is the realization of the spiritual havoc wrought in lands where even the names of the warring nations are unknown. Priests and Brothers have been summoned from the mission field in scores: those who remain with their flocks are struggling with difficulties that are well-nigh insuperable. They are impoverished: their schools, orphanages, hospitals are in danger of ruin for lack of funds. This indeed is a great calamity. Europe's affliction is sad: but it is of a temporal nature, and in countless instances God has already brought good out of it. In the mission field, however, the problem is of a more serious character: it effects the salvation of the souls entrusted to the Church.

Issue after issue of the mission-journals bears one and the same message, a cry of distress, a plea for help, a call to America as the only natural hope of the missions. Clearly our time has come to answer the call. How shall we do so? The venerable Archbishop Ireland points the way by saying:

> The Catholic Church must not allow the pall of death to spread over its missions in heathen lands. Those missions are its glory, the evidence of its divinely-given universality. Somewhere and somehow the remedy to menacing misfortune must be found. Catholics in Europe can do nothing;

Catholics in large-hearted America will be the savior of the Church in its missionary work. . . . In the early days of its history, when its children were few and poor, the Church in America received magnificent contributions from the Society for the Propagation of the Faith. It was indebted to that Society for its life, for the foundation of its prosperity which later came to it.

This is a challenge to our generosity: the gauntlet has been flung at our feet. The world is watching to see whether we shall pick it up or selfishly turn aside, leaving the Society to which, under God, we owe our faith to eke out a miserable existence, devoid of good works, through lack of gratitude on our part.

Signs of Superior Civilization

THE Appellate Division of the New York Supreme Court has just startled Gothamites into a new realization, by designating three courts in New York County to try murder cases exclusively, during the month of May. People are rubbing their eyes and asking what has happened. Nothing new; hands are dripping with blood, as usual. Fifty-one people have been murdered in New York since the beginning of the year: forty-seven persons are now under indictment for murder or manslaughter: ten other cases are ready for the Grand Jury. A record, surely. What will be done? Just this. The average law-abiding citizen who speaks the American language will say to his friend: "Somethin' doin', ugh?" His friend will answer: "Sure." Trials will drag on week after week at immense expense to the taxpayer. Fifty-five of those tried will go into cheap vaudeville or become "movie" actors: two will be convicted. Then the comedy will begin. "Uplifters," will sob and weep and splutter and splurge and denounce the State as a murderer. Commutation of sentence to life imprisonment will probably follow: at the end of five or six years the murderer will be freed. His hair has turned white you know, and there are dark semi-circles under his eyes. Horrid—and a most excellent reason, too, why the criminal should be allowed to stalk the earth in search of a new victim.

"Society's" Conversation

"THE man who really lives," it has been well said, "is, in the main a serious man; his thoughts and his conversation are worth while." Certainly his social intercourse will not always be characterized by superficiality and frivolity. Something besides trifles will engage his interest and occupy his leisure. Yet an observer of "society on parade" who thus describes the nature of the conversation that is heard in those exalted circles, would lead the thoughtful to doubt that our "best society" is really "alive" at all. He writes:

> Plays are touched on, but acting is ignored; operas are discussed, but only for the personal performances of celebrated singers, not for the music of the operas themselves. Politics are discussed only so far as they affect the Stock Exchange or the race-track. . . . Painting is discussed only to the extent of the latest fashionable foreign artist's portrait of the latest fashionable native society women. Literature is less fortunate, being considerably talked about in the shape of the latest fiction; but all the talk confines itself to the plot and the character; the style is left severely to itself. Science is discussed only as represented by the merits of competing types of automobiles.

Though these idle lilies of the land pride themselves on having mastered so perfectly the principles of the nil admirari that nothing can any longer surprise or astonish them, yet by a strange contradiction they are ever seeking tirelessly in dress, reading and amusements only the fantastic and the sensational. America's leisured classes, though they do not share the ancient Athenians' intellectual subtlety, seem to resemble them in that craving for novelty which St. Paul mentions. Like them our "best society" apparently lives in and for the present hour only, and employs itself "in nothing else but in telling or in hearing some new thing." But is that "to live"? The poet maintains that we really "Live by admiration, hope and love." Those who become so fascinated by the witchery of nonsense that they are no longer able to distinguish the important from the trifling, who are so satisfied with this world that they never think of another, and whose lives of softness and self-indulgence have hardened and frozen the heart, these can not rightly be said "to live." It was to such a people that St. Paul brought the newest and most striking intelligence they had ever heard. But they altogether missed its vital importance and only answered wearily: "We will hear thee again concerning this matter." In all probability, however, they never did, for those old Athenians had long ceased to "Live by admiration, hope and love."

Micrometer or Megaphone? Which?

"THAT? That's a micrometer-screw, a measurer of little things, midgets, mites, motes, molecules and of things still smaller. All made of hard metal, no possibility of expansion. It will tell you the exact width of a hair. What fraction of an inch can it gauge? Why, this one will estimate accurately one ten-thousandth part of an inch. Rather minute, eh? But there is a special make which goes into still finer things. Yes, it can see too, but, of course, the micrometer-screw has a limited horizon. No vistas, panoramas or bird's-eye views, but when it comes to concentration of vision and the descrying of infinitesimals, it is splendid. Here you have the eye of the micrometer-screw, called the micrometer-ocular. We are making micrometers now so that you can carry them around. Shall I fit you out with one?"

"That other instrument? Why you know that. 'Tis only a new form of the megaphone. The old-time megaphones have all been bought up by college students and guides in the sight-seeing cars. This is a vast improvement. It may not be popular on the grandstand because it does not split the air with thunders. The special improvements are a device for directing the sound, and another for eliminating all harsh or disagreeable noises. For example, you go to the theater and you wish to applaud with discrimination. While others are making a din and filling the ears of the poor actors with applause, deserved only by one or a few, you whisper into your megaphone, 'Well done, Othello'; 'Rosalind, you have been magnificent.' 'You are the best grave-digger I have ever seen.' Your message goes direct to the proper ear, and you are rewarded with a thankful smile, and your memory is embalmed in unforgetting gratitude. This one, you see, will not transmit hisses or boos or catcalls. Won't you take a melodious megaphone, this year's model?"

As you leave this Novelty Store with its wonderful instruments, you may wonder at the mysteries of science, but unless you are vastly different from the rest of mankind, you will find promptings and impulses and unholy tendencies which would outrival the achievements of the micrometer. Is there anything which limits the horizon of the soul? Is there anything which may cause the soul to imagine it is broad when it is really magnifying petty things? Are there human beings who feel starved when a crumb goes to another, who begrudge their neighbors a few drops of love when they have had the draught, whose eye-sight is so keen that a barely visible scratch assumes the dimensions of a gash or the depths and torment of a major surgical operation? Has any one ever had to close his ears to the reiteration of a maddening tune, "That was never done for me?" Answer these questions and perhaps you will see that you need not enter the Novelty Store to buy a micrometer. Jealousy is more microscopic, micrometric, more metallic and less expansive than any machine of human invention.

Ah, but do buy that latest model megaphone that has a silencer for harsh sounds and a magnifier for sweet sounds. The world needs that whisper of praise which is enlarged in the soul to a trumpet-blast, filling and inspiring the hearer. The comrade in the ranks would be thrilled to mighty deeds and lifted on wings by the touch of a fellow-soldier. A glance of approval may be the spark of a conflagration. A smile may be in some glowing heart, the first beam of a polar-dawn and a long polar-day. A megaphone differs from a funnel. The megaphone broadens its little contents to pour them whole in a generous flood upon the world; the funnel shrinks its contents and would narrow the universe until it trickles in a tiny thread into self. Encouragement is a sovereign remedy for jealousy. An enterprising printer recently issued this advertisement: Sell your hammer and buy a horn. It is regularly moved and seconded that the proposal be amended to read: Sell your micrometer and buy a megaphone, a large durable one, with a silencer for harsh sounds and a magnifier for sweet sounds. The world will profit by the purchase: two souls will grow in love and happiness, yours and your neighbors.

LITERATURE

"Quotes," Italics and Parentheses

HOW dear to the indolent writer are these three typographical devices! "Quotes," which in printer's parlance means the inverted commas indicating that a word or passage is another's, has been time out of mind the stay and comfort of those not too proud to own that their thoughts have been better expressed before. The frequent use of quotation marks, however, though it may be prompted by laziness, quite as commonly indicates that the fair grace of humility is the writer's possession and that the serviceable virtue of honesty is no stranger to his breast. Of this conscientious employment of inverted commas Newman's controversial writings offer many examples. If he quotes an adversary, it is done verbatim, literatim and punctuatim, and the opponent's argument is put as forcibly and clearly as possible. Nothing could be fairer. Since Newman's day honesty of this kind has become a more familiar spectacle than formerly.

But those little points that, in written speech, show so unmistakably that terms are being borrowed, have no adequate counterpart, unhappily, in the spoken word. Who has not felt, when listening to sermons or addresses, the "crying need" of some conventional gesture or intonation that would plainly indicate that the preacher or orator is quoting? Suppose, for instance, that every time a speaker used another's language, he should curve the fingers of his uplifted hands. Such a gesture would be a sufficiently close imitation of "quotes" and, if used conscientiously, would let the audience know just how much of the address they are hearing is the speaker's own composition. As preachers and orators naturally would not care to be making that rather humiliating gesture too often, they would give more time and care to the preparation of their sermons or addresses, and would so thoroughly assimilate and master their matter that the "quotes" sign would seldom need to be used, and their discourses in consequence would be marvelously improved. Here a delicate question of casuistry comes up. If an author quotes from his own unpublished writings, or if an orator cites a passage from one of his earlier addresses, should the borrowing sign be employed? The older moralists, as far as they have expressed an opinion on the subject, seem to exact rigidly in such cases the use of quotation marks. Later theologians, however, and among them weighty names not a few, reason very subtly on the question and sanction, as a rule, the omission of "quotes."

Another temptation that often assails violently writers and speakers is the unrestrained use of italics. It is far easier to lay stress on terms by drawing a line under them than by so constructing the sentence that the important words emphasize themselves. Therefore are the indolent much addicted to the "underscore." This regrettable practice, moreover, is by no means confined to their written words. It pervades their speech as well. We all number among our acquaintances men and women who are constantly speaking in italics. By tones, gestures and exaggerations they stress so forcibly the most commonplace observations that when an occasion arises that really calls for vigorous language the unhappy creatures are stricken dumb: their admiration or astonishment remain inarticulate and mute.

"The italics are mine." What a venerable "bromide" that is! But portentous withal. For when placed in a parenthesis at the end of a quoted passage which seemed as first written to be quite innocent and guileless, the words call the thoughtless reader's attention to the base insinuations implied in the terms italicized, and prepare the mind for the flaying that the author of the cited paragraph is sure to receive and that right quickly, too. "The italics are mine." And consequently a sound drubbing will soon be yours.

The marvelous influence exerted by italics is well illustrated by the classic example of Dom Flammato, the Tuscan Benedictine. His devotion to the Apostolic See was of so passionate a character that he took a resolution to read nothing save what was printed in roman type. His rigid adherence to this practice seriously imperiled, of course, his reputation for scholarship, but he never faltered. The sight of the gothic initials in the breviary he had to use robbed him of all devotion in choir, and a line of script that he was once inveigled into reading troubled his conscience for years. His untimely death at the age of eighty-one is attributed to the shock he received from reading a papal document which was actually printed in those detested italics, a form of type always associated in Dom Flammato's mind with heresy, schism and rebellion.

The third temptation to which the indolent writer frequently succumbs is the lawless use of the parenthesis. To arrange in a clear and orderly manner the clauses of a sentence takes time and care. But the parenthesis, or its near relative, the dash, wickedly supplies "first aid" to the hurried or the lazy and enables them to make fairly intelligible many a paragraph which had otherwise remained disgracefully obscure. There is no mark of punctuation that the world could more easily do without than the parenthesis. The true literary artist avoids it sedulously, but on the careless writer's page the parenthesis or its equivalent is of frequent occurrence. The man with an orderly mind will not rest content till he has made his thought crystal clear to the reader. But the person whose head is full of parentheses easily lets them slip into his speech and writing.

WALTER DWIGHT, S.J.

REVIEWS

Pioneer Laymen of North America. By Rev. T. J. CAMPBELL, S.J. Vol. I. New York: The America Press. $1.75.

To his three previous volumes on the "Pioneer Priests of North America" Father Campbell has now added the first volume of a new series devoted to the study of the adventurous Catholic laymen who were companions and coadjutors of those devoted missionaries who brought religion and civilization to sections of the western world that stretch from ocean to ocean and from Hudson Bay to Brazil. The list includes, he tells us,

> Explorers, founders of States and colonies, governors of provinces, commandants of forts, captains of vessels, officers of the regular army, leaders of the reckless coureurs de bois, daring traders who, in the interests of commerce, ventured alone among the savages, besides pirates, filibusters and peaceful colonists. They are mostly Frenchmen, or native-born Canadians, but there are a few Spaniards, an occasional Englishman, and toward the end, a distinguished man who is frequently put down as Scotch, but who constantly insisted on his Irish origin.

The "Pioneer Laymen" in this volume begin with that valiant Malouin sailor, Jacques Cartier, whose Récits give entertaining details of his three voyages along the coast of Labrador and up the St. Lawrence. In one of these we have the first description (1535) of the habit of smoking. Next comes the story of Pedro Menendez, where we see the vain attempt of the French Huguenots to transplant their brand of Calvinism across the Atlantic, and how Coligny, undismayed by his failure to rob the Portuguese of their Brazilian possessions, tried to wrest Florida from the Spaniards. This Menendez frustrated. "He was not the fierce and remorseless savage of anti-Catholic history," Father Campbell declares. "On the contrary, he was a quiet, calm, patient, unrevengeful man."

Samuel Champlain's exploits follow. We generally associate this founder of Quebec with Canada and the border part of the State of New York, hence there is a surprise in finding him on a voyage to Mexico in 1599. He was the distinguished faunal naturalist of his day. His narrative of the wealth and prosperity he observed in Mexico is in sad contrast to the conditions of that unhappy couutry to-day. After seeing all he could of Mexico he sailed around Yucatan as far as the Isthmus of Panama, which he crossed. When he got back to Europe he made the suggestion that it would be a practical scheme to dig a canal through the twelve miles that separated the Chagres river from the ocean. This, be it noted, was more than two centuries ago.

With the record of Charles de la Tour we have the mournful story of Acadia, and next the founding and development of Montreal are spread out in the careers of Maisonneuve and Charles le Moyne, and the volume concludes with a captain of industry, Pierre Esprit Radisson. Found as a lad a captive among the New York Mohawks in 1653, by the Jesuit missionary, Father Poncet, this Frenchman became the founder of the great English corporation, the Hudson Bay Company, and put into the control of England what is now British America. Radisson not only received no share of the vast wealth the Company accumulated but was the victim of misrepresentation, calumny and injustice both before and after his death. As he had embroiled France and England in a protracted war for the possession of half a continent, he is, to the French reading public, one of the most detested men in Canadian history. Father Campbell regards him as "the innocent and unconscious tool of underhand and unscrupulous statecraft."

The many admirers of Father Campbell will find in this new series companion pictures to his other popular historical sketches, and a good corrective also for certain false appreciations of facts and motives that a class of biased writers have fastened on American history. The volume is happily dedicated to a writer in the same field to whose zeal much historical data owes its preservation, Dr. Charles George Herbermann, President of the United States Catholic Historical Society and editor-in-chief of the "Catholic Encyclopedia."

T. F. M.

Spiritual Letters. By MGR. R. HUGH BENSON. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $1.00.

Hugh: Memoirs of a Brother. By ARTHUR CHRISTOPHER BENSON. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $1.75.

The mere fact that very limited excerpts from the letters of help and counsel he wrote to but one of his many correspondents, in a decade of incessant preaching and the production of some thirty volumes, make up into a handsome book, and that, in charm and style and intrinsic value these hurried missives of his pen maintain the high level of his finished works, bears eloquent witness to the indefatigable zeal and charity and the spiritual wisdom and literary mastery of Robert Hugh Benson. They will be welcomed by the countless admirers of the writer and the man for the new and pleasing light they shed upon his character, for as A. C. Benson puts it in a preface of admirable taste, these "frankest expressions of faith and belief, and a point of view that corresponds to a faithful and beautiful handling and interpreting of life . . . illustrate in a very peculiar way some of my brother's most marked characteristics, not only his enthusiasm and swift expressiveness, but his eager desire to respond to every call and claim for sympathy and interest, as well as his grace of loyal and continuous kindness." The first batch are selections from letters of direction to a retreatant in his last Anglican days, the next, commencing from his admission to the Church, explains masterfully yet with tender patience the dogmas and difficulties of Catholicism, and from Rome he continues to enlighten his spiritual daughter until she shared his conviction that "as to the Catholic Church, there is simply no question at all. It is it: and that is the end of the matter." His further letters "Of spiritual direction," "To one beginning a literary career" and "To one entering religion," bringing his correspondent to literary distinction and the peace of permanent immolation, are replete with the absorbing interest commanded by the assured voice of a master.

Here and there in this little book will be found a recipe for almost any dogmatic or spiritual disease or difficulty, and its refreshing informality will strengthen and commend it. Illustrating from Rome the Church's Catholicity, he writes: "This morning I, an Englishman, knelt with Italians before an Italian altar, and heard a German priest say Mass, with a negro server from Africa;" and having described with gripping realism Pius X preaching to a polyglot audience, he adds: "Parthians and Medes and Elamites . . . we do hear in our tongue the wonderful works of God. It is all a matter of seeing, not argument." There are unconscious revealings of himself, as in his letter from the Benedictine Monastery in Rome: "The Benedictines radiate tranquillity and the love of God, and have a sense of humor, and provide cold baths." There will be found in these letters many other delightful things, which they who read oftenest will appreciate most.

The subtitle, "Memoirs of a Brother," explains the purport of Mr. A. C. Benson's very welcome and valuable contribution to the life of his brother. Presenting that side of him which was least known to his Catholic friends, it is a necessary complement to the biography of his Catholic life, which the writer of these memoirs has entrusted to Rev. C. C. Martindale, S.J. It is the tribute of a loyal and affectionate brother who is at the same time frank, clear-sighted and critical, and skilled in the literary art of setting down incidents and characteristics in their true perspective; and happily the subject was such that the franker the pictures presented of him in youth and manhood the more they will delight his friends. Mr. Benson, however, has two limitations: his close companionship with his brother only began some years after Mgr. Benson's conversion, and in religious belief and temperament they were, he says, "poles apart." Hence there are gaps, which the recollections of other members of the family only partially fill up, and the analysis of religious motives is seriously at fault. This impotency to see the Catholic viewpoint rather spoils the two chapters on "Surrender" and "Authorship." With the "Confessions of a Convert" before him, Mr. Benson fails to see the one compelling cause of the surrender that clamors through that remarkable book: Anglicanism has not, Catholicism alone has Authority from Christ; and the same inability prevents him from appreciating what is best and truest in Mgr. Benson's fictional works. With this exception, the memoirs are in every way commendable and throw a most pleasing light on subject and author and the admirable family from which they sprang. M. K.

James Russell Lowell as a Critic. By JOSEPH J. REILLY, M.A. (Columbia), Ph.D. (Yale). New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.25.

Lowell is a writer much affected by those whom no one can persuade to read "a classic" but who are willing to absorb at second hand authoritative "impressions" of a literary masterpiece. He had an insatiable hunger for books, a witty, graceful way of expressing himself, an unerring taste in the choice of quotations, but he was not a true critic. This Mr. Reilly has here proved to admiration. Owing to his thorough familiarity with Lowell's works and career, the author has been able to marshal an array of facts and citations which make it plain that the Cambridge essayist was by no means a literary critic of the first rank. For all his reading, Lowell's learning was not wide enough, his sympathy broad enough, his judgment sufficiently sound, nor his penetration sufficiently keen, to make him a really just and discerning critic. He was only an impressionist. Being a man of little philosophic depth, a reader rather than a thinker, and an author unduly influenced by his moods and prepossessions, Lowell could not write without often betraying his limitations. No fair-minded person who finishes the perusal of Mr. Reilly's book can fail to be convinced that Lowell as a literary critic holds a far higher place in the popular estimation than he deserves. The breadth and accuracy of the author's own knowledge of English literature appear on every page of the book. He shows unusual qualifications as a critic of the critic. Now and then there occur repetitions which can be eliminated with profit in a second edition of the volume. Friends of Holy Cross will note with regret that Mr. Reilly omitted to mention that he holds his first degree from that venerable institution, which has been the nursery of many great men. W. D.

The Rediscovered Country. By STEWARD EDWARD WHITE, F.R.G.S. Illustrated from Photographs. Garden City: Doubleday, Page & Co. $2.00.

This is a book to increase the geographical information of the world, to give enjoyment to the fireside reader and guidance to the sportsman who is looking for a new place to hunt in Africa. The "Rediscovered Country" of which Mr. White tells us is the very latest hunting ground on that continent and the last spot there untracked by sportsmen. It is a land, indeed, that had been discovered and charted by the prospector, but for all that it had not as yet been shocked by the sound of the white man's rifle. It is not in British, but in German, East Africa that the path of these pioneers lay. The narrative is cast in the form of a diary and carries one through several months of tramping jungle and chaparral while searching for camp-spots and waterholes and the haunts of the game that had to be provided for the forty Africans who trailed after the author and his companion, Mr. R. J. Cunninghame. The diary style with its decapitated sentences and its mass of tangled detail somewhat compensates for its monotony of form by its constant shifting of scenes and incidents. To add to this entertaining variety the pages are well set off by a hundred photographs of the landscape, the animals and the Negroes in the "Rediscovered Country." A lion hunt in which Mr. White single-handed drops four lions in one fight may make some incredulous reader pause. And still this may not be of such general interest as the sight of a hunter speeding along on a motor-cycle with a lion in hot pursuit; or that story of a doctor, who presented all the Negro chiefs in his neighborhood with bicycles so the roads would always be kept in good repair. The book closes with minute instructions for hunters and a fine map. J. P. M.

Introduction to the Science of Ethics. By THEODORE DE LAGUNA, Professor of Philosophy in Bryn Mawr College. New York: The Macmillan Company. $1.75.

The author's purpose has been to present us in this book with a comprehensive outline of the science of ethics, as he believes it to exist to-day, and at the same time to offer an extensive though not complete account of the principal Greek and English systems of the past. Christian ethics as such Mr. De Laguna does not consider worthy of special treatment in the classroom. Lacking the absolute moral convictions which Christianity implies, the author advances the various ethical systems with but little directive comment. Religion is at once excluded for, in his opinion, it does not enter into a scientific consideration determining the motives of right conduct. With divine authority and sanctions debarred, morality has necessarily been cut adrift from its moorings. The evolution of moral standards is consequently the first postulate of the Bryn Mawr professor's ethics. Many of the "moral values" may have been found useful in the past, we are informed, but now reveal serious shortcomings, while there are still other standards whose defects are not yet generally recognized. One of these "survivals of barbarism," he tells his pupils, is "the way in which the young girl is commonly taught to regard chastity—as a precious possession which, once lost, can never be regained." The moral system which may now seem to us absolute appears so only because of our narrow vision.

These and similar doctrines are not new in the latest book on ethics. Leaving the sure guidance of the Church and the Holy Scriptures, we are at once landed in the new paganism with which our non-Catholic classrooms are often only too familiar. All supernatural sanctions for right living are swept away. Earthly happiness alone is proposed as a general, though not a universal, reward of moral conduct. A straw is cast out to save the young amid the tempests that toss them about. In spite of abundance of learning and many shrewd and true distinctions, the book is only another illustration of the sad failure of modern education without God. J. H.

Hillsboro People. By DOROTHY CANFIELD. With Occasional Vermont Verses by SARAH N. CLEGHORN. New York: Henry Holt & Co. $1.35.

The author of this very readable volume of stories believes that only in villages like Hillsboro, Vermont, people really "live" nowadays. Those whom hard destiny has made city dwellers "seem to be doing everything that was ever done or thought of except living." They make everything except one another's acquaintance: the only thing in the world that is really worth doing. In Hillsboro, however, life is really lived, for everybody knows all about everybody else, and all look on with the keenest interest while the tragedies and comedies of the village are being played. Nelse Pettingrew, for example, has gone awooing. Will the girl he marries help him to keep sober? Or proud old Squire Marvin, who worried his wife to death and spoiled all his children, is being carried off to the insane asylum. The "Hillsboro People" who witnessed that scene had no need of Æschylus or Shakespere to offer them the catharsis of pity and terror.

The author knows her rural New England thoroughly. The seventeen stories in the book are for the most part illustrations of the spirit of self-repression and unselfishness that characterize the villagers of Hillsboro. The best tales are "Petunias," which tells how a family behaved when the smallpox came; "As a Bird Out of the Snare," a story of heroic renunciation; "Portrait of a Philosopher," which smacks of Hawthorne; "Flint and Fire," the account of two old sisters' reconciliation, and "Avunculus," a sympathetic study of the race problem in New England. Other stories in the volume, which turn on the practical denial of Christianity among some descendants of the Puritans, are not pleasant reading. The "Vermont Verses," scattered here and there, harmonize well with the prose. W. D.

The Need for Art in Life. By I. B. STOUGHTON HOLBORN. New York: G. Arnold Shaw. $0.75.

Though this book is largely made up of a rather one-sided panegyric of ancient Greece, the author shows an appreciation of what was most attractive about the Middle Ages that is very refreshing. He maintains that the Athenians, say, of Pericles' time, represented the highest attainable perfection of goodness, truth and beauty; the medieval gentleman possessed the good and the beautiful but not the true; whereas we of to-day have the good and the true but lack the beautiful. Hence "The Need of Art in Life." A wider and more careful reading of the ancient Greek writers, however, would hardly justify the flattering description of Hellenic culture or the idyllic picture of Athenian slavery which Mr. Holborn gives. In that much-vaunted republic Socrates was put to death for his opinions, while some of Athens' most famous sons, e. g., Plato, Aristides and Xenophon, spent a great part of their lives in voluntary or involuntary exile.

Accustomed as we are to the prevalent tone of non-Catholic strictures on medieval times, Mr. Holborn's description of the popular enthusiasm for art in those days and of the wonderful success genius had in giving it expression is very pleasant reading, as is also his high tribute to medieval morality. In his brief notice, however, of the intellectual side of the Middle Ages the author is not so happy. He betrays the usual inability to see the true intellectual glory of those times. He finds nothing but the repression of scholarship and learning. To support his contention he has to go outside the Middle Ages proper for instances, and even these are inaccurate. What persecution, for example, did Copernicus suffer or Columbus—at least for his scientific achievements? While sharing with Mr. Holborn much of his disapprobation of things modern, Catholics can not admit that the one chief need of our age is its lack of beauty, and of a keen hunger for the beautiful. A more crying need is that of fixed moral standards and of practical enthusiasm for Christian ethics. J. F. X. M.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS.

So few are the Americans who really understand the nature of the relations between Church and State in Mexico as shown by the history of the past fifty years, and so unsatisfactory has been our information regarding the Catholic Party's attitude toward the present revolution, that the current Catholic Mind will doubtless prove to be of great interest and value. It opens with a very readable paper on "The Church and the Mexican Revolution" from the pen of a "Mexican Lawyer," who took a prominent part in the events he describes, is followed by a summary of Mr. Bryan's letter to Dr. Kelly and ends with the complete text of the latter's reply.

According to the Bookman's list, the six novels which were most in demand during March were these: "The Turmoil," Tarkington (Harper, $1.35); "The Valley of Fear," Doyle (Doran, $1.25); "Who Goes There!", Chambers (Appleton, $1.35); "Contrary Mary," Bailey (Penn Publishing Co., $1.25); "The Harbour," Poole (Macmillan, $1.40); "The Lone Star Ranger," Grey (Harper, $1.35). The first story mentioned is a satire on American materialism and has been favorably noticed in these pages. The second was reviewed in our issue of March 20, and tells about a new adventure of Sherlock Holmes which is far less interesting than some of his earlier exploits. "Who Goes There!" a book on the present war, is the ever-to-be-expected "latest" of the prolific and affluent Robert W. Chambers, for he now has thirty-nine novels to his name and is said to derive from them an income of $100,000 a year. While not harmful the book has little individuality. "Contrary Mary," though a "best seller," can be warmly praised. It is a refreshing novel, old-fashioned in its morals and its manners, wholesome from beginning to end, with a self-restraint in its handling of emotion and a skill in its presentation of ideals that make it pleasant reading. The book has more than its share of attractive characters and its theme is triumph through failure. "The Harbour" is a realistic novel with Syndicalists as its chief characters, and the hardships endured by dockers and stokers as its "message." Strong situations and pages of vivid description are not lacking, but the book is filled with profanity, is unclean here and there, and preaches the gospel of revolt. The last story on the list is a red and drab "dime novel" that will do its readers nothing but harm.

McClurg & Co., Chicago, have reissued in appropriate Oriental gorgeousness "Her Majesty the King" ($1.00), the late James Jeffrey Roche's clever and entertaining satire, in the guise of an Asiatic story, on Occidental deficiencies. Two decades have not dulled the edge of his wit nor flattened the point of his paradox; hence even yet "the surprising adventures of the good Kayenna and the marvelous wisdom of Shabacac needeth no apology," and the author's plea that his book be not relegated to the seekers of "transient knowledge in the public libraries, but be bought," is still admissible.

One good effect of the war is the interest it has created in Belgium, than which no land to-day affords more fruitful opportunity for the study of economics, industries, government, art in all its branches (including the art of living), social happiness and true democracy. This course is supplied as satisfactorily as could be expected in a volume of 242 pages by Clive Holland in "The Belgians at Home" (Macmillan, $0.40). Opening with a rather skimpy account of Belgium's history and an admirable picture of the Belgian people in their home life, the author plays a flesh-and-blood Baedeker to the reader through the seaside towns, along the West Flanders roads to Courtrai, from Tournai to Namur and up the Valley of the Meuse, then refusing unaccountably to let him see Liège, turns back to Brussels, Louvain, Ghent and Bruges, telling him all the while as much of Belgium's story and her artistic and industrial marvels as the reader or the book can hold. It is a valuable forty cents' worth and does not violate neutrality.

Without question "The Man Who Forgot" (Doubleday, $1.25), by James Hay, Jr., is a "novel with a purpose," for the book was written to further the nation-wide prohibition movement. Drink has made "John Smith," the hero, oblivious of his past life, and then a sudden reformation turns him into a total abstinence agitator. He succeeds in gathering at Washington, from all parts of the Union, thousands of people who are bent on forcing Congress to pass a national prohibition law. Just as the measure is carried John, of course, wins his bride. Waller, the reporter, is an interesting figure and political life in the capital is well described. There is considerable "fine writing" in the book, however, and a number of wild statements that will scarcely help on "the cause." The reader is assured, for instance, that six billion dollars a year is "the tribute this country pays to alcohol," and that a man who drinks a glass of beer lowers his general efficiency that day eight per cent.

In "Socialism as the Sociological Ideal: a Broader Basis for Socialism" (Sturgis & Walton Co., $1.25), Floyd J. Melvin, Ph.D., has added another volume to the innumerable books written in defence of socialism. The old platitudes are rehearsed and some new fallacies added in a language evidently intended for "intellectuals" and not easily intelligible even to them. Socialism itself is sufficiently attenuated to leave no commonly accepted characteristics, acording to Mr. Melvin, than "the further progress of civilization by man" and "decision in place of warfare or competition." The style and nature of the book may be gauged by the following pretentious definition: "Socialism is the social system which seeks, by means of the social control of heredity and environment, to direct the further progress of civilization in accordance with the ideals arising through social self-consciousness." Is not such a definition another evidence of the disintegration of socialism from within?

In a historical romance, "A Dealer in Empire" (Harper's, $1.25), Amelia Josephine Burr has sketched for American readers a picture of the court and times of Philip IV of Spain, where the more famous Velasquez walked with royal liberty and shared the splendor of his own immortality with his less famous royal hosts. With dramatic skill the author portrays the cold and proud Olivares, the minister and "second king," pandering by all manner of intrigue to the passions of the youthful monarch; and while the unscrupulous minister is dominating the country and hiding the tracks of his own viciousness from the eyes of his jealous sovereign, the power, prestige and territory of Spain slip away. The story is built indiscriminately of shadowy legend and of substantial history and, though the author soils some sacred things in her endeavor to make vivid the unseemly doings of the king, she pays implicit tribute to the virtue of the Spanish people.

Henry Bordeaux's novel, "The Will to Live" (Duffield, $0.75), which has been translated into English by Pitts Duffield, is a plea for the influence which the dead members of a family ought to exert on the living generation. A man's life is not merely a separate destiny, it is linked with the past and the future. Family traditions, especially if they be rooted in the soil, ought to be an incentive and a source of strength to the individual. The theme is well developed, although the story itself is too obvious and the translation at times rather stilted.

BOOKS RECEIVED

Allyn & Bacon, New York:
Vorwärts: A German Reader. By Paul V. Bacon. $0.80.

America Press, New York:
Pioneer Laymen of North America. Vol. I. By Rev. T. J. Campbell, S.J. $1.75.

Richard G. Badger, Boston:
City Life and Its Amelioration. By George Sharp. $1.00.

Benziger Bros., New York:
Questions of Moral Theology. Rev. Thomas J. Slater, S.J. $2.00; Miralda. By Katherine Mary Johnston. $0.35; The Mad Knight. By Otto von Schaching. $0.35; The Flower of the Field. By a Benedictine. $0.60.

Dodd, Mead & Co., New York:
War's New Weapons. By Baron Hrolf von Dewitz. $1.50.

E. P. Dutton & Co., New York:
Eat and Grow Thin. By Vance Thompson. $1.00.

Ginn & Co., New York:
Readings from American Literature. By Mary E. Calhoun and Emma L. MacAlarney. $1.40.

B. Herder, St. Louis:
Under Which Flag? By Edith Staniforth. $1.00; The Catholic Library. Vol. XVI. Fisher on the Penitential Psalms. Vol II. $0.30; Golden Lights. By E. Gallienne Robin. $0.75.

Mitchell Kennerley, New York:
My Life Out of Prison. By Donald Lowrie. $1.50.

Longmans, Green & Co., New York:
Hugh: Memoirs of a Brother. By A. C. Benson. $1.75.

The Macmillan Co., New York:
Spoon River Anthology. By Edgar Lee Masters. $1.25; The Harbor. By Ernest Poole. $1.40.

Oxford University Press, New York:
The Growth of English Drama. By Arnold Wynne. $1.15; Dedications and Patron Saints of English Churches. By Francis Bond. $2.50.

Penn Publishing Co., Philadelphia:
Contrary Mary. By Temple Bailey. $1.25.

G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York:
A Florentine Cycle and Other Poems. By Gertrude Huntington McGiffert. $1.25.

Volksvereins-Verlag, M. Gladbach:
Die Monroedoktrin. Von Dr. Hans Wehberg. 40 Pf.; Aegypten: Verfassung, Verwaltung, Volkswirtschaft. 40 Pf.; Im Kampf um unsere Zukunft. Von Prof. Dr. Martin Spahn. 60 Pf.; Mütterlichkeit. Von A. Heinen. M. 1.20; Bismarck. Von Martin Spahn. M. 2.50.

EDUCATION

School Children's Health

IN "Bulletin No. 4, for 1915" of the United States Bureau of Education, which may be obtained at fifteen cents a copy from the Superintendent of Documents, Government Printing Office, Washington, D. C., there are condensed some practical articles on the health of school children. Superintendents, principals and teachers of our parochial schools will find this "Bulletin" of great value as will be clear from the following excerpts and comments.

HYPERTROPHY OF THE TONSILS

The Department of Health of New York City found that "approximately thirty per cent. of the children in the schools were suffering from hypertrophied tonsils with or without such an obstruction to the nasal breathing as implied the presence of adenoids." The Department thought to fix a standard as far as possible for the class of cases of this kind in which operation would be advisable. Accordingly a letter was sent to a number of eminent specialists in throat and nose diseases in New York asking them what in their opinion were the exact indications for the operative treatment of enlarged tonsils. It is interesting to find that no two of these specialists agreed as to the exact details. So if one hundred children with enlarged tonsils were submitted to these seven specialists no agreement could be reached among the doctors regarding the wisdom of operating. The Bureau of Child Hygiene then established the following practical standard: No case is to be considered as true hypertrophy of the tonsils unless the hypertrophy is such as to interfere with the nutrition of the child or to cause secondary disturbances which interfere with its health and incidentally with its school progress. There are many specialists who seem sure that any enlargement of the tonsils is the signal for their removal. Where adenoids are present, of course, these should be removed. There has been, however, a good deal of over-zeal in operations in the throat and nose and it is interesting to find that a wave of conservatism is now setting in and that medical educational authorities will not permit themselves to be rushed into the operation mania. Where there is mouth breathing the difficulty should be removed so as to secure proper nasal breathing, but if the child is breathing through its nose and is in good health and strength, operations are of dubious value.

DISEASES OF THE EYES

In the articles on "The Care of the Eyes" there is important information about how to preserve the sight at its highest proficiency and about the prevention of blindness. At least five per cent. of blind cases are due to ocular injuries, most of which are preventable, as they arise from carelessness or ignorance. A much larger proportion of these injuries occur in children than in adults. Not a few of them are due to toys. The air rifle annually claims a harvest of blind eyes. The golf ball, with its fluid core, has taken a large toll of boys' eyes. Inquisitive children try to find out what is at the center of the ball and the irritant liquid is shot into the eye. Wood alcohol blindness still occurs with a frequency that should be noted. Certain diseases which often produce blindness and are communicable, as trachoma, are quite easily recognized. Therefore teachers and those in charge of children's institutions should know about them.

STUTTERING

The question of stuttering, so important for a large number of children, receives interesting treatment from two different specialists of large experience. Both insist on the absolute individuality of cases, that no two are similar and that any successful method of treatment must be adapted to the individual. They both emphasize the fact that over-consciousness has a great deal to do with the difficulty of speech and they make it very clear that the treatment must be mental rather than physical, though the psychic causes of stammering can, of course, be reached and removed only through the physical activity of the individual. While some of the stutterers are so bright their ideas seem to outrun their powers of speech and thus disturb articulation, some of the worst cases suffer from stuttering of mind, or a chronic uncertainty about just what they are going to say. Any "cure" must have as its basis mental occupation. They should have their attention distracted from speech itself. Charles Kingsley succeeded in overcoming his stuttering by keeping a disc of cork between his back teeth while he talked.

"PSYCHIC EPIDEMICS"

The question of psychic epidemics in schools shows how "suggestible" children are. An investigation of a school where the headaches which kept recurring were supposed to be due to the poor ventilation of the school, an imperfect lighting system, or the presence of sewer gas, proved to be caused simply by hysterical imitation and suggestion. One school physician relates that in certain classes one-third or more of girl pupils between ten and fourteen years of age asserted that they suffered from headaches, though in other classes of the same school with approximately the same number of pupils cases of headaches were rarely found. A suggestive therapy with bitter tincture, which so far as any therapeutic effect is concerned would be equivalent to bread pills, was prescribed and was immediately followed by an enduring cure. Many children who complain of headache have heard their mothers or aunts or some one else talk so much of headache that they begin to wonder about it and whenever they have a feeling of any kind about their head they complain of headaches.

DISINFECTED BOOKS

The question of the disinfection of books is treated by an authority who declares that > the process of killing germs in books by disinfection, although recommended especially by those who have the disinfectants and the apparatus for sale, may be dismissed as of very little use on account of the impossibility of the gases penetrating into the interior of the volume. Any effective sterilization will ruin the books, anything that leaves the books unaffected is quite useless, for disinfectant purposes.

The providing of school books by communities, and their exchange from one set of children to another may cause the transmission of disease. This sanitary factor in the problem of providing school books has never been given due weight, because the whole question is so largely one of commercialism. Library books probably constitute a very frequent source of conveyance of children's diseases. Convalescents handle them, there is no way of sterilizing them and unfortunately library stacks are usually dark rooms. The sun is the best disinfectant.

NEW DISCOVERIES

It is curiously interesting to note how many subjects are changing completely their aspects in the recent advances of physiology. After teaching for several generations that the taking of fluids in any quantity at meals diluted the gastric juice and weakened digestion, there is now a definite conviction in the minds of physiologists that rather liberal drinking helps and does not hamper digestion. A complete change has also taken place with regard to ventilation. It is now known that the good effects of efficient ventilation are not due to the chemical purity of the air. It is not because air is impure, but because it no longer carries off heat from the body that a person becomes uncomfortable. It is now definitely ascertained that ventilation should be carried out in the interest of the heat economy of the body rather than with an eye to the chemical purity of the air that we breathe. The good effects of the outdoor air depend on its coolness, its motion and its relative humidity, but if even impure air is kept in motion none of the bad effects supposed to follow from breathing impure air are observed.

JAMES J. WALSH, M.D., PH.D.

SOCIOLOGY

All Work and No Play

THIS page has chronicled the brief and sordid history of Francis Ignatius Brady. Francis, once a healthy, normal, growing young person, was possessed of a desire, likewise healthy, normal and growing, to mix with his kind for the purpose of amusement. He could find his opportunity, it would seem, only in a poolroom with a saloon next door. His end was sudden and it came before he was eighteen. The term "find" implies that he was obliged to seek and may, therefore, be inapt. In too many municipalities of importance, poolrooms with saloons next door and similar unhallowed places fairly thrust themselves upon the attention of unwary, inexperienced boys and girls, seeking normal change and relaxation.

THE PROBLEM

That a desire to play, to mix, to relax, to find amusement, to live a social life, exists in our young people, is fairly obvious. It can not be laid, as by an exorcism one might lay a ghost, by a well-considered exhortation on the necessity of self-abnegation. It is quite as natural as a desire for food and rest, and any attempt to eradicate it will end in disaster. The picture of an adolescent youth, biding at home of nights, to improve his mind and his manners, is very edifying. No less soothing is it to contemplate little Betsey Jane, as she holds her sampler to the lamp, to discern if the stitches be featly done. But these pictures represent ideals, not common realities and, for thousands of homes, impossibilities.

If the home be such that reasonable recreation and employment may be found in it, or under its auspices, then by all means let the young people be encouraged to stay there as much as possible. No social settlement or amusement-center can have a tithe of the inspiring influence exercised by a good home. But there are thousands of homes so restricted, physically, financially, sometimes even morally, that they can afford the growing boys and girls little or no domestic recreation. The children of these households seek, as other children seek, relaxation in healthy play and amusement. As they can not find it at home, they are likely to find it on the streets, or in places and under conditions which are not favorable to their growth in holiness.

THE "DON'T" POLICY

How to direct the gregarious habits of the young is a question which becomes more pressing day by day. Only a part, the less important part, of the question is answered by sternly suppressing places which may be harmful, physically or morally. It is not enough merely to remove obstacles. The question is not answered by saying "Don't." A policy of pure negation creates an impossible situation and defeats its own purpose. Excessive restraint leads to atrophy, a condition not intended by nature. When instead of issuing an unalterable ukase that Johnny shall not frequent the poolroom with a saloon next door, Johnny can be directed to a perfectly proper place of amusement in which he can have a larger amount of "fun," the first step has been taken in the solution of a difficult problem. For Johnny and his sister like to dance, to go to the "movies"; Johnny wants to play ball, to belong to a "gang," a club. His motto is the medieval axiom, agere est vivere, and he translates it, "Life means that something is doing all the time." Is he wrong? Not entirely. Life means ordered action, action constrained by proper limits, but it means action, after all, and in this sense he is right. Put Johnny in a cage, never let him mingle with other boys, never let him go abroad, and you may keep him from the influence of an openly vicious environment, but you will likewise make him a very dull, a very useless, unnatural kind of a boy.

ITS RESULTS

At present, our young people can fulfill their social ambitions very readily with the aid of organizations either purely secular or governed by Church affiliations more or less intimate. These organizations in the form of dance halls, social settlements, theaters and athletic clubs, are numerous in every large city, but, from a Catholic viewpoint, very few of them can be commended without reserve, and many of them must be openly condemned from the standpoint of even elementary decency. This fact has drawn the criticism that, while religious leaders are ready to condemn, they are very slow to supply a suitable substitute for the evil condemned.

There is much truth in the criticism. Our policy touching the social activities of a large class of our young people has been of a character almost entirely negative. "See what the children are doing, and tell them they mustn't." Instead of building a new road or finding the old one, we have contented ourselves, when we have done anything at all, with deprecating and deploring and "viewing with alarm" the guideposts to the broad and easy path to iniquity. All this is good and sometimes necessary, but it is not enough. No human being can model his life on a series of negations. A locomotive is restrained by the rails from plowing the fields along the right of way, but even this machine goes somewhere. We can not expect our young people to be contented if their desires, founded on human nature, for the amusement that is found in social gatherings, in athletic contests, in the theaters, are met by a policy of negation and restraint.

THE "DO" POLICY

Here and there throughout the country, the observer may note a parish fairly well supplied with this world's goods and large enough, in point of numbers, to be sufficient to itself. The spiritual wants of the flock are administered by a zealous and self-sacrificing clergy. The parish has its sodalities, its confraternities, and the real spiritual life of the people finds its truest expression in the crowds that throng to the Holy Table. Nor is the fact that man is a social being forgotten. There are clubs for boys and girls, clubs for the young men and women; there are lyceums, lecture courses, dramatic societies, and all these organizations have their home in a parish house, in which you will find a splendid gymnasium, an excellent library, and a hall for dances, moving-pictures, and parish gatherings of young and old. Ample provision is thus made for a full and enjoyable exercise, under healthy conditions, of the social instincts of the young people of the neighborhood. Mixed marriages will be few in this parish, for the young people have become acquainted with one another, and the boy or girl arraigned before the Juvenile Court will be a rarity. There is no "don't" about this program. It is all "do." It attracts the young people because it has something to offer them, something better, more enjoyable, than they can meet with elsewhere. As a sodality, it would be a failure; but as a necessary complement to the sodality, it is a splendid success. The secret of the success lies in its recognition of the fact that, since the young people inevitably will seek and find amusement, it is better that they find it where it will be beneficial and not harmful.

MEANS TO AN END

There was a period, and unfortunately some Catholic communities still languish in that darkened period, when to provide for the amusement of the young people, was thought to be beyond the office and beneath the dignity of the Church. This is misreading history. The mystery and the miracle plays are reminders of the medieval days when the parish was the center of the social as well as of the spiritual interests of the community. There is not the slightest danger that our church societies will degenerate into mere social clubs or athletic societies. Gymnasiums, dramatic clubs, moving-pictures, swimming-pools, baseball teams and athletic fields will be used simply as legitimate and valuable means in the process of shielding our young people from harmful influences, and of engaging their interest, moreover, in activities which are physically and morally helpful. If a baseball team will attract boys who are beyond the influence of a sodality or a sermon, it is wisdom truly Christlike to open an account with a dealer in athletic supplies.

IS IT FEASIBLE?

It is obvious, however, that what can be effected in this matter by a large and flourishing parish, is quite beyond the power of the smaller congregation, struggling with obligations which are imperative. Here we can take a needed lesson from the social organizations under the control of the various non-Catholic religious bodies. It is the lesson of "pooling our interests." Some reflections on this important matter will be offered in a subsequent paper.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Writing in the current Catholic World on "A Serious Problem," Joseph V. McKee calls attention to the deplorable lack of interest the Catholics of New York City are taking in secondary education and contrasts their apathy with the zeal of the Jewish people of the metropolis in this respect. Seventy-five per cent. of the pupils enrolled in the city high schools are of Hebrew parentage, he writes. In one there are 5,000 boys and only ten per-cent. of them are Christians. But are not our children being sent to Catholic high schools? Not in large numbers. For in four representative Catholic high schools he names there are only some 1,300 pupils, a total altogether out of proportion to the Catholic population of New York. Mr. McKee's conclusion is that more zeal for secondary education should be shown by Catholic parents. In this number of the Catholic World are also published the tributes paid that well-edited magazine on its recent Golden Jubilee, and excellent papers by Dr. Shanahan, Dr. Ryan and Father Pope.

The lecture given by Father Maturin, April 29, at Our Lady of Lourdes' auditorium, New York, marked the close of that distinguished convert's visit to America this spring. He told an audience for the first time what was practically the story of his conversion. In analyzing the psychological processes marking the change from High Anglicanism to Catholicism, as he had observed them in himself and in others, he said that a man's natural conservatism, his extreme reluctance to change religious opinions that he had held since childhood is what chiefly makes conversion difficult. Rome's imperious way of speaking and ruling does not hold back the Ritualist at all: indeed that is what he most loves and admires in her. For the troubles he has in the Church of England are largely due to the fact that her bishops really have so little power. The boasted "comprehensiveness" of the Establishment seems to be a cruel thorn in the High Churchman's side. Father Maturin sailed for England on May 1, and does not expect to visit this country again.

Some educators of note have recently commented severely upon the inability of the modern public school product to spell with anything like accuracy. "For some years," says the Providence Journal, "the alphabet has been out of fashion in scholastic circles, but there now seems to be a revival and a fresh recognition of the educational value of spelling. Newspapers have been active in several communities in emphasizing this value, by conducting competitions in spelling and offering prizes," and some schools have begun to bring back even the old-fashioned "spelling bee." Nor have the advocates of reformed spelling been less active. Dr. A. Gideon, Special Field Agent of the Simplified Spelling Board, has recently induced a syndicate of newspapers to adopt the simplified form of spelling in twelve words, urging it on the ground of "economy and common sense." The twelve words are, tho, altho, thru, thruout, thoro, thoroly, thorofare, program, prolog, catalog, pedagog and decalog. These spellings economize thirty-one letters. This is a solemn thought. Even in spelling wilful waste may make woful want.

"Eccentricities of genius, Sam," commented Mr. Pickwick, when the unconventional poses and remarks of Bob Sawyer and his companion were reported to him. The charitable observer is fain to pass the same judgment upon Bishop Burt of the Methodist Episcopal Church whose eccentricities have been reported from time to time in the press. As is well known, the bishop is fully convinced that the Catholic Church is plotting the downfall of "our hard-fought liberties," and he has no doubt whatever that before publication the metropolitan press is duly censored at the residence of the local Catholic bishop, or his representative. In Baltimore, Bishop Burt has recently outdone his most brilliant previous performances, by openly and unblushingly infringing upon papal prerogatives. "Before Bishop Burt left," writes the Baltimore Evening Sun, reporting a local meeting, "the members rose and sang, 'God Be With You Till We Meet Again.' He then pronounced the apostolic benediction in Italian." This rather unusual incident of a Methodist bishop giving a papal blessing, and in Italian at that, suggests to the Baltimore Catholic Review that the bishop is planning to have himself recognized as the first Methodist Pope. For the benefit of the future Pontiff, it may be suggested that the Apostolic Benediction is usually given in Latin. But, of course, to Bishop Burt this may be a mere Romish corruption.

Delivering the fifth of the Lyman Beecher lectures at the Yale University Divinity School, George Wharton Pepper of Philadelphia, formerly professor of law in the University of Pennsylvania, paid a remarkable tribute to the value of the Catholic parochial school.

> There is no doubt in my mind that the Roman Catholics have the finest system of teaching yet devised, and I am positive that the time is coming when a move will be promoted to have each religion care for the education of its children, just as the Roman Catholics are doing at the present time. I believe that these various religions will receive a small compensation from the State for the education of each pupil. . . . When this move is started, you may be sure it will have strong political backing.

Not all Catholics will agree with Mr. Pepper's belief that the time will ever come when State aid will be granted to Catholic schools, while many will hold that it would not be desirable to receive this aid. But Mr. Pepper's vision is keener than that of Dr. Gladden who holds, apparently, that parochial schools are unpatriotic, and of Mr. R. S. Bourne who thinks them unnecessary.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XIII, No. 5
WHOLE No. 318

MAY 15, 1915

PRICE 10 CENTS
$3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE
The War: Bulletin, May 4, p. m.-May 11 a. m. —A New Phase in Galicia — Russians Retire from the Dunajec—The Lusitania Sunk—China and Japan. France: Financial Matters. Germany: English Officers in Germany — German Opinion about the Lusitania—German Jesuits in the War. Great Britain: The Budget—The Question of Recruiting — Comment on the Lusitania. Ireland: Emigration Statistics — Items of Interest. Mexico: Mexican Ladies Protest—Mexico's Salvation 109-112

TOPICS OF INTEREST
A New Theory of Religion—Our Sublimated Magazines—May Lawyers Withhold Evidence? —The Young Man and Music—European Alcoholism—The Circus 113-120

COMMUNICATIONS
Catholics and the Y. M. C. A.—Governor Opposes Capital Punishment—"C. C." Answered—Absurdities About Mexico—A Governor Who Believes in Fair Play—Grace, not Information — How One Found the Church — Free Lectures on Catholic Subjects—Circulating Catholic Publications—Vestments and Ecclesiastical Art—Prohibition 120-125

EDITORIALS
The Daily Paper — Poland's Great Sorrow—Motherhood—"Euntes Ibant et Flebant"—Bearing Witness—Comparisons Are — 126-128

LITERATURE
How to Reach the Medieval Mind.
REVIEWS: The Epistle of St. Paul to the Corinthians — The Westminster Version of the Sacred Scriptures — America and the New World-State—The Road toward Peace—What of To-day?—The Spell of Southern Shores—The Whole Year Round—Essays, Political and Historical.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: The Little Missionary—"The Catholic Library"—"Eat and Grow Thin" —"Men, Not Angels"—"Within the Cloister's Shadow" — "Poems" — "The World of H. G. Wells"—"Selected Letters"—"The New World Religion."
BOOKS RECEIVED 129-132

EDUCATION
Muckraking the Public Schools.....133, 134

SOCIOLOGY
A New Religious Order.....134, 135

NOTE AND COMMENT
Catholic Student Wins Oratorical Contest — The Overloaded High School Curriculum—Canadian Eucharistic Congress—Pagan Styles for Women — Capital Punishment in Illinois — The Rationalizing Influence of the Union Theological Seminary—Bishop Colton and Father Maturin Dead.

CHRONICLE

The War.—Although the Germans have carried on an offensive at many points in the western battle line, there has not resulted any marked change in the general situation. Most of the local gains claimed by them are officially denied by the French. The main interest has been centered during the week on Flanders, where the Germans have been repeatedly attacking the British lines to the north, east and southeast of Ypres. As a consequence the British have retired from Zonnebeke, Westhoek and Zevecote, and, as far as can be judged from vague German and British reports, the Germans have succeeded in getting back some of the trenches on the very important Hill 60. Both sides are agreed in regarding the present battle of Ypres as one likely to have serious consequences.

Bulletin, May 4, p. m.-May 11, a. m.

According to Austrian and German accounts, the new phase of the campaign which began in western Galicia on May 1 is steadily progressing. If it continues to be successful, and a measure of success is admitted by Russia, the inevitable result will be a retreat by the Russians similar to that which they made in October, certainly as far as the Wisloka, and probably much further, to the river San. The movement which is developing is a huge encircling movement similar to that which forced the Russians to retreat toward Warsaw from the Silesian border. To understand it, it is necessary to bear in mind the positions of the Russian armies in Galicia. A week or so ago the Russian lines extended from the Vistula in a southerly direction along the rivers Dunajec and Biala, and crossing the Carpathians reached into Hungary as far as Bartfield. Here they turned almost at right angle and ran east along the summit of the mountains, past the Dukla and Lupkow passes, and entered Galicia, still continuing east somewhat to the north of Vereczke and south of Stry until they reached the Russo-Bukowina border.

A New Phase in Galicia

The Austrians and Germans are bringing pressure to bear on both flanks of this long battle line, being content to hold their own along the mountains. They have not met with much success on the Russian left flank, that is near Stry, where for a long time they have been endeavoring to cut their communications with Lemberg. In western Galicia, however, they claim to have been very successful. Advancing in great forces from Cracow they have driven the Russians from the Dunajec and Biala rivers, and state officially that the Russians are in full retreat toward the Wisloka. Near Tarnow the Russians, though finally forced to give up the town, made and are still making a most determined resistance, but even here their stand is said to be intended principally to cover their retreat. At the western angle in the Carpathians also the Austrians are vigorously attacking the Russians and are reported to have forced them to abandon all the passes east of Lupkow. It has also been reported, without official confirmation, that the Russians are beginning to retire from the Lupkow pass. This they will be forced to do, unless they can bring up sufficient reinforcements to check the Austro-German advance from the Dunajec. In fact it has been said that the Russians who have been forming the extreme right in the mountains are already in danger of being surrounded. As Russia says very little on the situation, and has admitted only slight reverses in western Galicia, it is difficult to state just how far the movement has progressed.

Russians Retire from the Dunajec

The life of the great Lusitania has come to an end. She sailed from New York May 1, with 1,917 persons on board, of whom 1,253 were passengers; of these 187 were American citizens. On the sailing list were the names of many well known men. She followed her ordinary course, and after an uneventful trip arrived on Friday within about ten miles of the Old Head of Kinsale, on the coast of Ireland. Shortly after two o'clock, p. m., she was torpedoed by a German submarine. Many of the passengers were at lunch. The ship sent one wireless message, which was as follows: "Come at once. Big list. Position ten miles south of Kinsale." Many life-boats were launched, but many others could not be got into the water owing to the big list to the side and the speed with which the vessel was sinking. Within thirty minutes she had disappeared. Boats of various descriptions which answered the call for help rescued, according to present accounts, 767 persons; 144 bodies have been recovered, but the rest are unaccounted for. The number of non-combatants who lost their lives in this single catastrophe far exceeds the combined list of all those who have perished in all the ninety cases of torpedoing in the war zone since February 18. The death list now stands 1,150, of whom 102 were Americans. The unidentified dead were buried at Queenstown with full military honors.

The Lusitania Sunk

Events have been moving with great rapidity in the Far East during the past two weeks. For a time war between China and Japan seemed almost inevitable, and complications between either or both countries and the United States was by no means an impossibility. It will be remembered that shortly after the opening of the new year Japan made extensive demands on China, the details of which were not given general publicity in this country. Japan protested publicly and it is said also secretly, both to England and the United States, that she was counsulting only the peace of the East, and had no intention of modifying the policy of the "open door." China refused to discuss the demands even in principle. A period of inactivity followed, at least as far as news of further negotiations was concerned. At the beginning of May Japan reiterated her demands, and China again rejected the proposals, objecting especially to certain demands in what has been called Group V. Japan called an extraordinary meeting of the Council Cabinet to discuss the situation, and at the same time mobilized her fleet. China meanwhile posted troops around Peking. An ultimatum was then drafted at Tokyo, and after receiving the approval of the Emperor was delivered at Peking. Forty-eight hours were given China for her reply. It appears, however, that Japan consented to postpone the discussion of the objectionable Group V until a later date, and also to cede Kiao-Chow to China. China has consented to the proposals, and peace is assured without violation of the "open door" or other treaty rights of the Powers.

China and Japan

France.—The Chamber of Deputies is still engaged in the consideration of questions of finance. One thing is certain, that the Government will not be stinted in its outlay during the period of hostilities. A measure now pending would revise all State contracts with individuals, and impose a special tax whenever the consideration involved is in excess of one thousand dollars. It is also proposed to make this tax retroactive. The author of the proposed law, M. Henri Conévol, maintains the equity of the proposition, by asserting that all who are profiting by the war may rightly be required to pay a share of their gains for the common defense. He argues that there is much dissatisfaction with the management of these Government contracts, and he believes that his bill will do away with the illegal commissions and other scandalous abuses which have long marked the conduct of the Government's business affairs. It is not likely, however, that the bill will approve itself to the Chamber. Its opponents urge strongly that it would bring about endless confusion at home. and endanger the country's foreign credit. On May 7, the credits asked by M. Ribot, Minister of Finance, were granted without a dissenting vote. These credits authorize the raising of a sum in excess of two billions of dollars. But this tremendous outlay seems absolutely necessary if the great game in which all are losers is to continue its ruinous course.

Financial Matters

Germany.—Reports of ill-treatment of prisoners, current in all the countries at war, usually prove, upon investigation, either exaggerated or altogether false. The American Ambassador at London has communicated to the British Foreign Office, a report on the treatment of English officers detained in Germany, lately forwarded by the American Ambassador to Germany, Mr. James W. Gerard. As it can not be thought that Mr. Gerard has in any way been unduly influenced, his findings may be accepted as accurate. The Ambassador visited in person thirty-nine English officers confined in prison. He writes that each officer has his own cell, and that he is treated with all the consideration which the circumstances of the case allow. All are permitted to take exercise, morning and evening, for an hour in the prison yard, and during these periods they may converse together freely. Their food is good, and the officers had no serious complaints to make, although opportunity was given them to present their objections. Mr. Gerard adds, however, that this treatment will be modified and the officers will be subjected to all the regulations binding an ordinary prisoner, should the report that prisoners taken from German submarines are not receiving similar consideration be confirmed.

English Officers in Germany

In the destruction of the Lusitania, German public opinion sees the speedy conclusion of the war. While the loss of life of so many non-combatants is regretted by all, it is held that sufficient warning had been given, and that in consequence, these non-combatants embarked at their own risk. It is also claimed that since the Lusitania carried ammunition valued at $200,000, and was probably equipped with guns that could destroy a submarine, she might fairly be regarded, not as a passenger, but as an army supply ship. England's attempt to subdue Germany by a process of starvation is considered to be ample justification for this act of reprisal. At the protest of the United States, Germany had consented to relinquish her determination to establish a war-zone around the British Isles, on condition that England would allow the free importation of food-stuffs for the civilian population of Germany. England refused the condition. In consequence, Germany was compelled to solve the difficulty thus created by England, by putting her original plan into instant and vigorous execution. Nor should it be forgotten, say German commentators, that this greatest of wars is being waged to preserve the national existence of a whole people. They are convinced that Germany did not seek war, but entered upon it only as the last means of self-defense. On the whole, it is the German opinion that, viewed purely as an act of reprisal, the destruction of the Lusitania is justifiable.

German Opinion About the Lusitania

Private letters give some information of the members of the exiled Society of Jesus who have returned to Germany. At present, sixty-nine priests, thirty-seven scholastics and fifty-five lay-brothers are connected, directly or indirectly, with the army, and this number may soon be augmented. Of the priests, twenty-four are military chaplains, while forty-five have been assigned to minister to the sick and wounded in the military hospitals and barracks. Eight scholastics and forty-nine lay-brothers are soldiers in the line. As in France, these men have exercised a remarkable influence for good in their companies. Not only have negligent Catholics been brought back to the exercise of their religion, but conversions of non-Catholics to the Church have been reported. Many have distinguished themselves for acts of conspicuous bravery. The Iron Cross has been bestowed upon nine of the priests and upon one lay-brother.

German Jesuits in the War

Great Britain.—In a brief speech on the budget, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has given the English public an insight into what the war is costing the nation. This information, he said, furnishing a review of the financial situation, would help the people to understand the immensity of the task undertaken. The Chancellor estimated the daily expenditures during the next six months at about eleven million dollars, and should the war be protracted a year beyond that period, the total cost would be upward of five billions of dollars. The Chancellor did not definitely propose the imposition of new taxes, although it was inferred from his remarks that this might be done shortly. "The ultimate issue of this war," said the Chancellor, "is not in doubt; only its duration." Much depended upon the operations of the next few months. This uncertainty made it difficult to estimate the budget with greater exactness. The operations of the summer, however, would give the Government a more dependable opinion. The national debt is at present about seven billion dollars.

The Budget

Addressing a meeting in London, held to encourage recruiting among employees in the wholesale and retail distributing trades, the Premier, Mr. Asquith, stated that out of 790,000 clerks, commercial travelers and other workers in these trades, 430,000 had enlisted in the forces. From this fact the Premier argued that the people at last understood the gravity of the war, and did not need to be flogged or goaded by rhetorical incitements before they could be induced to obey the call of duty.

The Question of Recruiting

> Never in the history of any nation has that recognition been more clear and universal, or that obedience more prompt and more unselfish. We have made a magnificent beginning and have stemmed the tide of aggression. Our men have shown a spirit worthy the best traditions of our race. Every breach in our first line has been made good, and there are still in reserve unused and, to the enemy, unsuspected resources which you must mobilize and organize to the full. I am an optimist; not that I underestimate the prowess of the enemy, the gravity of the struggle, the imperious need for the unsleeping exercise of our national qualities of patience, constancy, resolution and fortitude, but because I believe in the righteousness of our cause, and because I am confident that by personal and corporate effort and self-sacrifice we shall leave nothing undone to bring our cause, be the struggle long or short, to a decisive and glorious issue.

In spite of the Premier's optimism, however, the advisability of drafting into the army is still strongly urged in many quarters.

English opinion on the destruction of the Lusitania is probably best summed up in the words of Sir Gilbert Parker, "It is an inhuman crime, committed by an inhuman nation which has placed itself outside the bounds of civilization." The fact that a warning had been published in the American press is, to English commentators, simply a formal notification that Germany intended to commit murder, and no defence, either in international law or in ordinary humanity. It is admitted that the vessel was a fair prize, that the German sea-power was entitled to capture her, or in case of necessity, sink her, but not until every non-combatant had been taken from her decks. This, it is affirmed, is the custom of civilized belligerents, or was, until the opening of the war, when Germany's first act, the invasion of Belgium, was confessedly an open violation of international law. Retailing a list of grievances for which redress will be demanded, the Daily Chronicle says that a more drastic surgery will be needed for the cancer of German militarism than any prophet could have predicted last August. "There must be no head too high to fall for this," states the Daily News. "It is doubtless the hope of the enemy to convert the impotence of their blockade into reality by terror. They have mistaken the temper of the people of these islands, and of all men, whatever their nationality, for whom civilization has a meaning."

Comment on the Lusitania

Ireland.—The Registrar-General's report for 1914 shows a substantial decrease in emigration, the total number of emigrants, 20,314, being one-third less than the average for the previous decade. Leinster sent 2,860, Connaught 5,190, Munster 5,652 and Ulster 6,612. The majority ranged between the ages of twenty and twenty-five, showing that it is still the most physically fit who leave. Seventy-five per cent. came to the United States, and fifteen per cent., mainly from Ulster, to Canada. The total of Irish emigration since 1851 is almost exactly equivalent to the present population, 4,390,219. The fall in emigration is accounted for partly by the difficulty of transportation occasioned by the war, but mainly by growing progress in agriculture and industries, and an increased demand for labor.

Emigration Statistics

A discussion between Mr. T. W. Russell, M.P., and Sir Horace Plunket, elicited the fact that though the woolen industries had doubled their output and a new glass manufactory was flourishing, they had made little progress toward capturing German trade. They had first to capture, according to Sir Horace, German thrift and discipline and laborious technical preparation. It was agreed that the Belgian system of mixed agriculture and widely-scattered small industries was most suitable to Ireland. Complaint was made that Ireland was discriminated against in the army contracts, having received less than two per cent. of them. Another discrimination that has excited comment is the denial of admission of Catholic recruits or employees to regiments controlled by the Ulsterites. There is continued discussion of the mystery surrounding the whereabouts of Ulster forces, but it is admitted that, though they were fully drilled and equipped two years ago, they have not yet gone to the front.

Items of Interest

Mexico.—More than 800 Mexican ladies drew up the following eloquent protest and presented it to General Alvaro Obregon, a revolutionary leader who is said to be as ruthless a persecutor of the Church as Villa himself:

Mexican Ladies Protest

Moved by a deep, unselfish love for our unhappy country, and realizing, as Catholics, Almighty God's right to be worshiped by His creatures, we, the Catholic ladies of Mexico, come before you and, in the name of all Mexicans who believe in God, of all our countrymen who ask for justice, of all our fellow-citizens who long for liberty, and in the name, finally, of all lovers of order, (we) indignantly protest against the atrocious sacriliges you have committed in the Jesuits' Church of Santa Brigida, in the Church of the Immaculate Conception and in the Academy of the Sisters of St. Joseph. Cruelly outraged in their holiest beliefs, the ladies of Mexico indignantly maintain that the profanations and sacriliges that you and the revolutionary chiefs have committed dishonor the cause you profess to defend and will bring upon it the execration of mankind. Patriotism can not exist without liberty, liberty can not live where there is no law, and there can be no law where systematic robbery is one's only purpose and revenge his only desire. As we ask for nothing but justice, we beg you to restore those churches and the academy to their proper uses.

So far as is known, however, General Obregon paid no attention to the ladies' petition.

Desultory fighting has continued during the past week between Villa and Obregon, but the restoration of peace to the wretched country by the longed-for "strong man" still seems far away. Carranza is no doubt trying to wear down his enemies: meantime though conditions in Mexico City itself have improved remarkably since occupation by the Zapatistas, yet the country is in a plight wretched beyond description, for famine and disease are working havoc, especially among the poor. The American border towns are crowded with hungry refugees. An American correspondent, who understands the situation in Mexico, looks for salvation to the Church and the Maderistas. The letter runs:

Mexico's Salvation

Out of all the jealousy and intriguing, out of the suspense and uncertainty, the rise and fall of parties, one or two convictions have remained fixed in my mind, based on my judgment, and also on something deeper and more reliable than mere reason. One of these is that no permanent settlement of political affairs in Mexico will ever be made, and no negotiations of the United States will ever amount to anything which are not based on a thorough understanding and cooperation with the remnants of the official Madero family. I do not mean his relatives by ties of blood. The other conviction is that, whereas Mexico's political readjustment must be made through the remnants of the Madero Government, its reconstruction must come through the Catholic Church. I have not come to either of these convictions lightly. I have studied the matter as thoroughly as it is possible for me to do, and unhampered by any consideration except a desire to know the whole truth as to the cause of the trouble in Mexico and the remedy. I have made myself one of them and with them, and I have done it so successfully that, in talking to me, they have no sense of restraint because I am an American. I have made it a point to draw them out on the reason of their attitude toward the Church, and have induced some prominent men to write statements about it. I have also read everything that has been published and accessible to me, antagonistic to the Church in Mexico, including the most rabid of all, "The Mexican People," by Gutierrez de Lara, and at the end of it all the conviction remains, stronger than ever, that the salvation of the Mexican nation, physically, financially, morally and spiritually is in the hands of the Catholic Church.

But the Church can not, of course, exert her legitimate influence as a peace-maker and reconstructionist till an end is put to the persecution that is raging in Mexico.

TOPICS OF INTEREST

A New Theory of Religion

BY the end of the nineteenth century, the thinking world seemed aweary of the cold theories of Spencer and Taylor, which plucked the supernatural out of religion. The sign was consoling for the Catholic Church; but soon consternation set in. For, when the twentieth century dawned, a new and equally erroneous explanation of religion sprang from the sparkling pens of Loisy and Tyrrell. Whereas Naturalism had torn the heart out of religion, Modernism, at which the late Pope Pius was forced to hurl his powerful Encyclical Pascendi in 1907, tried to behead it.

The prompt action of His Holiness stemmed the great wave of Modernistic error, so far as the Catholic Church was concerned. But around the rock of Peter immanence has continued to swirl, lashing the pillar of ecclesiastical authority. The leaven of subjectivism which old Kant slipped into philosophical thought is doubtless the primal cause of this seethe. Schleirmacher, back in the beginning of the nineteenth century, began where the Königsberg sage left off, by asserting that religion was neither a knowing nor a doing, but a feeling. From his day until this hour, the subjectivistic view of the origin of religion has been climbing over difficulties to popularity. Consequently scholars were too evilly prepared to be shocked when Theodore Schroeder recently foisted, out of his studies of Mormon and sundry other religious documents, the unique theory that the "ultimate essence" of religion is naught but sexuality! According to him, the erotic emotions in man call for something extraneous, and are quite ready to pour themselves out upon human-made creeds as divine and superphysical. The mysteriousness of the "sexual urge" lends an air of mystery to the dogmas and rites on which it chances to expend itself. In a word, religion is utterly subjective in origin, and would hardly have become objective if sexual emotion had not given it an egress. This erotogenetic theory of religion is amply presented by J. S. Van Teslaar, M.D., in the Journal of Religious Psychology. The writer, a physician, gives the theory his hearty endorsement.

Thus once more is naturalism riding to triumph, victorious by the very means which Modernists proudly asserted alone could safeguard religion from the onslaughts of science: subjectivism! Incidentally the keen wisdom and foresight of the simple and saintly Pius X in condemning Modernism are superbly vindicated. The Church is now confronted with the duty of absterging this new and sordid error from the minds of men. Happily, the supporters of the recent error are not from her fold. But her mission is to all mankind: Catholic pens could not employ themselves better than in a duel with the ugly blunder of Mr. Schroeder. The death of this fallacy would likely mean life to many a truth-seeking but gullible soul.

The basic thought of Mr. Schroeder's theory is, of course, too much subjectivism. Empirical psychology teaches that knowledge precedes emotion. Unless scientific psychologists are willing to be beguiled by the late William James's queer conceit ("we do not cry because we are sorry, but we feel sorry because we cry"), they must bear in mind this primary lesson. But Mr. Schroeder, like the deceased Harvard professor, would have us regard feeling as antecedent to cognition. Every one knows that James's pen was often too facile for his philosophical prudence. Likely enough an aptitude for the unusual betrayed him into the present extravagance of inversion. Modern theories of religion must look beyond Cambridge, Mass., for a first-class witness to their merits; they look in vain. Yet with such testimony lacking, the theories, which state that religion is completely woven out of man's "intimate experience," can be esteemed for little more than mere twaddle. The ingeniousness of these explanations may be admitted and admired; but to the authors thereof the salutary admonition must needs be given: "Go to reliable psychologists, and appreciate the fundamental teaching that nothing is in the heart except what in some form or other originally got there through the head."

If man's sentiment through the ages has turned toward God, it is because his intellect, however vaguely, informed him of a divine existence. "Faith," as Aquinas so well and so long ago observed, "presupposes reason, as grace presupposes nature, as the perfect presupposes the perfectible." It is very legitimate to opine that an assertion anent religion by a theologian of the Angelic Doctor's acumen and authority is worth a trifle more than the dictum of a mere dabbler in silent documents, like Mr. Schroeder.

It is not strange, however, that Mr. Schroeder should fix upon the sexual instinct as the solution of the origin of religion. Naturally his scrutiny of Mormon literature alone should imbue him with such a belief. Indeed, his theory may be largely correct, as regards the polygamous doctrine which the bizarre Mr. Smith saw fit to inflict on America, or as regards the ancient licentious cults of the Chanaanean Baal and Astarte and those of the Roman and Grecian gods. Sensuality certainly colored these creeds with a vengeance. But Mr. Schroeder and his ally, Dr. Van Teslaar, evidently fail to notice the somewhat obvious line of demarcation between true religion and false. The mentioned religions did not consist so much in a subjugation of self to God as in an estimation of self as God. Thus they were not so much religions as perversions of religion.

Doubtless it is such pseudo-creeds that prompt the Schroeder-Van Teslaar opinion, and furnish it with a sprinkling of thin logic. But this theory is seen to be an elucidation not of true religion, but of false religions; not of the rise of religions, but of their decay; not of religiousness so much as of irreligiousness. When men homaged self instead of God, they deified error. But the very fact of their having paid to self the worship due to God would indicate that they originally had some perception of God; else how could they have thus infamously exalted human nature to His plane?

Mr. Schroeder crassly declares that the "love" emotion, generated at puberty, becomes attached to some established creed; as if religion were never anterior to puberty! as if adults had monopoly of faith! Should the gentleman chance to cast his glance into any Catholic Church, any Sunday morning, in any city, he would see a beautiful refutation of his ludicrous idea: innocent boys and girls receiving with angelic fervor the living Eucharistic God whom he is essaying to make a figment of carnal instinct!

To prove his theory, he has recourse to such religious institutions as the Holy Eucharist and the early Christian Agape, or love-feast. It appears that the term "love-feast" conjures up carnalities in his mind; if so, his notion is unpardonably like that of the pagans who busied themselves in ignorantly putting the most absurd construction on the purest Christian acts. An unprejudiced peep into pristine ecclesiastical history will convince our latest religious theorist that the Agape was a ceremony not of physical emotion, but of spiritual affection for the Saviour of men. The gap between the former, which is sexual, and the latter, which transcends sex, is plainly great; Mr. Schroeder does not span it, nor bother about doing so. He apparently imagines that spiritual and carnal love are identical. How much a pinch of scholastic differentiation, which so many modern scholars affect to despise, would improve his views!

True religion has always circumscribed and governed man's sexual nature: it is unthinkable that man's sexual nature could have created and ruled religion. Under false religions, such as paganism, sexuality smeared men's hearts, as the fungi of divorce and unnamable sins in old Rome attested. Under the reign of irreligion, identical conditions have obtained in our own day. But under the religion founded by Christ, personal chastity in thought, word and deed has always been effectively inculcated. Soul-love for the Maker has ever been taught and commanded. But since, in life, body and soul are so closely entwined, and since God is the author of one as much as the other, the Church has invariably prescribed that body, as well as soul, should pay the Godhead honor. The kind of love, however, which is essential to religion is indubitably the opposite of the variety which Schroeder and Van Teslaar impiously presume. It is to be hoped that they will give their poisonous pens a rest, otherwise Godfearing people will begin to suspect that they are writing out of the fulness of hearts which would profit immensely by the chastening hand of God, the true source of a religion sealed in the blood of His only begotten Son, the hope of mankind.

EDWARD F. MURPHY, M.A.

Our Sublimated Magazines

IT seems to be generally agreed that Catholics do not support their own magazines. A glance through the circulation figures in the "American Newspaper Annual" bears this out. Catholics differ little from their similarly circumstanced fellows. They attend the same theaters, go to the same moving picture exhibitions, patronize dances and ball games and buy a daily paper, but they do not read Catholic periodicals. Why is this?

Perhaps an impartial comparison of Catholic and non-Catholic publications might suggest an answer. As an exhibit on the non-Catholic side, take a magazine of general appeal, of unquestioned success and popularity, a clean periodical not depending on erotic fiction or the advocacy of some social panacea for its patronage. The Saturday Evening Post, with its 2,000,000 a week circulation and enormous advertising income, is a fair example.

This magazine is interesting, not because of famous writers who contribute to it, but because the stories and articles which it contains touch at some point the common experiences of contemporaneous life. An able editor once said that his experience showed him there are three subjects of universal interest: love, money (power) and food. An analysis of any current issue of the aforementioned publication will prove of interest. The copy of April 10 will do as well as any. Its contents include the following: "The Invisible Army," a description of the European secret service system; "By Dead Reckoning" (fiction), the promotion of a young sea captain through his own cleverness; "Alaska to Broadway and Back," a comparison of the wholesome life of the Northwest with the hot-house existence of the city; "A Change of Pace" (fiction), the adventures of a wealthy miner who insisted on riding across a desert in an automobile race; "The Elixir" (fiction), the story of a New England woman besting a patent medicine company, and of a young doctor's love; "A Permanent Intruder" (fiction), a story of a homely bulldog; "The Busher Abroad" (fiction), a baseball player's diary; "Paying for the Privilege in the National Guard," an exposition of the needs of that organization, and "Benevolent Foundations and Efficient Philanthropy," a signed article by John D. Rockefeller.

Catholic writers have not only the field of human experience from which others glean their material, but also the tremendously interesting and varied sphere of Catholic life and thought. Their possible readers number millions, intensely human, anxious to be amused and interested. What do the Catholic magazines offer them?

Catholic magazines fall, generally, into three classifications: publications devoted to the propagation of some particular devotion; reviews and quarterlies treating of learned topics or matters of purely clerical interest, and magazines of general appeal. It is only with the latter sort that a fair comparison can be made. Those who are familiar with Catholic literature can easily go over in mind, or actually trace in the files, the recent issues of our magazines and strike a balance.

In the matter of articles one finds many describing Old World places, visits to ruined abbeys in England and Ireland, accounts of pilgrimages to the Holy Land or visits to the famous churches of Europe, biographies of distinguished prelates, literary criticisms and, occasionally, controversial essays. Catholic magazine fiction is very apt to have its plots located abroad. One reason for this, editors say, is because more and better fiction is offered by English writers than by those in America. The stories sometimes deal with young men and women who, in the concluding paragraphs, discover that they have vocations to the priesthood or to the religious life, or whose good example leads to the conversion of a non-believing friend.

Do our Catholic magazines treat of subjects that are familiar and interesting to the great majority of our people, that deal with some practical problem of their daily lives and experiences? They unquestionably represent one phase of Catholic life, but is it the life of the multi vocati, of the multitude who most need an antidote to the insidious naturalism of the present-day literature? Do not our writers rather appeal to the pauci electi, the thoughtful readers, whose mental training would enable them to pick out fallacies even without a guide? There are few in the cloistered paths of perfection and very, very many buffeting the world and struggling with the difficulties of modern existence, men and women who live and love with every ounce of the life God has given them.

What sort of literature do such folk like? Fiction mainly, if one may trust the judgment of magazine publishers. "We are specializing in fiction this year," a member of the editorial staff of a prominent women's magazine said recently. "Our readers want to be entertained and amused. The few articles we print are on subjects of universal interest and immediate importance. If an article could be printed next year as well as this, we don't want it."

To Edgar Allan Poe is attributed the maxim that a short story should aim at producing an emotion. When a magazine story is good the reader involuntarily places himself in the position of the leading character, whose acts are those that the reader would like to have been able to do or fears he might have been forced to do, if placed in a similar position. The effect of short stories in non-Catholic magazines is emotional; a legitimate appeal, in the clean magazines, of course. The writer intentionally sets out to depict some fundamental human feeling, love most frequently, making it real by exemplifying it in characters that are familiar to the readers.

Catholic magazine fiction has been criticized as lacking in this. It often deals with situations purely intellectual, while its characters are not those men and women whom the average Catholic knows. Sometimes they are types he can not conceive or sympathize with. The life of the intellectual section of English Catholics or the salons of Europe have little counterpart in the United States. But we have a splendid, stirring, manly Catholic life here that offers limitless possibilities to the writer of fiction. Stories of American life and American business fill the successful non-Catholic magazines.

Fiction is harder to obtain than descriptive articles and ought to bring a better price. It does in non-Catholic magazines. Still, it is not the small pay so much as the uncertainty in the time of payment that discourages many Catholic writers, who would be willing to accept less, hoping for better times. To get a check, to cite one instance, a year after the publication of a story, with a note from the Reverend Editor that he had "intended to send it for a long time," is not thoroughly inspiring. It is not astonishing, however, after one has grasped a situation where business is run as is the case of one well-known Catholic magazine, which was published for about twenty years before its books were ever competently audited or its publishers knew whether they were making or losing money. Examples might be multiplied.

Observers are now seeing the first beginnings of a new era. The magazine above mentioned has been put on a business basis and is doing well. Its checks to contributors, and those of at least one other Catholic magazine, are mailed on the day of publication.

In some instances there has been a change of editorial policy, a change that has caused wide and invariably favorable comment in the Catholic weekly press. An editor or two, if not more, have put over their desks Terence's motto: Humani nihil a me alienum puto.

HORACE FOSTER.

May Lawyers Withhold Evidence?

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Would you mind discussing the following in your columns? A is a plaintiff and B a defendant in an action at law. The action comes to trial. The plaintiff puts in his evidence to prove his cause, the defendant follows with his proof, the case is closed, the jury instructed, and thereafter a verdict is rendered for the defendant, on the ground that the plaintiff has not proved his cause of action. But it seems the defendant's counsel is in possession of evidence, the truth and value of which is undoubted, and which, if adduced in the trial, if a certain witness were called, a servant of the defendant, would have turned the tables. The plaintiff does not bring it out; and though it is in the possession of the defendant, he, for obvious reasons, does not reveal it. Is the defendant's procedure justifiable morally, and if so upon what grounds?

New York. DEFENDANT.

STRIPPED of its legal setting and phraseology, the question proposed in the above letter is simply this: Is a man who has been brought to trial obliged in conscience to produce evidence which is in his exclusive possession, or may he without scruple conceal it? Actions at law fall naturally into two broad classes, criminal and civil. The line of demarcation, it is true, is not always easy to define accurately, as the two divisions often overlap; but theologians have found it convenient to adopt the classification, and to group their inquiries and conclusions concerning the duties and obligations of the parties to an action under these general heads. For the purposes of discussion, the defendant and his counsel may be regarded as one, as their privileges and restrictions, at least in the present question, are practically coextensive. The answer to our correspondent, therefore, to be complete, must consider the right of a defendant to withhold evidence, that might prejudice his cause, in two distinct kinds of cases, viz., where he is accused of a crime and threatened with punishment, and where a suit is brought against him with the object of forcing him to satisfy a claim which the plaintiff declares is founded in justice.

Moralists are agreed that, in criminal actions, it is licit to undertake the defence of a man who is known with certainty by his counsel to be guilty of the crime of which he is accused. Not only this. They go further and teach that the defendant may, either by his own personal action or by the assistance of his counsel, take all means that are not evil to escape conviction. He may therefore try to discredit the evidence produced against him, or endeavor to lessen the force of the arguments advanced for his condemnation, provided that he does not tell lies nor advance false principles. The liceity of this proceeding implies the liceity of suppressing damaging evidence which is his own exclusive possession. The argument is a fortiori. If he may, to the best of his power, nullify the evidence produced against him, even though he knows it to be true, certainly he may also withhold evidence of which the accuser is ignorant. Again, no person accused of a crime is under any obligation of confessing his guilt. It is his privilege to be held innocent unless he has been proved guilty. To say, however, that a defendant ought to produce a piece of damaging evidence that would in all likelihood lead to his conviction is equivalent to forcing him to confess his guilt. Such compulsion the law does not allow to be put on any man. The liceity of withholding such evidence is all the clearer in the case of one who is innocent. Where there is question, therefore, merely of escaping a penalty, the case may be taken up, no matter what may be the character of the evidence and, except in certain extraordinary cases, the evidence may be withheld to the best of the defendant's honest ability.

So much for cases where there is question merely of escaping conviction for crime. But what of civil cases where there is question of justice? May the defendant withhold evidence, where, for instance, he is charged with being the unjust possessor of the plaintiff's property? If the claim of the plaintiff is wholly just the defendant had no right to go to law at all, and consequently his procedure if viewed in its entirety, is not morally justifiable, even though it is conceivable that his procedure may have conformed to the requirements of the law. If on the other hand the defendant has a right in conscience here and now to dispute the plaintiff's claim, he has also the right to withhold the evidence. If the evidence is not of such a character as to put a bar in conscience to his going to law, neither is it such that it need be produced in court.

It is not necessary, however, that the defendant should be certain, either at the outset or indeed during any part of the trial, that he is beyond all doubt in the right. Frequently this is impossible. All that is required is that he should have solid probability for the justice of his contention, or at least that he should be honestly convinced that its justice is still in doubt. The same may be said of his lawyer.

When such is the lawyer's conviction, he may not only undertake the defence, but also on the trial withhold the evidence in question. The reason is that his duty is not to throw all possible light on the point at issue, but only to present his client's interests in the best possible light. He has no obligation to give a decision. That belongs to the jury and judge. Nor is he bound to bring forward anything that favors the plaintiff. To do so is the exclusive duty of the counsel for the plaintiff. In fact moralists are of the opinion that he would fail in fidelity to his client were he to divulge, either in the court-room or elsewhere, any secret of the defendant which might in any way prove prejudicial to his cause. So that not only would he not do wrong, if he withheld evidence that would be damaging to his client, but he would do wrong if he divulged it. Another consideration should be remembered. Besides being the counsel for the defence, a lawyer is also a sworn officer of the law. It is his duty, therefore, not to allow the plaintiff to prove his claim by illegal evidence, but to compel him to prove it according to the law of the land and the rules of evidence.

One other point remains to be stated. A judicial decision does not change the nature of the claim nor its real foundation in justice. A verdict for the defendant means no more than that the plaintiff has not made good his cause in court. If the claim be really just, it persists, and in spite of the pronouncement of the judge, it cries for liquidation at a higher tribunal than that of short-sighted human justice. No man is fully freed from an obligation in justice, unless he has also been freed by God at the bar of his own conscience. Should new evidence, therefore, be forthcoming after the trial which demonstrates that the plaintiff's claim was just, the defendant would be bound in conscience to make good that claim. Similarly, if the defendant should discover that his counsel, without his knowledge, by suppressing evidence which would have shown clearly that his case was unjust, won for him a decision that was not in accordance with justice, he would be obliged in conscience to satisfy the plaintiff's claim. J. HARDING FISHER, S.J.

The Young Man and Music*

GRANTING talent, temperament, energy, perseverance and a thorough musical education, general as well as special, there are many opportunities open to a young man for a successful career as a musician in this country. If he be possessed of a good voice, he may become a public singer. Lacking voice, he may acquire mastery over one or more musical instruments and become an orchestra player, a member of one of the large instrumental aggregations for the performance, chiefly, of symphonies, which have, in our day, become part of the life of almost every large community. Then, again, he may, always taking the necessary gifts for granted, concentrate his energies upon some particular instrument and become a virtuoso solo player. He may also aspire to the higher functions of conductor of chorus or orchestra or of both, teaching large numbers of people in the interpretation of the creations of the masters. He may even become a creator or composer himself. Lastly, and best of all, he may become a master of ecclesiastical music and devote his talents and activities to the service of the Church and her liturgy. In any of these fields, owing to the rôle music plays in the lives of our people, the possibilities for success will be commensurate with the young man's talent, ability, energy and opportunism. When I say success, I use the word in its ordinary worldly sense, not in the ethical and ideal meaning.

The fact that there is in this country no authoritative or official protection or promotion of music as an art, either by the general Government or the municipality, as in the case of other nations, not only has an important bearing on the social and artistic status of the musician at his début in public life, but it also affects him, more or less, throughout his career. While there are many private schools and excellent individual teachers under whom the aspiring musician may acquire skill and proficiency, they will not give him, except in very rare cases, the prestige which goes with graduation from an institution, authoritatively established by the nation, or endowed by individuals or associations for the purpose of upholding the ideals and maintaining the standards in accordance with which the young disciples in the art are to be formed, a prestige which is most desirable and important at the beginning of a young man's public activity. This circumstance not only deprives him of many material advantages at a time when he needs them most, but it also affects his attitude toward his art as well as toward the public and tends to increase certain dangers which are inseparable from the career of a secular musician.

The young musician must have employment in order to subsist. To secure this employment, unless he possess such talent and superior attainment as immediately to command it by sheer superior worth, it is necessary to please his patrons. This frequently implies, especially in our day, acceptance of their standards in taste and, occasionally, their principles; thus the musician has no opportunity to impose his standards and principles on them. If, as a singer, the young man becomes a member of an opera company, he is required to sing the rôles assigned to him, no matter what may be the character and tendency of the work in hand. The same holds good of the orchestra player. Like the singer, he participates in the performance of any and every work in the company's repertoire. This may be lofty and fill the imagitation with high ideals and stir the will to high purposes, or it may be frivolous, trivial and vicious both as to music and text. But he has no choice: either he must lend his skill to the work before him or withdraw from the company. Many singers and players yield to the allurement and glitter of the opera, ignore its dangers, voluntarily become cogs in a huge wheel, either on the plea of having to make a living or because they think such service is part of the exigencies of their profession. The moral effect produced upon singers and players by such concessions and compromises, by the sensuous nature of most of the music performed by them and by the generally deleterious atmosphere in which they live is too notorious to need description.

The singer, gifted with voice, temperament and intelligence, who devotes his talent to the interpretation of that which is highest and best in song literature, the cantata or oratorio, moves in a nobler sphere and enjoys many opportunities for influencing his hearers in an ideal direction. He has it in his power to choose his own repertoire. The same holds good with the virtuoso on any instrument and in a higher degree still with the conductor of large choral bodies or oratorio societies. To the latter it is given to occupy a position more responsible than that of other musicians except church musicians. He draws his numerous personnel for the rendering of works of art, inferior in importance to liturgical music only, from every rank of society, initiates them into the truths and ideas expressed in the text and familiarizes them with the musical splendor which the text has received at the hands of the composer and then invites the whole community to come and share in the feast which has been prepared for it. Not only has he the privilege of exercising this ennobling influence over so many people, but his sphere and the nature of his activity also removes him from the dangers of the compromises described above. He is very seldom confronted with a proposal to perform anything trivial, inferior or unworthy. Before leaving the secular field we must not forget the important, arduous and often ungrateful task of the private teacher. While the singer, player and conductor address themselves to the public at large and en bloc, the conscientious private teacher forms the taste and artistic mentality of the individual. He has the power to form people properly equipped to spread sound taste and to resist the musical heresies of our day.

*The thirty-second of a series of vocational articles.

While the young Catholic musician may, by adherence to principle, strength of character and constant vigilance, manage to carve out a career for himself in the secular domain of his art without grave compromise, his logical and real field of activity lies in the music of the Church. Instead of having to steer his way cautiously between the rocks and shoals of secularism and sensationalism, as expressed in the music of the world, he has but to place himself under the ægis of the Church, follow the plan laid out for him only recently by Pope Pius X and reaffirmed in unmistakable terms by Benedict XV, in order to be not only on safe ground ethically, but also to find the means for his highest development artistically. The fact that his path is clearly traced by no means implies that he will find it easy to travel. In view of present-day conditions in this country, in the matter of church music—with an exception here and there—the young man embracing this, the highest calling in musical activity, needs in addition to a formation in the various kinds of church music, i.e., Gregorian chant, sacred polyphony, figured liturgical music—to have a knowledge of the liturgy. He must live the life of the Church. Without her spirit he can not realize the nature, spiritual power and beauty of Gregorian chant, nor will he realize the mission which the Church has assigned to its use in her liturgy. Above all he must possess a never-flagging zeal, determination and perseverance if he would resist the surging tide of secular tendencies and the bad taste which obtains on all sides.

It must reluctantly be admitted that the temporal reward to which church musicians of the right caliber are entitled is not generally bestowed on them. Pope Pius X in his Motu Proprio on Church music has given directions on this point which will, it is to be hoped, be gradually translated into practice. In the meantime, gifted and generous young Catholic musicians may console themselves with the knowledge that their calling is an apostolate.

JOSEPH OTTEN.

European Alcoholism

IT is a common notion among amateurs in social science that, if our people would suppress the use of distilled alcoholic liquors and substitute the drinking of wine or beer, we should happily solve the intemperance question at once, and at the same time keep up the revenue for governmental needs. Italy and France, they say, drink wine and are sober; Germany and Austria drink beer and are sober. They are not sober; they are all chronically pickled in alcohol. France is twice as drunken as England. In these States, as everywhere else the expenditure by the Government because of the results of alcoholism immeasurably exceed the revenue from the tax on alcoholic beverages.

Luigi Luzzatti, who was the Italian premier, in submitting a bill recently for the reduction of intemperance, brought together evidence which proves that while the general death-rate in Italy is falling, the mortality from alcoholism is increasing; and, secondly, that the drinking of wine and beer has not decreased drunkenness, lessened crime and poverty, or the insanity brought on by alcoholism.

Dr. Antonini, a superintendent of one of the leading Italian insane asylums, said, a few years ago [Archivio di Psichiatria]: "The hospitals and insane asylums (of Italy) are filled with alcoholic patients; tuberculosis worsened by alcoholism is spreading everywhere; pellagra is spread by alcoholic degeneracy; crime is becoming more frequent among the young; the suicides are countless; the people are steadily growing weaker physically and morally." This sounds like oratorical exaggeration, but several other Italian delegates at the International Congress on Alcoholism in Milan, in 1913, gave the same testimony. Falconi, the Italian Minister of State, said that deaths from alcoholism in Italy had trebled since 1889.

Cardinal Mercier, the Archbishop of Mechlin, is one of the most zealous antialcoholic workers of Europe, because his own people in Belgium suffer so much from alcoholism. His address on this subject, delivered at Liège, December 20, 1908, is one of the best articles of its kind written. Another address, delivered before the Belgian National Antialcoholic Congress in Brussels, June 26, 1910, is supplementary to his conference at Liège. He gives some notable statistics: in 1910 there were 211,617 liquor shops in Belgium—one for every thirty-four inhabitants in the nation. One blessing of the war is that very many of these have been destroyed. The Belgians spent daily 550,000 francs for alcoholic liquor. There were annually 20,000 deaths and 800,000 cases of pauperism from alcoholism in that little kingdom; seventy-five per cent. of the judicial convictions and fifty per cent. of the suicides were caused by alcohol. The Cardinal says the Danes drink relatively more distilled liquors than any people in Europe, and the Belgians come next; but the Belgians drink more beer proportionately than any other nation in Europe.

The French consume more alcohol in general than any other people in the world—they drink twice as much distilled liquor per capita as the people of Great Britain [Brewing Trades Review, 1911]. There were 355,000 liquor shops in France in 1881, and 480,000 in 1911—three saloons to one bake-shop. "But one half-penny's worth of bread to this intolerable deal of sack!" In a stationary population French insanity has increased from 47,000 to 700,000 cases. There is a strong antialcoholic national league in France, and sad need for it. Bishop Turinez, of Nancy; Bishop Latty, of Avignon, and Fathers Ract, Gibier, Perrot and others have written vigorous pastorals or books on the subject of French alcoholism.

Dr. M. G. Bunge, professor of physiological chemistry at Basle, in 1893, estimated from Government statistics, that one-fifth of the commercial activity of the entire German people was at that time totally expended in the production and sale of alcoholic beverages. A great many officers in the German army and navy are total abstainers, owing to the Kaiser's urging. Russia has prohibited the sale of distilled liquors during the war; France has stopped the use of absinthe, and England has been threatening to tear herself away from her whiskey and soda. When, however, the Emperor William's address against alcohol, delivered at Mürvik, in 1910, was sent by a temperance league of Germany to 2,400 newspapers, less than 350 noticed it at all, some of these doubted its genuineness, and others altered its meaning.

Professor Adolph von Strümpfell, of Leipzig, holds that "Nothing is more erroneous, from the physician's standpoint, than to think of diminishing the destructive effects of alcoholism by substituting beer for other alcoholic drinks." In Munich one hospital death in every sixteen is from beer-drinker's heart, yet Lord Beaconsfield called beer "liquid bread." One loaf of bread has the food value of exactly one yard of filled beer steins, and the cost in many ways is much less.

These statistics, which do not scratch the surface, make it doubtful that Germans, Italians and other Europeans may drink alcohol at meals because "they have always been accustomed to do so." No matter what they may be able to do, it is certain that northern European races in America may not drink alcohol habitually. All investigators are unanimous in holding that half the crime of the civilized world is due to alcohol, and it is worth while to cut down this toll to hell, no matter what braying is on the wind from those who "know when to leave drink alone."

The only way to leave it alone is to leave it out, as Cardinal Mercier said; and this holds for Germans and Italians as well as for Irishmen. Wars start in avarice, but the sins of peace are also alcoholic. Here in the United States just now there is not a little fanaticism mixed with the attack on alcoholism, but the attack itself is good. It is to be regretted that Catholics are inclined to hold aloof in this fight, not through love for alcohol, but because bigots and canting preachers have made a new religion, that consists in twisting the tail of the "Demon Rum." If we will vote for the gang, we should at least spread the devotion instituted by Pius X, of holy memory, who in 1904 granted an indulgence to any one who abstains from alcoholic drink for the present day and says the prayer:

> God, my Father, to show my love for Thee, to repair Thine injured honor, to obtain the salvation of souls, I firmly determine not to drink wine, beer, or any inebriating drink today. I offer Thee this mortification in union with the sacrifice of Thy Son Jesus Christ, Who daily to Thy glory immolates Himself on the altar. Amen.

Pius X was an Italian who did not think alcohol good for the people, and Leo XIII was of the same opinion, as he wrote to Archbishop Ireland.

AUSTIN O'MALLEY, M.D.

The Circus

AN entertaining little essay on the circus appeared lately in one of the weekly papers, from the pen of Mr. Joyce Kilmer. Among his interesting reflections the essayist drew attention to the blind, unquestioning faith of the various performers in their trapezes and galloping steeds, and of the audience in its calm expectation that the actors will go through all their impossible feats without hitch or accident. And all this, observe, merely on a basis of precedent and the authority of the press-agent. Although the atmosphere of the circus is full of wonders, it is no place for doubts. The phenomenon is respectfully submitted to the notice of ultramodern gentlemen who maintain that an attitude of deliberate doubt is better than prudent belief. Various other profound phases of the circus were touched upon lightly by Mr. Kilmer; but, except for a slight reference, he ignored what to the present writer seems to be the primary significance of a circus, considered merely as a text.

Hazlitt forestalled us in discovering the main lesson of a circus. We shall allow him to state it:

> The hearing a speech in parliament, drawled or stammered out by the Honourable Member or the Noble Lord; the ringing the changes on their commonplaces, which any one could repeat after them as well as they, stirs me not a jot, shakes not my good opinion of myself; but the seeing the Indian jugglers does. It makes me ashamed of myself. I ask what there is that I can do as well as this? Nothing. What have I been doing all my life? Have I been idle, or have I nothing to show for all my labor and pains? Or have I passed all my time in pouring words like water into empty sieves, rolling a stone up a hill and then down again, trying to prove an argument in the teeth of facts, and looking for causes and not finding them? Is there no one thing in which I can challenge competition, that I can bring as an instance of exact perfection in which others can not find a flaw?

Now this was a most salutary mental state to be brought to. Who would think that a ferocious literary critic could be so impressed by an exhibition of Indian jugglers! It is to be regretted that Hazlitt did not patronize their shows oftener. He would have got along with his friends more swimmingly, made fewer enemies, and been less convinced of his own infallibility of judgment de omni scibili. What if, instead of a few Indian jugglers, the "greatest show on earth" was spread out before his astonished gaze, with its three arenas and its stages filled with "countless wonders," the "world's greatest aerialists," "notable galaxies of absolutely unequaled lady and gentlemen riders," "more extraordinary acrobats than were ever before seen together at one time," "a prodigious presentation of various and vigorous arenic acts of deftness and dexterity," "an entertaining number of trained horses and high-school acts, including the great troupe of musical horses," what, we say, would Hazlitt have felt in the presence of these and a hundred more ocular demonstrations of fine perfection arrived at by toilsome training? I fancy he would be ready, no doubt, to crawl on all fours in the lowest depths of self-abasement.

I do not make fun of Hazlitt. Nor in quoting the glowing phrases of the press-agent is any burlesque propensity indulged in. With Mr. Kilmer I believe the apparent hyperboles of press-agents understate the matter. The limitations of language are defined, as a rule, by ordinary occurrences, ordinary usages, ordinary excellences and vices, ordinary accomplishments. The circus is a place for the extraordinary. The perfection of training displayed in the circus transcends a vocabulary that has been called into existence by the ordinary haps and mishaps of life. It is a species of perfection that belongs, so to speaek, to the ultra-violet band of the human spectrum, beyond the reach of language. Pity the poor press-agent who works with the inadequate tools of everyday speech.

Would not Shakespere himself despair of giving us an idea of how much patience and perseverance went into the making of the bare-back rider who can eat and drink and lie down, and stand either on one foot or on his head, all on the back of a powerful steed galloping like mad round and round in a circle? Think of it! How safe that man would feel in an earthquake! While you and I risk our lives if we stand on anything less stable than eternal hills! Do not shrug your shoulders with the dull reflection that it is all a matter of practice. That's just it. Is there anything in the world you can do, as a result of practice, with the same ease and perfection? Surely there must be something which you are supposed to be able to do with some degree of perfection, if only for the reason that you have been given opportunities and facilities for acquiring perfection in it. Are you as expert in law, or medicine, or theology, or oratory, or writing, or engineering, or teaching, or in whatever your calling is, as the circus-rider is in his? I grant, a disconcerting question. Perhaps you have not taken your calling so seriously as the horse-back rider. Perhaps you have not given your specialty your undivided attention. Perhaps indolence has made you resigned to an amateurish mediocrity, satisfied to be a little better skilled than the laity. This is painful. I shall not press my inquiries farther. The circus-performer, it is clear, can humiliate us and put us through the same agonies which Hazlitt experienced from his Indian jugglers.

"Let us salute capacity wherever we may find it," said Stevenson, speaking of François Villon and his dexterous fellow-thieves. The circus, it is true, may not afford the most elevating influences imaginable. The fastidious eye will quiver at the frankness of its intention to win an honest, simple and childish approval. It is all color and movement and saw-dust. There may not be any great spiritual depth beneath its shining surface of tawdry tinsel, and we may find ourselves wondering what manner of a man he is who devotes an existence, which comes to us but once, to the rather uninspiring task of keeping, by highly-developed manual adroitness, a dozen china-plates, a set of cutlery, and half a score of lamps with their glass chimneys, revolving in a circle, without hurting himself. But let us salute capacity and we shall not go away unrewarded.

Behold that commonplace-looking man putting a pig through its paces! The animal is actually sitting at a table full of viands, with a napkin before him, and exercising preternatural self-restraint. What is that trainer doing here? Why is he not at the head of armies? Or manager of a world-wide corporation? Think of the obstinate material he has victoriously overcome! Who can form a remotely true conception of the vast mountains of patience, quiet persistence, self-control, quickness of perception, sagacity and alertness required to change the unregenerate pig of the farm-yard into this model of etiquette? Messieurs et mesdames, pueri, virginesque, if we could only bring half of that systematic industry and persistence to the training of ourselves, what a happy world we should find ourselves in! How many of us are helpless before the difficult material of our habits and temperaments! And yet, pardon me, we are not, I am sure, such unpliant subjects as the circus pig. How many parents and teachers are in despair over the perversity of children. And yet the common circus-trainer—but why carry the comparison to the last extreme of expression? "Let us salute capacity wherever we may find it." It shows an humble frame of mind. And we learn only when we are humble. Perhaps it is the humbling effects of the dexterities in the circus that make it more popular with children than with adults.

JAMES J. DALY, S.J.

COMMUNICATIONS

Catholics and the Y. M. C. A.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The stand taken by Mr. Farrell in calling Mr. Hume to order for the article he wrote in reply to a letter asking for proof that the Y. M. C. A. is hostile to the best interests of the Catholic young man, is rather startling. A general thesis is laid down in the words of our Holy Father Benedict XV: "Let no private person, either by the publication of books or journals, or by delivering discourses, publicly assume the position of a master in the Church." Mr. Farrell immediately jumps to the conclusion that "Mr. Hume has pronounced sentence where the Church is silent." After four or five readings of Mr. Hume's article I can not agree with his critic. It seems, in replying to the challenge of Mr. McCloskey, that the writer has not exceeded the liberty given to every Catholic by the very words of the Encyclical:

> Concerning matters in which, since the Church has not pronounced judgment, saving faith and discipline, discussion may take place pro and contra, it is certainly lawful for everybody to say what he thinks and to uphold his opinion.

Would Mr. Farrell kindly be a little more specific, and show just how and in what part of his letter Mr. Hume pronounces sentence against Mr. McCloskey and condemns him for his opinions. The arguments used by Mr. Hume have a strong objective value. They are set down as principles. The application of the principles is left to individuals themselves. The author has made the cap. He leaves to whomsoever it may fit to wear it or to tear it.

Mr. Farrell is hardly fair in summing up what he calls Mr. Hume's chief argument. He says: "Stated universally it would read, 'No Catholic can be loyal to his faith and retain his self-respect who joins a voluntary organization or society from the higher offices of which Catholics are excluded.'" Why put in higher offices? Does Mr. Farrell consider athletic trainers and captains of teams as officers exerting an influence on the destiny of the Y. M. C. A.? Mr. Hume does not limit the exclusion of Catholics to the higher offices. He claims that Catholics are denied both active and passive voice in the real, substantial direction of the organization, and this on religious grounds. In his own words: " . . . It refuses Catholic members the right to vote for trustees who control the destinies of the Y. M. C. A., and, naturally, does not permit them to hold places on this board." What is called Mr. Hume's chief argument—and we might question whether it be his chief argument—seems different when seen in the writer's own words. The critic throws the argument overboard by showing how absurd a parallel case might be. But alas for the parity! It has weak legs and broken crutches. The comparison limps just where it should be strongest. In the governing body of the Y. M. C. A. not a single Catholic representative is allowed to voice the sentiments of the nearly 150,000 Catholic members. There is no such total exclusion in the English Government. In that country Catholic citizens have a vote. There are Catholic judges on the benches; there are Catholic generals in the army; there are Catholic members of Parliament; there are Catholic lords. Catholics have a voice in the government of the land. A Catholic is not a mere protegé, a sort of governmental parasite, fostered simply because his presence, when aid is needed, lends help to the ruling inner circle.

Mr. Hume has a sentence to the following effect: "A Catholic can not accept these terms" sc., a total ignoring of his religious opinions, and on account of them an exclusion from all active influence, "without sacrificing loyalty and self respect." This sentence seems to be the wedge used to break up the whole argument of the letter. Taken, however, in its spirit and context, I think it ought to be understood as applicable to those Catholics only who realize the real state of the case and willfully accept the conditions imposed. If Mr. Farrell can show that the dictum in this sense, is in any way against the real spirit of our Holy Father's loving words, let him do so.

New York. L. RONALD.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Mr. Farrell is to be congratulated on the first fruits of his earnest, sympathetic defence of the Y. M. C. A. as a club for Catholic young men. Leo Paul McCloskey has written a second letter. Not satisfied with publicly boasting of and defending his allegiance to a recognized and confessed opponent of the Catholic Church, he is now bold and daring enough to launch a direct and snobbish attack against Catholic laymen, from whom, be it noted, he is always careful to distinguish his athletic self. His bad logic is its own best answer. But, it would be interesting to know how many athletic Catholics have been encouraged by Mr. McCloskey and Mr. Farrell to cast aside, as founded on second-hand knowledge or empty, narrow fear, the advice of Catholic pulpits. Surely, the Y. M. C. A. need not urge its Catholic members to bring around their Catholic friends, and Mr. McCloskey says it never does so, so long as it has such zealous Catholic members and devoted defenders as Mr. McCloskey and Mr. Farrell.

Out of fairness to the educational Order to which you belong, and from which so many of your readers have received their training, may I urge that you let all your readers know that Mr. Nelson Hume, too, is a graduate of a Jesuit college? He is the type of graduate to which your Order may point with pride and honor. While your colleges turn out such men, the Catholic Church may feel secure in the loyalty and self-sacrificing devotion of her laity; and, perhaps, in the near future, such generous laymen will be able to provide gymnasiums, not second-hand ones, where athletic Catholics can also manifest their loyalty to dear Mother Church.

Yonkers, N. Y. JOHN E. MCCLOSKEY.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have followed with interest the controversy on the subject of Catholics in the Y. M. C. A. The discussion seems now to be drawing to a close with arguments to show that the Y. M. C. A. is a Protestant religious body, and that in consequence it must exert at least an indirect influence on the Catholic members of the gymnasium under its control. I consider these points well established. Yet the full truth has not been told. I am convinced that the Y. M. C. A. conducts its gymnasiums, libraries and reading rooms largely for the purpose of exerting a direct religious influence upon its associate members. And while I am not unwilling to exonerate Mr. McCloskey and Mr. Farrell from any wilful fault, I fancy that I can see in their state of mind, as portrayed in their letters, a partial success of the Y. M. C. A.'s plan of campaign.

An exponent of the Y. M. C. A., Mr. Herbert N. Casson, who speaks "as one having authority," published an article some years ago which lays bare the root of the evil. The article appeared in Munsey's Magazine for September, 1905. After intimating that the Y. M. C. A., as looked at from different viewpoints, may be regarded as a real estate corporation, a gymnasium, a university, a church, a hotel or a recreation club, he discusses each phase of its work separately, and says:

> A fourth twist, and it is transformed into a church for men only. "Why don't men go to church?" is the plaint of many a preacher. In many cases the answer is, "Because they go to the services of the Young Men's Christian Association." Here we find a Bible class of thirty-eight thousand, and an annual attendance at religious meetings of more than three millions. If the men will not come to it, it goes to the men. It holds short dinner-hour meetings for workmen in the quarries of Vermont, in the lumber-camps and cotton-mills of the South, and in the mines and steel plants of Pennsylvania. Not long ago, in a blaze of missionary enthusiasm, it took forty of its young men and sent them as advance agents into ten foreign countries. . . .
>
> It would not be correct to say that it has no creed. It is definitely Protestant. There is nothing uncertain about its religious purpose. But it says, "The way to influence a young man's opinion is by becoming his friend." And so it opens its doors wide to Protestant and Catholic, Jew and Gentile, believer and unbeliever. Whether a young man's beliefs are shaped in the Young Men's Christian Association mold or not, he is welcome. To use the well-known phrase of Herbert Spencer's, "If it can effect the change it aims at—well; if not—well also, though not so well."

Here is an open avowal that the Y. M. C. A. has donned the sheep's clothing of broad-minded philanthropy for the express purpose of making proselytes to Protestantism. They become the friend of the young man by catering to his need for gymnastic exercise; they wish to influence his opinions, to shape his beliefs in their mold; they hope to effect the change at which they aim. They are wise in their generation, and the basis of their hope is the substance of our danger. If a young man is strong enough to resist their influence and to preserve his faith—"well also, though not so well." At least he is no longer antagonistic to the Y. M. C. A., and he serves as a decoy to lure his weaker brethren into the trap set for them.

As some of your correspondents have pointed out, the remedy seems to lie in the establishment of Catholic gymnasiums and reading rooms. Statistics given by the editor of the Queen's Work go to show that as much as one-fifth, perhaps one-fourth, of the Y. M. C. A. membership is made up of Catholics. Here is the nucleus of a splendid Catholic organization. If these young men would unite in their own defence, they could make a strong appeal to Catholic men of means, and their appeal would not be disregarded. Let us thank Mr. McCloskey and Mr. Farrell for directing our attention to this need, and let us ask them to take the initiative in leading back a large portion of our flock to safer pastures.

Detroit. JAMES MONAGHAN, S.J.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The lengthy letter signed by the gentleman of Baltimore is most interesting. He is unmerciful in his impeachment of the gentlemen who dare assert that "any affiliation with the Y. M. C. A. is prohibited to Catholics by the natural and divine positive law." He then proceeds to delineate at great length the real ens known as the Y. M. C. A., which he characterizes as a true Cerberus. He seems to defeat his own purpose, for any one who knows the real character, as described by him, and still has part with the "monster," would not be so much in danger of losing his Faith as in the greater danger of having already lost it. "He who is not with me is against me" seems to apply here.

It is not my purpose to prove that the natural and divine positive law enters into the question of the debate, as to whether or not a Catholic should affiliate himself with the Y. M. C. A., yet, working on the hypothesis furnished by his characterization of that organization, I should feel pretty safe in declaring it did, most emphatically. If not, then, to what purpose did St. Paul write: "Bear not the yoke with unbelievers, for what participation hath justice with injustice?" "For many walk, of whom I have told you often (and now tell you weeping) that they are enemies of the Cross of Christ. Whose end is destruction, whose God is their belly, and whose glory is in their shame, who mind earthly things." He might also read the second epistle of St. John (vs. 8-11), and if he can reconcile his pronunciamento against the Messrs. Hume, Jones and Ryan with his delineation of this "living, monstrous organism," then he proves himself, as he did in his first letter, a better sophist than casuist.

Montpelier. ROBERT HUGH.

Governor Opposes Capital Punishment

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The Governor of one of our States has recently declared himself opposed to capital punishment. As the State in which the Governor holds office has, up to the present, used capital punishment, he doubtless felt himself in duty bound to speak out his mind. Accordingly, in his message to the State Legislature during the present session, he endeavored to prove by statistics that capital punishment has not served a deterrent to murder and hence should be abolished. The statistics, however, are, as one paper puts it, "neither conclusive nor satisfying." But worse than this, the Governor has been unfortunate in the figures and comparisons he has chosen. For instance, he tells us that, "in this State of ours 651 homicides were committed in 1910, after nearly a century's enforcement of this law; while in a neighboring State, where capital punishment has been abolished, the percentage of homicides has not been much over fifty per cent. per capita of those committed in our State." Now, in the first place even though the law had been enforced (and we shall presently show that such has not been the case), the comparison between the two States is not a fair one, for the following reason: in the Governor's State the population of one city falls little short of the entire population of the neighboring State, and criminologists tell us that cities where men are constantly rubbing elbows with their fellows are special haunts of wickedness and crime. Indeed, it stands to reason there can be no satisfactory standard of comparison in the percentage of crimes committed between a population spread out over a large area and another of equal numbers confined to the congested limits of a city.

The Governor says he has gathered his statistics "after nearly a century's enforcement of this law" (i. e., capital punishment); and, in another place, that "such punishment has been duly enforced" in his own State. But the fact of the matter is that capital punishment has not been duly enforced either in the Governor's State in particular or in the United States as a whole. It is precisely because it has not been duly enforced that homicide in our country has grown to such appalling proportions. According to statistics furnished by the Chicago Tribune, one out of every seventeen murderers was put to death in the United States thirty years ago, whereas one out of every seventy-six was put to death ten years ago. The number of murderers during that same period, from 1885 to 1906, has steadily increased from 1,808 to 9,350. In Germany things are different. For instance, in 1906, when we had 9,350 murderers, Germany, with a population about two-thirds as large as our own, had 567. In Germany the convictions average over ninety-five per cent.; in our country, under two per cent. Again, in Canada, where the Government executes about nine out of every ten, the proportionate number of murders is many times less than our own. Baron Garofolo, who is, as Dr. Walsh has already said, a recognized authority, tells us in his book entitled "Criminology" that, "in country after country, where the death penalty has been eliminated or become rare because of abuse of the pardon and reprieve, the number of murders has constantly increased." So much for the "due enforcement" of the capital law in the country as a whole. Now a word on the law's "enforcement" in the Governor's State. "In this State of ours, 651 homicides were committed in 1910." We have no statistics at hand to show how many executions there were in that State that year. But we have statistics for three other years before and after that time. They are as follows: In 1908, one paid for his crime with his life; again in 1911, only one; in 1913, none at all. Every allowance being made for error in the light of these statistics, we shall not be thought unreasonable if we declare our unwillingness to accept the statement that the law of capital punishment has been duly enforced in the Governor's State.

We could have wished that the Governor had confined his attention to statistics in his message to the Legislature. Had he done so, he would have saved himself several assertions which are ethically incorrect. He would not, for example, have said that the carrying out of the law of capital punishment is brutal. Here are his own words: "The cold-blooded enforcement of this awful penalty under the form of law is brutal." It is difficult to understand how any one can declare lawful capital punishment brutal. To be brutal is to debase man's rational nature to the level of the dumb animal, the brute. But there is no brutality if the State, after satisfying itself as to the guilt of the suspect through a jury of twelve of his peers, declares his life forfeited, for reason tells us that the State has a right to use just means to secure the protection of its subjects. Perhaps the Governor will not admit that capital punishment is a just means of protecting its subjects. We quote his own words: "Taking human life is only justifiable in self-defence." The natural law, however, teaches that there are two other cases in which homicide is justifiable, namely, just war and capital punishment. Ethicists tell us that homicide is not intrinsically evil, and the Governor has virtually acknowledged this by granting that homicide is justifiable in self-defence. It is no less justifiable in the case of capital punishment, because it is a necessary means for attaining the end of the State.

We quote from the message once more: "'Thou shalt not kill' is the law of Christianity, and should be the law of twentieth century humanity." Be it so. But then, let Christianity and not twentieth century abolitionists be the interpreter of this law. How Christianity has interpreted it is clear from the usage of Christian nations and the teaching of Christianity itself.

St. Louis. JOHN J. KEEFE.

"C. C." Answered

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The inquiry of "C. C." in AMERICA (March 6, 1915) calls attention to the "Life of St. Catherine of Genoa" in English, with a preface by the late Father Hecker, in which he praised the translator without giving her name, though at that time, in 1873, she had already gone to her reward. The translation was made by Mrs. George Ripley. Like her distinguished husband, she was prominent among the Transcendentalists of Boston and one of the chief promoters of the Brook Farm Movement. After becoming a Catholic she lived many years in New York City, where she had the opportunity to consult Father Hecker frequently in regard to spiritual matters.

Her life after conversion was altogether heroic, both in good works for the poor and the sick and in patient suffering. So far as can be ascertained, her husband was well disposed toward the Catholic Church at the time of his death in 1880. He held a leading place as a critic and a scholar in New York, where he was chosen by the Appleton Company as joint editor with Charles A. Dana of the "New American Encyclopedia."

New York City. THOMAS MCMILLAN, C.S.P.

Absurdities About Mexico

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Another object lesson emphasizing the absurdity of discussing a matter about which one knows nothing is offered by Mr. Lincoln Steffens' article, "The Sunny Side of Mexico," in the May number of the Metropolitan. Mr. Steffens' entire stock in trade appears to be a lavish use of glittering generalities, of accusations unsupported by any proof whatever, and of imaginary conversations with fictitious characters. His ignorance of Mexico is on a par with that of the artist, Mr. John Sloan, whose pictures of Mexican scenes proclaim at once that Mr. Sloan has never been near that country. To people who really know our southern neighbor, some of Mr. Steffens' remarks will be a distinct revelation. Here are some of his assertions and the answer thereto:

> (1) One day's light labor a week, or an hour or two a day brings forth all the fruit, fish and flowers, all the food, shelter and clothing, they have to have.

No one with even a rudimentary knowledge of Mexico would be guilty of so preposterous an exaggeration. There are a few strips of land along the coast in Mexico where Mr. Steffens' remarks hold approximately true, but one glimpse of the barren deserts of the north, of the bleak mountain sides of many of the central States, or of the alkaline flats and marshes of the Valley of Mexico will dispel at once the idea that a living can be wrung from the soil with greater ease in Mexico than elsewhere.

> (2) The rest of the time they [the Mexicans] may loaf and play, make love, or war, or a useful tool beautiful, and they are willing and they are able to do such things happily.

All this as the result of the profound observation conducted from under the Portales at Vera Cruz during a period of perhaps two weeks. How much "happiness" has Mexico known during any part of her history? Has Mr. Steffens studied the annals of that unfortunate land? If so, he should know that the Spaniards on their arrival found the various tribes slaughtering one another and indulging in human sacrifices and cannibalism; that the Spaniards wrought much evil, together with the good they did, and that, when Spain relinquished her sovereignty, Mexico relapsed into utter anarchy; that revolution succeeded revolution for over fifty years; that occasionally there were no fewer than three individuals simultaneously claiming the presidency, and that an end to these conditions was brought about by the "despotism" of Porfirio Diaz, who gave the country thirty years of peace.

(3) Mr. Steffens says: "There are foreigners there; they see the fruit of the tree and the ore in the ground. . . . Hence the Mexican war," and then proceeds to tell that "Diaz sold lands, mines and natural resources generally to foreigners." He might have added that many of the properties acquired by foreigners were bought from private owners, and that, if Government land were sold under the Diaz Administration, at least the Mexican treasury was full, and her foreign credit stood high; that when Diaz retired, in 1911, the national treasury contained sixty-odd million pesos, which quickly disappeared before the onslaught of the Madero faction. Our observer also notes the fact that women and children accompany the army. "It was the people at war; at a people's war." Evidently Mr. Steffens does not know that this has been the custom in Mexico from time immemorial, and that women and children followed the armies of Diaz and of Huerta, just as they follow the forces of the present leaders.

(4) Mr. Steffens refers to Mexico City as the "foreign capital" of Mexico. It has been the national capital and recognized as such, ever since the country has had a national existence, so that we are left to guess just what is meant by that profound remark.

(5) "Carranza has been 'seen.'" The "'interests' that corrupted the Mexico of Diaz financed the murder of Madero and the revolutions against the revolution, these are dead against him." Vague statements, which may mean anything or nothing. Is it at all surprising that, in a country where all political differences are settled by force, the political opponents of Madero should have employed against him the same tactics he used against Diaz?

(6) "But," we learn, "Carranza was aroused to rage by the atrocities of Diaz. He joined Madero. And he saw Madero victorious, 'fooled' and finally killed." And, incidentally, during the "tragic ten days" in Mexico City, when Madero was still alive and in a position to profit by assistance, one of the many persons who did nothing to help him was Venustiano Carranza.

(7) Carranza's program is magnificently simple: "We will fight on and on for all that we want; all. It's a people that's fighting." It is safe to say that not more than two hundred thousand men, at the outside, are to-day under arms in Mexico, or a trifle more than one per cent. of the population of the republic. This does not look much like a "people's war" or a "people that is fighting."

(8) Finally, Mr. Steffens tells us, Carranza and the men about him are trying to prevent in Mexico the social evils the United States and the rest of the world are trying so gingerly, so vainly, to cure. "Being young and primitive." says Carranza, "we have not yet built up the terrible industrial system under which you have woman-labor and child-labor and hard labor for most people; riches and luxury for the few; prostitution, disease and crime." Words fail me. I can not conceive that any one, even a man so utterly devoid of humor as Carranza, should issue a statement to the effect that in Mexico there is no woman-labor, nor child-labor, nor hard labor for most of the people. No "luxuries for the few," indeed! For the last four years the American public has been assured that it was to abolish class-privilege that the revolution was being waged, and now Carranza tells us that this evil does not exist in Mexico! No prostitution! Ye gods and little fishes! Did Carranza say this of Mexico, and did Mr. Steffens believe it? "No diseases," of a country ravaged by smallpox, tifo, and venereal disorders! No crime! no, certainly not. No one ever heard of rape, murder or pillage in Mexico, least of all in territory occupied by Carranza's troops.

"We think we can avoid that system." Unfortunately, the world is skeptical, and it is to be feared that before Mr. Carranza can put into operation his Utopian schemes, which, to use his own words, "will provide less thrift and more joyousness, less misery and more, much more, general leisure and culture and happiness (than exist in the United States)" the heavy hand of justice will rudely awaken him from his pleasant dreams. Such is the sober judgment of a former resident in Mexico.

New York. A. K.

A Governor Who Believes in Fair Play

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In your able editorial, "Black and White," in the issue of April 3, you referred to the efforts made in various States to pass the convent inspection bill, and incidentally you mentioned that a committee appointed by Governor Ferguson, of Texas, to report on such a bill respectfully recommended that it be not passed, giving among other reasons, "that this particular bill is a veiled and unprovoked effort, whether wittingly or unwittingly, to encourage a vicious and unwarranted anti-Catholic sentiment in the American State." And the most pleasing feature of this agitation is that the pernicious bill died in the committee-room. That speaks volumes for Texas, where Catholics are in the minority. Having lived in Texas for thirty years, this makes me feel proud. The average Texan is not only fair-minded but our Legislature is likewise, for the above committee was largely composed of non-Catholics.

However, we have one man in our Lone Star State whose thought and actions are preeminently characterized by fairness and impartiality toward the Catholics, although not one himself, and that is our esteemed Governor, James E. Ferguson. During the campaign of last summer Mr. Ferguson was assailed, even by non-Catholic preachers, on the stump, in the pulpit and otherwise, all because he was a friend of Father Heckman, the priest of Temple, Texas, the home city of the Governor. It was learned during this heated campaign that Governor Ferguson had aided, in a financial manner, the priest's work, teaching a free night-school for the so-called "bad" boys, the boys on the street, and had also given aid to his church work. In a veiled manner it was even asserted that Mr. Ferguson was a Catholic.

Listen to his manly and brave words, that were thunderingly uttered in his many campaign speeches:

"They say I am a Catholic. Suppose I were one, would I not have the right, according to the Constitution of the United States, to run for Governor? But I am not a Catholic. Then they say I am friendly to the priest in Temple, and have helped him in his great work. To this I say unhesitatingly: yes, and I am proud of it; for I would sooner have the friendship of Father Heckman than be President of the United States."

Mr. Ferguson, when first announced as a candidate for Governor, was very little known throughout the State, the politicians were lined up against him, the leading papers were for the other candidate, who was widely known, but in spite of all this, for his fearless and fair-minded policies he was elected by over 40,000 majority.

Our hat is off to the average Texas voter, its Legislature and, above all, to the Governor who believes in fair play.

Galveston. A TEXAN.

Grace, not Information

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Not so very long ago, the writer was moved to give a copy of the "Life and Letters of Henry Van Rensselaer, Priest of the Society of Jesus," to a man who believes himself to be a "devout Catholic" of the Anglican persuasion. As the consequences involve some vital points on subjects of general misunderstanding, they are here given. The usual acknowledgment by courtesy contained these words: "But how could you be induced to give away a book which you so much value? In the hope of making a convert of me, I suppose? You must have given me up long ago, as a bad job." Now there flashed into the writer's mind at these words, one of Mgr. Benson's very strong epigrams, and the following reply was given to the "bad job":

It is not at all surprising that the attitude of Catholics in this matter is so universally misunderstood outside of the Church. I wish, therefore, to explain it to you. No well-instructed Catholic ever tries to "make converts" in the sense you mean. Proselytizing is the uglier name for it. St. Paul himself did not do that. What he did was to preach the Gospel, leaving the Holy Ghost to make the converts. Paul might indeed plant, then as now, and others might water, but God alone giveth the increase. Now, as in the first days of the Church every Catholic is bound to spread the light of Catholic truth wherever the darkness of error prevails. When the Apostles saw their Lord and Master reviled and falsely accused; when even one of the Household shamefully betrayed His cause and that of the infant Church—to a man, they rallied around Him and spent themselves in His glorification. Thus inflamed they were also, to a man, crucified, boiled in oil, given to beasts and torn asunder in the unflagging performance of this duty.

A readiness for such improbable extremes is the obligation of every loyal, not to say "devout," Catholic to-day. In occasionally giving a Protestant a book containing Catholic truth, we merely imitate the first apostolic work. Ours is a war of defence more than of aggression. With Our Lord and His Church bound, stripped, and held naked before scoffing natives and governments, we must seek to wipe the bloody sweat from His Holy Face, as did St. Veronica with the napkin of love for Him besought in the Gospel.

Robert Hugh Benson was once asked why he did not try to make converts of some of his old Anglican friends. His reply, above mentioned, was this: "Because they do not need information; what they need is grace—which God alone can bestow." You, my friend, are also well supplied with information of a sort, though, if you will pardon me, not yet the right sort. With a very deliberate discourtesy, which a well-born man like yourself would never permit on another subject, you frequently speak to me of "Romanists" and the "corruptions" of my holy faith. Now you know perfectly well when you use these expressions that, like yourself, I was born in the United States, and not in Rome: that I am not, therefore, a Roman, nor even a "Romanist," which is a word of Protestant invention. When you and your friends tell me, either directly or by implication, that "nearly all converts undergo a moral and intellectual deterioration" by reason of that grace, I send you a life-story like that of Father Van Rensselaer, Mgr. Benson, Paul Bourget, Newman, as a drop out of the bucket of inexhaustible names. I am not trying to "make a convert" of you, who are as you admit a rather bad job, if one regarded such things from the human standpoint. St. Augustine was a bad job, and even St. Paul, yet grace, not information, converted them. No human being ever made a convert, although human beings are of necessity instruments of grace. Therefore, I politely request you and all non-Catholic friends of your state of mind to accept or reject a gift purely as a matter of free-will, as the world did when Our Lord first came to proclaim His truth and His justice. I am solemnly bound by my conscience, not by "Roman tyranny," to spread religious truth whenever social decorum allows it; by example, by correction of falsehood, by joyous and zealous defence of the Holy Maligned One. Such is the "proselytizing" fervor of any instructed Catholic. I use the word instructed, not educated, because an instructed Catholic does not always imply an educated person in the world's sense. Jeanne d'Arc was an instructed Catholic. She was not an educated person. Grace, and not information, directed her.

Chester Springs, Pa. E. S. CHESTER.

How One Found the Church

To the Editor of AMERICA:

H. F. D., whose inquiry appeared in your issue of January 2, may be interested in knowing that it was a mistranslation in the Protestant Bible that started me "on the road to Rome."

Years ago, I translated the New Testament from the Greek. In translating the passage about the marriage in Cana, I was greatly surprised to find that, in the Greek, Christ said to His mother, "Woman, what is that to thee and to me?" In the Protestant version, the passage reads, "Woman, what have I to do with thee?"—a question that had always made me shudder, for it was not only un-Christlike, but unfilial.

Many years passed by before I learned, through a discussion with my doctor, who is a devout Catholic, that the Catholic Bible had the translation as I had rendered it. The thought came to me then, that, if the Catholics had the right translation, they might be right in other ways as well.

After following a tortuous path for a few years I, at last, realized that if ever I was to fulfil the end for which the Great Sacrifice was made, I must enter the Church that Our Lord instituted. So to-day, I am very thankful that I found that error in the Protestant translation, and I thank Him every day for making me a Christian and a Catholic.

Milwaukee. M. L. B.

Free Lectures on Catholic Subjects

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The following plan, which I have been discussing with some zealous Catholics of this city, may prove to be of interest to your readers, and even helpful in solving the knotty problem of how we shall successfully offset and undo the evil that has been done and is still being done by the Menace and kindred publications. The Knights of Columbus are showing most commendable and practical zeal at no little expense to themselves in combating this great evil. This is evident from the fact that they have set aside $50,000 to cover the expenses of hunting down and exposing calumnies against the Church. Since they are so willing to do their share in this fight against bigotry and prejudice, why could not the Church put at their disposal a number of lecturers, both churchmen and laymen, who would deliver lectures under the auspices of the Knights on controverted points of Catholic doctrine and Church history? These lectures could be given in large halls or theaters. They should be free, at least for non-Catholics, and the Knights would see to it that as many as possible of their non-Catholic friends and acquaintances were present. Needless to say, many who could never be persuaded to hear a sermon or lecture in a Catholic church would gladly attend a free lecture in a public hall or theater. If this plan were carried out in all our cities and towns throughout the country it would remove prejudice in a way nothing else can remove or destroy it. I think this is evident to any thinking man. Of course the distribution of Catholic Truth Society publications, the "Faith of our Fathers" and similar literature would go hand in hand with the above plan as a natural adjunct and auxiliary.

The objection may be raised that this project is not feasible owing to the lack of a sufficient number of capable lecturers. The objection is groundless. There are many priests throughout the land who are good speakers and who could readily prepare two or three lectures to be delivered in all the cities and towns in their vicinity. Our numerous, eloquent missionary priests have just the experience necessary for lectures of this kind. Then there are our distinguished Catholic laymen, to mention off hand only three, Dr. James J. Walsh, the Hon. Bourke Cockran and Professor J. C. Monaghan, whose words, perhaps, would weigh more with many non-Catholics than those of a member of the clergy. And last, but best of all, on "state occasions," so to speak, our distinguished orators of the hierarchy could be relied on to lead the way in this work of spreading the light of truth which alone can scatter the darkness of ignorance and prejudice. What is said here regarding the K. of C. is of course also applicable, with due modifications, to other Catholic societies, like the A. O. H., Central Verein, Catholic Foresters. In fact circumstances may be such in many places as to make it necessary for two or more of these societies to share among them the responsibility of the undertaking. Finally, if the above plan were carried out, not only would the end proposed be in great measure attained, but what may be of even greater importance, a well-informed Catholic laity would be ready on all occasions to give a reason for the Faith that is in them and an invincible defence of the same.

St. Louis, Mo. F. L.

Circulating Catholic Publications

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I am one of ten thousand or more parishioners of a city parish served by a religious congregation and working to erect a million-dollar church building. The parishioners are workingmen and their families. Great as is the opportunity to sell popular-priced Catholic literature to instruct and fortify the parishioners, not a piece of Catholic literature is ever on sale in or about the church buildings, and this—alas for Catholic organization—in spite of the fact that this same religious congregation, at its headquarters in another Eastern city, is engaged in the praiseworthy work of printing and attempting to circulate a good series of Catholic pamphlet publications. The parishioners, as they leave the church on Sundays, may be seen buying the yellow secular newspapers in which they will read unfair and garbled presentations of news relating to the Catholic Church, cabled across the Atlantic by the anti-Christian and Jew-owned news agencies of Europe. Within sight of this parish is a small colony of Finns, socialists to a man—and woman. Although poor without exception, their power of organization is such as should put Catholics to shame. Out of the small savings of their men, married and single, and of their single women, practically all of whom are domestic servants, they have built a thirty-thousand-dollar socialist hall containing a large and fully equipped theater, meeting rooms, and a cooperative restaurant. On week nights socialist meetings are held, also gymnasium classes, and on Sundays there is a socialist Sunday school in which children are taught to scoff at Jesus Christ and every form of religion. Every Sunday evening there is staged some socialist play, usually replete with attacks on religion and existing society. To enter the door of the building is to be solicited to buy socialist literature, a large supply of which is always on display. These people know the power of literature for organization purposes. Proof of this is furnished by the fact (it is one that should interest those of us who dream of a Catholic daily) that their subscriptions make possible the continued success of a socialist daily, printed in Finnish in an Eastern city some three hundred miles distant, and with a total circulation of less than ten thousand. Why not learn from the enemy? Did we exercise like energy in the ten thousand Catholic churches, schools, halls, society rooms, etc., of the United States, the difficulties of our publishers and writers were solved long ago.

Brooklyn, N. Y. JEROME D. GILLEN.

Vestments and Ecclesiastical Art

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It is good to see the comments in AMERICA on Gothic vestments. Matters of ecclesiastical art have been left entirely too much in the hands of commercial producers. We welcome the day when Gothic vestments will be more generally used, because they will bring in their train other sister arts in the service of the Church, and this movement may ultimately restore the mother art, architecture, to its former prestige. A priest of our diocese has none other than Gothic vestments. The members of his altar society have recently finished a chasuble, forming part of a complete set of vestments which were designed by an architect along the lines recommended by Madame Stummel, an authority on this subject. The vestments are made entirely by hand by members of the altar gild, the orphreys and borders being worked in silk embroidery. The interest thus aroused has a triple benefit. It encourages creative work, stimulates an interest in art and produces work worthy of the Lord. I have often wondered why altar societies confine their labors to keeping the altars clean and providing them with flowers. In the good old days, the designing and making of vestments was the chief occupation of such a society. The revival of the arts and crafts, now going on outside the Church, is a standing reproach to our indifference in allowing the gild idea of artistic service to go into hands which are far removed from the original source and inspiration.

Pittsburgh. JOHN T. COMES.

Prohibition

To the Editor of AMERICA:

If your letters on Prohibition are not closed, may I add, from Father Bridgett's book, "The Discipline of Drink," these words of the Cardinal Archbishop of Westminster (Manning):

> Now, my dear friends, listen: I will go to my grave without tasting intoxicating liquors; but I repeat distinctly that any man who should say that the use of wine or any other like thing is sinful when it does not lead to drunkenness—that man is a heretic condemned by the Catholic Church. With that man I will never work. Now, I desire to promote total abstinence in every way that I can; I will encourage all societies of total abstainers. But the moment I see men not charitable, attempting to trample down those who do not belong to the total abstainers—from that moment I do not work with those men.

Sudbury, Ont. HUGH J. MCNENLY.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, MAY 15, 1915

Entered as second-class matter, April 15, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Contributions for the Mexican fund may be sent direct to AMERICA.

The Daily Paper

THE controversy on the daily paper is now over. As usual in such cases, there were many opinions, variously expressed. It is certain, however, that the majority of the disputants were discontented with present conditions. The corrective is another matter. Some clamored for a distinctively Catholic daily; others for a clean paper fair to all; still others for a press bureau which would supply reliable news and refute calumnies. Here are the favorite remedies. Which will be chosen? All three are possible: two are comparatively easy. It is easy for Catholics of our great cities to choose the cleanest and fairest of the daily papers and throw their support to them, using all legitimate influence to make them cleaner and fairer. This is a partial solution of a vexed problem which, to our discredit, remains not only unsolved, but even untouched. It is easy, too, to found a press bureau; proper management would not be difficult, nor expenses great. Some brains, a great deal of interest and much good-will are requisite. There are brains in plenty; there is little interest and less good-will. This is a strange phenomenon, too. Our people are virtuous; they are generous and quick to respond to appeals. They have made astounding sacrifices to build and support churches and schools; they are helping missionary societies at home and abroad; they are doing little or nothing for the Catholic press.

There is a reason for this neglect: on second thought, it does not appear so strange after all. The people do not understand the importance of the Catholic paper; its value has never been brought home to them; our press holds no place in their lives; they care nothing for it because they know nothing about it. Here is the reason of our present deplorable condition, the reason why the great, vigorous American Church, 16,000,000 strong, second to none in holiness, is left without such important instruments for good as daily papers in the English language. The very confession of our deficiency is a humiliation; the deficiency itself is a monstrous shame.

Those who are pleading this cause are "voices crying in the wilderness," but they will not always be such. Below the horizon clouds are gathering; some day they will rise high and burst; the storm will be on. Our churches and our schools, especially the latter, will be in its path. Catholics will be given the consolation of picking up the pieces. History repeats itself.

Somewhere there rests the great responsibility of arousing the people to the necessity of a strong Catholic press which knows no fear except of God alone. In this is safety for the present and hope for the future.

A little interest will cause Catholics to influence some papers in every city to become cleaner and fairer; a little more interest will give rise to a Catholic press bureau; more interest still, and there will be Catholic daily papers, in the English language, in a few of our greatest cities. The first two are good: the last is best of all. Interest alone is lacking.

Poland's Great Sorrow

THE history of Poland for almost one hundred and fifty years is written in the tears of her people. Partition after partition has followed in ruthless succession, with the consequence that one of the noblest peoples of Europe, in spite of preeminent gifts of mind and heart, has been repressed and persecuted and kept almost in the position of serfs. And yet the Poles have not been crushed. On the eve of the present war, Polish names ranked high in science, in literature and in art, while the steadfastness of their adherence to the Catholic faith was acknowledged wherever Poland was known. If this has been the case, the reason may be traced largely to the character of the Polish women. Their love of country, their devotion to the home, their passion for high ideals, have kept alive both the fire of patriotism and the lamp of purity.

The lot of Poland, always hard, has been made even harder by the war. Innocent and without responsibility for its outbreak, Poland, by the very fact of its geographical situation, has had to bear an altogether disproportionate share in its effects. Over other countries the scourge of war has passed but once, but over Poland it has swung back and forth like a pendulum, and every time it has left in its wake new desolation and suffering. On the women, however, has its cruel hand been heaviest. The men are in the armies; they have at least a blanket to cover them, rations to eat, and their virtue is not exposed. Not so with the Polish women.

The lot of the daughters of Poland is especially piteous. Heroism comes as a grace of state to wives and mothers. But what of the young girls, who are without homes, without food, and without a roof over their head? Who is to save them? The Central International Catholic Association for the Protection of Young Girls (16, rue St. Pierre, Fribourg, Switzerland) is trying to protect them, but it finds itself without the necessary funds to do efficient work. And yet it sees a very great danger threatening both the health and morals of these innocent victims, unless contributions of money put it into its power to cope with present conditions. Oh, for a generous giver to snatch back souls that are being forced to the brink of hell!

Motherhood

ON earth there are many things sacred: motherhood is among them. In it marriage finds its chiefest justification and a vindication, too, because motherhood places the state of matrimony on a plane where woman is glorified and noble emotions replace sordid passions, causing men to bow in reverence before the mother and the clinging infant which she has brought forth for God and the State. A noble group it is, the mother and her children, God-given and God-blessed, the support at once of civilization and the body politic. There is no place for flippancy in a mother's regard; in her presence thought, word and action should be as lofty as man can make them. She is holy unto God, holy unto the State, holy unto her family, and the spirit of reverence should be poured out round about her, even as sweet-scented oil and precious wine. What, then, is to be thought of those "advanced" women who, this week, have been clamoring, now on the highway, now on the housetop, speaking of mothers in a brutal fashion, unworthy of the shambles, as "breeders"! One thing only: they were born some centuries too late: at least their sentiments would seem to indicate that they would make fit leaders of a bygone people whose god was not our God, but rather a thing of earth too vile for mention.

"Euntes Ibant et Flebant"

WHEN the Greeks of Xenophon, fatigued after long months of weary marching, saw afar off the thin blue line which they knew was the sea, they broke ranks and, casting discipline aside, cried out with joy, "Thalassa, thalassa! The sea, the sea!" But the anabasis of Sing Sing was no such thing of joy, even though the waters of the Hudson sparkled right up to its walls. None of its compulsory inhabitants were minded to say with Goldsmith, "Sweet Auburn! loveliest village of the plain"; yet to Auburn sixty-three of them had to go to lessen the congestion in Sing Sing, for one gaol differeth from another in reputation, and "going, they went and wept." The thing that caused them the greatest pang of regret was the thought that they would lose their Sunday baseball.

Warden Osborne's views on capital punishment and some details of prison reform are unsound, to say the least, but that does not lessen the praiseworthiness of his plan to make imprisonment effect a reformation and not a degradation. The reason why most persons are in prison is that, in some way or other, they have not "played fair"; and, apart from the moral truths of religion and ethics, there is no greater factor in instilling the idea of fair play than sport. And so, one of the best lessons in give and take, in honest and manly striving for excellency, that Mr. Osborne could impose upon the prisoners under his care was a legitimate interest in sport.

The credit of this discovery is not, of course, due to Mr. Osborne. The English Government discovered it a number of centuries ago, when the Catholic religion was proscribed and Protestantism brought in with itself a spirit of dourness and disaffection. By orders of the Council the authorities of each parish were to see that the young men engaged in archery and other manly sports. The day and the hour being at the choice of the Council, they chose Sunday, and the time after divine service as the hour for the young men to engage in sports on the village greens, hoping to bring back somewhat of the joy of life which had apparently flickered out with the Faith.

But English Puritanism would have none of the Sunday sports and, after the same manner, the Puritans of Ossining will have none of the Sunday baseball for prisoners, and their protest against Sunday games for the prisoners has received the blessing of the Baptist minister. The Sunday recreations of the average citizen are commonly reckoned to be his own affair, though not infrequently they bring him into conflict with the law. But the law has tried many ways of reforming the outcasts of society which have been attended by a success more or less indifferent; and it is not beyond the bounds of probability that, having had recourse to the natural means of Sunday baseball, it may be led to the spiritual means of the fear of God—which is sound Pauline theology and practical common sense. The crusaders allege that crowds of girls, who flirt with the inmates, watch the games outside the prison walls. Here is the opportunity for the Ossining Village Board to take in hand their regular parishioners before tackling mere transients; for charity, so we are told, begins at home.

Bearing Witness

THE last recorded words of Our Lord were those addressed to His followers just before He ascended into heaven: "You shall receive the power of the Holy Ghost coming upon you and you shall be witnesses unto me . . . to the uttermost parts of the earth." The promise was kept. Ten days later the Paraclete descended on the Apostles and they began to speak in divers tongues of the wonderful works of God, thus becoming Christ's "witnesses." The testimony the Apostles thus began to give, Catholics have to this day continued to offer even in "the uttermost parts of the earth." But what does being a "witness" mean? To be a witness of Christ is to be a warrior of Christ. "Martyr" is derived from the Greek word for witness and all the world knows how the martyrs bore testimony to their faith.

A good witness too, is one who knows the truth thoroughly and tells it exactly. Fear or favor can not keep him from testifying to the truth as he sees it. As Christ wishes all His followers to be fearless and veracious witnesses of their faith in Him He instituted a Sacrament that would make them so. That Sacrament is Confirmation, the prime object of which is to keep the Church's sons and daughters good witnesses of Christ. Among us the Catholic is assumed to become "of age" on his Confirmation day. After receiving that Sacrament he is expected to use his soul's powers for the benefit of others. A child no longer, he is reckoned a citizen of God's kingdom, and a soldier of Christ's army, so he must do his share in furthering the interests of his country, and in defending the rights of his King. These duties those confirmed discharge efficiently by always making in word and deed a courageous profession of their faith: by fearlessly witnessing Christ.

"If age but could, if youth but knew," is the plaint of the poets. In the things of the soul, both young and old, labor under the double disability of ignorance and weakness. It is only when the intellect is illumined with light from heaven, and the will is fortified by power from God, that the soul has a "right judgment" and can put into practice with joy and consolation the guidance that is given. If the children of the Church would awake to action the counsel and fortitude they received in Confirmation we should doubtless have fewer Catholics nowadays who are ignorant of their religion, and whose lives give the lie to the faith they profess. Then, perhaps, our age would behold a renewal of the wonders that made the Church's early days so glorious and throngs of unbelievers would enter her fold.

Comparisons Are —

IT was at a concert. His woman companions enjoyed the singing and were eager to say so, but he swamped their praises before they were fairly launched. His air was severely professional; his nonchalance was slightly accentuated; his judgments had a ring of hopeless finality. "The singing was good," he admitted, and felt himself aglow with his large generosity in bestowing the faint praise of the positive "good," yet, checked by the consciousness of superior experience, he hastened to add: "But I have heard better." You have all made the acquaintance of such a bird of ill-omen croaking hoarsely as you left the play, "I have seen better." Your favorite book or friend or place is accepted by him with an air of tolerance. "Yes, yes! But I have known better."

If he were really a connoisseur, you would not mind so much, but as he is a mere amateur or rather one who is just one week ahead of you in his information, or one night ahead of you in seeing the play, you submit with ill grace to the superiority which he has conferred upon himself, not by ability, but by agility. Your true critic will not strive to impress you by his conceit. He will have a high ideal, but he will make of it for others an incentive rather than a deterrent. He will not force the scalers to slide despairingly to the bottom because they have not reached his lofty heights. At his altitude the true connoisseur sees so many higher ridges rising before him, that he welcomes with cheering encouragement those who are perched upon lower peaks than himself. He is not so prompt to triumph and cry: "I have seen better," when he is humbled by the vision of a bewildering succession of towering eminences still unscaled.

But to come back to the self-satisfied superiority of your concert friend. He has the narrow conceit of a collector of bric-à-brac. He is delighted to be able to say that he has the only stamp of its kind. "Here is the only ring of this make in existence." "After blowing this bottle, the glass-maker breathed his last." Take a man with such a narrow outlook and send him out to visit his neighbors. He will inevitably take the special smiles and special dishes and special attentions he receives, as continuous performances instead of a particular benefit for himself, and then go home to brandish threateningly that bit of superior information above the heads of his own household. It is bad enough to have the ghost of the "cake mother used to bake," haunting unhappy tables, without importing "better smiles," "better chairs," "better pictures," "better whatnots" like so many specters to haunt and terrify a poor housewife all the rest of her days. Of course, there are limitations and shortcomings everywhere, but they become very malodorous as well as odious, should the critic make comparisons. Yet if every rose has a thorn, why will the critic insist upon pressing his nose upon the point of the thorn instead of smothering it in the fragrant softness of the fair petals? The friends of one of these "seen better" critics tied some ripe, golden pumpkins to an apple tree and asked the critic if he had seen better apples than those; "They would make good crab-apples in Ireland, where I have seen better," replied he, nothing daunted.

It is such comparative critics who like a thing just when they haven't it, who will not see progress where they can not see perfection, who refuse to recognize a man that has stepped from the gutter because he has not at once mounted to a tall pedestal, who admit no good unless it is the best and only, who divide the universe into two classes, their experiences and zeros. They would root up the blade because they do not find that the grain has sprouted up over night and has presented to them a self-cooked, predigested breakfast food all ready for their fastidious tastes. "First the blade, then the ear, then the full grain in the ear," but many a modest blade has been withered to barrenness by the supercilious condescension of those who have seen, known, felt or experienced better blades.

LITERATURE

How to Reach the Medieval Mind

THE following letter was recently written to Ernest MacEdon, an undergraduate of London University, under interesting circumstances: His friend, Hereward Golighty, son of a successful Sheffield cutler, is taking out his degree in history. To his secret delight he has to occupy himself with the Middle Ages, which he finds very different from Sheffield, and with medieval faith, which he finds more exciting than knife-grinding. His history professor insists on all students throwing themselves into scientific sympathy with the people and the ages studied. "History," he says, "is not a matter of reason, any more than men's actions are matters of reason. A good historian must be a man of strong prejudices—for the truth." One day, under stress of this thirst for scientific sympathy with the Middle Ages, Golighty interrupted his outline luncheon at a "beanery" by saying to MacEdon: "Could you give me some hints for getting the Medieval Mind?" The result of this question is the following letter which I wrote to my friend. I withhold the mere personal equation:

Your friend Hereward Golighty is minded to undertake a noble enterprise. Deal nobly by him. Do not expect too much from the son of a successful Sheffield cutler. Very likely the finer parts of the man have been ground away. I send you fifteen ways of reaching the Medieval Mind. I might have given fifty-five; but I chose fifteen in honor of the fifteen Mysteries of the Rosary; and because fifteen is a mystical number, being five times three, that is, a man's whole devotion to the Blessed Trinity. I have set them down as they came to me. No logical order has been thought out; because logic is not life; because in matters of life men hesitate and say, "Where shall I begin?" when they can begin anywhere. To reach the Medieval Mind, try one or more, or all of the following:

1. Study one book. Read many. This will give breadth. Hobbes, in a mood of medievalism, said: "I should be as ignorant as other men if I had read as much."

2. Spend a night watching in church. This is more exciting and desperate than to spend a night boating on the river. It gives the mind the noble power of going to sleep, when sleep is the only scientific attitude toward rubbish, written or spoken.

3. Give away all your money. There is no need to sell your best books. Most of them are not fit to be bought. The best books you could read are not yet on your bookshelf.

4. By having nothing of your own, you become possessor of the sun and the stars. Franciscans say, "A monk should carry about nothing but his lyre." As I don't know what this means, I can not tell you. But ask a Franciscan: for it means something fine, and means it furiously.

5. Believe in God. Not otherwise can you become a real rationalist and a thorough-going agnostic. If intelligence did not cause the world, then the world is not an intelligent unity. For if the First Cause of the world is Infinite Intelligence, there are infinite reasons for everything. Moreover, only the infinite can never be wholly known. Now, an agnostic is not a person who knows nothing: otherwise he would be a log, or a wooden head. An agnostic is a conscientious person who knows something, and does not know it all. When he knows it all he ceases to be an agnostic. Believe in an infinite, intelligent First Cause and your rationalism and agnosticism will have infinite play. You can go on reasoning and being ignorant for ever.

6. Walk across Europe five times in six years, as Dominic did. This is "the living picture" method of acquiring the sense of history. Every day read a chapter or two from the Gospels. This will bring you into living contact with the only founders of the historical method.

7. Scourge yourself to blood thrice a night, once for yourself, once for sinners, of whom you are the chief, once for the souls in purgatory, which you will be sure to believe in when you get there. In hot, tropical weather this will keep you cool. In all periods of great political unrest this will enable you to be detached.

8. Walk to Jerusalem begging your way. You will come back with leprosy or ague or some other wide gateway into reality. You will also understand the Jews. This will help you to understand the Christians—a much more unintelligible people.

9. Take Jesus of Nazareth seriously as a Leader to be followed; Jesus of Capharnaum as a Master to be obeyed; Jesus of Thabor as a consolation to be drunk sparingly; Jesus of Golgotha as a model to be copied doggedly. Never mention Him, save in protest, on the same page as evolution.

10. Say a hundred Our Fathers every night between 11 p. m. and 2 a. m. At each Our Father, genuflect. You do not know what a genuflection is? It is severe physical drill. But do not ask a Swedish gymnast. Ask any small Catholic child you see coming out of a slum school. I mean any one that has reached "the age of reason."

11. Believe possible everything that does not contain a self-contradiction. This quickly puts an end to the "village pump" type of mind which thinks miracles impossible. It may also lead to new inventions; something as astounding as Lincoln Minster or a flying buttress.

12. Talk little or nothing about art. Make something. Make anything (except money). If you want to make a useful thing, say a boot or cartwheel, make it as useful as you can. If you want to make a beautiful thing, like a chalice, a brooch or a poem, make it as beautiful as you can. Most of the great medieval artists who made beautiful things are unknown. People did not know they were artists; neither did they.

13. Be merry. A man who never laughs almost certainly is a fool. A man who nearly always laughs may be a saint. The only serious way of taking most of our sorrow is with a little laughter.

14. Learn the metaphysics of Aristotle off by heart, like Aquinas. He did it to while away the time in prison. You can do it to make you modern. A man who does not know Greek thought is hopelessly antediluvian. It is a question whether he can be a Christian mystic. Learn the Decretals of Gratian off by heart, like Antonino of Florence. He did it to earn his way into his Eden of the cloister. You do it in order to earn your way into Roman law. A man who does not know Roman law should not be a mystic. He will run amuck spiritually.

15. Have great respect for the devil. Don't believe him when he tells you he does not exist. The lie subtle is his specialty. The devil is very intelligent. I have been told that he is also a gentleman. This does not make him the devil, but makes him dangerous.

16. Learn to sing great songs like Credo and Veni Creator, in a great tongue like Latin. Die hard like the Crusaders to the noble war song, "Hail, Holy Queen!"

VINCENT M'NABB, O.P.

REVIEWS

The Epistle of St. Paul to the Corinthians. With Introductions and Commentary. By Rev. JOSEPH MACRORY, D.D., Vice-President and Professor of Sacred Scripture, Maynooth College. St. Louis: B. Herder.

The Westminster Version of the Sacred Scriptures. The New Testament. Vol. IV, Part III. The Apocalypse of St. John. By the Rev. FRANCIS GIGOT, S.T.D., Professor of Sacred Scriptures, Yonkers, New York. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $0.30.

This study of the Epistles to the Corinthians was prepared principally for students, and therefore has kept steadily in view the needs and limitations of the classroom; but it will be found no less useful for the reference library of the seminary and the desk of the priest on the mission. For although of set purpose it is brief, at least comparatively so, it is at the same time thorough, comprehensive and illuminating. The great texts on grace, the indissolubility of marriage, the institution of the Holy Eucharist, and the Resurrection are satisfactorily and adequately discussed; although it is a question whether their treatment would not have been still more useful, if more insistence had been laid on their dogmatic value. Could the seminaries find place in the curriculum for one at least of the Epistles to the Corinthians, preferably the first, with Dr. MacRory's book as the text, they would supply the seminarians with an introduction to an accurate and detailed study of the Scripture that would amply repay the time and effort expended, and in all probability would give the impetus to future work of a similar kind to many a young priest.

Dr. Gigot's translation of the Apocalypse is well done. It is a distinctly "readable" version of the mysterious revelation made to St. John, translated into English directly from the original, and presented to the eye by a typographical arrangement that keeps before the mind the general divisions and subdivisions, and the particular topic of each separate group of verses. A rapid but scholarly introduction precedes the translation and concise notes accompany the text.

J. H. F.

America and the New World-State. By NORMAN ANGELL. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.25.

The Road toward Peace. By CHARLES W. ELIOT. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Company. $1.00.

The present titanic war is teaching the world the inestimable benefits of peace. And in order to guard effectually against another such upheaval, thoughtful minds have been looking into the motives and causes of the present struggle. Mr. Norman Angell's most recent contribution on this subject is scholarly and suggestive. Although he is convinced of the ultimate triumph of the Allies, still he is satisfied that a mere military victory over Germany will mean, not peace, but at most a truce. Hence, his chief concern is about the principle underlying the present crisis. This latter, he believes, is the logical outcome of the desire for political dominion, and of the belief in the value of military power. Consequently, if peace is to be lasting, this false principle must be utterly exploded, and the nations must be brought to realize that the struggle for world-empire is a barren and evil thing, and that the attainment of political dominion adds neither to the moral nor to the material welfare of those who achieve it. However much America may attempt to hold aloof from Europe, she can not but feel deeply the effects of upheavals like that which is now shaking the Old World. To avoid all such dangers, to secure her own safety and free development and at the same time to confer the greatest of blessings on the world, America should use her potent influence to bring about the abandonment by the Powers of Christendom of rival groups of alliances, and the creation instead of an alliance of all the civilized Powers, having as its aim some common action, preferably not military, which will constitute a collective guarantee of each nation against aggression. The present situation furnishes to America an opportunity to take a real world-leadership by organizing a real world-state, and especially by introducing as sanctions economic, social and moral forces.

"The Road toward Peace" is a collection of detached addresses, and letters recently printed in the New York Times. The book contains much needless repetition. The author wisely maintains that competitive arming of the nations will not bring peace, while at the same time he admits that reduction of armament is impossible until there exists an international court and a force behind that court. Hence the road to peace, if we accept Dr. Eliot's judgment, is through the reduction of national armaments, the creation of a federal council of the most powerful States, and the establishment of a federal force competent to impose peace. The volume is so bitterly anti-German that even the good things it contains will fail to influence many honest-minded readers. The author's viewpoint is very much narrower than that of Mr. Angell. For constructive purposes the latter's work will be much more helpful. But neither writer seems to go to the root of the difficulty. Concord among nations, no less than among individuals, can not be divorced from religion, and if God, justice and charity be omitted from our calculations, no abiding peace is feasible.

D. J. C.

What of To-day? By FATHER BERNARD VAUGHAN, S.J. New York: McBride, Nast & Co. $2.00.

Into this volume of nearly 400 pages Father Vaughan has gathered thirty-eight papers, beginning with "The New Spirit," which he deplores, ending with "The Old Spirit," which he admires, and having in between essays or addresses on such varied themes as the Present War, England's Christianity, Marriage, "The Woman Movement," "The Superman," "Modern Ideals," and sermons on "The Weapon of Prayer," "A Message from Bethlehem," etc. The author makes his appeal not merely to English Catholics but to all British Christians. As was to be expected from him in these critical times, Father Vaughan is burning with patriotism and fans vigorously the war spirit of his countrymen. He considers that one result of the present conflict will be the regeneration of England. When he addresses the soldiers he speaks as if they were crusaders and pays warm tributes to the thousands of "Tommies" who assisted at his open-air Masses.

From an examination of the library, the platform, the press, the stage, and the drawing-room of England he reaches a rather pessimistic conclusion regarding the vitality of her Christianity. He maintains that there was never a time when the upper classes so profligately wasted their energies in the pursuit of pleasure. Their environment he considers as bad as that of the poverty-stricken, and he shows how closely the vices of the rich are copied by the poor. The author proves how untenable the position is of the Christian socialist and attacks the lax morality of the woman movement. His paper on "Satanic Spiritism" is a particularly good one. Father Vaughan's prescription for the maladies of the age is the union of the Old Spirit's motto, "Never too late to mend," with the New Spirit's watchword, "Do it now." "What of To-day?" is dedicated to the King of Belgium.

W. D.

The Spell of Southern Shores; or, From Sea to Sea in Italy. By CAROLINE ATWATER MASON. Illustrated. Boston: The Page Company. $2.50.

It has been said that the reading of history makes some amends for the shortness of life; it might be added that the reading of books of travel makes some amends for the shortness of funds. For the untraveled, "The Spell of Southern Shores" will be enlightening; for the traveled, it will be reminiscent, and for those about to travel it will prove suggestive. The "Southern Shores" are, for the most part, those of Italy; and Genoa, Viterbo, Taormina, Syracuse, Girgenti, Palermo, Rimini, Ravenna, Padua, Venice, produce much of the spell. Geography, history, art, literature, are blended interestingly together, and a romance, skilfully interjected acts as a magnet to lift the weight of pedantry which so easily attaches to a work of this nature.

A character in the book believes that one who admittedly has never been a good Catholic will be made a good Protestant, but this statement must be part of the fiction in "The Spell." In apparent contradiction, the author admits the donations of Constantine, Charlemagne, Pepin and Matilda to the Popes, yet seems to resent Clement IV's antagonism to the Hohenstaufens, because of their attempt to wrest from him what was papal dominion. As for Clement's consent to the judicial murder of Conradin, last of the Hohenstaufens, conclusive evidence has shown that he not only opposed it, but pleaded hard for the life of the boy, and sternly rebuked Charles of Anjou after the cruel deed had been done. But the mistake is a common one and the author's "sincerity of intention," which she pleads in the foreword, will surely prompt its correction, should another edition of the book be forthcoming. "The Spell of Southern Shores" is provided with a large map, an adequate index and fifty-three fine illustrations, some of them in color. C. F. B.

The Whole Year Round. By DALLAS LORE SHARP. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Co. $2.00.

The author of this charming account of wild life for young people has cunningly captured the good-will of grown-ups by saying right away in his introduction that he has four children of his own. Having, then, a love for children and a love for the wild creatures, it were but to be expected that Mr. Sharp should have produced the most sympathetic story of what two observant eyes may see and two quick ears may hear from January to December. From the time of the first messenger of spring, which for Mr. Sharp is the shadbush, until Christmas Day, when the 'possum took his dinner high up in the top of a persimmon tree—the author claims that he was there, so he should know—more wonderful adventures and romances take place in the fields, the woods, the swamps and rivers than any town dweller could possibly imagine. But the country folk are not to have it all their own way. Mr. Sharp assures us town-people of New York, Boston, Baltimore, Philadelphia, Chicago, San Francisco, etc., that we have a surprisingly good chance to watch the ways of wild things, and even to come near to the heart of Nature: for we have our rivers, our wharves and our parks, and life is there, only waiting to be seen. Mr. Sharp gives a terribly exciting account of how Mr. Jenks, of Middleboro, went hunting for turtle's eggs for the great naturalist, Agassiz, and how he got them to Cambridge just in the nick of time. There is also a very interesting chapter on things to do this spring, which may urge parents and other kind relations to get this book for the young people before the spring has passed. The excellent printing and instructive illustrations make this one of the best books for the young (and also the not-young) we have seen for a considerable time.

H. C. W.

Essays, Political and Historical. By CHARLEMAGNE TOWER. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50.

Mr. Tower's latest volume is a collection of seven essays. They cover a wide range of subjects, from Europe's attitude toward the Monroe Doctrine to General Howe's management of the English forces during the earlier stages of the Revolutionary War. The author is a warm admirer of Grotius, of whom he writes: "The world owes it to a single man that an end should be put to the barbarity of warfare, while war itself was not to be entered upon for pretexts that were neither worthy nor sincere." Rather a hard saying to one mindful of Saint Thomas and of his words found in the 2^a, 2^{ae}, 40, 1. But the Angelical wrote in the thirteenth century. Mayhap his teaching was forgotten in the seventeenth, and no less glory attaches to the rediscoverer of truth than to a more ancient elaborator. But Saint Thomas had not been forgotten, for in Grotius' own time the Dominicans had in the lecture halls of Europe such men as Soto and Cano. Nor is it likely that Grotius himself was entirely unaware of their existence and doctrines, for in the 1735 edition of his work, "De Jure Belli et Pacis," reference is made not a few times to Francis de Vittoria. Now Vittoria was a member of the Order of Preachers, the theologians mentioned above had been among his pupils and the "Summa" had been his text. Again, Suarez had died only in 1617, a few years before the appearance of Grotius' book, and Suarez was not an altogether unknown commentator on the works of the "Doctor Angelicus." So Grotius hardly deserves the sweeping praise that Mr. Tower gives him.

But if this undiscerning praise be found hard reading, what shall be said of another of Mr. Tower's statements, to wit: "The duties it (international law) imposes are enforced by moral sanction—by fear on the part of sovereigns of provoking general hostility and incurring its probable evils in case they should violate maxims generally received and respected." Therefore if a sovereign thinks himself powerful enough to disregard these "probable evils," if only the strength of his army and navy be such as to remove any fear of provoking "general hostility," if the acumen of his generals and the training of his troops be such as to render it improbable that he will incur any evil in "violating maxims generally received and respected," then for this sovereign there will no longer be in international law any "moral sanction." To a powerful sovereign is a treaty in reality but a "scrap of paper"? R. R. R.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

We welcome heartily the Little Missionary, a children's journal, just issued from the Mission Press of the Divine Word, Techny, Ill. It is bright, well illustrated and full of instruction, and will appear ten times annually, at the reasonable price of twenty-five cents a year or twenty-five subscriptions for twenty cents each. As Protestants are supporting generously a number of children's mission journals, certainly every Catholic school should welcome this new messenger of the Little Missionary of Bethlehem. Mission stories about foreign lands are full of fascination and will likewise arouse zeal for apostolic work at home. One of the great blessings the war should bring to us, in making the missions dependent upon our support, is the awakening of the missionary spirit in our schools.

That excellent series of books, "The Catholic Library," which some months ago discontinued publication because of the war, has begun to appear again. The sixteenth number of the series is the continuation of Blessed Cardinal Fisher's "Commentary on the Seven Penitential Psalms" (Herder, $0.30), which Professor J. S. Phillimore has edited so capably. The first volume of this valuable work was favorably reviewed in our issue of December 12, 1914, and the present volume contains the author's reflections on the fifth, sixth and seventh Psalms for the repentant. The quaint and virile English in Cardinal Fisher's exposition of the De Profundis is an admirable example of his style and method.

If Napoleon had only had the opportunity of reading Vance Thompson's "Eat and Grow Thin" (Dutton, $1.00), perhaps the history of Europe would have been quite different.

Brillat-Savarin, at any rate, believes that the Emperor's corpulency cost him his throne. The author advises very rotund persons who wish to lose, without impairing their health, some twenty-five pounds in a few weeks, to observe these "Don'ts":

> Don't sleep too much. Don't take naps. Don't over-eat, even of lean dishes. Don't eat unless you are hungry. Don't drink with your meals. Don't drink alcoholic beverages. Don't eat bread, except gluten bread, toasted, and this in moderation. Don't take a cab—walk.

And don't fail, it should be added, to con well the kinds of food Mr. Thompson forbids the man who would keep graceful and slender. Milk, with its four per cent. fat and its five per cent. carbohydrate, for example, he must shun carefully; olive oil, with its 100 per cent. fat he must not even think of, while sugar, with its 100 per cent. carbohydrate, is little better than poison. Sheer starvation, however, need not be the fate of the author's disciples, for he suggests a good variety of "Mahdah menus" that are not fattening. Mr. Thompson is a writer who can even make statistics interesting.

Katherine Tynan's "Men, Not Angels, and Other Tales Told to Girls" (Kenedy, $1.00) consists of twelve stories of varying degrees of merit. "Wine that Maketh Glad," a tale of the persecution of Catholics in France; "But for England," treating of the return of the Friars to England, and "The Schooling of the Schoolmaster," with its references to reformatories, are the best stories in the volume, and might form, each one, for its distinct novelty, the ground-plan of a book. "Voices in the Night" and "The Gift of God" are trite in plot, and only a rather clever treatment saves them from being commonplace. "The Child to Whom Everybody Was Kind" is interesting but falls below its classic prototype by Father Faber. There is an air of the supernatural in the book lent, no doubt, by the presence of so many priests and nuns as characters. The pictures are rather crude and the price of the book is too high.

"Within the Cloister's Shadow" (Richard G. Badger, Boston) is a little book of verses, quite varied in theme, by Hamilton Schuyler. The earlier ones are devotional in character, then come others, inspired by the author's patriotism, and last, some he entitles "Flotsam and Jetsam," containing selections in a lighter vein, which many will prefer to Mr. Schuyler's more serious verses. In "The Heroes of Old Romance" he has amusingly expressed what many a boy has felt.——Rev. H. B. Tierney, of Trenton, Mo., is one of the many priests who, amid the multitudinous cares of parochial life find time to devote to the Muses. In the volume of his collected "Poems" (Neale Publishing Co., $1.00) Father Tierney has given to the world his published and hitherto unpublished verse. At the age of twenty-five years he received a gold medal from King Christian of Denmark, as a prize for his poem entered in an international literary contest. The volume is handsomely printed on high-grade paper and excellently bound in scarlet morocco.

Mr. Van Wyck Brooks has taken upon himself to explore "The World of H. G. Wells" (Mitchell Kennerley, $1.25), which he does with a certain brilliancy and a fervor savoring of the methods of the American school of literary criticism, though it is doubtful whether even Wells would take himself quite so seriously as does Mr. Brooks. The fact is that this popular novelist in himself is all very well, as a product of the modern English university, but critics, such as Mr. Brooks, are all too apt to assign to him a greater prominence than he is wont to enjoy in his native atmosphere. That Mr. Brooks should have determined upon Wells' philosophy of life is, in itself, a stroke of genius, for the subject of his criticism has shown in his more recent writings a tendency to alter his philosophy of life, and to make an appreciable advance toward more conservative ideals than those shown in his earlier works.

The volume of "Selected Letters," which Stella Stewart Center has made up as a recent number of "Merrill's English Texts" series, contains specimens of the epistolary style of three dozen authors, ranging from Madame de Sévigné to Lafcadio Hearn, whose father, by the way, Miss Center calls an Englishman, though he has hitherto been so successfully masquerading as an Irish Catholic as to deceive his son's biographers. The selections from Charles Lamb, that prince of letter-writers, are particularly good, but Robert Louis Stevenson is inadequately represented, while there is too much of James Russell Lowell. The introduction, notes and suggestions for study and composition increase the volume's usefulness as a text-book.

The Rev. Josiah Strong, D.D., the author of "The New World Religion" (Doubleday, $1.50), is a Congregationalist minister with ideas as vague as those of his coreligionist, the late Dr. Fairbairn, President of Mansfield College, Oxford. The only really clear insight into the religious tendencies of Dr. Strong is given us when he writes of the Catholic Church. He hates Rome; and his hatred blinds him completely to anything good in that department of "institutional" Christianity. He believes in neither the divinity nor the Christhood of the Saviour. The author's Christianity is not a definite creed, but an organism. But the trouble is, no one can tell what kind of an organism. It is ever changing, ever seeking expression in the language of such widely different minds as Frederick Harrison, Rudolph Eucken, Immanuel Kant, St Augustine and others.

BOOKS RECEIVED

Benziger Bros., New York:
A Book of Answered Prayers. By Olive Katherine Parr. $0.45; Roma. By Rev. Albert Kuhn, O.S.B., Part IX. $0.35.

Dodd, Mead & Co., New York:
The New International Encyclopedia. Volumes IX-XII. Glacé-Jouy.

George H. Doran Co., New York:
The Eagle of the Empire. By Cyrus Townsend Brady. $1.35.

E. P. Dutton & Co., New York:
The Life of Cervantes. By Robinson Smith. $1.00.

Harper & Bros., New York:
Johnny Appleseed. By Eleanor Atkinson. $1.25.

Houghton, Mifflin Co., Boston:
Doodles. By Emma C. Dowd. $1.00; The Nutrition of a Household. By Edwin Tenney and Lilian Brewster. $1.00.

B. W. Huebsch, New York:
The Other Kind of Girl. Anon. $1.00.

P. J. Kenedy & Sons, New York:
Civilization and Culture. By Ernest Hull, S.J. $0.30.

John Lane Co., New York:
Panama and Other Poems. By Stephen Phillips. $1.25; Grocer Greatheart. By Arthur H. Adams. $1.25; Poems of Emile Verhaeren. Translated by Alma Strettell. $1.00.

J. B. Lippincott Co., Philadelphia:
Famous Days and Deeds in Holland and Belgium. By Charles Morris. $1.25.

Longmans, Green & Co., New York:
What Should I Believe? By George Trumbull Ladd. $1.50.

The Macmillan Co., New York:
Getting a Wrong Start. Anon. $1.00; Rabindranath Tagore: a Biographical Study. By Ernest Rhys. $1.00.

A. C. McClurg & Co., Chicago:
The Song. By George P. Upton. $1.00; Favorite Fairy Tales Retold. By Julia Darrow Cowles. $0.75.

The Page Co., Boston:
The Spell of Flanders. By Edward Neville Vose. $2.50.

The Pilgrim Press, Boston:
Shall I Drink? By Joseph H. Crooker. $1.00.

G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York:
The Anglo-German Problem. By Charles Sarolea. $1.00.

EDUCATION

Muckraking the Public Schools

IN the year of grace, 1913, Kansas, once bleeding, but now wind-swept and prosperous, presented an admiring world with eight hundred and fifty million bushels of corn. Confronted with these unguaranteed figures, the casual reader of the Government Agricultural Bulletin may reecho the sentiment of Dominie Sampson, "prodigious!" and pass on to observe the artistic plates which picture the diseases to which corn is heir. The figures do not hold his attention. They are too vast to be impressive. Doubtless you can shut your eyes and visualize the three grains of corn which, in the old song, stood between starvation and a mother with her daughter; but the outlines of these three grains may waver and flow, if you try to add a fourth. Most of us are accustomed to think in small numbers, and this is why large figures are apt to be mere sound and fury, signifying nothing in particular. Hence, the greatness of the corn crop of Kansas is not brought home impressively, by saying that it exceeded eight hundred and fifty million bushels.

PICTURESQUE CALCULATIONS

The story were better told, had the Government statistician awakened his dormant imagination. "For a cup," one may hear him say, "I will take the dome of the Capitol, and dipping into the bins of Kansas, I will pour the golden flood into the Woolworth Building. I dip again, and watch the wealth of Kansas overflow in great ripples into Park Row. Measure the tide as it surges up Broadway and down to the Battery, until all the happy Island of Manhattan is knee deep in corn. Like a flash of light, I transport myself to Chicago. I will pave the length of Michigan Boulevard with corn, and fill the elevators, and load the ships in the port, and feed the hungry for a day and a night." And as he dips again with the dome of the Capitol, he begins to believe, with you and me, that the granaries of Kansas are inexhaustible. Very likely, this estimate is somewhat exaggerated. But if Kansas did produce that amount of corn, these loose and picturesque calculations would express its vastness more accurately than precise statements in cold terms of homely bushels.

WHAT'S WRONG WITH THE SCHOOLS?

These remarks on the corn crop of Kansas are but preliminary to a few reflections on the hoary and venerable question, "What is wrong with public secondary education in America, and why?" Speaking a few weeks ago at Columbia University, the President of the New York Board of Education said that as a system the public schools were perfect, but that in practice, "they are doing very badly the work of equipping children to play their part in life." Not only are the graduates of grammar schools lacking in knowledge that they should possess, the President continued, but they are lacking in "energy and the will to succeed." Business men have made these charges for some time, and there is now a general demand that the schools be reorganized.

Nor are these shortcomings confined to the schools of the metropolis. An editorial writer in the Chicago Tribune for January 17, refers to "the solemn futility and waste of the elaborate process which we call education. . . . It is time for all of us to draw conclusions on our educational routine. Our youth spend from ten to sixteen years in the schools, and the time and effort expended should net us a good deal more than it does." More recently, in an editorial statement, the New York Times, while defending the value of a college education, frankly admitted that "a large proportion of the graduates of the public schools seem to have learned too little from their schooling." Similar testimony is offered by other cities. Whatever be the cause, there is reason to believe that our public schools are not giving a fair return for the capital invested.

ABUNDANT FINANCIAL SUPPORT

Colleges and universities sometimes excuse and tolerate a weak department on the ground that the funds necessary for its complete development are not available. The public school can not, at least in New York, and probably in no populous center, offer this excuse, since the typical American city is even generous in its appropriations for public education. For the current year, to cite a ready example, the allotment for the Department of Education in New York City is $39,840,349.90, a sum exceeding by $1,636,942.98, the appropriation for 1914. An unofficial estimate fixes the appropriations for the public schools in New York City during the last twenty-five years at something less than five hundred million dollars, and this calculation probably underestimates the real total. These are large sums, and like the figures of the Kansas corn crop, may not mean much to the average mind. While in discussing what might be done with this vast sum, the picturesque paragrapher would have a subject made to his hand, to outline what these millions have actually accomplished in New York, would restrict him considerably.

UNSATISFACTORY RESULTS

Among the critics who are not satisfied with the results, is Mr. Michael Friedsam, for thirty-five years a member of a large New York department store. "In that period," he is quoted in the New York Times, "I have observed from fifteen thousand to twenty thousand boys and girls from the elementary schools who have entered the establishment as employees. From this observation, I am in a position, I believe, to draw some deductions as to the practical value of elementary school education." These deductions, summed up in an editorial in the New York Sun, are not flattering. "It is almost impossible to get competent boys and girls from the public schools to-day. I do not speak of children who leave school before they finish their course, but of those who have their grammar school certificates."

But is not Mr. Friedsam expecting too much from these children? After all, one does not expect every boy and girl with a grammar school certificate to be an admirable Crichton. But that Mr. Friedsam has not pitched the standard too high is obvious from his criticism that "It is frequently the case that the average products of the elementary schools to-day can not write legibly, spell or read correctly, or solve easy problems in arithmetic. A knowledge of simple fractions is too fanciful an accomplishment to contemplate. Large employers of labor find that the public schools are not doing the effective work they once did in the fundamental subjects of education. The average graduate of the public schools has a smattering of many subjects, but a thorough grounding in none."

THE FUNDAMENTAL DEFECT

It is not fair to charge these shortcomings upon the teachers. The fault lies in the system which they are obliged to administer. For half a century, secondary education in America, to a greater degree than elsewhere, has been the subject of almost countless pedagogical experiments. It is perfectly true that the unusual conditions of American life called for an adaptation of old methods, and it is to their praise that American educators were guided by a sincere desire to admit only the best of the newer processes in education. But sincerity of purpose does not guard against serious mistakes of judgment. Seeking new methods, they did not realize that they were forgetting old, well-established principles. When the times seemed to require "a knowledge of many things," the school program was, by degrees, so enlarged, that the old principle, according to which mere knowledge is not education, was practically abandoned. The fruit of this unwariness is the present-day overloaded curriculum, from which a child may emerge after eight or ten years of "study," nearly as untrained and undisciplined, mentally, as he was before this process of "education" began. He has acquired, it may be, although even this may not be counted upon, a superficial knowledge of many things, with "a thorough knowledge of nothing in particular," but in the words of the President of the New York Board of Education, "he is found lacking in energy and the will to succeed."

The fundamental defect of modern secondary education, is not that it does not educate, but, since it is founded on principles pedagogically unsound, that it can not educate. It strives, first and foremost, to impart knowledge. Therefore its programs are overloaded. The result, by a natural consequence, is not concentration of mind, but mental dissipation. "Our children," comments Mr. Friedsam, "lack energy, perseverance, driving power, seriousness, the sense of responsibility." In view of their defective training, it would be very like a miracle, were these qualities found in them.

SUGAR-PLUM METHODS

Adding to the evils fostered by the overloaded program, are the sugar-plum methods which of late are finding their way into many secondary schools. To falsify, within limits, the ancient saw that knowledge makes a bloody entrance, is a praiseworthy act, but to falsify it utterly, is to destroy the possibility of education. No one believes that a given subject is a mind developer simply because it is difficult, but it is absurd to deny that certain exceedingly difficult subjects are valuable developers of both mind and character. Huxley once said that education was a training that gives a man the ability to do the thing when it ought to be done, regardless of whether he felt like doing it or not. The method which relieves a child of the burden of thinking will surely prove attractive. But if a result contemplated in education is the power to do even unpleasant things when these should be done and done at once, it may be thought that we are not notably providing for that result by allowing the child to "smatter," and to smatter moreover, just as he likes, when he likes, and upon what subjects he may please to elect. To provide for the child's individuality, to assist him in "working out his educational destiny along natural lines," does not mean that he is to be permitted to do as he wishes. Quite as often, it will mean that he is to be induced, or even compelled, to do what he does not wish. Training has always included repression, reticence, control, just as order has, and morality, and civilization and power. The process which never corrects, never suppresses, never burns like a cauterizing iron, nor cuts like the surgeon's scalpel, may deserve any name you may be pleased to bestow upon it. But it is certainly not education.

PRUDENCE AND PROGRESS

What is needed in our secondary schools, writes the Chicago Tribune, is not reorganization, but revolution. Perhaps. In the meantime, our conservative Catholic schools, ever slow to exchange old lamps for new, may be congratulated upon their prudence. It is better to be real than brilliant, wiser to hold back than to be progressive, if progress means that we are to pursue every will o' the wisp that beckons the unwary sciolist in education to his destruction.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

SOCIOLOGY

A New Religious Order

A FEW decades ago, a sodality for young men grew and prospered exceedingly in the congenial soil of a parish administered by a religious Order. In a happy moment, some unsung genius suggested the building of a home for all the parish societies. The idea was rather new then but, in spite of its novelty, appealed favorably to the Elder Statesmen of the various organizations. Happy circumstances allowed the purchase of a suitable site at a low figure, and within a year fifty thousand dollars had been expended in furtherance of the plan. After this period, the aged relics of the days "when Father Dan, God rest him, was here," could rub their eyes and gaze at "that new-fangled thing, a parish hall! What are we coming to, at all?" You see, the idea was really very new in those days, somewhat akin, indeed, to heresy.

THE GYMNASTIC MODERNIST

In erecting this structure by a few strokes of the pen, we have proceeded too rapidly and too smoothly. As the plans were being considered, a daring young person, a Modernist, no doubt, suggested that the architect be instructed to allow for a gymnasium and an entertainment hall, as well as a chapel and a library. Since this is a tale of thirty years ago, need it be said that this soaring young person was promptly and permanently put down? Monsignor Benson has suggested the incongruity inherent in the picture of a man riding a bicycle on Judgment Day. No less incongruous did the idea of a gymnasium in a sodality hall appear to the venerable fathers of those days. They seem to have discerned in it some recrudescence of the pagan phases of the later Renaissance.

To return to our building. When completed, even the most unfriendly critic admitted it to be an eminently respectable pile. There were sundry board rooms in it, a chapel of a transition style of architecture, and several parlors. The library was filled with tall bookcases, containing, under lock and key, such excellent works as Rodriguez, Scaramelli, the Spiritual Combat, a complete set of Furniss' Tracts, a number of catechetical works, and Butler's Lives of the Saints. It was a chamber strongly reminiscent, as indeed was the whole interior, of the Four Last Things.

MEETING A CRISIS

The solemn opening of this parish hall was befittingly solemn. But after a year even the most enthusiastic began to wonder if it were really worth all the toil and sacrifice it had imposed upon its founders. True, it was an admirable place for sodality meetings, but not much better, after all, than the parish church. The wonderment grew apace, until some ten years later, viewing with concern a dwindling membership among the young men, the sodality officers decided to heighten the parish hall's attractiveness, by adding a gymnasium. This was located in the cellar, and occupied a groundspace fully twenty-five by thirty feet in extent. For light, air and cheerfulness, it rivaled the remoter reaches of the Catacombs, and for gymnastic purposes was fully as suitable. After this effort, at which, indeed, not a few of the older members shook deprecating heads, the officers felt that they had risen admirably to a difficult crisis. But for some reason, the gymnasium was not greatly patronized, and it is now used partly as a store-room for coal, partly as a sleeping apartment for the janitor of the parochial school. The nightly visitor to the parish hall will find perhaps a score of the more aged pillars of the parish, grouped about the library table, reading to improve their minds. The younger people of the parish, the spes optima gregis, are working off their surplus energy in places where the bright lights gleam, or the movies flicker.

AN OFT-TOLD TALE

This story of the parish house is, doubtless, an oft-told tale. There have been notable exceptions, it is true, and these gathering places for the tender members of the flock have proven themselves exceedingly valuable in withdrawing our young people from the influence of improper amusement, by providing them with recreation of a suitable and acceptable nature. The obliging linotyper will kindly stress the second adjective.

Looking back on some of the failures, the reason of the collapse seems fairly plain. Burdened with the multifarious duties of the sacred ministry, our clergy, even were they otherwise fitted for the task, can not give the time and constant attention which a project of this nature requires. A social center is quite as automatic as a theater, i.e., it needs unremitting care and much advertising. If those in charge of it are inexperienced, if they are unequal to the demands made upon their time, patience, or limited financial resources, the novelty soon wears off, and by degrees the plan is abandoned. It does not attract the young people. It is "slow," it is "strict," "there is nothing new in it," is their verdict. At any rate, in their judgment it has the fatal quality of dullness, and that is enough to destroy its usefulness. Small wonder, then, that in countless cases, financial loss and new jewels in the pastor's heavenly crown have been the net results of these parish organizations.

The truth seems to be, that a live and vigorous social center can not be supported save by the exceptionally large and active parish. It costs money at the outset for equipment, and, after this has been secured, for the salaries of those who promote it; and more than money, it requires constant care to keep it bright and attractive as well as clean. If it lacks these qualities, it may be a pious sodality, exercising a benign influence upon the young people who are in need of no particular care, but it will not engage the interest of those who need guidance and protection.

UNION OR DISSIPATION?

In an able article in the Catholic World for April, Dr. Kerby shows the need of a closer union of our many charitable organizations. These, for the most part, are accomplishing their difficult task admirably, but if they are to reach their full efficiency, there must be a "closer coordination among our religious charities themselves," and more definite cooperation between our religious and Catholic lay charities. Lacking this coordination, constructive work either will be done inefficiently, or it will not be done at all.

What Dr. Kerby says of Catholic charities is equally true of the parish social agencies. Taken singly, these agencies may seem and in reality may be, thoroughly inefficient. They do not reach the classes for which they are intended, simply because they can not offer what these classes want. In a given city of fifty parishes, perhaps two can maintain fairly attractive social centers. For the other forty-eight, success is practically out of the question. But it would seem that the united efforts of fifty parishes could, when properly directed, support an organization which would present all the attractions now sought and found by our young people in clubs and societies not under Catholic influence. At the present moment, success seems to be founded on union with similar interests and on the ability to cooperate with all helpful agencies. Churches cooperate with employment bureaus, medical faculties with hospitals, business houses with associations of their employees, schools and colleges with libraries, museums, and even with factories and mercantile establishments. The results are mutually beneficial. The fear, that a "pooling of interests" to establish an association offering to our young people greater advantages than those held out by non-Catholic organizations, would withdraw their interest from the parish activities, does not seem well founded. Even should this tendency exist in a particular locality, suitable provision could be made to counteract it. At any rate such an association would not withdraw the young people from the Church, a danger always present in the non-Catholic organization.

DO WE NEED IT?

To retain our hold upon the young people, is it necessary that we not merely supervise their amusements, but provide them with suitable means of recreation? In these days, when even the children clamor for amusement, and in the centers of population too often find it in circumstances that are ruinous to body and soul, the answer is an emphatic "yes." Would that God might raise up a saint with the unconquerable zeal of the great human-hearted Apostle of the Gentiles, blended with the gentle courtesy of Philip of Neri who drew the Roman youth to God through their love of music, to found a religious Order for lay folk, whose main work would be to occupy the recreation time of our young people with wholesome amusement. We build penitentiaries to last generations. Boys and girls now playing on our streets, frequenting our uninspected dance-halls, hanging about our saloons, forming vile acquaintances in our low theaters, will one day occupy those gloomy cells. In a single year, fifteen thousand Chicago boys and girls, under the age of twenty, were arraigned for violations of the common law of the land. In New York these numbers are doubled. According to an authority, the whole machinery of our grand juries and criminal courts is operated for the benefit of youths between fifteen and twenty-five years of age. How can we get a hold on these young people before it is too late? Will a pious society attract the boy or the girl eager to see what is fondly imagined to be "life"? Or will the denunciations thundered forth in sermons which they never hear, convert them?

The problem of catching by a hook baited with amusement the boys and girls who are slipping away from us into hell, is fully as important as the holy work of converting the Indians in Alaska and Tierra del Fuego. Not that we can not, and should not, provide for both to the extent of our means. But in view of the lethargy evinced by many Catholics of means and position, when zealous Catholic social workers bring to the fore the question of amusement for our young people, the exaggeration may be pardoned.

P. L. B.

NOTE AND COMMENT

The oratorical contest of the Intercollegiate Peace Association for the North Atlantic States was held at Clark College, Worcester, Massachusetts, on April 30. Each of the contestants had won the first place both in a local contest at his own college and in a State intercollegiate contest. The speakers were E. A. Burtt of Yale, representing Connecticut, M. J. Cohen of the College of the City of New York, representing New York, P. W. Lane of Bates College, representing Maine, F. W. Wennerberg of Boston College, representing Massachusetts and C. G. Fenerty of St. Joseph's College, Philadelphia, representing Pennsylvania. It will be noted that two States, Pennsylvania and Massachusetts were represented by students of Catholic Colleges, and the fact that the decision of the judges gave Mr. Wennerberg of Boston College the first place in this interstate contest, indicates that something may be said for the value of the training imparted in Catholic educational institutions. Mr. Wennerberg will represent the North Atlantic States in the final contest to be held at Lake Mohonk on May 19.

American educators are beginning to question whether it is possible for a high school student to carry profitably, Latin, French and German, in addition to the other subjects required. It is high time the inquiry was made. Dr. David Snedden, Commissioner of Education for Massachusetts, thinks that as the typical curriculum is now arranged, the student may get a smattering of the languages, but nothing more. "In America," is his opinion, "we have too much smattering in foreign languages, and thoroughness in none." Very few American children, he thinks, should be induced to study more than one foreign language, and in the languages chosen, instruction should be given for at least six or eight years. A question clamoring for solution is how to unload the overloaded high school curriculum. The spectacle of adolescent boys and girls applying themselves to three or four languages in addition to history, mathematics, elementary science and perhaps other branches, would be ridiculous were it not sad. The result is not usually even information, and it is certainly not education. Instead of concentrating the student's energies and leading him to think, it is little better than a course of mental dissipation.

Under the presidency of Cardinal Bégin and Archbishop Bruchesi, the National Canadian Eucharistic League will meet in Montreal on July 13. Sessions will be held during three days, and papers will be presented both in French and English. The Congress is not international but Canadian, and while intended chiefly for the clergy, an invitation has also been issued to the laity. The Holy Father has written a beautiful letter expressing his approval of the Congress and conveying his best wishes for its fullest success. In the English sections, the opening address will be made by Rev. Thomas Burke, C.S.P., of Toronto, and among the speakers will be Bishop McDonald of Victoria, Bishop Morrison of Antigonish, Bishop O'Brien of Peterboro, Bishop O'Leary of Charlottetown and Bishop Ryan of Pembroke. No doubt the Congress will do much to oppose the spread of modern irreligion by directing the thoughts of all to the Tabernacle.

In the New Witness, Katharine Tynan speaks her opinion plainly, of the pagan and worse than pagan spirit which is dictating "styles for women." "When did this evil thing appear, and who is responsible for it?" she asks:

> What mockery is it, what evil jest, that takes this high moment, to present our women in every paper one takes up, not as mænads, not bacchantes—for these may be beautiful—but as leering devils? Their attitudes, their figures, are those of the cake walk, the turkey trot and other uncleannesses; their faces wicked as Aubrey Beardsley's nightmares, when they are not specimens from an idiot asylum.

"Who is responsible?" is a question that every Catholic woman may with profit to herself and others put and answer. It is bad enough when these disgraceful styles are adopted by women who, as Mrs. Hinkson says, "are content not to have a soul." But it is far worse when Catholic women join with the mob, to perpetuate modes of dress which can not be excused from gross impropriety.

The Governor of Illinois is urging the legislature to abolish capital punishment. The Governor stops short of saying that a legal execution is a "legal murder," but what precisely he expects his reform to reform, is not quite clear. In an able editorial, the Chicago Tribune suggests that the law-makers consider, in their deliberations, not sentiment, but public policy. It is admitted that hanging a man by the neck until he be dead, is "odious to thought and hateful to sentiment," just as a surgical operation is to some people, or vivisection, or even medical treatment. But what does capital punishment do for the protection of society? The Tribune thus states its opinion, instancing a local condition:

> A good many of the worst crimes committed hereabouts are by young fellows of a criminally egoistic class who are ready to take a reasonable chance. They pride themselves upon their shrewdness. They consider themselves wise guys as well as tough guys, and it is a part of their vanity to be both. A wise guy might accept one chance in ten, but not nine in ten. If Cook County had a record of prompt discovery and prompt punishment of every cold-blooded murderer, we believe that the thought of the hazard would enter the mind at the very moment that temptation was pointing out a method and an opportunity to commit a crime.

No doubt the penal methods now in vogue are needlessly crude. But it should be remembered that any reform which tends to lessen the sanction of law, by making the way of the transgressor easy, is equivalent in principle to anarchy. The rights of the peaceable citizen must be preserved, even if this protection means the perpetuation of the penal system which the modern uplifter is pleased to term "medieval." Just at present New York, or a certain coterie in New York, is lavishing a good deal of sentimentality upon the woes of the imprisoned gunman, bank-wrecker and thug. This altruism is touching; but what of the innocent victims of these gentry behind the bars?

Several prominent Presbyterian clergyman have issued an appeal, asking that the Presbyterian General Assembly investigate the presbytery of the city of New York. These gentlemen protest strongly against the rationalizing influence of the Union Theological Seminary:

> Is the Bible still to be our rule of faith and the law of the Church, or are we to be dominated by an institution which has dethroned the Bible and put in its place, the discordant guesses of fashionable rationalism? . . . Every Spring a new class of Union students enter the ministry, taught by their professors to blue-pencil the Bible and punctuate its most sacred passages with interrogation marks.

The protesting clergymen further charge, that Union graduates call in question the virgin birth and the miracles of the Gospels, while admitting that did He choose, Christ might suspend the operations of the laws governing the physical universe. On critical grounds, some refuse to accept the fact of the resurrection of the Saviour, while one denied the existence of hell. If these charges be true, there is but little Christianity in some of the graduates of this institution, once a stronghold of Presbyterianism. In a reply to this protest, signed by Dr. Coffin, it is said that "while scholars are divided on their interpretation of this part of the scripture narrative, they could not affirm the historic fact of the virgin birth, with the same positiveness with which they affirmed the historicity of the other events of the Gospel." This reply, since it admits that the text of Holy Scripture is subject to the revision of those modern "scholars," who have long since ceased to admit its sacred origin, seems to confirm the objections set forth in the original protest.

The Right Reverend Charles H. Colton, Bishop of Buffalo, died in his episcopal city on May 9. The bishop was born in New York City in 1848. After his classical course at the College of St. Francis Xavier, in that city, he entered St. Joseph's Seminary, Troy, and was ordained priest in 1876. Ten years later he became pastor of St. Stephen's Church in New York, where he built the splendid schools of the parish. New honors came to him in 1894, when he was appointed chancellor of the archdiocese. His ardent zeal and deep piety marked him as an ecclesiastic destined for great work in the Church, and in 1903 he was consecrated Bishop of Buffalo. In his new field of labor the bishop's efforts in promoting education and charity were blessed with unusual success. The great Cathedral which he erected in Buffalo will be his monument in the eyes of the world, but he will long live in the hearts of the thousands for whom he unselfishly gave his life.——According to the cable the Rev. Basil W. Maturin lost his life in the sinking of the Lusitania. His death will be mourned in America as well as in his native country. Father Maturin was the Lenten preacher in the Church of Our Lady of Lourdes, New York, this present year. He was born in Ireland in 1847 of old Huguenot stock, long settled in that country. After his graduation at Trinity, he repaired to England, where he was engaged for some years in the ministry of the Church of England. In 1873 he came under the influence of the famous "Cowley" Benson, and sought admission into the Anglican community popularly known as the Cowley Fathers. Three years later, he was sent to Philadelphia, where his sermons at St. Clement's were received with much favor. In his last public address in New York, Father Maturin referred briefly to his own conversion, which took place in 1897. After his reception into the Church, Father Maturin wrote a number of works, all of which evince a remarkable insight into the religious problems of the times. For some years past he had been acting as chaplain to the Catholic students at Oxford.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XIII, No. 6
WHOLE No. 319

MAY 22, 1915

PRICE 10 CENTS
$3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE
The War: Bulletin, May 11, p. m.-May 18, a.m. —Ypres and Carency—Austro-German Victory in Galicia — Other Items — American Note to Germany. Germany: American Note, Bryce Commission. Great Britain: Rioting and Internment — The Bryce Commission — Mortality Among the Officers. Ireland: The Liquor Taxation. Italy: Doubt and Disorder. Mexico: Survey of Conditions. Portugal: The New Revolt 137-140

TOPICS OF INTEREST
Mrs. Nickleby and the Crozer Professor—Athletics in Our Schools—Looking Forward—The Bombardment of Hell—The Irish in Argentina —Converts' Leagues — Catholic Landmarks of San Francisco 141-148

COMMUNICATIONS
Lady Mackenzie's Contribution to Science—Prohibition—Schools in the Philippines—More Instruction Needed—Catholic Lecture Courses—A Catholic Correspondence School — Saving the Boy—Catholics in the Y. M. C. A.—Anglican Terminology 148-153

EDITORIALS
Food for Thought—American "Punch"—Bibles Here and There—Freemen of the Universe—The Ladies Wept—What Are Curmudgeons? 154-156

LITERATURE
Dante's Six Hundred and Fiftieth Birthday.

REVIEWS: Thomas Addis Emmet and Robert Emmet—The California Padres and Their Missions —The Solitaries of the Sambuca—A Cloistered Romance — Chaucer and His Poetry — The College Chaucer — A Historical Introduction to Ethics.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: The current Catholic Mind —The Month for May—The Sun Spot—"Under Which Flag?"—"Golgotha"—"The Mystery of Faith" — "Johnny Appleseed" — "Getting a Wrong Start"—"Still Jim"—"Bealby"—"Betty-All-Alone."

BOOKS RECEIVED.....156-160

EDUCATION
A Disciple of McMurry.....161, 162

SOCIOLOGY
Annual Conference of the St. Louis Catholic Charities 162, 163

NOTE AND COMMENT
Old Paganism Taking New Forms — Catholic Literature in Anti-Catholic Communities—Papal Infallibility — Zanzibar Excommunicates Hereford—Race Suicide—Zeal of the Priests of Paris —Death of Bishop Scanlan, Bishop Maes and Rev. Dr. Dumont.....163, 164

CHRONICLE

The War.—Very important events have taken place during the week in both the western and eastern theaters of the war, the advantage being with the Allies in Flanders and with the Austro-Germans in Poland and Galicia. The situation, however, in the west has undergone no vital change, whereas the state of affairs in the east has been essentially modified.

Bulletin, May 11, p. m.-May 18, a. m.

Along many portions of the line in Belgium, France and Alsace there have been engagements, without having produced notable results; but it is in the north that the fiercest fighting has been going on. The Germans have been making efforts near the coast to drive back the Belgians; but whatever little advantage there has been gained, has been on the side of the defenders. Further south, near Ypres, the British and Germans have been keeping up a series of determined and costly assaults on each others' positions, but neither side has made permanent progress. The Germans in particular have been on the offensive most of the time, but have not succeeded in advancing their lines. The main event of the week in the west has been the French offensive, which began at Carency, apparently on a small scale, but finding the Germans unprepared, soon developed to a forward movement on a front of twenty-five miles to the north of Arras. Here the French, supported by the British, have pushed forward from St. Eloi and Carency as far as Souchez, Givency, and beyond Nouvelle St. Vaast. At the point of their farthest advance the Allies have gained about two and a half miles. From Givency as a center the territory gained tapers off to about half a mile on a front of about four miles. The movement, therefore, has resulted in a gain for the Allies that is only a little less than that won by the Germans some weeks ago in the vicinity of Ypres. It has not yet spent its force, and has for its objective the important center of Lens.

Ypres and Carency

By far the most important event in the week has been the progress of the Austro-German armies in southern Poland and Galicia. The Russian defeat is assuming larger proportions, and the victory of their opponents already ranks with the greatest victories of the war. The Austrians and Germans have been operating on a front of more than one hundred and fifty miles and have driven back the Russians with great loss. Starting at Nowe Miasto, on the river Pilica in central Poland, they have been successful all the way to Dolina, which lies almost due south of Lemberg, in Galicia. Their main efforts, however, have been confined to Galicia. Here the Germans, after occupying Mielec and Dembica, have advanced to the river San and are now in possession of Rudnik, Lezasyk and Jaraslau. Further south, the Austrians are to the north, west, and south of Przemysl, and are predicting the recapture of their stronghold in the near future. Still further south the Austrians, after taking Dynow, Sanok and Lisko, on the upper San, have crossed that river and have captured Dobromil, Stary Sambor, Borislau and Dolina. Just what has happened in the mountain passes, especially at Lupkow and Uzsok, is not very clear. Naturally the precipitate retreat of the Russians has resulted in large losses in men, guns and ammunition; but the Austrians and Germans are also reported to have suffered heavily.

Austro-German Victory in Galicia

As an offset and a check to this reverse, the Russians have inaugurated and partially carried out a drive toward the passes in Bukowina. They report extensive victories gained over the Austrians near the Dniester, with a consequent advance over the river Pruth. Fighting is now going on north of Kolomea and near Czernowitz, but its outcome is as yet uncertain. The invasion of the Baltic provinces by the Germans seems to have been halted, but it has carried them far into Russian territory to Shavli. It has had the additional advantage of keeping in the north Russian troops that were and are much needed in Galicia. The British Admiralty reports the sinking in the Dardanelles, by a torpedo, of the British predreadnaught Goliath.

Other Items

As was foreseen, the United States Government has addressed to the American Ambassador at Berlin a note to be communicated to the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Imperial German Government. It begins by enumerating the Thrasher incident, the attack on the Cushing, the torpedoing of the Gulflight, and the sinking of the Lusitania, and says that these acts "constitute a series of events which the Government of the United States has observed with growing concern, distress and amazement." In view of the attitude Germany has hitherto maintained with regard to "international right and the freedom of the seas," and of the fact that she has always been "engaged upon the side of justice and humanity," it declares that the "Government of the United States was loath to believe—it can not now bring itself to believe—that these acts, so absolutely contrary to the rules, the practices, and the spirit of modern warfare, could have the countenance or sanction of that great Government." It expresses the hope that the German Government will once more "vindicate its position with regard to the sacred freedom of the sea."

American Note to Germany

Recalling the warning given by the German Government to neutral ships to avoid the war zone, and our own Government's formal refusal to allow "in any degree an abbreviation of the rights of American shipmasters or of American passengers on merchant ships of belligerent nationality," and its determination to hold the German Government "to a strict accountability for any infringement of these rights, intentional or accidental": the document asserts that the United States assumes that the Imperial German Government does not "question those rights," but accepts > as a rule that the lives of non-combatants, whether they be of neutral citizenship or citizens of one of the nations at war, can not lawfully or rightfully be put in jeopardy by the capture or destruction of an unarmed merchantman, and recognize also, as other nations do, the obligation to take the usual precaution of visit and search to ascertain whether a suspected merchantman is in fact of belligerent nationality or is in fact carrying contraband of war under a neutral flag.

After pointing out "the practical impossibility of employing submarines in the destruction of commerce without disregarding those rules of fairness, justice and humanity which all modern opinion regards as imperative," the note commits the United States to the general principle that "manifestly submarines can not be used against merchantmen, as the last few weeks have shown, without an inevitable violation of many sacred principles of justice and humanity."

Then follows a most important paragraph in which are asserted (1) the indisputable right of American citizens to take their ships and to travel wherever their legitimate business calls them upon the high seas; (2) the fact that they are justified in being confident that their lives will not be endangered while exercising those rights "by acts done in clear violation of universally acknowledged international obligations"; and (3) the additional fact that they can "certainly" be confident "that their own Government will sustain them in the exercise of those rights." The note calls attention in passing to the "surprising irregularity of a communication from the Imperial German Embassy at Washington addressed to the people of the United States through the newspapers," and goes on to point out that "no warning that an unlawful and inhumane act will be committed can possibly be accepted as an excuse or palliation for that act or as an abatement of the responsibility for its commission." It declares that "the Government of the United States can not believe that the commanders of the vessels which committed these acts of lawlessness did so except under a misapprehension of the orders issued by the Imperial German Government."

The last part of the document is the most serious of all. Basing its position on the fact that "the commanders even of submarines were expected to do nothing that would involve the lives of non-combatants or the safety of neutral ships, even at the cost of failing in their object of capture or destruction," the United States confidently expects (1) "that the Imperial German Government will disavow the acts of which the Government of the United States complains" (2) "that they will make reparation, so far as reparation is possible, for injuries which are without measure," and (3) "that they will take immediate steps to prevent the recurrence of anything so obviously subversive of the principles of warfare for which the Imperial German Government have in the past so wisely and so firmly contended.

The document closes (1) with an appeal "to the special ties of friendship and the explicit stipulations of the treaty of 1828 between the United States and the Kingdom of Prussia"; (2) with a declaration that "expressions of regret and offers of reparation . . . can not justify or excuse a practice the natural and necessary effect of which is to subject neutral nations and neutral persons to new and immeasurable risks"; and (3) with the statement that "The Imperial German Government will not expect the Government of the United States to omit any word or act necessary to the performance of its sacred duty of maintaining the rights of the United States and its citizens, and of safeguarding their free exercise and enjoyment."

Germany.—The American note with reference to the sinking of the Lusitania has become the subject of much unofficial comment. General regret for the loss of the lives of Americans is expressed; but the destruction of the ship itself is defended. A prominent writer in Der Tag says:

American Note, Bryce Commission

The English press and the American press, bought up with English gold, have begun already to exploit the Lusitania incident against Germany to stir up America against us. The sober-minded American Government, however, will hardly be able to draw serious conclusions from the destruction of the Lusitania and the loss of American passengers. Americans entrusted themselves and their goods to an auxiliary cruiser of a belligerent power. The passengers on the Lusitania knowingly entered a war zone, and there is no reason to treat a war zone on sea differently from a war zone on land.

The Vossische Zeitung argues that the ship took no care to avoid danger but thought that her protection lay in a "living American rampart," which was utilized to ensure the safety of the 5,000 cases of ammunition aboard. The paper asserts that our Government must take this phase of the question into consideration, and consider whether it can allow the allied nations to stake the lives of American citizens in order to facilitate the conveyance of contraband. In a further discussion of the problem the Zeitung contends that after the declaration of a war zone on February 4, the American Government should have prevented citizens from sailing on British vessels, thus obviating present difficulties. The report of the Bryce commission has called forth two comments: the first is to the effect that the charges have all been made before; the second denies that the atrocities were committed.

Great Britain.—Following the destruction of the Lusitania, rioting broke out in the East End of London, in which German shopkeepers were the principal sufferers. Boycotts have been instituted, and at the Royal Exchange, a notice was posted stating that the presence of persons of Austrian and German origin was not desired. Public feeling has been deeply stirred by rumors, fostered by a few newspapers, that, should London be attacked by Zeppelins, aliens would assist the raid by starting conflagrations throughout the city. "One unhappy result," said Mr. Asquith, speaking before the House of Commons, "is that innocent and unoffending persons are being made to pay the penalty for the crimes of others." Lord Beresford and others have presented petitions to the Commons, asking that the House decree the internment of all male aliens of military age, and the removal of all others to places thirty miles or more from the coast. About twenty thousand Germans are now at liberty in London, and while accurate figures are lacking, it is estimated that about eighty thousand are in the entire country. It is stated that in London several thousand have presented themselves voluntarily for internment, and that the Home Secretary is now considering plans to repatriate aliens who are beyond the military age. This order may be extended to include women and children.

Rioting and Internment

The Bryce Commission published its report on May 13. This Commission, appointed by Mr. Asquith last December, consists of Viscount Bryce as chairman, Sir Frederick Pollock, Sir Edward Clarke, Sir Alfred Hopkinson, H. A. L. Fisher, Vice-Chancellor of the University of Sheffield, and Mr. Harold Cox. The general findings of the Commission, based, it is said, upon more than a thousand depositions obtained from Belgian, French and English civilians and soldiers, charge that the "rules and usages of civilized war were frequently broken" by the German military forces in Belgium. The Commission expresses the hope that at the conclusion of the war an international council may be convened, to adopt means whereby the repetition of the alleged violations of civilized warfare may be made forever impossible.

The Bryce Commission

The seriousness of the engagements about Ypres and in the Dardanelles is indicated by the great mortality among the officers. During the fortnight ending May 8, 285 officers were reported killed, 649 wounded, and 24 missing. Three brigadier-generals and twelve lieutenant-colonels are among the slain. Since the outbreak of the war, 2,246 officers of the army have been killed, 4,177 wounded, while 762 are missing. This brings the total to 7,185.

Mortality Among the Officers

Ireland.—The Irish press of all political affiliations is unanimous in condemnation of Lloyd George's liquor measures, and both sections of the Nationalist Members were united in their opposition. "Because," writes the Dublin Independent, "there is excessive drinking among a section of munition workers in Great Britain Irish industries are to be crushed by a ruinous impost. The new taxation seems to have been deliberately graduated so that Irish breweries would be compelled to shut down whilst English concerns would be left practically untouched." The projected taxation, affecting only the heavier or Irish beers, would, it was contended, put thousands out of employment and ruin the allied industries. Mr. Healy pointed out that it would make the Home Rule Bill a farce, inasmuch as it would eliminate the chief source of the little taxation that Ireland was permitted to control under that Bill. In Guinness' alone it would pauperize 8,000 heads of families, unless they choose to enlist. Its effect would be, said Mr. O'Brien, not only to destroy one of the few flourishing Irish industries, but to "usurp the authority of the Irish Parliament before you have brought it into existence." The united remonstrances induced the Chancellor again to modify his measure, but its incidence on Ireland is still considered disproportionate. Most of the temperance advocates welcome it; and not a few, like the Leader, who view it from the standpoint of commercial prosperity, hold that, whatever the object, any measure that diminishes the sale and consumption of liquor will ultimately benefit the country; but Bishop Fogarty of Killaloe, a vigorous temperance advocate, has denounced the new taxes as destructive of the economic conditions of the whole nation, particularly of the malt and barley industries, which affected every county and province in Ireland. "It was the old story again, Ireland was to be sacrificed, her industries crushed under the heavy wheel of English interests."

The Liquor Taxation

Italy.—During the week Italy's troubles were increased by the resignation of the Salandra ministry. The King invited Marcora, President of the Chamber of Deputies, to head a Cabinet and, on his refusal,

Doubt and Disorder

Paolo Carcano, Minister of the Treasury under Salandra, was called upon for the same purpose; he, too, refused to act. Newspapers and orators complicated the situation by their fierce denunciations. The Messaggero declared that a Cabinet under Marcora would be a farce, for Marcora was Giolitti's lieutenant and as such a pacificist. The Tribuna, the organ of Giolitti, aserted that the reported denunciation of the Dreibund by Italy was false, whereupon d'Annunzio declared on his word of honor that the Dreibund had been denounced May 4. Dante Garibaldi, speaking in Milan, said: "If the Government refuses to go to war against Austria my family will lead the people on the barricades." Serious rioting has taken place in Rome; the German Emperor has been burned in effigy; troops are guarding the streets leading to the Chamber of Deputies, and to the German and Austrian legations. The rioting has spread to Milan, where a general strike has been proclaimed to protest against the course of political events. It would appear that the more orderly part of Italy's population shrink from war, while the turbulent element is much in favor of it.

Mexico.—Mexico, north and south, is still in a chaotic condition. The capital is under the control of Zapata: Garza is provisional president. The relations between these two men are far from amicable.

Survey of Conditions

The first breach, brought about by Garza's denunciation of the southern bandit to the convention, was never closed; moreover, the president was forced to place some Zapatistas in his cabinet; among those selected was Palafox. This firebrand was later forced from office and Zapata demanded his immediate reinstatement. A riot ensued and General Estrada, Garza's chief of staff, was shot by Barona, a Zapatista; this led to further fighting during which Barona shot General Banderas, a fellow officer; in the shooting that ensued fifty men were killed. On the following day another riot took place and Barona's brother was killed. A late despatch says that Zapata's troops have retired from the city, leaving it unguarded; this, however, is unconfirmed. Meantime a party of Americans who "bought their way" out of Mexico City arrived in Vera Cruz on May 13. They report great scarcity of food, an insufficient supply of water, and the continued presence of smallpox and typhoid. News from the north is scanty and unreliable. Villa and Obregon have, it appears, engaged in skirmishes; but the reports thereof, sent out by the Villista agency, are promptly contradicted by Carranza's bureau. This latter announced recently that Huerta was compelled to leave Spain and now, at the request of the Spanish Government, the Spanish ambassador to the United States pronounces the report untrue. During the week an uprising of Yaqui Indians took place in the State of Sonora; Americans were attacked and one at least was killed. Thus the country is still in the grip of war, hunger and disease.

Portugal.—Since the overthrow of the monarchy in Portugal there has been much political unrest due principally to the incompetence and tyranny of those in power. Several times during the last year or so the dissatisfaction became serious; the Government was characterized as tyrannous; the President and the advisers were called outlaws; assassinations were frequent; bread riots took place; people of position were arrested and confined in dungeons: martial law was often proclaimed, and a new republic was set up in the north under the presidency of one General Barreto. When the European war broke out, the strain became great; intervention was the bone of contention. By a treaty drawn up shortly after the Boer war, Portugal was committed to give aid to England, in case of need. Intervention, however, was unpopular with that wing of the republican party which was under the power of Costa. Manoel, the exiled King, had declared for the Allies and Costa feared he was seeking to regain power through England and France. On the other hand the military party clamored for intervention; their insistence became so great that on January 11 Costa ordered the arrest and dismissal of many officers of the army; the army became truculent and a committee of public safety was formed to protect the republic. This proved a fiasco and the Government resigned. Since then affairs have gone from bad to worse and at last popular dissatisfaction culminated in a new revolution, entirely republican in origin. At this writing details are meager enough; but it seems certain that the crews of some warships slew their officers and then bombarded Lisbon, killing many people and causing much damage to property. There was also serious fighting in the streets, and the outbreak spread to Oporto and the Provinces. The revolutionary committee issued a proclamation that the object of the revolt was to restore a real republic; and counseled the people not to indulge in reprisals, but to trust the "National Government, which will act vigorously but generously toward the vanquished."

The New Revolt

TOPICS OF INTEREST

Mrs. Nickleby and the Crozer Professor

MRS. NICKLEBY once remarked that a fine day in summer, with the birds singing in every direction, always put her in mind of roast pig, with sage and onion sauce, and made gravy. This worthy, and wordy lady, as is well known, was wont to give utterance to statements at once unique and startling, defending them by further remarks which made the original observation seem as dull and uninteresting as a day at Coney Island in November. But she has a parallel in Professor Henry C. Vedder, who indeed gives signs of eclipsing this famous lady in both procedures.

This gentleman is a Professor in the Crozer Theological Seminary, a respectable institution adorning the quiet town of Chester, Pennsylvania. He writes books, too, but for all that he reminds me uncommonly of Mrs. Nickleby. In a learned volume, "The Reformation in Germany," he strives to win a niche in the temple of fame by the following striking, though not unique statement:

> The impression is general among Protestants that, since the Reformation the Roman Church has done away with the sale of indulgences. That such is not the case, but that she has in modern times, when not actively opposed by Protestantism, not only preserved this abuse, but managed ingeniously to join it with an appeal to the passion for gambling, so strong in many races; let this extract testify. . . .

This is fully equal to any utterance ever attributed to Mrs. Nickleby, though it lacks the charity which usually characterized that lady's remarks. As a Christian gentleman, Mr. Vedder is not in the habit of making odious accusations; as a student and teacher of history, it is unthinkable that he should repeat a charge which can not be fully proven. He does offer proof, but it is remarkably like one of Mrs. Nickleby's "explanations."

> . . . Let this extract testify, from an advertisement in a Brazilian newspaper of 1910: "Raffle of Souls. During the last Raffle of Souls the following numbers gained the prize and those that have had the good luck to draw these numbers may be certain that their dead loved ones are liberated from the flames of purgatory."

On reading these remarkable passages, Mr. James L. Tobin, of Brooklyn, addressed himself on November 28, 1914, to the erudite Professor. After the customary preliminaries, Mr. Tobin proceeds:

> As this reference (a Brazilian newspaper of 1910) lacks definiteness, I beg leave to ask you for the name, date, and place of publication of the paper in question. I shall be further indebted to you if you will let me know of any place in this vicinity where files of such a paper may be seen.

Professor Vedder's answer, as giving an insight into the manufacture of history, will repay careful study:

> CROZER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY
> DEPARTMENT OF HISTORY
>
> MY DEAR SIR: DECEMBER 2, 1914.
>
> The Brazilian newspaper in question was sent me shortly after its publication by a graduate of our institution who was and is a missionary in Brazil. I can only assure you now that I saw the advertisement and copied it into my MS. which I was then using in lecturing to my classes, not having at that time begun its preparation for the press. For some time I preserved the paper, but do not find it now among my collections of material. It is very improbable that files of Brazilian newspapers are kept anywhere in the United States. If you are really interested in verifying such a reference, I can give you the name and address of a man who can doubtless procure you Brazilian newspapers containing such advertisements. I am assured they are no rarity.
>
> Very truly yours,
> HENRY C. VEDDER.

Mr. Tobin was "really interested" in securing a copy of this Brazilian newspaper, which seemed to be a decided "rarity," although, according to the Professor, advertisements for the sale of indulgences were not. On December 3, he wrote to thank Mr. Vedder for his prompt reply, adding in the spirit of the gentleman from Missouri, "As I have a keen interest in the matter, I would appreciate any assistance you may choose to give me." A fortnight sped by. The silence maintained by the Professor was tense, or perhaps, prudent. It may be that along with the original indulgence-advertisement he had likewise lost the name and address of the expert on Brazilian newspapers. By December 16, Mr. Tobin began to fear that the unlucky Professor had also lost his previous communication in re the expert. Instead of putting up a candle to St. Antony, Mr. Tobin again resumed the labors of the pen:

> In your note of December 3, you expressed a willingness to give me the name and address of a man who could procure some Brazilian newspapers containing the advertisement to which your book refers. On receipt of this offer I wrote you requesting the proffered information, but as I have not heard from you since, I fear that my letter has failed to reach you, or that you have overlooked the matter. I would be indebted to you if you would refer me to some such person as your letter suggests.

But the Professor having stated the loss of the original proof of the Church's passion for selling indulgences, declined to give the matter further thought. Carlyle says somewhere that silence is eternity. So far as Mr. Tobin is concerned, during the last four months the Professor has been adding to eternity.

The whole matter might be here dismissed simply as a common specimen of crude anti-Catholic bigotry, did it not afford an example of the disreputable methods into which Protestant teachers of repute are occasionally, but too often, betrayed when discussing Catholic subjects. In the present instance, Mr. Vedder's charge is, briefly, that the Roman Church sells indulgences. His proof is, briefly, that some unnamed person once said so in an advertisement in a Brazilian newspaper which can not be found. Now one need not be an expert on the rules of evidence or of historical composition, to point out that Mr. Vedder's proof is worthless. Nor is Mr. Vedder's case advanced one whit by granting, what he has not proved, that such an advertisement actually appeared in a Brazilian newspaper. It is still incumbent upon the learned Professor to show that this proceeding was authorized, not by a private individual, no matter of what ecclesiastical rank, but by the Church herself. The charge, be it remembered, is preferred against the Church, and Mr. Vedder must surely be aware that no association can be held responsible for the private acts of unauthorized individuals. Failing to show this authorization, the only inference which may logically be drawn from this supposititious advertisement is that an individual, name and residence unknown, makes the absurd claim that he has liberated certain souls from purgatory. It does not even follow that the unnamed individual is a Catholic. Indeed, the wording of the advertisement, utterly at variance with Catholic belief and usage, justifies the inference that he is not. So far as it is licit to draw conclusions from unsubmitted and unverified premises, it may be said that the advertiser may be a Jew, or even a member of the Baptist Church. The Professor, however, has not succeeded in fixing the crime even upon an individual. He has offered precisely nothing to substantiate his odious charge against the most venerable Church in Christendom, for when challenged to produce the one small shred of alleged proof referred to in the offending paragraph, he was obliged to confess that he had lost it! Surely, this eclipses any absurdity ever attributed to the hapless Mrs. Nickleby.

The written word remains, unless Professor Vedder is pleased to expunge it from the next edition of his work. But in the interval, does the Professor continue to teach his cloistered classes at Crozer that, except where opposed by an active Protestantism, the Catholic Church sells indulgences, joining the traffic with "an appeal to the passion for gambling"? If so, Mr. Vedder is a modern proof of the saying of Demosthenes, that a man readily believes what he wishes, but that "this belief is frequently in opposition to the facts."

JOHN WILTBYE.

Athletics in Our Schools

LATE years have seen a rapid growth of interest in athletics in our schools and colleges and above all a great development of competitive athletics. The universities began with their competitions in rowing and baseball; football and track athletics were added; then the colleges took up the matter; now the high schools and even the upper classes of the primary schools are competing in various ways, in baseball or football, or in relay races or track athletics in some form. In recent years there has been a great extension in the variety of the competitive sports. Tennis, basket ball, indoor athletic contests, hockey on the ice and even golf with other games are now indulged in competitively, and all these sports are supported at many of the universities. The element of competition enters in as an important factor for developing and maintaining the interest both of students and the public in these games. So great is the enthusiasm over them that at present there is no season of the year that is not occupied with one or other form of contest.

I have occasion several times each year to attend high school and public school commencements or closing exercises. One feature that comes home to me with a great deal of force on these occasions is that whenever athletic trophies or prizes are publicly awarded, the receivers of them always attract much more attention than do winners of class prizes. If the school team in any sport has beaten the team of a rival school, then the small boys and the large girls greet the successful athletes with thunders of applause, while a little trickle of hand clapping, here and there, in the hall is quite enough to express the feelings of the school with regard to success in intellectual contests. We certainly are creating an ideal of physical prowess in this country and one wonders just where it is all going to end.

I am not sure whether most people realize the extent to which this interest in physical prowess has gone in this country. I had occasion some weeks ago to talk to the Republican Club of New York City, the general subject assigned to all the speakers being "American Ideals." I found it just a little difficult to be sure what were our American ideals. A prominent American literary man who sat close to me at lunch, confessed that one might easily be a bit uncertain about the nature of American ideals. There were some contrasts that suggested themselves as a possible introduction to a talk on this subject, so I told the members of the club that I had recently been reading once more the story of Cimabue's Madonna and the reception accorded it by his enthusiastic fellow-citizens in Florence. Cimabue had dared to paint a perfectly natural mother and child, venturing greatly away from the Byzantine formalism which had produced such stiff pictures before this time. When the Florentines saw the new Madonna and child they literally went into ecstacies over it. All the people who lived in the quarter of the city where the picture was painted, accompanied it in joyful procession to the church, where it was deposited, and where it may be seen at this day. Timothy Cole, who made the beautiful woodcut of it for the Century years ago, declared that it was one of the most beautiful pictures in the world. Evidently the Florentines had good taste.

I ventured to ask my audience at the club what would turn out a quarter of the city in such wild joyousness in our time, as to stop business and make a date in history that would always be remembered. Of course we would not turn out for a picture no matter how beautiful it might be. Certain very modern pictures might attract a great deal of attention, but a picture of a mother and child, even of the Madonna and the Christ, no matter how beautiful, would be carried by on the streets almost unheeded. My auditors at the club smiled a little bit knowingly, as if with the feeling that life is so strenuous in our time that there is practically nothing that would be able to turn our people out of their business ways and occupations as the Florentines had been turned seven centuries ago. Our ideals of attention to business are entirely too rigorous to be affected by anything extraneous in quite that fashion.

I suggested, however, that I had asked an elderly friend, a man whose long years in association with a great newspaper has given him the opportunity to have his finger on the pulse of our time and its interests, much more than most people, what he thought might possibly create such a commotion in a quarter of one of our American cities as that caused by Cimabue's picture seven centuries ago. He said without any hesitation:

I'll tell you! (this was before the recent affair of honor at Havana). If the new "white hope" "licks" Jack Johnson, any quarter of any of our American cities in which it is announced that he is going to make his appearance on the streets will surely have a stoppage of business for a time, and if the police allow it a procession will be formed and there will be a great deal of popular enthusiasm let loose.

Of course my elderly friend is a cynic or must be considered as such. Perhaps the necessity for constant attention to the uglinesses of the news for many years has soured the milk of human kindness in his heart.

So I put my question as to what would cause a corresponding turnout to that of Cimabue's day in our time to a young man, a recent graduate of one of our universities. He, too, had no hesitation in answering. He said:

If the Giants bring back the pennant this year—though I am beginning to fear that they will not—the city authorities of New York will have to place a cordon of policemen around the railway station to which they return to keep the rising generation in this "burg" from stopping business on the day that they come home to us as victors.

I fear my young friend is an enthusiast. Perhaps both my old and young friends have been coming to appreciate better than most of us, the fact that our American ideals have a tendency to follow after physical, rather than esthetic prowess in our day, and perhaps just possibly they judge our generation better and from more direct information than the rest of us. My audience of the Republican Club smiled a little at this thought, and I ventured to ask them if we were all laughing at ourselves, and I fear that the laugh in response indicated that that was what they felt.

Whatever may be the response to the question as to the meaning of present day interest in athletic contests and its relation to American ideals, there is a very general impression that our deep interest in athletics in recent generations and especially in contests and competitions of all kinds is a good thing, because it makes for better health for the rising generation and more abundant vitality. There is a thorough persuasion that indulgence in athletic sports tends to give not only longer life, but greater capability of resisting disease and therefore reasonable assurance of good health and consequently the efficiency that comes with a hale and vigorous body. The stoop shouldered, near sighted student of caricature, is no longer to be the ideal. The vigorous athletic student is the admiration of all observers. No wonder then, that he is cheered to the echo when he takes prizes on commencement day for athletic contests, and that in high school or college or university he is the ideal of the younger students around him. If he has helped to maintain the honor of the school in an intercollegiate or interscholastic contest by some striking feat of personal prowess, he is almost the idol of the younger boys and of all his girl friends.

Besides its value for health, athletics is supposed to be of immense value for morality. Even the most strenuous advocates of college athletics in the present day exaggerated form, confess that it hurts scholarship, but the advantages for health and character are supposed to outweigh this disadvantage entirely. This is a day of experts, and it would seem to be only fair to take the opinion of physicians with regard to the relation of athletics to health. Now the most interesting feature of present day medical literature in what concerns school life is that physicians who have had any experience are practically agreed in declaring that competitive athletics in youth at school or college, far from making health better has a definite tendency to impair health. They maintain on the strength of observation and statistics that many athletes die younger than their fellow-students of reasonably good constitution, who did not take any strenuous part in athletics while at college, and that in after life the college athletes have distinctly more tendencies to be ailing, are oftener absent from their occupations because of ill health, are forced to take more and longer vacations, and are not at all the beings of perfect health and strength they are often supposed to be by those who know nothing about the matter from actual facts. Besides it is physicians who point out that the ethical value of athletics is very dubious. Some of these questions I propose to discuss in a subsequent article.

JAMES J. WALSH, M.D., PH.D.

Looking Forward

DURING the next few weeks every Catholic college and university in the land will be sending forth into the world a company of chosen young men, its graduates. They are the happy few, though their numbers are by no means small, who have been called forth from out the world of Catholics of their own age to receive the priceless gift of a complete Catholic education. They are this year's first-fruits of the joint labors of the Catholic homes and the Catholic schools of America. They are new recruits joining the colors, and being gladly welcomed to the ranks of the educated Catholic manhood of our country.

The seals of their colleges, deeply pressed upon the parchment of their degrees, are but a symbol of the fact that during all the years of their training both at home and at school, loving hands have been endeavoring to impress a special character deeply on their minds and hearts. The gift that has been given to them is precious beyond pearls and rubies; it is hidden and closely interwoven among the very fibers of their being; it can never by any power be taken away from them; and it can be lost or made void only by their own treason to themselves. On that glad day on which this great gift is finally wrought to completion in them, they should know, and understand, and acknowledge that they have accepted not only a great gift, but also a great responsibility. It is for this reason that older men who have felt the stress of life and know the power of the world, seeing these young men light-heartedly accepting the gift and the responsibility together, can not but temper rejoicing that at length the entire gift has been given to them, with some fond fears about their use of it, and how they are going to discharge the responsibility they have accepted.

The chief responsibility resting on them is that they, a comparatively small number, have been chosen from among so many others to receive this gift. For them it is the five talents. Much has been given to them, and from them much will be required. Many of them, answering a special vocation, will become priests, and their further training will be in able hands; but most of them, whether they intend to make extended professional studies or not, will find that their further training as Catholics can rest in no hands but their own, even though to be an educated Catholic layman, as the world goes to-day, is a special vocation too. This process of self-training, self-development, self-discipline must begin the very day they leave their college halls. There is a great task awaiting them for which they can not fit themselves too soon. They may take five, ten, fifteen years to complete their equipment, but they must not take one day to begin it. If they have been chosen, it is for service: to act as exemplars and guides to their fellow-Catholic laymen in the practical application of Christianity to the conduct of every day life. Among their fellows, less richly gifted than themselves, they will be the best equipped to apply Catholic standards, to understand and explain the Catholic point of view on all questions affecting the life of their country; and if they owe the devoted doing of this work to their fellow Catholics as a Christian duty, they owe it no less to their fellow Americans as a patriotic duty.

Amid the hurly-burly of the life they are about to enter, their great temptation will be to lay aside as being unpractical the Catholic ideals now glowing in their hearts and minds, and to adopt the standards of the world. They may be urged sometimes by the words, and more often by the example, even of some men who are themselves graduates of Catholic colleges to believe that "no man can look at things consistently from the Catholic view-point, and hope to get anywhere in this great land of ours." Such words have been spoken by Catholic lips, and enforced by eloquence learned in a Catholic college; but they are a libel both upon Catholic ideals, Catholic standards, Catholic view-points, and upon American liberty, American opportunity, and the soundness and goodness of American life. Upon the pages of the Menace they are the words of calumny and hate; upon Catholic lips they are the words of surrender to false worldly ambition. They are the voice of the tempter in the desert place saying: "All these will I give thee, if falling down thou wilt adore me." Into the ear of each of this gallant company of Catholic youth one day such words in some attractive form may be whispered. May their hearts and lips not falter upon the word, "Begone!"

These young men go forth courageously into the spacious days that now are dawning. The great war is but the travail and agony preceding the birth of a new era. This new era is theirs to live in, theirs to labor in, theirs to impress with the noble ideals they have learned in their Catholic colleges. The present sorry, material scheme of things is being shattered to bits. Theirs it is to remold it nearer to heart's desire.

NELSON HUME.

The Bombardment of Hell

ONCE a Protestant Bishop remonstrated with his clergy on their too cautious references to the place of final punishment and represented their preaching of it thus: "Dearly beloved, were a man wilfully to indulge in mendacity and profanity and inebriety and theft and other such sinful abominations, and were he really to depart this life clothed in the garments of his iniquity, he would, methinks, be consigned to that place or state which the ancient Christian writers were wont to denominate—ah-h—hell, as it were—after a manner of speaking." That was three decades ago. Now that Protestant ministers usually mention hell only to deny it and bishops admit candidates to the ministry who openly repudiate it, the good man would hardly dare or care to rebuke them ever so mildly. The Protestant pulpit has ostracized hell, following, as is its wont, in the trail of magazine and newspaper and such like peddlers of "scientific" haberdashery, which have branded it with the "dark-age" label, translated it to hades, and reserved it for their joke-column fillings.

Occasionally revivalists will ring the changes on hell, and should they rouse in a notable degree that sense of future punishment for sin, which, however dormant, is always inherent in the human soul, the paragraphers are up in arms and hell is bombarded with countless bombs of asphyxiating ink. A fair sample of the Protestant mind in this matter may be found in the New York Evening Sun. It has a column called the "Sun Dial," which is intended to be and usually is humorous, and is also wont to exhibit good taste and good sense. But Mr. Sunday's clanging tocsin has transmuted the sunny humorist into an angry and un-sun-baked theologian, solely because the evangelist implants in his hearers' minds "the sense of hell as a waiting, reaching, creeping, enveloping, concrete thing." Nor is it only the excess of emphasis that angers. Hell itself must go: "It is the last gabbling echo of the silly tales we gibbered when we were blue-lipped apes back yonder in the gray dawn of time; and one day there will come a language in which the thing is not. As skulls grow broader so do creeds."

This is not merely the ebullition of an irate scribe who finds the daily torture of grinding out a column-full of humor, punishment enough. It is typical of the literary pabulum that is fed daily, weekly, monthly, in Gargantuan dishes to the general public; and the blue-lipped apes and broadening skulls supply just the right "scientific" flavor for the banqueters that are catered to. These busy purveyors of exploded theories know not or ignore that real scientists now are agreed there are no scientific grounds for placing blue-lipped or any other kind of apes on our family tree; that the theory of broadening skulls has gone by the board, the oldest skulls discovered proving broader than the modern average, and that if the latest evaluations of Egyptian, Hittite and Ninevite civilization do not establish that "we were always decent," as an acquaintance justly claimed for his family, they do verify his further contention that "the farther you go back the more decent we were." Nor would it matter to the argument at what period of his physical development God breathed on man and gave him reason and free will. From this twofold gift flows responsibility and responsibility entails a sanction. What the sanction is, is revealed in the Scriptures: heaven is awarded the good: hell, the wicked. To escape hell the shallow shirkers of reponsibility are willing to forfeit heaven. Hence their attachment to the ape theory. To condemn an ape, they argue, improved or unimproved, blue-lipped or red-lipped, to hell, were ridiculous and brutal; therefore, hell is not.

The dictum of the immortal "John William Walshe" that "modern men of science lost half their usefulness and wasted half their energies through not having been properly grounded in logic," applies with multiplied force to the journalistic jugglers of scientific fallacies. After all their tricks are tried, reason continues to insist inexorably that a future sanction ought to be, and is. Every violation of law has its penalty, and even though the law of men should not exact it, the law of nature does, with a constancy as inevitable as the laws of life and death. Nature's law is that which God has implanted in the human heart, and the penalties that men must pay in this life for having "rebelled against the law of their minds" is plainly set forth by St. Paul. One can see his description realized in every-day experience, even without visiting prisons, hospitals and insane asylums, and the illogical ravings of agnostic professors, university ex-presidents and their journalistic claquers are among its commonest manifestations. But in this life the penalties for rebelliousness, as the rewards of loyalty, are partial. The good often suffer and the wicked prosper. The infinity of God's mercy is stretched to the farthest limit finite nature sets; but there its scope is ended. Beyond there is justice only; not the failing and often mawkish judgments of human courts, but the infallible and inexorable justice of God, which apportions its due, adequately and finally, to right and to wrong. And the due of those who, knowingly and to the end, shut their eyes against God, is that they shall never see Him. Cut off from the distractions of earth, their nature's yearnings for all good, which is God, shall, by their own act, remain unsated forever. Their own unceasing sense of loss of the God they wilfully repudiated shall be their torture. This in the main is hell. It is in a sense infinite loss, for it is the loss of the Infinite.

Revelation affirms what reason justifies. Christ came not to condemn but to save, and words and deeds of mercy make the story of His life; yet against the hypocrites, the unmerciful, the scandalizers, the persistent and unrepentant pursuers of evil, He, the embodiment of Divine Mercy, hurled the terrors of hell in terms unmistakable. When St. Matthew records the Baptist's threat to the Pharisees, "Ye brood of vipers who hath shewed you to flee from the wrath to come?" and, "the chaff He will burn with unquenchable fire," he immediately adds: "Then cometh Jesus unto John to be baptized by him." The same evangelist sets down the Saviour's twice repeated judgment on those who aided not the poor and needy: "Depart from me, you cursed, into everlasting fire which was prepared for the devil and his angels." Referring in St. Mark to scandal-givers, Christ reiterates thrice that it is better to maim one's body "than to go into hell, into unquenchable fire, where their worm dieth not and the fire is not extinguished." The same, uncompromising doctrine is found in the other New Testament writers and runs through many of the parables, particularly those of our Lord's last days, in which He warns the Jews of the penalties their obstinacy shall entail. St. Jude's statement that "the punishment of eternal fire," after the manner of Sodom and Gomorrha, awaits those also "who defile the flesh, and despise dominion, and blaspheme majesty," sets down together the cause and the effect. It is obvious, then, that the doctrine of hell is an integral part of Revelation and that to reject it is to reject Scripture, Christianity and Christ.

But "fear," says our philosopher, "is the most base and ignoble of motives." Again is evident the lack of that logical training which precludes the equivocal usage of words. Fear may be prudential, reverential and servile, salutary and destructive. Is it ignoble fear that causes a man to take out a life or fire insurance policy, or induces a scribe to do his work faithfully and well lest the blue envelope of dismissal should affright him? There are many temptations, within and without, to swerve from what one knows to be right; and it is not ignoble to be steadied in right by realization of the penalties for wrong, be these imprisonment or death, whether in time or eternity. When the knowledge that hell is the fitting penalty set upon sin by an all-good and all-just God makes a man recoil from evil and return to virtue, the fear engendered is not ignoble but a stimulus to nobleness of life. This is the fear of hell that suffices for sacramental absolution, the same that Christ spoke of when He said: "Be not afraid of them that kill the body . . . but I shall show you whom you shall fear; fear ye Him who, after he hath killed, hath power to cast into hell; yea, I say to you, fear Him." (Luke, xii: 4.)

The Catholic Church, like her Author and Master, incites men to shun evil and practise virtue primarily for the love of God; to do good because it is the teaching of Christ and the reflex of the All-Good, the purpose of man's life here and the condition of its happy completion hereafter; but she also preaches the doctrine of eternal punishment, precisely as Christ preached it, for the same purpose, and to the same degree. Hence we need not be surprised that the people of our time, witnessing her uncompromising teachings on hell, as on every other doctrine taught by her Founder, regard her precisely as His hearers regarded Him: "They were astonished at His doctrine; for He was teaching them as one having power, and not as the scribes." (Mark i, 22.)

MICHAEL KENNY, S.J.

The Irish in Argentina

THE Irish are so ubiquitous that every one takes for granted their presence in the Argentine Republic. Few, however, seem to know to what high distinction in every department of our national life, though not numerous, they have made their way. The history of this country before and after its independence furnishes excellent proof of that gift of assimilation with the natives among whom their lot is cast that has been the traditional genius of the sons of St. Patrick.

The first Irishman who came to this country was Father Thomas O'Fihily, S.J., a native of Limerick, better known under the Anglicized form of Fields. He arrived in Argentina in 1586 and with the aid of Father Ortega, a Spaniard, started the first of the Paraguay Reductions. According to Father Charlevoix the number of the Indian converts made by these two Fathers reached 200,000. The Irish Jesuit lived to the ripe old age of seventy-seven, having been in the mission field for over thirty years. Another Irish missionary, Father Mahony also labored in this country during the first half of the eighteenth century.

The period of independence found a small but strenuous colony of Irish residents in Buenos Aires. Among them was one of the greatest warriors our history registers, William Brown, whose exploits may be ranked like those of Nelson "above Greek, above all Roman fame." Born at Foxford, County Mayo, in 1777, he came to this country in 1810, and by his naval campaigns against Spain (1814-16) and against Brazil (1826-28) made his name a household word with all Argentinians. Among his companions in arms were enrolled many of his own race. Peter Sheridan of Cavan, who arrived early in the eighteenth century, and Thomas Armstrong of Kings County were among the founders of Argentina's wool industry. It is to them and to other Irishmen that Mr. Cooper, the British consul at Buenos Aires, referred to when he said, in an official report that "the progress of Buenos Aires is mainly due to the industrious Irish sheep farmers." Dr. Hugh Sheridan, Peter Sheridan's brother, served under Admiral Brown. His son, who died here in 1861, was a famous painter of South American landscapes. A friend of his, Bernard Kiernan, a native of Derry, discovered a comet in the Magellan clouds, on March 13, 1830.

A remarkable group of immigrants came from Ireland during and after the famine years, among them the Rev. Anthony D. Fahy, who was born at Loughrea, County Galway. No Hiberno-Argentinian will ever forget the apostolic zeal and paternal solicitude of this great Dominican priest. His memory holds a hallowed place in every heart, while those who knew him personally still speak of him after many years with emotion. To him is due in large measure the present prosperous condition of his countrymen. "Take care first of all of your souls," he would say to the immigrant, "then learn the ways and language of the country, and save your money to buy land, for this is going to be one of the greatest nations of the world." Many who followed his advice now own large tracts of pasture land in the best parts of the country, such as Santa Fé, Buenos Aires and Córdoba. I have never traveled in the Argentine rural provinces without hearing of rich estacieros with Celtic names. Some of their ancestors came to this country in the coffin ships during the famine years, but already they have acquired much of the richest pasture land, and rank high in the progressive movement of the country. The Duggan banking company some years ago was said to be the fifth wealthiest banking company in the world. The Irish have been conspicuous in other fields. Michael G. Mulhall, who in his day was acknowledged to be the greatest living statistician, started the Daily Standard of Buenos Aires which is still the most influential English paper on the Southern Continent. William Bulfin also attained prominence as a writer of short stories. In 1832 he was associated in literary work with Michael Dineen and later became a member of the staff of the Southern Cross, a weekly review founded in 1874. Since 1905 another weekly, the Hiberno-Argentine Review has been published. In the military world General Donovan is considered one of the ablest commanders of the modern Argentine army; Vice-Admiral O'Connor, by his tactful and diplomatic management of the Argentine fleet in Paraguayan waters, earned for himself a most enthusiastic ovation from his countrymen, and Doctor Santiago O'Farrell is distinguished among many who have risen to an honorable place in the walks of political, commercial, professional and social life.

The interests of religion among the Irish have not been neglected. They were first looked after by Father Burke, a Dominican, who is mentioned, in 1820, as "over seventy years of age, and much esteemed by the British as well as by the natives." During the second half of the past century, as the Hiberno-Argentine flock was greatly increasing, many priests were brought from Ireland to take care of the Irish colonies. Among them were the Irish Passionists who erected two monasteries; Mgr. O'Reilly, who has been working in this country for over forty-eight years, and the Reverend John Sheehy, who has been in charge of the Irish colony at Rosario since 1887. Other names are equally beloved and suggest a clue to the material and spiritual prosperity of the Irish in this country. To these men must be given the credit for keeping the Irish here intensely Catholic, intensely attached to "the old sod," and, at the same time, intensely loyal and devoted to the land of their adoption. In proof of this it suffices to state that they have Irish academies and colleges for the education of their children, Irish homes for their orphans, and their own Irish papers and their own Irish churches.

Buenos Aires. WILLIAM J. FURLONG.

Converts' Leagues

A DISCUSSION on the subject of "Converts' Leagues" may well begin by noting the objections which are commonly brought against them. Most of the opposition or criticism comes from converts themselves, who take the ground that they wish to blot out the past. It is much better, they say, for one who has been on the outside most of his life to lose sight of his former self when he comes into the Church and merge, as soon and as completely as possible, with the general Catholic body. There are some who make a point of concealing the fact that they are converts and dodge the question when put to them as much as they can. They are against converts' associations because they suspect that these are intended to keep converts in a class apart.

Objections of this sort are partly due to misunderstanding of the real nature and purpose of a converts' league. The New York organization, with a record of twenty years' existence and members' roll of 1,200, is probably the most important of the various leagues throughout the country. It does not restrict its membership to converts; on the contrary, it welcomes other Catholics to its ranks, with the express idea that the meeting of the two will hasten the fusion of the convert with his new surroundings. This social feature is, of course, subordinate to the rest, but it does make clear that there is no "segregation" of converts aimed at in the Converts' League. The average new-comer leaves most of his friends behind him when he crosses the threshold of the Church. He is anxious to meet Catholics, new and old, and the League gives him an opportunity to do so.

There would, however, be no great principle behind a converts' league which did not aim to take its part in the general conversion movement. The League in New York frankly says that while its local lectures and meetings are all very well, its chief reason for existence is to contribute to the growth of the Catholic faith among the non-Catholic people of America.

It has begun publication quite recently of a quarterly called the Catholic Convert, and has sent this paper through the country widely, with special attention to the districts where the struggle against ignorance and bigotry is hardest to wage. This paper keeps these central thoughts in mind: that every conversion is a very striking thing, that the numerical extent and importance of the conversion movement among the educated classes of America is not appreciated by the public at large, and that the relation of the life stories of converts and the discussion of Catholicism by people who were once in the opposing camp should be a contribution worth making in the non-Catholic missionary field.

The response to the first number of the Catholic Convert, which appeared in March, has been most gratifying. From all over the country letters of encouragement and accompanying subscriptions have poured in. Pastors of churches have been particularly kind in sending the names of the converts in their localities for entry on the sample-mailing list. There is plainly disclosed a sentiment favorable to the formation of converts' leagues in other cities and towns, in affiliation with the organization in New York. This is a big project which may easily come some day, although its development must be slow and more or less experimental at the start.

So far as the League in New York is concerned, much depends upon the financial results of the little magazine. Every fifty cents which comes in for a year's subscription, every dollar which is sent in for subscription and membership in the League combined, goes to swell the fund for two great purposes: one, the relief of needy converts, more particularly former Protestant ministers who have abandoned all when they entered the Church; the other, the necessary equipment of preachers and speakers who will go out on the non-Catholic missions, sent by and representing the Converts' League.

Much has been done in the past; and is being done now, in the way of relief work. But the League's resources have never been large enough to accomplish all that it should be able to accomplish in tiding minister-converts over their period of stress. The success in dollars and cents of the new paper enterprise is, therefore, essential for the proper carrying out of relief and employment bureau work, and for ultimately cooperating with the other agencies in the missionary field.

Whether there is enough in all this to constitute a raison d'être for the converts' leagues, as against the convert with the "disappearing" point of view, is a question which may perhaps be safely left to the reader to decide.

STUART P. WEST,
President, Converts' League of New York.

Catholic Landmarks of San Francisco*

LIKE Rome, San Francisco is a city of hills; but, unlike the Eternal City, she is a creature of yesterday. Though it is true that for nearly two hundred years there has been human life astir under the cross of Mission Dolores, still, as a city, San Francisco is little more than half a century old: in the very infancy of civic existence. And yet, there is hardly an American city about which there is such a flavor of historic interest; such an atmosphere of old, forgotten things; such romance, also; such legendary lore and verifiable adventure together. If her life has not been long, it has been most full, most varied, and strange as a fable. Her fair young face is eloquent of character, suggesting many singular experiences. More things have happened to her than happen to commonplace, humdrum cities in all their tedious centuries of mediocrity. Whether she be rich or poor; whether she be tattered and torn, fleeing, a queenly refugee, from tragic disaster, or whether she stand before the world adorned and made magnificent, San Francisco wears the purple cloak of romance. And—though at times it may seem negligently borne, or even put aside—she bears the Cross; she is one of the most Catholic of American cities: by birth, inheritance, tradition and present strength of the Faith.

From one of her many hills you may see the Cross upon a score of churches. If you stroll about her streets and ways, Catholic landmarks meet you on every side. Only a few days ago her people celebrated the ninth anniversary of the great earthquake and fire. "Strange," said an Eastern visitor, "that San Francisco should care to remind itself so vividly of such a terrible thing." Well, that's a note of this blithe city: its gay spirit is even debonair in the remembrance of trouble, and that's a singular trait. Most of us, as individuals as well as communities of folk, may put forth a brave front to pain or peril, but few of us can recall our woes with cheerfulness. But San Francisco throws the emphasis of its remembrance of 1906 upon the renewal of its life, not upon its threatened extinction, or its loss. Instead of pointing out the ruins which still dot the city, it indicates, with a graceful gesture, what has been restored and rebuilt. And of the most wonderful relic of its titanic disaster, this artistic city has made a thing of elegiac and romantic beauty—I mean the "portals of the past," the fine arch which was all that remained of a building on Nob Hill, and which was removed to a place by a placid pool in Golden Gate Park. It throws a dim, serene shadow upon the still water—an image of the place occupied by the memory of trouble in the San Franciscan's mind.

*Third of a "Catholic Landmarks" series.

Save for the loss sustained by the city as a whole, no one institution suffered anything like the damage inflicted upon the Church. And no other institution, again except the city as a unit, so wonderfully demonstrates the San Franciscan ability to recuperate from weakness, regain lost ground, and make of trouble a point of departure for new successes, as does the Catholic Church in this vigorous and virile city. In a sense, every church in the city, from Van Ness avenue—with St. Mary's Cathedral as the central one—to the water front, is a landmark of the new San Francisco, as all are rebuilt either wholly or in part, and thus recall the greatest disaster of its kind in modern history and the wonderful recovery which this cheerful people made.

Aside from this special interest, and opening vistas into the adventurous and romantic eras of San Francisco—which appear so preposterously remote, though most of the things which we recall as appertaining to those times happened only yesterday—there are a number of historic Catholic landmarks, to be acquainted with which is to realize how fundamentally and intrinsically the story of the Church is the story of the city. As Father Brennan recently remarked, in a splendid summary of the loss and the recovery of the Church from the 1906 disaster, it may be said of America in general that the city comes first and the Church follows, but that the contrary is true of San Francisco. The city was at last built about a place sanctified by the Church and established for that purpose which transcends all others, and which, if any city ignores, it has failed in the true sense of the word failure, no matter how glorious its apparent success may be—I mean, of course, the saving of souls.

When the first house of the modern San Francisco was built on what is now Clay street, by Jacob P. Leese, in 1836, the Mission Dolores, or La Mision De Nuestro Serafico Padre San Francisco, as at first it seems to have been named, was three or four miles "out in the country," a country so difficult to traverse, because of the rolling sandhills, that three miles was a great distance. Now, however, the old Mission, with the quaint cemetery nearby, the two chief Catholic landmarks of San Francisco, historically speaking, are in the heart of the most populous portion of the city. Partly restored, after long neglect, to something of its original proportions and character, the Mission is one of the most potent attractions to all visitors. And let it be said to the credit of the Catholic laity that it was the devotion and pious persistence of a humble Catholic lay-woman, the late Norah Fennell, which brought about the saving and restoration of this cradle of Catholicism in northern California. She drew up a petition for funds on a piece of paper, and went out with it herself to start the movement which had such a splendid and worthy result.

The twin towers, each surmounted with the Cross, of the new St. Ignatius Church, which dominate so large a portion of the city and are used by seamen in laying their courses, recall the fact that the first Jesuit missionary in this city, which owes so much to his Order, Father Langlois, was the one who is responsible for the fact that many writers attribute to San Francisco, the city, and even to the Mission, the special patronage of St. Francis Xavier instead of St. Francis of Assisi. Father Langlois entered the Order from the secular priesthood, and was a most zealous member. Believing that, though the bay had been named after the great Poor Man of Assisi, he, as the first regularly constituted ecclesiastical authority of the city—his authority being given him by the administrator of the diocese in 1848—had a right to name the city's patron saint, and having a great devotion to the patron of missionaries, St. Francis Xavier, he placed the city under that saint's protection. Well, we may be sure that in heaven the two saints do not dispute the point; so we on earth may rejoice in their joint patronage of our city by the Golden Gate.

Another shining landmark of Catholicism, literally so, is the illuminated cross on old St. Mary's, the Paulist church in the heart of Chinatown, with joss houses and Oriental gambling halls around it. This, with the original walls still strong and intact, is the first Cathedral, founded by Archbishop Alemany in the early fifties.

Not far away is the cross on the tower of St. Francis d' Assisi on the dangerous verge of the "Barbary Coast," that place of unspeakable vice and vulgarity which, though nowadays held in some partial restraint, is still smouldering with the volcanic energy of darksome evil. This marks the place where the first Catholic church was erected in the modern San Francisco.

Where the Palace Hotel now invites you to partake of its world-renowned hospitality, stood originally the Church of St. Patrick, now on Mission street, some blocks away, with its musical chimes that ring the hours when the church is in festival. The first St. Patrick's Church, a wooden building, now stands out on Eddy street, by the Church of the Holy Cross. It was sawn in two and hauled away to its present position many years ago, and is used as a church building by the parish authorities of Holy Cross. Its identity with the first St. Patrick's is not known to most people, even among Catholics.

There is no space left to linger over the many other Catholic landmarks which make San Francisco so rich in reminders and relics of the Faith—such as the statue of Serra, in Golden Gate Park; the Cross, on Lone Mountain, and all the others. Let it be said, however, that few American cities are so rich in these signs and symbols of living religion, and none, perhaps, is more strong and fertile in that which produces these landmarks: the Faith itself.

MICHAEL WILLIAMS.

COMMUNICATIONS

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

Lady Mackenzie's Contribution to Science.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

On Thursday, May 6, in the New York Tribune, on its page devoted to "Woman's Varied Interests," we find an "interview" with Lady Grace Mackenzie, the interviewer being Lucy Huffaker. From this interview we extract a few sentences. It opens as follows:

> Now comes a woman who has done things which few women or men either for that matter have done. She has made real contributions to science the while she has proved the strength and resourcefulness of woman.

It appears that Lady Grace is a mighty huntress of "big game" and an explorer, having spent several years in both pastimes. She has recently returned from Africa. Hear now the interview:

> In the Masi (sic) tribe with which she has just spent months in Africa she is especially interested. They are, she says, a primitive people with no religion and no morality. They are prosperous and peaceful and lead happy, useful lives.
>
> The Masi disprove the old statement then that all people have some form of religion? I asked Lady MacKenzie.
>
> "Absolutely," she answered, "I came to know them very well. I could speak to them in their tongue. And I found they had nothing which could be called a religion. They seem to have no idea whatever of worship and they have no prayers. There have been other explorers among the Masis, although I am the first white woman they have ever seen. The white men who have been among them will bear me out when I say that they seem to have no religion whatsoever. They are a brave people, much less superstitious than most primitive peoples."

Lady Mackenzie further along describes the peculiarities of the tribe. It appears that they have no "sex morality," being both polygamous and polyandrous in their practices, but "jealousy" is the "unpardonable sin" among them. They do not drink and deliberately limit the size of their families because they foresee the invasion of their country by the white man and the ultimate enslavement of their race, and so forth.

The name being spelled Masi throughout the entire "interview," it is, of course, possible that Lady Mackenzie is not speaking of the Masai, although this is the only African tribe with a name at all similar to Masi. But if it be the Masai tribe to which her remarks apply, then indeed she has made a "discovery." Whether it be a real "contribution to science," however, may be judged in the light of the following:

Father Cathrein, S.J., has recently published an important ethnological work (Herder, 3 vols. 1980 pages) entitled "Die Einheit des rittlichen Bewusstseins der Menschheit," which is an encyclopedic review of the religion and morals of the savage tribes of the entire world. An account of the Masai tribe is given in Vol. II p. 84, from which I take the following:

According to Merker, who dwelt many years among the Masai, and who has published a notable work about them, their religion is plain, simple monotheism. Bishop Le Roy, who traversed the Masai country in 1890 gives the same testimony. "Their God," says Merker, "is called 'ngai and is an incorporeal being, a spirit. To make pictures or images of God is by divine decree a sin. God is the Creator of the world and all in it. He rules all by His will. God is almighty, omnipresent, all-knowing, infinite, eternal. 'God knows,' 'God gives man good things,' 'it is the will of God' are expressions that one hears daily, and they are not thoughtlessly used, for religiousness is a quality of the Masai."

Merker, who was with the German "Schutztruppe" in German East Africa, wrote a monograph on the Masai (Berlin, 1904) the very title of which is interesting, for he called them a "Semitenvolk." In this monograph he points out the extraordinary parallelism between the Masai religion and that of the Israelites. The Masai have a tradition of the Creation, Paradise, the Fall, the Deluge and the Ten Commandments, the latter having been received on a mountain through an angel in thunder and lightning! They practise circumcision also by divine command. In case of hunger, danger, sickness and so on, all pray to God. The women pray morning and evening. In some districts the children do not pray, in others girls only pray and in others all children pray. Many men pray twice daily.

Of course Lady Mackenzie may be right and Merker and Bishop Le Roy may be wrong. Besides she may not have meant the Masai at all. And maybe the interviewer got it wrong. And in one or other of these events it may be a "contribution to science." And then again on the other hand it may not.

Why didn't the Tribune save it for its Sunday edition? Has any one ever thought of compiling an "Encyclopedia of Sunday Science"?

New York. THOMAS F. WOODLOCK.

Prohibition

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A priest ought not to proclaim to the world that he does not defend drunkenness, but stands for temperance. It is a reflection on the priesthood and unnecessary, since reason demands temperance of the heathen. I have written nothing that called for such a statement from your Mannington correspondent. What I complained of and protested against are the inconsiderate utterances, particularly of priests and others in positions of influence, which are naturally taken as a defence of drinking, encourage it, and cause the Spouse of Christ to be ill-spoken of by those outside the Church. They have done her much harm, and it is high time they ceased. He wants to know whether we cater to not-well-informed Protestant minds. Most assuredly we must. That is what Christ called us to and shared His priesthood with us for. He died for every soul within the limits of our parishes, and wills them to be saved and to come to the knowledge of the truth. "Go teach all nations" is His command; teach them to "hear the Church" even when she admonishes them to keep out of the dangerous liquor business and tells us to get them out of it. We are to see to it that as many as possible of those other sheep, for whom the Good Shepherd laid down His life, hear His voice and enter the One Fold. To every one of them, whether Catholic or well or ill informed non-Catholic, we are debtors. As the Good Shepherd laid down His life for them, so we must spend and be spent for them or take the consequences.

He need not go to Turkey nor send any one there to see what would be the effect of country-wide prohibition in the United States; it can be learned from Mr. Fitzgerald's able article in the column next to his own in AMERICA. The Church does indeed command her priests, as he says, to use intoxicating wine (Why "intoxicating"? Who ever heard of any other kind?) in the Mass. She does not, however, command them to use or to defend and encourage the use of wine or any other intoxicating liquor outside of the Mass. If none but what she commands were used, there would be no drink problem to solve.

Yes, God made the grape, but leaves to man the use to which it is to be put. Man may make it into wine, raisins, butter, jelly or whatever else he likes. Your correspondent never used nor saw any wine, not even an ounce, not made by man, and if he ever got any that was not good, it was some man that he blamed for it. But we know what value to put on his statements, when he asserts that for every person that dies from the abuse of alcoholic drinks five thousand die from contaminated water. Bishop Canevin, who is very careful in his statements, said in an address in Cleveland some few years ago that sixty thousand die from drink every year in the United States. I feel sure he will not suspend me if I cut down his figures three-fourths, not from any mistrust but to have a few victims left for tuberculosis and cancer. Now 15,000 x 5,000 is 75,000,000, and that many die every year in the United States from contaminated water! Whew! Who would have imagined the water in this country so deadly? However, Mannington is in a "dry" State, and fibbing may be one of the vices increased by prohibition.

Scottdale. M. A. LAMBING.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In regard to prohibition, a statement of Victor McKee in a recent issue deserves comment. "There are fewer wife-beaters in dry than in wet territory according to statistics," says Mr. McKee. According to whose statistics, Mr. McKee? Did you read the following from the Congressional Record, December 29, 1914, page 6,942? "Divorces granted to wives because of the drunkenness of their husbands: . . . During this time the State of Kansas granted more divorces on account of the drunkenness of the husband than twenty-five States in which liquor was lawfully sold."

Cicero, Ill. A. KNOFF.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I would like space for a few words on prohibition, for I see your columns have been opened to the question. To take a drink of alcoholic beverage is either right or wrong. If it is wrong, then Christ and the saints as well as most of the popes, bishops, priests and a large number of other holy men and women of the Church have committed a moral infraction through drinking. We can not hold that they did. Therefore we must hold that in drinking they did no wrong. If it was right for them, it is right for us; since the moral code of the Church does not change, as has been charged against her by her enemies. If the Church has sanctioned the drinking of alcoholic beverage it must sanction the making of it.

Total abstinence, as well as any other ascetic work, will do for those who wish to mortify themselves for the sake of God, their own or their neighbors' welfare. To force it upon others is unchristian. We teach in the Church the virtues of patience, fortitude, justice and temperance. But our Puritanical Catholics, some even of considerable standing, would change these century-old virtues to patience, fortitude, justice and total abstinence. The Church will condemn this, we hope, thus frustrating an attempt to change the Church into a total abstinence society. Let our prohibitionists try to enforce our present moral code. The Church was the same yesterday as she is to-day and will be to-morrow and to the end of time. She will change to suit no new creed.

Winona. JOHN A. JOHNSON.

Schools in the Philippines

To the Editor of AMERICA:

To the article, "Religious Conditions in the Philippines," that appeared in your number of November 28, 1914, I have something to add. For the lamentable state of religion three causes have been assigned by the reverend writer. They are: The lack of priests, the activity of the American Protestant ministers and the public school. I should like to insist on the third. The province of Surigao does not suffer from the lack of priests, nor from the propaganda of Protestant ministers, but we do suffer from the public school. It constantly spreads Protestant ideas among the people, and it is the great promoter of indifferentism in religion.

When the Philippines were under Spain all the public schools were under the supervision of the parish priest. Under the present régime all these schools have passed into the hands of our adversaries and become destroyers of religion, with this consequence: that everywhere we are obliged to build new schools. Here in Cantilan we have more than 300 children, for the most part housed, who attend school in the parish house. We have to pay our teachers, moreover we must build little Catholic schools on the plantations, because the public school in the plantation is a continuous temptation to the children there to shirk going to the Catholic school in the town. Owing to the lack of money the arms of the workers here are paralyzed. What a fine field for their zeal then lies open to American Catholics!

Cantilan, Prov. of Surigao, P. I. G. POINVELS, M.S.C.

More Instruction Needed

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The reason why we American Catholics lack backbone and organization is due to the fact that most of our people are ignorant of just where the Church stands on various subjects. We should have fifteen or twenty minutes a week devoted to instructing the people on such things as the Mass, the Sacraments, indulgences, sacramentals, etc. You may say, "Why, the children are all instructed at home on these vital topics." Not so, for just as a test I recently asked one hundred average Catholics these five questions which have been put to me by enquiring Protestants:

"What is an indulgence? What authority have priests for claiming to forgive sins? Why is a nuptial Mass the proper or rather the preferred ceremony for those entering into marriage? Why does a priest wear green vestments? Why does the Church oppose socialism?" The replies to these questions were in many cases, "I am not quite sure," or "I don't know."

If American Catholics can't answer questions like these can we blame the non-Catholics if they believe the lies in the Menace?

San Francisco. JOS. A. GARFIELD.

Catholic Lecture Courses

To the Editor of AMERICA:

After many years of experience perhaps my opinion with regard to the way of making Catholic lectures successful may be worth while for your readers who have been interested in the discussion. The American people generally have lost interest to a considerable extent in lectures. At least there is much less interest in serious lectures than there was in the halcyon days of the Lyceum at the middle of the nineteenth century. People still attend Chautauquas; not for the message, however, but to have it to say that they have heard certain men, and very often too because there are singing and musical numbers and short plays and other amusements on the program.

Our Catholic people generally do not measure up to the serious lecture standard even when the lectures are given humanly and relieved by flashes of humor and good stories. At least they feel that a lecture is almost sure to be a bore and so they are not tempted to come, though many who do come find that they have so much interest that it is easy to form the habit of attending them. At bottom our people are much more serious and seriously interested than they themselves think they are, and a great many of them thoroughly enjoy a good lecture.

The one thing of supreme importance is to get them to come. Besides for Catholic lectures a sprinkling of Protestants is particularly good both for the Protestants themselves and to arouse indifferent Catholics. Now there is just one way to get such people into the audiences. Don't announce the lecture or the lecture course merely as such. Do not give it solely for the education or information that may come from it. Arrange the lecture for charity or some social purpose. Sell the tickets for charity. Nineteen out of every twenty people who buy a ticket, Protestants or Catholics, will come to the lecture. I know this from absolute experience even in towns that were not lecture towns.

The object of the charity then should be something to which all are willing to contribute, be they Catholics or non-Catholics. The most successful lecture course I have ever given was in Albany, except perhaps the Lenten lectures on the war here in New York last winter. I was told by the Albany committee that they were dubious about the numbers who would come. They said, 'You know Albany is no 'lecture town.'" They added, "We have sold $1,500 worth of tickets so that the lecture course will be a success anyhow, and we are hoping that you will not have scanty audiences." The object was a boys' summer camp. The hall would seat about seven hundred and fifty. It rained a little the first night and we had six hundred. We never had less than seven hundred after that, though it rained twice, and once we had to have extra seats.

Now that Catholic interest is waking up and doing things for the boys and the young men why not have lecture courses to help out the cause? Our people are growing tired of euchres, they are unworthy anyhow; vaudeville and minstrels can scarcely be kept up to the standard of taste that ought to mark a Church function. A musical program of members in the parish can be given in conjunction with the lecture, and success is quite assured if the committee only take a real interest. JAMES J. WALSH.

A Catholic Correspondence School

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In a recent issue of AMERICA one of your correspondents, suggested that Dr. J. J. Walsh should publish in your paper a course of reading which would be the means whereby an average man might acquire a polemic acquaintance with the subjects usually considered an approach to a liberal education for men who have not had the advantages of university training. I wish to second this request of your former correspondent, and as the publishers of the "Catholic Encyclopedia" have announced that they intend taking up other lines of educational work, I suggest that they undertake the preparation and introduction of a sound collegiate course of studies to be given by correspondence. There are many young men and women who desire Catholic education, yet can not obtain it because they lack the money or the leisure for attending college. Many priestly and religious vocations, moreover, would thus be fostered.

New York. W. J. B.

Saving the Boy

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The article in AMERICA of April 10, under the caption of "Your 'Kid' Brother," by Nelson Hume, certainly makes a convincing appeal. No sociologist can overlook the truth, that the welfare of the future generation depends to a great extent on the moral conduct of the youth of this generation. Our large cities, and our smaller ones for that matter, are constantly confronted with the problem of reforming the young lives of incipient criminals. The juvenile court is indeed a blessing, but the sphere of its influence is necessarily limited. What then, is to become of the boy of the street, who is being taught much evil in the school of his environment? Must he join the ranks of crime? What of the Catholic boy who, because of poverty, of parental neglect, of dangerous influences and surroundings, has perhaps been already initiated into the first classes of crime? Unless he is safeguarded, examples of evil are very likely to lead him into ways that end in perverted manhood. This might be prevented if a Big Brother would take an interest in him and set before him ideals of Catholic citizenship which, when developed into the fulness of manhood, would be a credit to the state, an honor to the Church and a glory to God. The boy himself is certainly worth saving. Although the rough-and-ready urchin of the street may at times appear to be vicious, yet those who understand him, know him to be at heart a true American boy. It is this American boy that needs the help and example and interest (for this is most potent) of a big, clean-living American brother.

The Big Brother movement it is true is being carried on by non-Catholics, but nowhere has it met with such success as in the Ozanam Association of New York City. This association, with its endowed club-houses and its efficient organization, with its athletics and other activities, is doing a world of good for the spiritual and material interests of many a boy. Why should such an institution be confined to New York? Its need is nation-wide. Why not have it spread to other cities as well? There are many men, Catholics of deep sympathy with the difficulties of their younger brothers, who would be glad to enlist their services in so good a cause, if it were properly presented to them. The experience of the New York branch would facilitate pioneer work elsewhere, and eventually there might be developed an Ozanam Association on a national basis. Should this come to pass, it would go far toward solving one of the most pressing problems of Catholic sociology.

St. Paul. L. J. W.

Catholics in the Y. M. C. A.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

One of your correspondents, believing membership in the Y. M. C. A. a proximate danger of sin, claimed that association therewith is forbidden by the natural and positive divine law. A second correspondent remarked that confessors have sometimes given penitents permission for limited membership. In these remarks Messrs. More and Farrell appear to find a contradiction. But why? Surely the proximate danger of sin, against which both the natural and positive divine law are directed, may depend on circumstances against which a prudent confessor may guard an obedient penitent, by insisting on the observance of certain conditions, thus causing a proximate danger to become remote. Your first and second correspondent appear right, Messrs. More and Farrell wrong.

New York. A. L. DOWNS.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have followed with great interest the controversy commenced by Mr. Leo Paul McCloskey of Philadelphia and pursued by Mr. Hume and other correspondents, anent the membership of Catholic young men in the Y. M. C. A. From somewhat painful personal experience I learned the truth of the attitude of the Y. M. C. A. toward the Church, for I once tried to vote for directors of our local Association and had the extreme pleasure of being refused the privilege after my religion had been ascertained. For certain reasons I found it convenient to attend the law school conducted by the Y. M. C. A. in Cincinnati and it was during my professional course that I was compelled to be a member of the Association. During that time I had ample opportunities to observe the objects and aims of the Y. M. C. A. and my observations compel me to be in hearty accord with the sentiments of Mr. Hume and to second sincerely his warnings against Catholics joining the Association.

Yet, valid as Mr. Hume's objections are, Mr. McCloskey has very pertinently suggested the sad lack of Catholic institutions where a Catholic young man may find innocent amusement and beneficial physical development. Outside of a few inadequate local organizations, in most cities there is nothing to supply this much-needed want, and criticism and controversy do not answer his question: "Should not something be done for Catholic young men who are fond of athletics?" Mr. Hume seems to indicate that the blame for this deficiency is to be laid at the door of the Catholic laity. Perhaps so. But, investigation may lead us to even higher realms than those out in the world.

About seven years ago, recognizing the dire necessity of a Catholic athletic and social organization, a certain religious community founded in this city what is known as the "Friars." This religious order kindly donated to the use of the "Friars" a large building within ten minutes of the heart of the city. By supreme efforts sufficient funds were raised to equip this building with a library, pool and billiard rooms, a lounging room and one of the finest and largest gymnasiums in the city. It was also planned to inaugurate lecture courses and eventually evening classes so that we might offer to the Catholic boys every facility for mental, physical and social development which was presented by the local Y. M. C. A. Invitations were issued to the young men of the city to join this organization. Its dues are only eight dollars per year. One would have thought that the Catholic population as a unit would have zealously supported this movement. But how sorely disappointing was the attitude, firstly of the people and secondly of others, to whom I shall refer shortly.

About a year ago it was determined to construct a swimming pool, which was all that was needed to make this club thoroughly up-to-date and modern in every respect. Of course, money was needed to accomplish this, and with our low dues we had not been able to accumulate a surplus. A committee appointed for the purpose approached the wealthy Catholics of this community for assistance. Advice was plentiful, but money unusually scarce and instead of donations excuses were received; and such dismal excuses they were. One Catholic opined that a Catholic institution was unnecessary and only served to develop clannishness among our young men; another thought that if our young men wanted a gymnasium and swimming pool they should pay for it, while another declared that as he had enjoyed no such luxuries in his youth, they were not required to-day. Invariably it was the worn-out argument of sicut erat. Finally by dogged persistency the amount, namely, $3,000 was realized. The largest donation, however, from the laity was $50, while about one-tenth of the entire sum was donated by non-Catholics. It would make quite an interesting comparison to place the "Friars'" list of donors beside that of the contributors to the Y. M. C. A. building fund, which reached the enormous sum of $500,000. Doubtless it was "a matter of business policy" which prompted prominent Catholics to place their names among the Y. M. C. A. benefactors.

This, however, was an obstacle which in a measure had been anticipated and was not quite as discouraging as another far more serious drawback. No sooner was the "Friars" organized, when similar movements were set on foot by the heads of parishes in nearly every parish of the city, although there are not half a dozen who are in a position to afford their young men anything bearing a semblance of a real athletic club. The motive underlying this activity was the fear that the young man might be weaned away from his home parish. In their zeal to hold intact their little flock of young men, they forgot that for more than a quarter of a century the Y. M. C. A. had been doing unmolested its utmost to wean the young men, not only from their home parishes, but from their faith. In spite of all this opposition, though, the "Friars" live and are flourishing and will continue to combat the forces of the Y. M. C. A. and endeavor to shield from the pernicious influence of this Association the coming generation of Catholic men.

It is a crying outrage that such an arraignment as this should be possible, especially in view of the fact that we Catholics are so firmly established in these United States. It is a severe indictment of the sixteen millions of which we are so justly proud, that we can not meet this most serious problem, so simple of solution, yet affecting so vitally the future generation of Catholic men. Let us hope that good may come of this controversy and that the evil may be remedied. In the mean time we shall continue our humble efforts in patience and find what solace we can in saying, "But we number sixteen millions and that is consoling."

Cincinnati. ALFRED T. GEISLER.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

My candid opinion is that Leo McCloskey has so far fallen a victim to the Y. M. C. A. plan of campaign as to become one of the many, who, it seems, have received some inducement from the hands of that organization to propagate its disguised but Protestant doctrines. I say Protestant, for the Y. M. C. A. has proved without a doubt that its aim is Protestant. It not only admits Protestant young men, but it offers its advantages to Catholic youths if they but submit to its rules and gradually to its beliefs; otherwise they are not wanted, and they are soon made to feel the chill of an unwelcome guest.

Mr. McCloskey states that he derives from the Y. M. C. A. gymnasium great physical benefits, but one can read between the lines of his statement that, as a Catholic, he has weakened if not entirely destroyed his proper attitude of mind towards things Catholic. The Y. M. C. A.'s marvelous equipment of pools and gymnasia play the right hand's part in alluring youths to its doors. They first work upon the human elements of the man by pleasing the senses and gratifying innocent pleasures, and then play upon the inner man who, overcome by the worldly gifts offered, forgets duty.

I know whereof I speak. In one large city, inducements of every kind are offered to draw the young men into the Association. Y. M. C. A. schemes are many: it proposes to the athletic youth special rates for the six months of summer; it opens night schools for the studious youth; it has a summer camp for the pleasure seeker; talks, whose under-current is religion, on Sunday afternoons by men of position. Announcements of these are posted on small billboards near street corners under an alluring headline; these are for the young men who have no place to go on Sundays.

In a large department store a Y. M. C. A. clerk distributes on Saturday afternoons, during the winter months, small cards to the male clerks, inviting them to these Sunday lectures. In one office a Catholic youth was called from his duties three different times by Y. M. C. A. agents offering him all the advantages of that organization if he would cast his lot with them at the low rates then current.

I do not wonder at McCloskey's step, but I do wonder exceedingly on what grounds of Catholic principle he stands when he insists, with seeming pleasure, that he sees no harm in the Y. M. C. A. Surely his Jesuit education has produced a broader sense of duty than that which he manifests. However, let us not despair, but rather pray that as the prodigal son he may see his error and regain in a stronger degree his Catholic faith so that he may make amends by his actions for the scandal he has caused by his words.

Prairie Du Chien. M. T. LAMBILLATTE.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A great deal has been said in AMERICA lately about that "Protestant Swimming Pool," not more than one per cent. of which is directly to the point. The Church does not forbid her children to take baths at swimming pools in connection with Protestant church denominations any more than she forbids them to get shaved in barber shops owned and run by Protestants or Free Masons. So long as there is no proximate danger of loss of faith, she does not even forbid her younger children to be educated in the public schools. This is a matter to be left to the confessor. This puts the Protestant church swimming pool and the public school on a par. The question is thus reduced to the question of atmosphere, which is undoubtedly very dangerous to the Faith. It should be carefully avoided as far as possible, and must be avoided where the danger is proximate. During my ministry I have met with a great many of both types of the young man who are taking different sides in the controversy; and while it has always seemed to me a pity that we Catholics can not get our lawful share in the natural good things enjoyed by non-Catholics, and our share of the fruit of our taxes, nevertheless, the longer I live and observe, the more I see the baneful effect of a non-Catholic, and even in many cases, a non-Christian atmosphere.

St. James, Minn. JAMES DURWARD.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Being a reader of your review I have become deeply interested in your discussion of the standing of the Y. M. C. A. in regard to Catholics. Mr. McCloskey's article has a point that every young Catholic man should see. He clearly shows the method of dragging Catholics into such a society by means of a swimming pool to wash off their religion in order that they may become members of such a society.

However, I agree with Mr. McCloskey when he states that there is no inducement in our present Catholic societies which will give a young man a chance to enjoy a summer-winter swim, but he should remember that the K. of C. is not an athletic society nor are some of the others he mentioned in his communication to AMERICA. The time is now ripe for the starting of such a society which will cause Catholics to forget that there is such a thing as the Y. M. C. A. in existence. I am one who has always taken part in athletic work, having been a college baseball and football player, but I would rather do without exercise than join the Y. M. C. A. I like to engage in sports as well as Mr. McCloskey, but I think he does not see the dangerous side of the Association, as it is not so polished as the other side. Many Catholics have joined the Y. M. C. A. in the same way as Mr. McCloskey and would be the first ones to welcome an athletic society throughout the United States among Catholics if a national movement were inaugurated.

Let all Catholics think this over and start the ball rolling for a Roman Catholic Athletic Association.

Hartford. T. J. DELAINE.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In AMERICA for April 24 there is an article written by one K. More, in which he says he is forced to defend the Y. M. C. A. on account of the very poor arguments against it. In the very beginning of his article he says, "I hesitate to appear as a devil's advocate." Does Mr. More really know what this sentence means? Does he really intend to defend one against whom the Church has prayed, against whom the Catholic Church has always prayed? It may be that Mr. More thinks the faith of those who frequent the Y. M. C. A. is perfectly safe. To the present time this has not been proved. On the contrary it has been shown many times that the Catholic young man who frequents the Y. M. C. A. has placed himself in a very dangerous position. Mr. More appears to think that those who attend this organization are not submitting themselves to the proximate danger of sin. Does he really know who the companions are of a Catholic young man who attends this organization? Because one person may be able to attend this place and still continue to keep his faith, surely it does not follow that all young men can do so. The one who has the faith ought to thank God earnestly for it, and pray for grace to keep it; for no one knows what temptations are in store for him. Mr. More is of the opinion that because some confessors have given their penitents permission to attend these places, every Catholic young man should have permission. Surely no one knows better than the confessor the condition of the soul of the penitent. For the one who is permitted to attend these places may be much stronger in his faith than another; no two souls are alike. Would it not be a terrible thing if the frequenting of one of these places should prove to be the means of one losing his faith and probably his soul? Mr. More does not know how many persons may read his article, and it would be a dreadful thing if through it scandal were given; for we all know what Our Lord himself said of one giving scandal.

Again Mr. More says, to study a certain thing at the Y. M. C. A. does not seem to him to be a proximate danger to one's faith. No. The studying itself is no danger; but who knows when things might arise which would be dangers and very serious and proximate ones? The immortal soul is not a thing with which to trifle; and one indeed has a great deal to answer for, who takes upon himself the responsibility of another's soul either directly or indirectly.

New York. T. A. KEANE.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In view of the very enlightening letter of your Detroit correspondent, signed, "James Monaghan, S. J.," in AMERICA of May 15, which should settle absolutely the question as to the religious character of the Y. M. C. A., may we indulge the hope that both Mr. McCloskey and Mr. Farrell will take to heart the last paragraph of that letter?

> The remedy seems to lie in the establishment of Catholic gymnasiums and reading rooms. Statistics given by the editor of the Queen's Work go to show that as much as one-fifth, perhaps one-fourth, of the Y. M. C. A. membership is made up of Catholics. Here is the nucleus of a splendid Catholic organization. If these young men would unite in their own defence, they could make a strong appeal to Catholic men of means, and their appeal would not be disregarded.

Will Mr. McCloskey and Mr. Farrell become the leaders in this worthy undertaking, and may we indulge the further hope that they will inform us in the near future, not only that they have tendered their own resignations to the Y. M. C. A., but have taken "the initiative in leading back a large portion of our flock to safer pastures," and have started a movement for the solid establishment of Catholic gymnasiums, where they may have all the advantages which they have relinquished, in organizations under the protecting influence of old Mother Church?

Brooklyn. ROSALIND SHIEL.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The new "International Encyclopedia" is an authoritative reference work. In its articles on the Catholic Church it shows an evident intent of fairness, and in many cases the articles seem to have come from official or semi-official sources. I think we may feel the same confidence in its treatment of the Y. M. C. A. Its article on that organization opens as follows:

> Societies of young men composed of an active controlling membership identified with evangelical churches and of a more numerous associate membership not yet connected with the churches. All their work seeks to promote the physical, social, mental and spiritual welfare of their members.

In that significant little word "yet," and in the statement that all their work has a religious purpose, may be found sufficient reason why no conscientious Catholic can justify his membership in what is for others a very useful organization.

Boston. FOSTER STEARNS.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I wonder how many of your correspondents who denounce the Y. M. C. A. have ever been members of that organization? I joined the Y. M. C. A. three years ago. Unlike many other club houses, it does not sell intoxicants; unlike many Catholic lyceums, its members are not forced to recreate in dirty, ill-ventilated basements. For three years I was proud to associate with Y. M. C. A. men and glad to join in their sports and social life. In that time not once did the slightest evidence of proselyting come to my notice.

However, I am no longer a member, because by membership I would be supporting a non-Catholic institution: in itself wrong.

Of course I lost much of my self-respect as a Catholic when I entered a Y. M. C. A. building. Invariably I felt ashamed when I realized that our Church, with all its opportunities, had done nothing that approached the Y. M. C. A., and was making no effort to supply the deficiency.

Brooklyn, N. Y. JOHN D. FLYNN.

[This controversy is now closed.—Editor AMERICA.]

Anglican Terminology

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Just now my Anglican friends who are at all interested in religious matters are talking about the old six points and the new six points. Can you tell me what these terms mean?

New York. A. L. K.

[The old "six points" were: (1) The "Eastern Position," which means that the minister should stand at the center of the communion table, back to the people, and not at the north end. (2) Two lighted candles should be on the table at communion time. (3) The minister should wear the chasuble, etc. (4) Water should be mixed with the wine in the chalice. (5) Unleavened bread should be used for communion instead of leavened bread. (6) Incense should be offered during the service. The new "six points" are: (1) The reservation of the blessed sacrament (sic) for the purpose of adoration. (2) Restoration of devotions to Our Lady, with the intention of teaching "dogmatic truths" about her. (3) The privilege of using Latin in the Mass (sic) instead of English (4) The restoration of contemplative Orders. (5) A celibate clergy. (6) A restatement of relations to the Holy See.—Editor AMERICA.]

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, MAY 22, 1915

Entered as second-class matter, April 15, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Food for Thought

THE following amendments introduced into the New York State constitutional assembly offer food for thought:

The Delegates of the People of the State of New York, in Convention assembled, do propose as follows:

Section 1. Education of the children of this state shall be forever a function of this state and under the control of the state, and [T]the legislature shall provide for the maintenance and support of a system of free common schools, wherein all the children of this state may be educated.

The Delegates of the People of the State of New York, in Convention assembled, do propose as follows:

ARTICLE III.

Section —. No tax exemption on real estate shall be granted to any church, society, or school under church direction or ownership, nor to any cemetery association, or public or private institution of any character not owned by the federal, state, county or municipal government, but all such property shall be taxed proportionately to its assessed valuation, the said tax to be applied to the general fund of the city, county or state, by which it is levied. The legislature shall enact such statutes as are necessary for the enforcement of the foregoing provisions.

Both these documents give rise to many questions. Some of the most pertinent of these are: Is New York State to take precedence of parents in the matter of education of children? Are the properties of societies not under church direction or ownership, such as Masonic temples and Odd Fellows halls, to be exempt from taxation, while the homes of the Little Sisters of the Poor who gather in cast off old men and women from the highways and byways, and support them until death, without pecuniary assistance or aid of any kind from the State, are penalized by taxation for conferring a moral and material benefit on the aforesaid State? These and many other questions are worthy of consideration. For, after all, to prevent a great State from erecting a monument to injustice is an act of mercy.

American "Punch"

THAT widely admired American quality for which we have no name but the slang word "punch" is thus described by a writer in the New York Nation:

It is a quality which can be known truly only by its works, and they are mighty and innumerable. It is the ability to achieve the end without the means, the whole without the parts. It makes railways without money, churches without religion, literature without art, newspapers without news, and educational institutions without educated men.

Well said. So "punch" translated into the concrete would seem to give us "Mergers," "Billy-Sundayism," "Best Sellers," "Yellow Journalism" and "Carnegie Foundations." But this highly desirable quality of punch which all wide-awake Americans are now expected to impart to everything they do, say or think, is not easy of attainment. Though all strive for it, comparatively few are successful in the quest. Instances innumerable, therefore, of plays without plot, verses without meter, pictures without meaning, songs without sense, dances without grace, fashions without modesty, music without beauty, diction without taste, jests without point, language without refinement, and thought without order, are met with at every turn on the highways and byways of modern life. This only indicates how often the punch has failed to be achieved.

It is in the field of education, however, that a passion for the punch works the greatest havoc. To be able to read, write and cipher well, used to be considered a very ordinary accomplishment in a child finishing the eighth grade of the grammar school. But nowadays the public schools are devoting so much time to showy branches like basket-making, clay-molding, folk-dancing, "nature study" and what-not: branches that may be said to "have the punch," that boys and girls have neither time nor inclination for mastering even the highly useful, but quite punchless gift of spelling correctly. So when these children, diploma in hand, find work in commercial houses where there are no baskets to make, no movements to dance, and no birds to distinguish from flowers, employers soon begin writing to the papers cruel and cynical letters about the defects of our public school system, letters which seldom lack, indeed, the striking quality of punch.

Bibles Here and There

THE American Bible Society has just published its annual report: The work achieved is marvelous: 6,370,465 copies of the Scriptures were scattered broadcast over the earth. This is an increase of 1,119,289 volumes over last year, so that now after almost a century of existence, the society has distributed 108,890,356 bibles. The books have gone to Mexico and Central America and South America, to all parts of Europe, to China, Japan and the Philippines and to most other parts of the earth. The people to whom the volume is sold or given are exhorted to read it prayerfully, for it is the word of God and contains salvation for the many. This is one side of the shield: the other side is not so bright: on it is written the sad and ominous fact that some few years since there were but two prominent ministers in one of our largest cities who believed that the Bible was the inspired word of God. Here the Bible is a human book, replete with errors; then it is a divine book, man's only hope. Thus the temple is erected with the left hand and pulled down with the right, and confusion worse confounded gradually replaces the peace and light that come from the reading of the true Scriptures, under the proper guidances. Some day Japanese and Chinese, and others too, hearing the discordant sounds from out this Babylon will realize that altars are toppling and shrines crashing down, and smiling complacently they will conclude that "paganism is not so bad after all." Figs can not be gathered from thorns nor grapes from thistles.

Freemen of the Universe

"GOD has made you one of the freemen of the universe. How could I forge shackles for you?" This is a quotation taken from one of the clever modern stories. In this particular case the freedom advocated is not reprehensible, but it is an example of the growing use of a good word, that of late has been getting into bad repute. It is the old story of evil associations. Freedom, it is needless to remark, is of itself irreproachable. But the new freedom, the larger freedom, the freedom that opens the door to life, has connotations that are by no means blameless. Freedom as the term is used to-day has ceased to be unequivocal, and in this there is a danger and a snare.

A new race of prophets is preaching to a delighted world the ancient message of the worldling, which, if not frankly pagan, is really pagan at the core. Only the veneer is Christian, and even this is gradually being worn away. The new preachers do not ascend the pulpit in dim-lighted churches, nor stand within the sanctuary near the steps that lead to the altar. Their lesson is given in a subtler way. They preach vicariously. They employ the glamor of the daring stage, and the enchantment of the "problem novel"; and so cleverly is their poison concealed by the charm of the characters whom they make their spokesmen, that there is danger of even the elect being deceived.

We can not take our principles from such men. Of them St. John said in his day: "They are of the world; therefore of the world they speak. And the world heareth them." But we must not hear them. Our teacher is "the Spirit of Truth, whom the world can not receive, because it seeth Him not, nor knoweth Him." "The Paraclete, the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, He will teach you all things." Here is our teacher. He speaks to us through the Church. Woe, therefore, to those who consider and call the Church old-fashioned, strait-laced, out of touch with the times! They are speaking the language of the world and its votaries, they have not the Spirit of Truth. "Knowledge will make you free. Taste and eat of the forbidden fruit." Thus the plea for false freedom has come from the garden of Eden. Unfortunately many do taste and eat, and knowledge of sin does give them freedom, but it is the freedom that leads to death. Not freedom from the laws of God, not freedom from restraint of passion, not freedom from the teaching of the Beatitudes, makes men free. Such freedom, in spite of its lure, is only bondage. The only freedom that breaks our fetters, is the freedom of the sons of God.

The Ladies Wept

QUITE recently a sometime United States senator from Utah gave a lecture on Mormonism—and the ladies present wept. So the report runs: and it is to be hoped that the report is true. It is fitting that ladies should weep over a system which degrades women in an unspeakable fashion. This Mormonism does: it is a blot on our civilization, a wretched thing more worthy of the bush than a Christian country. But after all, bad as it is, in certain respects at least, it is no worse than divorce as practised in America. Mormonism respects certain fundamental rights which divorce flouts in a dastardly fashion. Mormon men care for their wives and children. Mormon mothers do not desert their offspring for the sake of a scoundrel who has cast off his wife as if she were an outworn chattel. Mormonism and divorce with remarriage are both repulsive and dangerous to the State, but the latter is probably more dangerous than the former. Some kind of a society can be built up on Mormonism; unlimited divorce tends to eat the heart out of every society. The uncontrolled whim and passion which breaks up the family, the unit of society, with little or no hindrance, tends to do far more harm than the sordid passion which is so curbed that it does not blind a man either to the need of some kind of stable family life, or to the recognition of certain rights of the "plural wives" and their progeny. Well-placed tears are good: especially when the emotion which prompts them becomes the mainspring of reasonable action. Is there no sometime senator able to make the ladies weep over divorce and then take action on divorce? He would be a benefactor of our country.

What Are Curmudgeons?

SCIENTISTS have some difficulty about the proper classification of the curmudgeon. Those who say it is a marsupial and to be classed with the wombats, the kangaroos and the bandicoots, point triumphantly to the purse which every curmudgeon carries close to the heart, and mention the fact that marsupials belong to the lowest existing mammals, down into which they have no hesitation in dropping the curmudgeon. On the other hand scientists equally competent put the curmudgeon with the turtles, and assert that they have close kinship with the snapping variety. To establish their views those zoologists bring forward the curmudgeons' well-known proclivities for pouncing swiftly on their prey and then instantly closing up tight beneath a hard, impenetrable shell. Like the turtle, too, the curmudgeons, as observers have not failed to note, hide their eggs in banks, but strangely enough no one has seen any eggs of the curmudgeon hatch out. Curmudgeon's eggs are like cold-storage eggs, no doubt; intended to increase one's capital, not one's chickens.

Because of this uncertainty in scientific circles, a further study of the curmudgeon's habits and habitat seems desirable at this time. The creature has long been known to the world. The most noticeable peculiarity of the curmudgeon is the propensity to hoard. Other animals store away for a rainy day. With the curmudgeon every day is a rainy day, and there is never a stop to hoarding. The hoard is never lessened by consumption. The only pleasure the curmudgeon seems to take in what is stored up is to look at it and feel it. A special delight is shown for green paper with odds and ends of silk thread in it. The rustle of these rectangular papers and perhaps too, the pictures on them give intense delight to the curmudgeons. They also love the sight and clink of gold and silver coin. Some of these habits would denote that curmudgeons are an evolution of the bird family, some of whom like to line their nests well with showy comforts. Other habits, however, denote some kinship with the boa-constrictor, whose veracious appetite survives in the curmudgeons.

The curmudgeons avoid bright, joyous places, but love banks where they are often seen retiring into dark, mysterious recesses, hiding away their hoards. It is easier to get a bone from the jaws of a bull-dog than to induce curmudgeons to let go of anything they have picked up. They make a bone look like a billiard-ball, so clean do they scrape it. They are said to draw blood from a stone. At all events, it is a well-authenticated fact that they are skinflints, and any stones near the curmudgeons have no necessity to roll in order to lose their green moss. The curmudgeons will see to that. Outstretched hands elicit deep growls from them, and orphans and widows are a special abomination, driving the curmudgeons into frenzied apprehension for their hoards, which occasionally in the lone history of their race have been known to melt before the tears of the poor and outcast.

Young curmudgeons offer interesting fields for study. They are usually male and very hard to tame. It was a young curmudgeon's mother who begged her offspring, "Be polite, now Johnny, and give your sister the larger piece of cake." "Ah, let her be polite," growled the young curmudgeon. Another when requested to give his sister the lion's share of the bananas, made a curmudgeonly answer, "Lions don't eat bananas," and his sister got the lion's share.

Are there any church curmudgeons? Everybody knows there are church mice and they are a poor set. The church curmudgeons are almost extinct. They have to practise what is called in the animal kingdom, protective mimicry, putting on a mask which causes them to merge into their surroundings and elude detection. They must pretend to be poor. It was the first church curmudgeon who growled out, "This might have been sold and given to the poor." He was a marsupial, a bearer of the purse.

LITERATURE

Dante's Six Hundred and Fiftieth Birthday

SOMETIME during this month of May, 1915, we are not quite certain when, occurs the six hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the birthday of Dante, who was born in 1265. There have been periods during those years, though never for long, when the great Tuscan poet was neglected. There was a time in the eighteenth century when the literary authorities of Europe even affected to contemn him. This was due to the fact that the precious eighteenth century had lost touch with the realities of life and was weaving fine-spun theories for itself as to the significance of human existence. But for the most part Dante's fame has been so constantly growing all over the world that he is now acknowledged to be probably the greatest poet that ever lived. Homer and Shakespere are the only men that are mentioned quite in the same breath with him and it is felt that these three immortals are far ahead of any poets that may be placed second to them. If a plebiscite of the great literary men and critics of the last one hundred years were taken in every country in the world, Dante would undoubtedly have the majority of votes for supremacy as a poet.

Dante greatly dared to write his sublime epic not merely about man as we know him in this world, but also as poetic fancy illuminating faith might picture him in the world to come. In this matter it is easy to understand how near the sublime is to the ridiculous, and that Dante has succeeded in always keeping his immortal poem on the plane of the highest sublimity, even while venturing very close to the edge of the inevitably ridiculous, is the best possible demonstration of his genius. It is because of their appreciation of this marvelous intellectual power that in recent years the keenest critics in every land have greeted this medieval poet as the greatest seer that the world has known, and have recognized in him a man of the most penetrating vision regarding the meaning of human life and gifted with a wonderful power of expressing his vision in absolutely explicit and intelligible ways.

In spite of this universal harmony of critical judgment, to most people Dante, it must be confessed, is little more than a name, and to not a few he is but the shadow of a name. A great many even of those who do considerable reading and think themselves quite well informed, could tell scarcely anything about Dante's times and nothing about his poem except that it had some gruesome details regarding the torments inflicted on the sinners in hell. It is a matter of common knowledge that most of those who, tempted by the poet's great reputation, have ventured to dip into his book, have not as a rule been much impressed by what they found there, and often have returned from their little literary excursion confessing that Dante is utterly beyond them. Needless to say, however, "The Divine Comedy" is not a work to open for light reading, or for the purpose of learning, in an hour or two of leisure, a good deal about the author. Only prolonged and serious study rewards the Dante lover with the supreme satisfaction of sympathy with one of the greatest geniuses that ever lived. Dante is well worth while, but the reader must pay the price. Dante fulfils to an eminent degree that well-known definition of a classic: "A book that every one praises but no one reads." It is to the quality and not to the quantity of his audience that Dante owes his place in the world of letters. So much is heard nowadays of "best sellers" and "most read books," it should be owned that Dante was never a "best seller." He has been brought out, however, in more editions than any poet that ever lived, and far from being the "most read" he is perhaps a "least read" author. But what readers he has!

"The average man" is doubtless inclined to think that Dante has become a sort of tradition among the "high brows," but that he by no means possesses the human and universal interest which certain perfervid admirers of his proclaim they find in him. Many of those who praise Dante are believed to affect their admiration for him. To be among the Danteists is considered a high distinction. The general public's attitude of mind toward enthusiastic Dante students is like that non-musical people have toward music lovers. They conclude that this enthusiasm over music can not be genuine since they do not feel it, and likewise those who have read a few lines or a few pages of Dante but have then laid down the book with a keen sense of dissatisfaction because of their failure to find him interesting, infer that the admiration of others for the poet is misplaced, whereas the fault is really in themselves.

Here in America even those who read a great deal are likely to feel that Dante, in his political philosophy, in his practical point of view, in his sense of life's significance and in his concern for the trivial doings of his little Florentine Republic, is so "out of date" that his writings can have little interest for us. They think that a man living in Dante's narrow environment could not have had the opportunity for such profound experience of life, and such deep knowledge of mankind as would make him a real immortal in literature. They feel further that the mass of information, historical, political, social and educational, required to understand Dante properly, makes it impossible for a modern twentieth century person to be much interested in Dante. But the most eminent literary men of the last two generations have exhausted the vocabulary of panegyric in speaking of him. Poets, critics, historians, churchmen, philosophers and statesmen have for years devoted many hours to the study of Dante, and some of them have published their opinions of his work. Each finds new beauties and new points of view. Dante proves to have a message for them all and to give each reader a new insight into the meaning of some phase of life.

An American poet, Henry W. Longfellow set himself the task of writing a translation of "The Divine Comedy" and spent many years at the work. In order to help him a group of men used to meet, discuss passages with him, offer suggestions and bring their store of erudition to his aid. Thus simply was the Dante Club of Cambridge organized. Even before this, however, there had been a definite exhibition of interest in Dante by Americans. The earliest translation into English of the "Vita Nuova" under the title of "The Early Life of Dante Alighieri" was made in 1846 by Mr. J. Garrow, an American, and some twenty years later Charles Eliot Norton brought out his version of the same book.

The most discerning American appreciation of Dante, however, comes from one of our leading critics, James Russell Lowell. His essay on Dante, as published in the first volume of "Among My Books," is a fine piece of literary criticism. After years of sympathetic study, prolonged meditations and frequent recurrence to his author in varying moods, and after the experiences of long periods, passed in different posts of responsibility in various parts of the world, Lowell succeeded in writing an essay that is itself probably destined to live for ever.

Dante will doubtless continue to be, so far as the great mass of mankind is concerned, "a book that everyone praises but no one reads," but that will not dim the luster of the genius of this great man. Perhaps the celebration of the six hundred and fiftieth anniversary of his birth may bring to him a new sheaf of readers and true lovers, and thus there will be added to the world of our time another band of men and women who enjoy a source of satisfaction in life and a poignant stimulus to thought which are denied to most people. Dante is really the touchstone of literary and artistic criticism at any time in the world's history. Whenever Italy has neglected Dante, or for a time thought little of him, her art and her literature have degenerated. The awakening of an interst in Dante anywhere in the world is the sign of a new efflorescence of art and literature among the people. He is Literature's proudest boast. He is one of the few men whose work no one with even the slightest pretensions to scholarship and literary culture can possibly ignore.

JAMES J. WALSH, M.D., PH.D.

REVIEWS

Thomas Addis Emmet and Robert Emmet. Two Volumes. By THOMAS ADDIS EMMET, M.D., LL.D. New York: The Emmet Press. $10.00.

The distinguished author modestly calls these massive volumes of some 1,300 octave pages a memoir; they are rather the thrilling and for the first time finished story of the illustrious Emmet brothers, of their character, writings, achievements and family traditions, their relations with the events, States, statesmen and celebrities of two continents in the period they illustrated, their understanding of the conditions and principles of Irish liberty, and the influence they have continued to exercise on the centuried struggle to which both consecrated their energies and fortunes and one of them sacrificed his life. The younger brother's dying speech has struck a chord in the heart of the world and kept the memory of both alive; but had that elegy been never uttered, his nobility of character, the magnetism of his influence and the solidity as well as brilliancy of his genius would challenge the admiration of men; and had the '98 revolution succeeded, Thomas Addis Emmet, who was its brains and its pen, who rejected high office in his own country and won it in ours, would have ranked among the ablest and worthiest of the liberators of nations. Their writings and deeds and unselfish aims, the historical and romantic interest interwoven with their lives, and the rare distinction that no blemish, public or private, ever attached to either, demanded an adequate biography. It is fortunate for literature and history that at last they have found it.

Dr. Emmet inherited the versatility and Irish sympathies of his family. Distinguished in his own profession by medical works of international repute, he found time and energy for laborious original research into Ireland's history and especially the not inconsiderable part of it which his family had made. His "Incidents of My Life," published in 1911, evidence not only a vivid interest in all the affairs of humanity and a marvelous memory stretching over a period of sixty years, but also the gift of weaving fact, incident and anecdote into an historic and entertaining narrative. His two volumes, "Ireland under English Rule," the result of indefatigable research and now considered a standard authority, provided the background, and his previous memoir of "The Emmet Family" supplied the details of the present work, which is the consummate epitome of a life-long labor of love.

The first volume, having traced the Emmet genealogy, and particularly the Tipperary progenitors of the patriots, who, it appears, had a good sprinkling of Gaelic blood and spoke Gaelic in their daily intercourse as well as Latin and French, presents the career of Thomas Addis Emmet in Ireland and America. A lawyer by profession and sharing with every member of his family his father's brilliant gifts and purity of patriotic endeavor, he rejected, in his twenty-ninth year, the Solicitor-Generalship of Ireland, by which Pitt and Castlereagh would buy off his opposition, and having labored in vain for Irish and Catholic rights through parliamentary reform, reached the conviction, which later experience confirmed, that Ireland's salvation lay in complete independence from England. Like his brother, he had no illusion about the danger of French cooperation. His writings, which are perhaps the most valuable portion of the work, show him an able organizer, and a cool, logical, well-informed thinker.

The second volume throws many a new light on Robert Emmet, heightening the general conception of him as the ideal patriot, and revealing that from friend and foe he received the tribute paid by Anthony to Brutus, and deserved it better. His writings, like those of his father, brothers and sisters in these volumes, are of high merit and exclusively devoted to Ireland. The song, "Erin's Call," written in his twelfth year, might well serve as her anthem now. The impression one gathers from contemporary records and correspondence, state documents and descriptive matter is summed up in the estimate of Rev. Dr. Douglas, a schoolmate: "So gifted a creature does not appear in a thousand years. The whole family were distinguished for talent of the highest order." The interest is not confined to the Emmets. Pitt, Castlereagh, Napoleon, Sarah Curran and that loftier heroine, Anne Devlin, American politics of a hundred years ago, England's dealings with Ireland and countless incidental facts and personages pass in review, illuminated by many details of striking interest from unknown or forgotten records. Emmet's speech, accepted from Dr. Madden's compilation, does not appear as genuine as the usual version.

Dr. Emmet's introduction is a valuable contribution to the philosophy of Irish history, supplementing T. A. Emmet's remarkable review, and the "aphorisms" scattered through the volumes summarize the views of nearly every competent authority. The bibliography is complete, as is the index to each volume, which, with the general setting, is the work of Miss B. M. Kelly, who prepared the index volume of the "Catholic Encyclopedia." Over one hundred artistic illustrations, judiciously selected and sumptuously produced, complete a work of monumental value to the students and writers of Irish history, and of an interest transcending romance.

M. K.

The California Padres and Their Missions. By CHARLES FRANCIS SAUNDERS and J. SMEATON CHASE. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.00.

This work excites mingled feelings in the Catholic reader. Its authors are to be praised greatly for their sympathy with the Padres and the neophytes, and for the respect with which they treat our holy religion. They have taken the measure of such writers as Bancroft, and have learned to rely upon Fr. Zephyrin Englehardt and men of his stamp. One will not find here any fables of the Padres' avarice, of their brutality to converts, of their wealth secretly conveyed to Mexico, such as we have had to blame in other books on the subject. On the contrary our authors take occasion, when it offers itself, to show the absurdity of such tales.

Now for the other side. Like all Protestants who have fallen under the spell, the authors have enveloped the California Missions with a romance having no foundation in reality. This is seen especially in the stories they have interwoven with their history. These, of course, are the fruit of the writers' imagination, and in many of them a Catholic will detect at once the false note. Two or three times the Catholic Church is taken roundly to task for not having cared for the Missions according to the ideas of the Landmarks Club. But this is the way of the world. First, rob the Church of nearly all her possessions, and then rail at her because the little left is in ruins; first tie her hand and foot, and then rebuke gravely her inactivity. We notice also one or two references to a freedom of manners in a couple of friars, on the authority of such persons as Vallejo and Alvarado. Since elsewhere the authors give a fair notion of such characters, they would have been more consistent had they sought better testimony in that matter.

We are glad to say that this book is the work of gentlemen. If Catholics will find it somewhat unreal, if here and there it may ruffle their feelings just a little, they will never see in it any deliberate misrepresentation, still less anything that could be construed by the touchiest of minds as offensive. Its Spanish and Latin are not above reproach. There was a time when publishers of any name held it a reflection upon themselves if any book issuing from their press was not faultless in such matters, but that time seems to have passed. On one thing we must congratulate the authors absolutely. We read: "Welcome, then, Fray Luis Antonio Martinez, of San Luis Obispo, Fray Luis of that ilk, as one may call thee," from which we gather with pleasure that they are among the few living to-day who understand the meaning of the much-abused phrase, "of that ilk." We need no other proof that they are not only gentlemen, but also scholars, and for that almost singular virtue we overlook their venial faults in the matter of Spanish and Latin.

H. W.

The Solitaries of the Sambuca. By DANIEL MAULDSLEY. With a Prefatory Note by MONTGOMERY CARMICHAEL. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $2.00.

A Cloistered Romance. By FLORENCE OLMSTEAD. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.25.

Whatever Mr. Carmichael writes, whether his subject be old paintings, old towns, old tapestries, or the old spirit of religion in its modern manifestations, is sure to be an artistic delight. Mr. Carmichael, we think, has practised at least some of the sixteen ways, lately explained in AMERICA by Prior M'Nabb, of getting at the medieval mind. But he knows the modern mind quite as well, with its adaptability to take on medieval forms of sanctity which, after all, are medieval only because a great many medieval persons exhibited them very perfectly and very winningly. Essentially they are Catholic, both in origin and in their fitness for all men and all times. Those who remember Mr. Carmichael's "Life of John William Walshe" need not be told that to seek the name of Daniel Mauldsley in any extant "Who's Who" would be a fruitless task. But with the aid of Montgomery Carmichael, whose bodying forth he may be held to be, he writes like a very real person, and the biography of Paul Casauban, which he produces, is a charming and much-needed explanation of the spirit and purpose of the contemplative life. It would be too much to expect that the vast amount of quaint and sometimes exceedingly amusing monastic erudition which one finds in this volume should be wholly free from error. The statement, for instance, that "subjects of all Religious Orders, whether Monastic or Mendicant, have the right secured to them by Papal privilege of quitting their Order and entering a Camaldolese Hermit's cell" is not true of the Society of Jesus, nor, perhaps, of other religious Orders. Nor will all agree with Paul Casauban's contention, that to advance all choir-monks to the priesthood is a "weakness of modern monasticism." It is true that this was not contemplated in the original rule of St. Benedict, but it must be remembered that this innovation is not precisely modern, and that, gradually introduced by competent authority, it has contributed to the remarkable spread of monasticism, and has been of immense advantage to the Church. These, however, are but blemishes, in no way affecting Mr. Mauldsley's thesis.

Instead of solitaries, hermits and friars—and if you wish to know the distinction between the three, consult Mr. Carmichael's book—the main figures in Miss Olmstead's volume are nuns and their charges, the inmates of a home for the aged. Miss Olmstead does not conceal her admiration for the self-sacrifice of these religious women, but as she lacks all real insight into the meaning of the religious life, her nuns are mere puppets. Mike, Mr. Samuel, Mr. Cashdollar and the convent Bucephalus are capitally drawn, and while Mary, an inmate of the home, is most unpleasantly real, Alethea, the beautiful heroine, and Paget, the hero, are rather dull and of a familiar type. It is to be regretted that Miss Olmstead has spoiled a good story by dragging in the "The hours I spent with thee, dear heart" variety of nun, and the Mother Superioress, ever loved of fiction writers, who, when not playing the tyrant over the Sisters, is playing the fool by meddling with affairs which do not concern her.

P. L. B.

Chaucer and His Poetry. Lectures delivered in 1914 on the Percy Trumbull Memorial Foundation in Johns Hopkins University. By GEORGE LYMAN KITTREDGE. Cambridge: Harvard University Press.

The College Chaucer. With Introduction, Notes and Glossary by HENRY NOBLE MACCRACKEN, Ph.D. New Haven: Yale University Press. $1.50.

Here is a volume containing six charming essays on Chaucer, his times, and four of his principal works. In the opening essay particularly we have a good illustration of the saner and more sympathetic view that is coming to be held regarding the Middle Ages. Chaucer himself has never lacked sympathetic readers and critics, still his works, particularly the "Canterbury Tales," have suffered at the hands of those who saw in them texts on which to preach their own distorted views of their medieval ancestors and especially of the medieval Church. Ever since the early Reformers in England thought they saw in Chaucer a willing and conscious ally of Wyclif, almost every commentator from Speght to Skeat has thought it his duty to depict Chaucer as the satirist of his Church, appending hostile if not outrageous notes lest any reader should miss the argument. It is therefore gratifying to find in Mr. Kittredge, whose other works show scholarship combined with great breadth of sympathy, a more intelligent grasp not only of the times of Chaucer, but of the very idea of his masterpiece, the "Canterbury Tales." In his interpretation, as just as it is ingenious, Chaucer no longer appears as the rabid satirist, or even the mere story-teller depicting the life, the types he saw around him, but rather as the consummate dramatic artist painting, in a wonderful "human comedy," characters true indeed to life—else he were no true artist—yet not necessarily typical of the times, but, like Shakespere's men and women, universally true, and therefore no longer a theme of pious disquisitions on medieval iniquity. The more literary and less historical essays of the volume, though narrower in their interest, manifest the same high ideal of the author's scholarship.

In the ordinary Chaucer for school and college use, so much space and attention are devoted to the editor's notes and critical apparatus that but a small portion of the text can be given. So the student can see but little Chaucer owing to the profusion of editorial comment. In his "College Chaucer" Professor MacCracken aims at giving the maximum amount of Chaucer that can be contained in a handy volume, and that, too, in the spelling of the original MSS. and not as revised to fit the ideas of what modern scholars think the medieval orthographist should consistently have written. The notes are extremely brief but excellent and the glossary is sufficiently full.

J. F. X. M.

A Historical Introduction to Ethics. By THOMAS VERNER MOORE, Ph.D., Instructor in Psychology at the Catholic University of America, Priest of the Congregation of St. Paul the Apostle. With an Introduction by the Rt. Rev. THOMAS JOSEPH SHAHAN, S.T.D., Rector of the Catholic University of America. New York: American Book Co. $0.80.

In this little volume we have a product of the modern spirit of specialization in its latest development. For Dr. Moore's book is neither a history of ethics nor a text-book of ethics, but is intended to "clear a path of approach" and present a preliminary survey of the most important of the philosophical disciplines. Such an introduction will surely prove of great value to the investigator who hopes to treat adequately the basic problem of ethics; the determination of a norm of morality. It will give him a propitious start in his search for ultimate moral truth not only by acquainting him with those fundamental truths regarding the nature and destiny of man which are styled the "preambles," "the postulates" or "the presumption" of ethics, but also by familiarizing him with the various solutions, proposed by ancient and modern thinkers, to these and kindred questions. For this purpose, Dr. Moore has divided his presentation into three parts: "The Ethics of Conditionate Morality," "The Ethics of Absolute Morality" and "Criticism of Moral Systems." In the first two parts the systems of such philosophers as Epicurus, Socrates, Plato, Aristotle, Kant, Rousseau, Bentham, St. Thomas, Mill, Adam Smith, Spencer and others are concisely explained and analyzed, a short life of the philosopher being appended in each instance. In his choice, the author had, necessarily, to be selective; types consequently are chosen, and the systems are presented impartially and accurately, frequently in the moralist's own words. Dr. Moore is laudably objective in this portion of his work; criticism is not interwoven with the exposition, but is reserved for special treatment in part three. Socrates, Plato and Aristotle are well depicted in their true relation to St. Thomas as the successive beacon-lights of paganism, heralding the dawn of Christian morality.

One might have welcomed in this volume some specific reference to the more pronounced misconceptions of life's meaning that are holding the public ear to-day and for a day; but the author doubtless intends that they are best studied in their sources, as most modern vagaries are but rediscoveries of defunct systems. Dr. Moore should be gently chidden for allowing his printer to use such small type in the footnotes.

E. A. W.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The general observance this month of Dante's six hundred and fiftieth birthday makes timely Dr. Walsh's paper on the great Tuscan poet, which is published in the current Catholic Mind. A portion of the article appears in this number of AMERICA. Father M'Nabb's delightful recipe for reaching the medieval mind follows appropriately the Dante paper, and the number ends with the striking sermon Father Patrick H. Casey, S.J., delivered last Lent, at "Old St. Joseph's," Philadelphia, on "The Catholic Working Girl."

Happily, the war has not kept the May Month from reaching us. The contents of the number is as follows:

"The Ethics of Prohibition," by the Editor; "A Cruce ad Crucem" (verse), by Armel O'Connor; "The Origin of the Appellant Controversy, 1598," by the Rev. J. H. Pollen; "Monsieur L'Abbé," by E. K. S.; "Archbishop Lanfranc—a Medieval Study," by the Rev. John Baptist Reeves, O.P.; "The Capitulation" (verse), by G. M. Hart; "Notes on Familiar Prayers VII. The 'Anima Christi,'" by the Rev. Herbert Thurston; "The Saints from Without and Within," by S. E. S., and "A Village Symphony," by Mary Samuel Daniel.

The "Miscellanea" and "Topics of the Month," which follow, contain very temperate, sensible reflections on the war, prohibition, etc.

Father J. S. Ricard, S.J., who has charge of the observatory of Santa Clara University, California, has started a little monthly magazine called the Sun Spot. He explains in language not too learned for the layman and yet scientific enough to interest the astronomer, his ideas about sun spots and weather. There are also papers bearing on meteorology, the mathematics of the sun, general astronomy, etc. What a fearless weather seer Father Ricard is may be inferred from the answer he gave an Iowa college that asked, on April 8, whether it would be safe, from a purely meteorological point of view, to give "As You Like It" in the open air, on June 9. "You may depend on tolerably fair weather on June 9," was the response. The new periodical is ten cents a copy or one dollar a year, and should be brought to the attention of the astronomy classes in Catholic colleges.

"Under Which Flag?" (Herder, $1.00) by Edith Staniforth, is a story of the interesting period of the Bourbon restoration. The intricacies of relationship in the opening chapters present rather a tangled skein, but the clearer thread of narrative follows in the rest of the book. Against the historic background of Napoleon's first downfall, Louis XVIII's accession to the throne, and the exile's escape from Elba, are thrown romantic scenes of love and daring, in which the characters own allegiance to the changing powers.——E. Gallienne Robin's "Golden Lights" (Herder, $0.75) are those of love and faith, which the heroine of the novel strives to keep aflame amid storms of difficulties. The suspense of the story is well sustained and Anglicanism is discerningly described. The present-day part of the book brings in a Cambridge "coach" who writes books on "New Thought," an actress who figures in a divorce case, and a minister who is converted to Catholicism. Both these books deserve many readers.

"Golgotha" (The James H. Barry Co., San Francisco) is a little book containing the ten discourses on the Passion which Father Dennis J. Kavanagh, S.J., delivered at St. Ignatius' Church, in that city, last Lent. "Genuine Christian Science," says the author, is taught from the Cross, and his Ignatian contemplations of the scenes on Calvary abound in striking applications of that science's postulates to the modern world's maladies. "Golgotha" is fittingly dedicated "to the young men and young women of San Francisco who inaugurated the movement for the 'Reverent Observance of Good Friday.'"——"The Holy Eucharist in the Scriptures," "The Holy Eucharist in the Church," "Some Thoughts for Each Day During the Octave of Corpus Christi" and "Eucharistic Aspirations and Meditations on Psalm XLI" are the chapter-heads in "The Mystery of Faith" (Herder, $0.75), a little book which Father Kenelm Digby Best, the Oratorian, has written in the evening of his days. The volume will increase its readers' love for the Blessed Sacrament.

Here are five recent novels: An ardent disciple of Swedenborg, "Johnny Appleseed" (Harper's, $1.25), "half mystic, half poet," travels through the Ohio valley in the early days of immigration. His mission is to plant appleseeds in the homes of the early settlers. He is a lover of nature, but just what he learns from nature the author, Eleanor Atkinson, fails to tell us. His life is one of devotion to his fellow-men, but the story is not skilfully told: there are too many loose ends of incident and the plot is insipid.——"Getting a Wrong Start" (Macmillan, $1.00) is called the "truthful autobiography" of a writer of "best sellers." The anonymous author tells how he failed at everything he undertook until, at forty, he produced a successful novel. He means his book to be a guide and inspiration for young men, so he gives them principles like these: "In my philosophy, my wife is free to leave me when she finds a better man"; "Good normal physical health is the best of all blessings." He owns that man feels at times a longing to rest "upon Someone or Something larger than himself," so he becomes either religious or bibulous.——"Still Jim," by Honoré Willsie (Stokes, $1.35), is a story built up on the usual lines of engineering tales, so we have a number of risks to be run, a flood to be beaten back and a "toll of human lives." The novel's plot is conventional and, while the minor characters are fairly well drawn, the principal ones are weak and uninteresting.——H. G. Wells' "Bealby" (Macmillan, $1.35) is disappointing. Though liberal touches of British humor are used in telling the episodes of the first week's service of a gardener's step-son in the manor-house, the book is by no means irresistibly funny. Filled first with rebellion, then with terror of its consequences, the boy involves in his troubles the Chancellor of the realm, the other guests of a week-end at Shonts, as well as the whole household; and even the countryside has reason to remember the passing through of Bealby. What merit the book possesses is in the bits of description and sketches of English character. Unless Mr. Wells' name were on the title page, very probably we should have heard little of this book.——Meg Villars' "Betty-All-Alone" (Glode, $1.25) tells in a series of letters the deliberate fluttering of a moth who, in search of the flames of love and fortune, seeks to escape from the dull commonplace life to which her father's improvidence condemned her. The novel is not fit to read.

BOOKS RECEIVED

Baker & Taylor Co., New York:
By Right of Sword. By Leigh H. Irvine. $1.50.

Dodd, Mead & Co., New York:
Rabindranath Tagore: The Man and His Poetry. By Basanta Koomar Roy. $1.25.

E. P. Dutton & Co., New York:
The Conduct of Life. By Viscount Haldane. $1.00.

B. Herder, St. Louis:
Fits and Starts. By Rev. T. A. Fitzgerald, O.F.M. $1.00; History of the Catholic Church from the Renaissance to the French Revolution. By Rev. James MacCaffrey. 2 Volumes. $3.50; The Lives of the Popes in the Middle Ages. By Rev. Horace K. Mann. Vol. XI, Vol. XII. 1198-1216. Innocent III. $6.00; Pulpit Themes. Translation of Schoupe's Adjumenta Oratoris Sacri. By Rev. P. A. Beecher. $2.75.

James Maclehose & Sons, Glasgow:
Pre-Reformation Scholars in Scotland in the XVIth Century. By W. Forbes Leith, S.J. Six shillings net.

G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York:
Alfred the Great. By Beatrice Adelaide Rees. $2.50.

Sherman, French & Co., Boston:
The God of Battles and Other Verses. By Ambrose Leo McGreevy. $1.00.

Sturgis & Walton Co., New York:
The Greek Spirit. Phases of Its Progression in Religion, Polity, Philosophy and Art. By Kate Stephens. $1.50.

Survey Associates, Inc., New York:
The Normal Life. By Edward T. Devine. $1.00.

Chas. Scribner's Sons, New York:
New Cosmopolis. By James Huneker. $1.50; Daybreak. By Elizabeth Miller. $1.35; The Christ of the Men of Art. By J. R. Aitken. $6.00.

R. & T. Washbourne, Ltd., London:
On the Papacy. A Pastoral Letter by His Eminence Cardinal Mercier. Twopence; Cardinal Mercier: His Philosophic and Pastoral Work. Sixpence.

Yale University Press, New Haven, Conn.:
The College Chaucer. By Henry Noble MacCracken. $1.50; The Divine Comedy. Translated by Henry Johnson. $2.50; Some Textual Difficulties in Shakespeare. By Charles D. Stewart. $1.35; Yale Yesterdays. By Clarence Deming. With a Foreword by Henry Walcott Farnum. $2.25.

EDUCATION

A Disciple of McMurry

"TRUTH," said the speaker, as one bowed with the wisdom of the centuries, "truth does not exist. What is true to-day is false to-morrow." And he drank a glass of water, as twenty auditors of the fair and impressible sex sat silent as on so many peaks of Darien in the presence of this genius, new-swum into their ken. Seven of the twenty were Catholics, dark and benighted papists, enemies of the light. These, like Alice in Wonderland, thought that the eloquence might possibly mean something, but that, somehow, it was not very clear. They wondered, in short, why the learned speaker insisted with such vehemence upon the truth that truth does not exist. Truly, life is full of puzzles, and this is one of them.

HARRYING A SUPERINTENDENT

The orator was the superintendent of public instruction in a large Pennsylvania city; the audience, a score of school-teachers, sitting at his feet, powdering themselves in the dust of the wise. These ladies had been haled before the superintendent to "say their lesson," from McMurry's "How to Study," and to receive instruction on the succeeding chapter. "Haled" is a picked phrase, chosen out of many. For these ladies, with the ingratitude common to their sex and state in life, wanted none of McMurry, even though enriched with the classic comments of the superintendent. But so convinced was this pundit that in McMurry's book one might find a well of truth, pure and undefiled, that he compelled his teachers to attend these classes, although, when assembled, he told them that truth did not exist. Perhaps he would say that truth does not exist outside of McMurry's book or his own glosses upon this valuable work. At any rate, the harassed superintendent has lately addressed a remonstrance to the Board of Education, in which, despite his assertion that truth does not exist, he proposes the truth that McMurry's work is "the most widely-read pedagogical text-book in the United States." Since, however, the superintendent can not in logic claim that his assertion is true, the point of his argument is somewhat blunted.

"HOW TO STUDY"

It would seem, then, that Professor McMurry, of Columbia University, is the cause or occasion of this sadly disedifying pother. His text-book "How to Study" is a slender volume truly to raise so strong a wind of controversy, and is, indeed, except in one important section, so obvious and colorless that the disinterested spectator wonders what there is in it to quarrel about. The obvious character of its contents may be judged from the sounding title of the initial chapter: "Indications That Young People Do Not Learn to Study Properly: the Seriousness of the Evil." Few are the individuals, especially of the teaching fraternity, who need a book, or even a chapter, to stir their consciousness of this unfortunate fact. The truth gradually dawns even upon the author, for, on page five, he remarks, "It is, perhaps, unnecessary to collect proofs that young people do not learn to study," and for the next six pages he shifts the emphasis by showing that many of their teachers are in the same ill plight.

Professor McMurry does not assume the rôle of a path-finder. He is content to saunter along familiar and well-frequented paths, and his advice, pleasantly worded, on ways and means of teaching the young idea how to shoot with accuracy and dispatch will no doubt prove acceptable and profitable to scores of budding teachers. But the Professor is more at home in suggesting these familiar methods than in explaining the philosophy which underlies them.

A MUDDLED PHILOSOPHER

In common with many a modern writer on philosophy, Professor McMurry would have profited by a course in Aristotelian logic. He sadly lacks a consistent terminology. He can not define his subject, or will not, but prefers to talk about it and around it. Even after fifteen pages of discussion on the "nature of study," he fails to leave the student with a clear idea of what study is. In a text-book, these are serious faults. The critic hesitates either to reject or to approve much of what Professor McMurry writes, on the ground that, perhaps, he really does not mean what his words imply. But, after a careful study, it does not seem overstating the case, to say that no one who accepts Profesor McMurry's theories of knowledge can accept the dogma of the existence of God. This is not claiming that the author is a professor of atheism or of religious indifference. It is merely stating that his theories, so far as they can be gathered from his "How to Study," are incompatible with the acceptance of a divine revelation. Possibly the Professor is not loath to admit this indictment.

"SO-CALLED KNOWLEDGE"

Professor McMurry's theory is, briefly, that "perfect reliability is attached to very little of our knowledge. . . . Probably some things are true for all time, such, for example, as the facts of the multiplication table, propositions in geometry, and some of the laws of physics." But "even our statements of scientific law, instead of being final . . . are subject to error. . . . Our so-called knowledge ranges all the way from ideas that possess a very high degree of probability to those that are a product of faith and hope, the greater portion of them approximating the latter. . . . The highest wisdom represents only a rough approximation of the truth." "Since, therefore, so few ideas are fully reliable and unalterably fixed, a settled attitude toward them is undesirable, not only because it is opposed to utility, growth and knowledge, but because it finds no warrant in the real nature of knowledge."

TANGLED TERMS

This is wild and loose language for a philosopher. If "perfect reliability is attached to very little of our knowledge," it follows that of some knowledge perfect reliability may be predicated. But of what knowledge? We are nowhere told. It is not the multiplication table, for this is only "probably" true, and the philosopher passes the same judgment upon geometry. Yet, on the other hand, the range of "knowledge" is said to extend from "probability" to "faith and hope," and "the highest wisdom" is not truth but merely an "approximation" to truth. What, then, has become of that small field of knowledge to which, by implication, the Professor allows "perfect reliability"? To add to this Babel of ideas, we are finally informed that a "few" ideas are "fully reliable and unalterably fixed."

A teacher who expresses himself after this contradictory fashion is misnamed. Within the compass of a few pages, he teaches that no knowledge is certain and that some knowledge is certain, but nowhere does he point out the truths which we may accept. It is strongly to be suspected that the learned Professor is too modest to indicate the one undisputed and indisputable truth in all this universe. It is summed up in a counsel frequently inculcated by the Professor of Elementary Education at Columbia: "Let us preserve an open mind on all things": except, of course, on the truth of the sentiment just uttered.

TRUTH AND REVELATION

If by this welter of loosely-chosen phrases and contradictory statements, Professor McMurry means to teach that, beyond the range of those truths, settled for all time by the authority of God, it is the part of wisdom to keep one's mind open for the reception of new truths, naturally acquired by the operation of the human intellect, it can only be said that the Columbia Professor is singularly unfortunate in his mode of self-expression. Whether or not this is his position, can not be gathered with finality from the phantasmagoric ninth chapter of "How to Study," in which the author undertakes to set forth his theory of knowledge. Some truths, he admits, are "certain." Are these the truths of revelation? We are not told. But, in his public utterances, Professor McMurry has not been slow to apply his "open-mind" theory to religious belief. In his eyes, faith is not supernatural and can not be. Revelation, the certain communication of unchanging truth by an infinitely truthful Being, is a myth. Our acceptance of the existence of God, even as our acceptance of the truth of the multiplication table, is, at best, "probable," provisional, subject to unending change, as evolution brings us nearer to the goal of perfect knowledge, set on the hills that our feet shall never tread.

IRRESPONSIBLE PROPHECY

"Truth does not exist. What is true to-day is false to-morrow." This is the lesson drawn by many a half-baked superintendent of public instruction from Professor McMurry's "How to Study." Much cry and little wool, and a parlous small pennyworth of bread for so much muddy sack. The first statement refutes itself; the second is not a proof but an unfounded and irresponsible prophecy, incapable, by its very nature, of reasonable proof. But irresponsible prophecy is as easy as lying and, in the long run, equally worthless as an argument. Yet if truth does not exist, it is unreasonable to ask for valid argument.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

SOCIOLOGY

Annual Conference of the St. Louis Catholic Charities

FOR years Catholic Charity has had the almost fatal habit of silence. Charity is so much a part of Catholic life that it was taken for granted. No one thought of talking about it, and the people who were doing the work were quite too busy to find time for playing press agent. The result, however, has been a delightful division by non-Catholic sociologists of all charity into Organized Charity and Catholic Charity; that is, when these gentlemen condescended to admit that there was such a thing as Catholic Charity. Another result is a regrettable lack of knowledge among Catholics themselves of what the Church is accomplishing in social and charitable work. But of late it has been thought well to adopt, in part at least, the "publicity program."

INVITING INSPECTION

The Annual Conference of Catholic Charities, of which the present is the fourth, is the St. Louis expression of this new attitude of publicity. Fifteen hundred friends, well-wishers and patrons, organizers and workers of thirty-five charitable institutions and societies, greeted Archbishop Glennon when he rose to open the meeting.

"Catholic charity," he said, "has nothing to hide. We not only do not resent, but we hereby invite, public inspection of our institutions by Catholics and non-Catholics alike, regardless of their faith or even of their prejudices." One wonders if the archbishop's invitation was loud enough to sound above the snarl of the presses at Aurora, Missouri.

There was an expectant stir, a sudden darkening of the auditorium, and upon the screen, in rapid succession, passed the projected pictures of some thirty buildings devoted to Catholic charity in St. Louis. As each familiar scene was flung on the curtain, a volley of applause, more thrilling than the rattle of musketry, rose in greeting. There were seven hospitals, five orphanages, seven homes for the destitute, three settlements, two hotels, with a dozen more buildings of varied character, ranging from a deaf-mute institute to the inevitable and sadly undervalued House of the Good Shepherd, each a real monument to the heroic sacrifices and a tribute to the open-handedness of the least wealthy body of Christians.

INVESTING HALF A MILLION

The institutions passing so rapidly before the eye provided for every age and every condition of destitution, from the foundling thrown helpless on the mercy of strangers to the tottering man or woman whose next step would be the grave. This is no hyperbole, but the soberest truth. Infancy is sheltered in a foundling home and three nurseries; youth grows up within the wall of Catholic orphanages; young womanhood is trained and shielded in a Catholic technical school; homeless boys, on the highroad toward manhood, learn something of the meaning of home under the protection of a Catholic priest. Independent women of small means find Catholic homes, three in number, eager to make life pleasanter for them; one Catholic hotel for workmen opens its doors yearly to six thousand guests. The outcast colored girl, the sick, the insane, the consumptive, those whose ears are shut, the woman whose place in life has been irretrievably lost, all find Catholic arms open to receive them, provided they have the passport to Catholic charity: poverty and want. Catholic settlements have grown up in the heart of St. Louis slums; Catholic men and women search the highways and byways for the blind, the maimed and those fallen among thieves. And Catholic charity closes the eyes which for the last time have looked out upon a world that had so little to make it attractive.

When the lights were flashed on again, a hasty examination of the Conference report explained in part this systematic development of St. Louis charitable institutions. Catholics of St. Louis, in the year just closing, spent in charity, independently of all investment in buildings or equipment or salaries, $536,682.38. I say it explained in part, for the additional $178,000 put down as the estimated salary due the Catholic nuns who were giving their services without recompense, no more represented the real value of their devoted sacrifice than a like sum would have been capable of securing such self-forgetfulness. The only coin in which the wonderful charity of our Catholic Sisterhoods can be reckoned is the coin current in a kingdom beyond this world.

THE CHILDREN AND THE SCHOOLS

From that moment the Conference ceased to be statistical, and became as delightfully personal as only the presence of children could make it. The curtain rose with slow solemnity, and the audience rose with sheer joy as twenty little tots, the eldest about five plus, spread their starched dresses, shook their multicolored bows and bowed a deep and unsteady bow. If the nun who had trained them to sing, with gestures, of course, about the doll with "a dreffful pain in its sawdust," had been asked whence these foundlings had come or whose they were, she probably could not have answered, unless, perhaps, with simple faith, she had said: "They come from God, and they call their Mother, Mary."

Catholic charity had snatched these innocents from everywhere and nowhere, before the black waves closed over them. And there was not a heart among us that did not bless the institution that had harbored their pitiful weakness, nor an eye but was misty at thought of what they might have been.

Catholic charity has always been interested first and foremost in the children. That fact the Rev. A. V. Garthoeffner, who brought out in his address the work of the St. Louis parochial schools, strongly accentuated. Catholics, he said, spent in this one city the annual sum of $780,000 to educate their twenty-six thousand children. So it was not surprising that, with one exception, the program represented the work done among the city's orphans and destitute children.

THE WRONG FLAG

From the male orphanage came a troop of boys who executed a lightning drill with a speed and precision that made the pulse beat with new vitality. At first, as they trotted onto the stage at double quick, it seemed like dangerous copy for anti-Catholic papers; for who knew but those wooden guns might at any moment be turned against the rights and liberties of American citizens? But when the American flag was suddenly hoisted, and the lads formed a solid protecting square about it, and the audience cheered to the echo, somehow the thought of anti-Catholic copy evaporated like alcohol in the sun or in a prohibition State. These Catholics are always spoiling good copy; the proper cue was to have hoisted the papal colors.

Colored Catholics of St. Louis are given more than ordinary care; that we knew; but the sight of the forty and more colored girls in their neat blue frocks, dancing and singing with taste and delicacy, made concrete a rather hazy knowledge. The Oblate Sisters of Providence are caring annually for one hundred and twenty colored orphans, and rearing them in the Catholic Faith. Were it not for the Charity Conference, many a Catholic would never have heard of the colored Sisters who are doing such splendid work for the unfortunate of their own race. Catholic charity transcends all bounds of race or color.

So number followed number, each a revelation of the completeness and comprehensiveness of Catholic training. A group of girls in yachting costumes plied vigorous and rhythmical oars in a delightful boat drill. A rainbow dance engaged the activities of a second group. A touch of pathos surrounded the exhibition given by Catholic deaf mutes, one of whom, a blind-deaf girl, had within the year increased her vocabulary from twenty-five to five hundred spoken words. A choral club of young ladies from one of the Settlements sang with appreciation Schubert's "Who Is Sylvia?" And throughout it all, audience and actors were united in one large-hearted feeling of friendliness.

RESULTS AND PLANS

When Judge O'Neill Ryan came forward to map out the work of the Conference for the coming year, his appeal for personal cooperation aroused in the ever-responsive audience spontaneous enthusiasm. The plans for the future were expansive, but with the record of past years to cheer him on, there was not one present but felt that no hopes could exceed possibilities.

The curtain fell; the gathering, every member of which seemed personally interested in all the rest, moved slowly out into the May sunshine. Groups of children, weary but smiling, were convoyed by vigilant Sisters through the crowd that made their way a triumphal march, and packed into autos and carriages and into one large open van. The Fourth Annual Charity Conference had become a tradition. But its purpose was served. Catholic charities had stood forth, not vauntingly, but honestly and frankly, to challenge friendly as well as hostile investigation. Another wabbly prop had been knocked from under bigotry's structure of lies. Isolated Catholic activities had been welded closer together and strengthened with a sense of comradeship in a great and enduring work. And not least, Catholics themselves, as they turned back to their homes, carried with them a new sense of the immense good being done here in a busy, forgetful twentieth century world by that Church that has ever befriended the friendless; and unless their hearts were completely riveted with the steel of selfishness, they had acquired a new sense of their duty toward the poor and suffering of Christ.

One thought has been troubling me ever since. Who first coined the phrase, "Organized Charity"? At any rate, it looks as if non-Catholic sociologists had invented the name, and Catholics had invented the thing itself.

DANIEL A. LORD, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Away off in Jersey there live a woman and a monkey; at least there did; but the monkey died. The woman is alive, however, and that is passing strange, for her heart was wrapped up in that monkey. Her love and grief and a' that took shape in a monument: a monkey's monument over a monkey's grave. Poor creature: not the monkey, he is dead; but the lady, she is alive. Her motive would be hard to analyze. Maybe she is an evolutionist and knows on what branch of her ancestral tree monkeys stood; maybe she had no children on whom to pour out her love; rich ladies are often in this plight. Be that as it may, monuments to monkeys and coffins for dogs are a sore commentary on the trend of modern thought and action. The cycle is well turned toward pagan times. Christian children with pinched, hungry faces are pleading for bread, while "milady" is buying a coffin for her dog and erecting a monument to her monkey. The old paganism is taking slightly new forms, that is all. God will have His day later.

The Catholic Truth Society, 407 Bergen Street, Brooklyn, is planning a campaign for the spread of Catholic literature which, it is hoped, will meet with great success. In a pamphlet recently issued the Society states that it is in receipt of many letters from priests in the South and West, and even in Canada, Alaska and Panama, asking for Catholic newspapers and magazines for the thousands of scattered Catholic families under their charge. Many of these families are located in sparsely settled districts or in communities where anti-Catholic bigotry is strong. Priests are few in these regions; hence the people can be visited only from time to time throughout the year. "Some word of doctrine, some consolation of religion, some explanation of the puzzling news items and anti-Catholic comments of the press, some idea, in a word, of God and the Church should be brought into their lives during the months in which there is no Mass, sermon or sacraments." This can be done by distributing Catholic newspapers and magazines. If you do not keep a file of your Catholic magazine, you are asked to send it regularly to some Catholic family whose address will be furnished on application to the Catholic Truth Society of Brooklyn. Much good will undoubtedly follow this plan, and it is earnestly requested that all cooperate with the Society.

The Spectator is gravely exercised over the downfall of papal infallibility. This is but natural, since the Spectator is also infallible, and that in a degree never claimed even by the most ardent supporters of the See of Rome. The Spectator has issued an infallible Bull, accurately measuring the guilt incurred by the respective nations now at war. Even the United States is not beyond the Spectator's purview, although it is only by implication that this country is censured for adhering to a policy which it "thinks" to be neutral. Having thus exercised its own prerogative of infallibility, the Spectator calls upon the Roman Pontiff to adopt a similar course, threatening, in case of refusal, to issue a second infallible decree, wherein it will be set forth that the infallibility of the Pope has been found to be "illogical and unworkable, in a vortex of human suffering produced by intricate international politics." But since the infallibility of the Spectator has guided it safely through this vortex, and has laid bare before its piercing eyes the intricacies of international politics, why should this smug journal trouble itself about the downfall of papal infallibility? One infallible authority in the world is sufficient, and this journal confesses that its seat is in the office of the Spectator. Infallible the Spectator may be, but only the overwrought feelings natural in time of war can excuse the insincerity with which the Spectator gravely calls upon the Holy See to issue an infallible pronouncement, while it openly proclaims that it does not believe the Holy See to be infallible.

The Bishop of Zanzibar has recently excommunicated the Bishop of Hereford. This prelate had appointed to a canonry in his cathedral a gentleman named Streeter, the author of a treatise which is said to be frankly rationalistic. Whereupon in a "Letter given under Our Hand and Seal in Our Cathedral City of Zanzibar," a sentence of excommunication was decreed:

> Therefore do We, Frank, Lord Bishop of Zanzibar, hereby declare and pronounce that, so long as the ground of Our complaint set forth above remains, there can be, and from this day forward there is, no Communion in Sacred Things between Ourselves and the Right Reverend John, Lord Bishop of Hereford, nor between Ourselves and any Priest within his jurisdiction who shall make known his approval of the false doctrines now officially authorized within the Diocese of Hereford.

The Bishop of Hereford may be pardoned for regarding this sudden and unexpected fulmination as "hasty and ill-considered." Last year, it will be remembered, the Bishop of Zanzibar threatened to leave the Church of England, unless certain doctrines held by his episcopal brother of Mombasa were officially rejected by the Mother Church. It need not be said that the Church, which as Dean Hodges has recently said, glories in her comprehensiveness, has not rejected, nor is likely to repudiate the interesting varieties in doctrine and practice championed by the Ordinary of Mombasa. An interesting sequence is that though Zanzibar has excommunicated Hereford, and Hereford has told Zanzibar to mind his own business, yet both remain in communion with Canterbury!

The French correspondent of the Journal of the American Medical Association for May 8, gives the following quotation from the report of the Academy of Moral and Political Science at Paris:

> Considering that the lowering of the birth rate can not be attributed solely to economic causes but to moral causes, and that the measures taken by the law will run the risk of being inefficacious without acting on the ideas and morals, the Academy expresses its opinion that (1) the most energetic effort should be given to measures whose purpose is to preserve the morality of youth, the stability of the family, to facilitate marriage among young people, and that these efforts should be favored by the care of public authorities; (2) all the forces of religion, intellectual or moral, churches, schools and popular educational societies should combat by an energetic propaganda, the social curse which threatens the existence even of the nation.

France knows what it means to suffer the effects of a criminal policy which misguided enthusiasts and men and women, wanting in all sense of their duty to God and human society, are trying to introduce into this country, giving it the sanction of law. God struck Onan and he died. Such too is the fate of the nation which would make a lie and a mockery of God's law in sanctifying "the social curse which threatens the existence even of the nation."

A writer in the current Month thus eulogizes the zeal shown by the priests of Paris:

> The work done by Paris clergy is nearly unbelievable. They work as I never saw priests work anywhere (though I have no doubt they do in all great cities). They go to bed often in the small hours of the morning, and are up at five or six. They fast and give retreats all Lent, besides extra sermons, and a continuous attendance in the confessionals. The number of Masses said and Communions made daily at a big Paris church is enormous, in addition to which there are confraternities to be run, œuvres paroissiales of all sorts, schools, marriages, baptisms, consultations. . . .
>
> Monsieur l'Abbé, then, was up at five every Sunday morning, retreat or no retreat, and preaching to his Travailleurs at six. Sometimes he would say his Mass then. By seven he was in his confessional, and before 8.30 he had hurried off to a chapel of ease in the parish to give an instruction to boys and young men,—Le Catéchisme de Persévérance. I have heard some of these instructions, a set on "The Bases of the Catholic Religion," I think it was. They showed me that the Abbé had a mind as well as a soul, that lucid, reasonable, versatile, illuminated mind of the educated Frenchman, with a philosophical and theological training that rendered him nearly irrefutable. I wished often as I listened to these instructions of his, that he could give them himself, in his own incomparable tongue, to the non-Catholic students of our universities. After this work with the boys he was back at ten at the paroisse, where sometimes, if he had not said his Mass already, the High Mass fell to him. Or at least he must make the quête—an arduous work this pilgrimage round the crowded church, his arm stretched out with the little red bag for sous, saying merci for every solitary one.

This was last summer. In August the war broke out and that zealous priest was ordered to the front. "I did not hear from him again, and I never shall," are the significant words with which the writer ends.

Two more American Sees were vacated on May 10 by the death of the Right Rev. Lawrence Scanlan, Bishop of Salt Lake City, and of the Right Rev. Camillus Paul Maes, Bishop of Covington. Bishop Scanlan was born in Ireland in 1843, and studied at All Hallows College, where he was ordained priest in 1868. In 1870 he was made pastor of the Cathedral in San Francisco, but left three years later for Utah, the entire Territory being his parish. In 1887, he was consecrated Bishop of Laranda in Asia Minor and Vicar-Apostolic of Utah, and when the diocese was created in 1891, became first Bishop of Salt Lake City. Bishop Maes had borne the episcopal dignity for thirty years. Born in Courtrai, Belgium, in 1846, he was educated at the College of Courtrai and at the University of Louvain. Here he was ordained priest in 1868. Coming to the United States in 1869, he was attached to the diocese of Detroit until 1885, when he was consecrated Bishop of Covington. Bishop Maes was a member of the Board of Directors of the Catholic University and of the Catholic Extension Society, permanent president of the American Eucharistic Congresses and founder of Emmanuel, the monthly organ of the Eucharistic League. Besides the "Life of Father Nerinckx," Bishop Maes was the author of a number of articles on history and philosophy contributed to the "Catholic Encyclopedia" and to learned journals in America and in Europe. A man of the most winning personality, and a true priest of God, Bishop Maes will long be remembered with deep affection by his people. A third death is that of Very Reverend F. M. L. Dumont, S.S., S.T.D., president of St. Austin's College, Catholic University, Washington. The venerable Sulpician, who was a native of Lyons, France, had labored for more than forty years in the United States, endearing himself to hundreds of priests by his sanctity and strenuous work in the vineyard of the Lord.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XIII, No. 7
WHOLE No. 320

MAY 29, 1915

PRICE 10 CENTS
$3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE
The War: Bulletin, May 18, p. m.-May 25, a. m.—Events in the East—Other Items—Italy and Austria—Demands and Concessions—War Declared. Germany: Food Problem — Trade. Great Britain: Ministerial Difficulties—Recruiting Laborers. Mexico: Food Riots. The Netherlands: Resuming Relations with the Vatican 165-168

TOPICS OF INTEREST
Athletics and Health—The Young Man and Steamship Transportation—Murder and Sentimentality—More Anglican Misrepresentations—In the Midst of Life—Corpus Christi...169-176

COMMUNICATIONS
Wasted Money—Some Troubles of the "Defenders of Liberty"—That "Raffle for Souls"—Prohibition—Ye of Little Faith.....176-177

EDITORIALS
Our Boys — A Convent Girl and the Paris Fashions — Clean-up Week — The Cuckoo Controversy—Ancient Carrion—The Ladies and the Law Court—Agreeing to Differ.....178-181

LITERATURE
The Catholic's Bookshelf: Mr. Gilbert K. Chesterton's "Orthodoxy."

REVIEWS: Dante's Divine Comedy—The Spell of Flanders—Prehistoric Man and His Story—The Eagle of the Empire—Grocer Greatheart—Daybreak—Bramble-Bees and Others.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: Cardinal Mercier's Pastoral on the Papacy—"The Growth of English Drama"—"Vanishing Roads"—"In Hoc Vince"—"Tolerance" — "Vida Popular San Vicente de Paul"—"The Earthly Paradise"—"Doodles"—"The Mad Knight"—"Miralda"—"Little Bird Blue"—"Favorite Fairy Tales Retold"—"Vorwärts — "A Book of Answered Prayers" — A Bundle of Pamphlets.

BOOKS RECEIVED 181-185

EDUCATION
The Catholic Summer School.....185, 186

SOCIOLOGY
The Indian Problem.....186, 187

NOTE AND COMMENT
Father Gavisk President of the National Charities Conference—Anti-Catholic Paper Loses in Suit—Catholic College Orators Win—Laws Not Enforced—Education for the Home—Pilgrimages and Sacred Relics—The Pity and Horror of War—The Decline of the Saloon—Some Consequences of the European War—A Protestant Rebuke for Bishop Burt.....187, 188

CHRONICLE

The War.—The advantage of the week's fighting in the west, while it has not been very great, has been almost entirely on the side of the Allies. North and east of Ypres the Germans have been making continuous efforts in mass formation to break the British lines, but apparently have had but little permanent success. Heavy losses are reported from both sides. Further south the British have retaliated and driven back the Germans toward La Bassée a distance of one mile on a front of two miles. North of Arras the French have added to their former gains and are now said to be in complete possession of the Lorette heights. At other points also the French claim successes, though not of an important nature. In the Champagne district and at Ailly indecisive engagements have taken place.

Bulletin, May 18, p. m.-May 25, a. m.

In the east the Russians have been trying to stem the victorious Austro-German advance. Battles have been raging throughout the two hundred and fifty miles that stretch from the Pilica to Czernowitz. Success is claimed for the Russians at the two wings. For it is said that they have checked the Germans in central Poland, and still further increased the proportions of their victory in Bukowina. Accounts of the disaster suffered by the Austrians south of the Dniester have been exaggerated, but their defeat has been serious, as they have fallen back from the Dniester and been forced across the river Pruth. Czernowitz itself is said to be under bombardment. In Galicia, however, the Austro-Germans are still pressing home their overwhelming victory. The Russians are endeavoring to make a stand on the river San and for the time being have been able to hold their own, but already their lines between Jaraslau and Przemysl have been pierced, though not broken, in several places. The large concentration of troops by the Austrians and Germans along the river, the active assault on the fortress of Przemysl and the fall of the strong fortress of Jaraslau, together with reports from Petrograd that hint at the possibility of strategic reasons counseling the further retirement of the Russians, make it not unlikely that the Russians will fall back to the vicinity of Lemberg. This move, it has been pointed out, might involve a Russian retirement to the Vistula in southern Poland, and another assault on Ivangorod and Warsaw. In the Baltic provinces success is claimed by both sides, but the Germans seem to have strengthened their hold on the territory already gained.

Events in the East

Other Items

The American note to Germany has as yet received no answer, nor has any official hint been given as to what will be its tenor beyond the resumption by Germany of the submarine activity which was suspended for a time after the sinking of the Lusitania. Switzerland also has decided to address a note to the German Government protesting against the loss of three Swiss lives when the great Cunarder was torpedoed. Switzerland is also mobilizing her army for the purpose of maintaining her neutrality. No very marked progress has been made by the Allies in the land attack on the peninsula of Gallipóli, although operations have not been discontinued. Fresh bodies of British and French troops have been landed on both sides of the Dardanelles, and some success has been gained in the southern portion of the peninsula. Maitos also, on the European side of the strait, is reported to have been captured by the Allies.

Italy has declared war on Austria. The events of the last week have followed one another with great rapidity.

A few days ago peace was still a possibility, now the hope of the continuance of Italian neutrality has gone forever. What precipitated the crisis was the tendering of his resignation to the King by Premier Salandra. Giolitti had been called to Rome by the peace party to use his influence against the war movement. Salandra urged on the King the acceptance of his resignation and the forming of a new Government. Popular demonstrations of protest of a violent character followed in many parts of Italy, proving conclusively that Salandra, and not Giolitti, had the confidence of the nation. Accordingly the King, having failed to induce either of his two choices to form a Ministry, announced, after forty-eight hours of suspense, that Salandra and his Cabinet, with Baron Sonnino as Foreign Minister, would continue in office. Although it is difficult to estimate accurately how far the popular demonstrations were spontaneous, they have effectively committed the people to responsibility for the war.

Italy and Austria

The Italian Cabinet at once proceeded to reject the concessions submitted by Austria on the grounds that they were both tardy and inadequate. Italy's demands, as appears from the Green Book, which was published on May 20 and contains the Italian account of the negotiations that have been going on between the two powers, were formulated at the request of the Austro-Hungarian Premier, Baron von Burian, by the Italian Foreign Minister Baron Sonnino in the beginning of April. They are as follows: 1. Cession of the Trentino with the identical boundaries of 1811. 2. Rectification of the eastern frontier in Italy's favor, including the cession of Gradisca and Goritz. 3. Trieste, including Nabresina, Capo d'Istria and Pireno, to be proclaimed an autonomous, independent State, Austria to withdraw her troops and renounce her sovereignty. 4. Cession of a group of the Curzolari Islands, including Lissa, Lesina, Curzola, Lagosta, Cazza, Meleda and Pelagosa. 5. Immediate occupation by Italy of the territories ceded and the evacuation by Austria of Trieste. 6. Austria to recognize Italian sovereignty in Avlona and sufficient of the hinterland for its defence. 7. Austria to declare its complete disinterestedness in Albania. 8. Austria to pardon and release political and military prisoners who are citizens of the ceded territories. 9. Italy to pay 200,000,000 lire (about $40,000,000) toward the refund of the national debt of the crown lands, etc., of the ceded territories. 10. Italy to promise neutrality throughout the war toward Austria and Germany. 11. Italy to renounce further invocation of Article VII of the Triple Alliance and likewise Austria's connection with the Ægean Islands.

Demands and Concessions

The Austrian concessions, the loyal fulfilment of which, had been guaranteed by Germany, were explained in detail by the Imperial Chancellor of Germany, Dr. von Bethmann-Hollweg at the opening of the Reichstag to be the following: 1. Part of the Tyrol inhabited by Italians was to be ceded to Italy. 2. The western bank of the Isonzo, in so far as the population was purely Italian, and the town of Gradisca likewise was to be ceded to Italy. 3. Trieste was to be made an imperial free city, receiving an administration which would insure the Italian character of the city, and to have an Italian university. 4. Italian sovereignty over Avlona (a seaport of Albania) and a sphere of interest belonging thereto to be recognized. 5. Austro-Hungary declared her political disinterestedness in Albania. 6. The national interests of Italians in Austria to be particularly respected. 7. Austria-Hungary to grant amnesty to political military prisoners belonging to the ceded territory. 8. The further wishes of Italy regarding the general question to be assured every consideration. 9. Austria-Hungary, after the conclusion of the agreement, to give a solemn declaration concerning the concessions. 10. Mixed committee for the regulation of the details of the concessions to be appointed. 11. After the conclusion of the agreement, Austro-Hungarian soldiers, natives of the occupied territories, shall not further participate in the war.

After the rejection of Austria's concessions, developments came quickly. A law was readily passed in both the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate, authorizing the Cabinet to declare war, which afterwards received the sanction of the King. The same day the Council decided to promulgate an edict calling all soldiers born between the years 1878 and 1895 to the colors. This edict, signed by the King, has been posted throughout Italy. It is expected that some 3,000,000 men will respond. All northern Italy was then put under martial law, also all the Adriatic coast, and the Adriatic Sea was declared closed to all vessels except warships. This did not, indeed, amount to a declaration of war, but it was the last preliminary step to such a declaration. Both Austria and Italy asked the United States to look after their interests in their opponent's country, and Germany made the same request of Switzerland. Everywhere matters were believed to have got beyond recall, but the German and Austrian Ambassadors refused to ask for their passports, although even they regarded the situation as hopeless. Austria hastily destroyed bridges at Ponte Caffaro and Ladrone, and skirmishes took place between Austrian patrols and Italian Alpine chasseurs along the frontier, especially at Montosso.

War Declared

At last Italy took the decisive step. On the afternoon of May 23, the Italian Ambassador to the Austro-Hungarian Government, the Duke of Avarna, handed to Baron von Burian, the Austrian Premier, a declaration to the effect that Italy considered herself in a state of war with Austria-Hungary. At the same time the Austro-Hungarian Ambassador at Rome was handed his passport. Shortly after the German Ambassador at Rome received instructions from Berlin to "leave Rome conjointly with the Austro-Hungarian Ambassador." Austria at once raided the Adriatic coast by air and sea, while Italy attacked Porto Buso. A good deal of interest attaches to the course Rumania will take, for it has been current rumor that an understanding had been reached between Rumania and Italy and that they would enter on hostilities together.

Germany.—For the present at least there seems absolutely no danger of a deficit in food. Not only are foodstuffs plentiful, but they may be had at reasonable prices. Hamburg restaurants, for instance, still offer a variety of dishes. For one mark 20 pf. (29 cents), a dinner can be had, consisting of soup, meat or fish, vegetables, salad and dessert; for one mark 80 pf. (43 cents), both meat and fish can be had. The "war" bill of fare differs from that of times of peace only in as much as foreign names for dishes are either eliminated or bracketed after the German terms. Thus Mayonaise has become Oelerirturke, Chateaubriand à la Jardinière has been changed into Rindlender Stück nach Gartnerart, beefsteak has become Ochsenstück, and sandwich has been converted into Herschaftliches Butterbrot. Berlin is not less original and patriotic than Petrograd. A recent bulletin of the American Association of Trade and Commerce gives important statistics concerning Germany's trade. In 1875 there were 4,568 merchantmen with 1,066,900 net registered tonnage; in 1914, 3,968 vessels with 3,257,981 net registered tonnage. The merchant marine has therefore decreased by 594 units—due principally to the elemination of fishing vessels, tugs, etc., from the class of merchantmen—but has increased by 2.2 million net registered tons. The average tonnage of the vessels has increased from 234 in 1875 to 821 in 1914. The period from 1875 to 1914 spans the time of frequent changes from sailing to steam vessels. In 1875 there were 299 steamships with a tonnage of 189,998; in 1914 there were 2,170, with a tonnage of 2,832,312; the tonnage of sailing vessels has decreased from 878,385 to 487,759. Six ports figure prominently as home ports for the merchant marine :

Food Problem

Trade

Port	Number of Ships	Total Gross Reg. Tons
Hamburg	1,466	2,969,700
Bremen	713	1,494,790
Stettin	156	150,675
Flensburg	90	112,250
Lübeck	54	78,892
Rostock	63	72,441

Thus these six cities are ports of ships aggregating approximately 4.9 million gross registered tonnage, while the total gross tonnage of the entire merchant marine reaches only 5,238,937 tons. The steel market has been suffering on account of the absence of skilled workers at the front. The majority of the plants are not able to continue operations in two shifts; arangements, however, have been made to add to the workers by recalling some men from the front. There is an added difficulty in a shortage of coal. The coal syndicate is making only sixty per cent. of the regular shipments; the demand for coke has increased, causing a reduction of the two million tons that were stored. Further difficulty is expected after September. General trade in glasses is brisk; in some departments of the clothing trade there has been a decrease, in others an increase; men pressers and cutters have been replaced by women, and there is no lack of workers. Cotton prices are rising; good cotton is now bringing 22 cents a pound. There has been a great increase in German made cosmetics. In 1901, Germany imported from France perfumes worth about $2,000,000. This importation has ceased and home-made products are now supplied in abundance to the market.

Great Britain.—What part of the clamor raised against the Ministry originates with men who have an axe to grind, and what part really expresses the conviction of the country that the Ministry has blundered and blundered badly, is not at present an easy matter to decide. There has been dissatisfaction, ill-founded, perhaps, but expressed in influential quarters, with the navy, and in particular with the recent operations in the Dardanelles. Given a dissatisfied and influential faction, it is but natural that Mr. Churchill, the Minister technically responsible for the conduct of naval affairs, should be marked for removal. Lord Fisher, against whose counsel, it is said, certain recent naval movements have been originated, has tendered his resignation as First Sea Lord, but there seems to be little probability that it will be accepted. Furthermore, if Lord Northcliffe and his party organs are to be given credence, Kitchener, the once popular hero, has proven himself unequal to the burden imposed upon him by the Government, or, as it is hinted, to the multitude of minor tasks assumed in the face of opposition by this noted destroyer of red-tape methods. The Times, while admitting "that reinforcements and shells of the right kind" were not provided, or at least not provided at the time when both were most needed, says that "the whole trouble arose because Lord Kitchener assumed a burden to which no man could be equal," and urges that, for the future, many of Lord Kitchener's activities be transferred to other agencies. Commenting upon the attacks made on Lord Kitchener, the editor of the Pall Mall Gazette writes, "We must stamp out this thing, even if a dictatorship has to be set up to do it." Mr. Garvin's language, probably, is purposely hyperbolic, and while England under a dictatorship strikes one as slightly humorous, there is no doubt, that should she come to this need, England has a dictator ready at hand in Kitchener of Khartoum. Speaking in Parliament, Mr. Asquith has announced, first, that no change in the Ministry would affect either himself or the Foreign Secretary, Sir Edward Grey; next, that the policy of the Government to prosecute the war "with all possible energy and by means of every available resource" would be retained; and finally, that any reconstruction of the Cabinet would be made "for the purpose of the war alone," and not as a political overture or compromise. "This," said the Premier, "is as far as I can now go." Rumor, however, has gone much further, and while dropping Mr. Churchill from consideration, has constructed several Cabinets, using the names of the Marquis of Crewe, the Marquis of Lansdowne, Mr. Arthur Balfour, Mr. Reginald McKenna, Mr. Bonar Law, leader of the Opposition, and Lord Reading. It is now reported that the personnel of the new Cabinet has been definitely settled, and that the names of the new Ministers will be published after Whitsuntide.

Ministerial Difficulties

Labor difficulties, besides giving rise to local disturbances, have, it is thought, seriously hampered the Government in its conduct of the war. In the opinion of many, by being too ready to listen to the clamor of the professional labor agitator, even in time of serious national peril, organized labor has not strengthened its cause. What with enlistment and strikes, the number of ordinary laborers has been reduced; others, however, hitherto unused to toil of this kind, have loyally offered their services. The Industrial Reserve, formed to assist in meeting the demand for laborers in the armament factories, has proved exceedingly useful. Few members of the Reserve merit the name of skilled workmen; many are frankly unskilled; but the majority have an aptitude for the work, which will soon make their services valuable. Oddly enough, the unskilled workmen are recruited from a higher social grade; the more useful or semi-skilled class being men who received some training in mechanical work in factories in their younger days. Women, too, are doing their part to relieve the scarcity of laborers. According to a report issued by the British Board of Trade, by the week ending April 16, forty-seven thousand women had expressed their willingness to engage in "special war service." About eight thousand have agreed to undertake work in the armament factories. The immediate demand for women in this work is not great, but from estimates submitted by some of the principal factories, it is thought that within the course of the next few months the required number of women employees will be upward of fourteen thousand. An apprehended scarcity of coal has caused the appointment, by Order of Council, of a special Commission to deal with this serious contingency.

Recruiting Laborers

Mexico.—During the week popular dissatisfaction over shortage of food culminated in several riots. Two thousand men, women and children joined in an outbreak in Hermosilla Sonora, and helped in the looting of shops. The middle class is now feeling the pinch of hunger acutely, the poor are crowding the streets of Mexico City begging for food. The International Relief Committee has purchased large quantities of cereals for distribution, but at this writing no satisfactory arrangements for transportation had been made. On May 21, when corn was being distributed to 8,000 people, the supply gave out before all were satisfied and in the scramble that ensued 250 people fainted. Meantime general conditions continue to grow worse; one despatch reads, "undescribably loathsome conditions prevail and the Government is powerless against bandits." On May 18 the German Chargé d'Affaires was attacked by outlaws and further troubles feared. Americans arriving at Vera Cruz from the capital confirm the worst reports, and predict greater evils. The chiefs are still battling furiously; first one, now another, announces a "decisive victory" over the enemy. Mexico's crucifixion is one of the great tragedies of history.

Food Riots

The Netherlands.—Important facts affecting Europe's present political conditions must have been met with recently to warrant the Dutch Government's sudden change of attitude regarding its official representation at the Vatican. Last February, the question of reestablishing the embassy to the Holy See was discussed in the Upper House of the National Legislature. The Dutch Hierarchy was reestablished by Pius IX in 1853, three years after this action had been made possible by laws passed under the leadership of the Liberal Premier, Dr. Thorbeck. In 1871, after the fall of the Papal States, the anti-clerical forces, under the plea that diplomats are sent to represent their countries at temporal courts only, withdrew the Dutch Minister at the Vatican. The Holy See, however, with the exception of a few years immediately after the Peace Conference, from which at the instance of the Italian Government, the sole representative of the Prince of Peace was excluded, has maintained a chargé d'affaires at the Hague. When, a few months ago, the matter was again brought to the attention of the Government, Dr. Loudon, Secretary for Foreign Affairs, explained the position of the Administration. He declared that conditions then existing were not such, in his opinion, as to make the matter urgent. The motives actuating other Governments were not applicable to the Netherlands, while precipitate action in sending an envoy to the Vatican might expose the Government's policy to misinterpretation. He added, however, that should changed conditions seem to call for a representative at Rome, the Government would interpose no objection. Toward the end of April, Monsignor Nolens was entrusted by the Government with an official mission to the Holy See, for the purpose, it would seem, of reestablishing diplomatic relations. Dr. Nolens is the leader of the Catholic party in the Dutch Parliament. Should his mission prove successful, Dr. Nolens, according to diplomatic usage, will be accredited as Dutch Ambassador to the Holy See.

Resuming Relations with the Vatican

TOPICS OF INTEREST

Athletics and Health

I SAID in the previous article on "Athletics in Our Schools" that the main reason alleged why educators are willing to accept and even encourage competitive athletics in our colleges and do much to stimulate their development in our high schools and even grammar schools is that they are claimed to be of great value for health. Everyone concedes that they distract the youthful mind from study, tire out the muscular system and therefore for an interval at least make mental application very difficult and besides take up precious time that used to be devoted to more serious purposes. Because of the advantage to health, however, all these disadvantages are overlooked or are supposed to be more than made up for; as a consequence we are in the midst of a wave of enthusiasm over school and college and university athletics.

Now the very curiously interesting reflection on this state of mind in educators or at least in educational authorities who have the right to regulate school policies in these matters, is that physicians not only do not agree with this claim of the benefit for health to be derived from athletics as at present practised, but actually condemn them as positively harmful to health. A typical summary of medical opinion may be found for instance in an editorial in the Journal of the American Medical Association published a year ago at the beginning of the spring athletic season (March 21, 1914). The Journal of The American Medical Association is the representative medical periodical of nearly 100,000 physicians in this country and they are our best educated and most progressive physicians. The Journal is known to be very conservatively edited and would not take the position outlined in the editorial unless it was felt that this represented the opinion of those who had the best opportunity to know most about the subject. The opening paragraph of that editorial will give an excellent idea of what physicians think of athletics:

> It is one of the numerous paradoxical facts encountered in every-day life that the problems of athletics rarely receive the attention of those who are most concerned with health, the supposed ultimate purpose of bodily exercise. The management of athletics is rarely found in the hands of a physician, by whose scientific guidance one might reasonably expect that the various sports would be enabled to effect the best of which they are capable and would be freed from the unconcealed dangers attending some of the present athletic practices. Athletics have, for the most part, to-day become the province of the people at large. It is the uneducated trainer rather than the physician, the hero-worshiper rather than the hygienist, who directs and inspires the performance of the physical exercises which ought to be undertaken primarily in the interests of a sound body and a sound mind. Games have developed into contests in which victory is sought at any human price. The "manager" is the foremost adviser, and the physician is called on as a last resource to mend the damage that may have been done in an ill-advised struggle for athletic supremacy.

The Journal then goes on to review certain recent investigations of the effects of athletics on the system. As everyone knows the heart is particularly likely to be affected, and there is the "athletic heart" with its increase in size so often likely to be followed by degeneration later in life. What few know, however, is that physicians have now found an "athletic kidney." The mechanical jarring and vibration of certain kinds of leg exercises—bicycling in the older days, running and football in the modern time, and particularly hurdling, high jump and the like cause kidney symptoms that are serious in their outlook. Needless to say anything that affects this organ is extremely important. Medical investigation seems to be just leading up to a like find with regard to "athletic arteries" which are noted in those who have taken part in exercises calling for extreme exertion. "An enormous volume of blood may be driven into the arteries in a very brief period. In contests of long endurance the final outcome is a prolonged and unrelieved fall in blood pressure, with an increasing relaxation of the fatigued cardiac musculature. Heart, kidneys, arteries, these three constitute the vital tripod, yet athletics seem to affect all of these three supports of vitality unfavorably.

The Surgeon General of the Navy has for some years now constructed tables with regard to the effect of athletics upon the men of the navy. Here the statistics ought to be reasonably accurate and significant. All the men that enter the Naval Academy are prime as regards health and strength, and comparison between selected groups of them is fair to all. After their entrance a further selection of the very healthiest and most active is made and these become members of the various teams. They represent the flower of the health and strength of the cadets. After their years of training, if athletics made for health, it might be expected that these naval athletes would in subsequent life have almost perfect health. The Surgeon General has found, however, that on the average the athletes die younger; during the twenty years after their graduation they have to have more sick leave; they sooner become less capable of doing the ordinary every day duties of the navy than the non-athletes. In every way though this group of men started with a decided physical advantage over others that advantage is not only lost, but a distinct disadvantage to health results from their attention to athletics.

Above all, competitive athletics are hard on the heart. There is first, the immediate effects of severe muscular strain on the heart; second, the effects of training and a series of severe athletic contests on the heart mechanism, and third the ultimate effects in the subsequent life of an individual, of alterations brought about in the heart through athletic contests in early life. These manifold effects were studied recently by two physicians of Madison, Wisconsin, as the result of the frequency of disturbing heart conditions, and even serious pathological changes among the men participating in the competitive sports at the University of Wisconsin. Their conclusions are that athletic training leads at first to physiologic hypertrophy or enlargement of the heart. but when prolonged and marked by severer athletic contests it leads commonly to dilatation as well as hypertrophy and this is often accompanied by insufficiency of the valves. The reason for this is that the over-stretched muscle structure is larger than the valves. They even found that such a distended heart seemed actually to be more of an advantage in carrying a man through a severe athletic contest than a normal heart would be. A slightly leaky heart seems actually to accommodate itself to the very severe strains put on it by athletics better than one of which every valve holds tight. The only trouble is that acute cardiac dilatation with serious and even fatal conseqences occurs more frequently in athletes and men used to severe muscular strain than in normal men, and the ultimate effects are more prolonged and severe.

No wonder then that their final conclusion is that there is reason to believe that for normal human activities an athletic heart is distinctly disadvantageous.

There are other phases of athletics in the schools and colleges which have recently been discussed by physicians. It is pointed out for instance that the moral advantages of athletics are much exaggerated. Sometimes men are kept from gross indulgences by their fidelity to training, but the motive of their fidelity is low and the end of training is sometimes marked by an orgy of excess. It is also pointed out that in reformatories, athletics often do good for the weak, badly nourished young fellows who come from cities without ever having had proper exercise. Exercise, however, does no good in modifying the character or the conduct of lusty youths, especially those of the second generation in this country who have good physical constitutions and yet exhibit such a lack of control that commitment to reformatories is often necessary.

It is evident then that whatever else may be the reason for which athletics are being encouraged in our schools and colleges it can no longer be said to be for health. Health is but an excuse. The real reasons remain to be seen. Undoubtedly that itching for publicity which is such a typical characteristic, but such an unfortunate tendency of our time is the principal reason. There is no easier way to get into the public prints than by means of athletic contests. The same amount of publicity in any other way is very costly. Educational authorities, however, seem to be ashamed to confess openly—they often do so privately I know—this itch for publicity, however, and so other excuses are offered. After health the principal reason given for athletics is the moral advantage or the ethical gain to be obtained from athletics. As education is or ought to be meant quite as much for the development of character as for the instruction of the intellect this should be an eminently appropriate reason. It is never so much emphasized as the health excuse, however, and I think it is rather easy to show that athletics are even less calculated to give manly standards of conduct than to improve health. On the contrary they emphasize some of the most undesirable traits of the modern spirit of success at all costs as the one object in life. That subject will be discussed with some citations from authorities in a subsequent article.

JAMES J. WALSH, M.D., PH.D.

The Young Man and Steamship Transportation *

IN the several departments of great modern steamship companies, there are positions to meet the tastes and talents of a variety of young men, positions which are interesting in the constant novelty of the work, refreshing in their daily variety and fascinating in the large interests involved. Opportunities for congenial employment are limited solely by a young man's taste; his success solely by his energy and ambition.

In the financial department, of course, he will be expected to understand bookkeeping and the auditing of accounts. In the legal department, he will become familiar with unique forms of admiralty jurisprudence unknown to the Common Law, with international treaties and regulations, insurance policies, collision claims, salvage and "general average" adjustments. In the passenger and freight traffic departments, the study of customs revenues and tariffs will interest him, embracing the transportation of men and merchandise from one end of the earth to the other. In the engineering department he will, while the ships are in port, live "on board," or in the repair yards, being closely associated with that consummate product of technical skill and manufacturing efficiency, the modern steamship, with its problems in naval architecture and marine engineering as to hulls, engines and boilers. In the operating department, he may choose to learn, and then to superintend, the stevedoring and stowage of cargoes; or to assist the port captain in providing crews, stores and supplies for the succeeding voyage. Or, if he care for the invigorating life at sea, he may wish to work up on shipboard in five years' time, from quartermaster to captain and commodore, studying seamanship, navigation, astronomy and geography. Or, if his penchant is mechanical, he may desire to 'go-below' in the engineroom and advance, in the same period of time, from oiler to chief engineer.

Into whatever branch of the service he may enter, the novice will soon find his environment is in itself educating in the sense, inter alia, that travel and association with travelers and with fellow-workers engaged with him in a variety of occupations, are said to be educating. And, too, it may be said that, if the religious and military orders be excepted, no other kind of organization demands of its subordinates such exacting discipline. "Ship discipline" is proverbial; and, generally, it is carried, along with the ship's papers, into the office.

*The thirty-third of a series of vocational articles.

Naturally, in such work, the personal requirements are as varied as the posts filled. But perhaps the predominating essentials are those of an administrator and an executive, although there is little of any sort of talent that is not utilized somewhere in the different departments of these large and strenuous public-service enterprises. In particular, however, must a successful steamship manager possess energy, and be ready to labor long and hard at odd hours, for there is no telling at what time of the day or night a ship may be prevented by force majeure from arriving or departing on schedule. Also, he should possess an accurate fund of information regarding public needs, ability to feel the commercial pulse on the particular trade-route of his "Line." He should have breadth of view which, in large transactions is able to gauge future contingencies; a deep sense of responsibility which duly regards the extremely valuable property and the many interests at stake; and quick judgment in the sudden emergencies which frequently arise, making necessary the readjustment of best-laid plans gone "aft-agley." Invariably will the novice find his directors and managers real masters of men, of wide and ripe experience who, after long training, have unconsciously come to a habit of thinking and acting "subject to authority" and who quite realize the importance and magnitude of the stewardship of which they are accountable to hundreds of stockholders and thousands of employees.

GEORGE RUSSELL DILKES, JR.

Murder and Sentimentality

THE great revolt of the sixteenth century turned not alone from authority to license; it left reason for sentimentality. Now whether a murderess is hanged or fitted for the variety stage depends on her face, and the male cut-throat that goes to the chair has been utterly neglectful of the primary elections. A man who is hanged in the United States now is a fool, or his friends are careless.

God created man with a natural tendency to civil society, and He therefore gives him all the requisite powers for the preservation of that society; if, then, the preservation of society depends on the slaying of certain criminals, society has the right to slay them. In the opinion of most moralists the preservation of society does depend on the killing of criminals guilty of homicide; for homicide if unchecked will leave no security to the members of civil society and such society will disintegrate, and the only effective punishment either in threat or execution to prevent murder is the death of the criminal.

Those who favor the abolition of capital punishment cite statistics which show, they say, that after the abolition of capital punishment in various states homicides were less frequent. Capital punishment was abolished in Belgium in 1863; in Rumania in 1864; in Portugal in 1867; in Holland in 1870; in Switzerland in 1879 (in fifteen of the twenty-two cantons); in Italy in 1889 (in Tuscany in 1859). There is no capital punishment in the following states of the German Empire: Prussia, Saxony, Oldenburg, Weimar, Baden, Anhalt, Brunswick, Nassau, Würtemburg, and Bremen. It is not inflicted in Venezuela, Brazil, Colombia, Ecuador, and Costa Rica; and it was abolished in Michigan in 1847; Rhode Island in 1852; Wisconsin in 1853; Maine in 1857; Kansas in 1907, and in Minnesota and Washington. In the Minnesota legislature last year bills were introduced to prevent the catching of frogs and to provide that lumberjacks be furnished with individual bathtubs; the Kansas legislature considered bills prohibiting the use of face powder, hair dye or bleach, the piercing of ears and the wearing of earrings; this kind of mean shallowness is common in American legislatures, and legislators capable of it can be made very sentimental by a speech against capital punishment.

Those opposed to capital punishment tell us that in Italy during the decade before the death penalty was abolished there were 16.7 murders to the 100,000 inhabitants, but in the decade after the abolition there were 11.2 murders per 100,000. Belgium had 921 murders from 1853 to 1863; then capital punishment was abolished, and from 1863 to 1873 there were only 703 murders. Rhode Island without capital punishment had only 7 murders between 1866 and 1875; while Connecticut, with capital punishment, had 28. Maine had 253 murders between 1867 and 1887, the year in which that State ceased to inflict death, but between 1887 and 1907 she had only 162 murders.

These statistics, however, do not take into account even a part of the factors that should be included. The United States, with capital punishment for eleven crimes, but which is not enforced, has an annual murder rate of 6,597; Italy with no capital punishment in 1906 had 3,606 murderers to try, and if she had as many inhabitants as the United States, Italy would have had over 8,000 murders in that year. Italy and England have the same number of inhabitants, yet in 1906 Italy had 26 times the number of murders England had. England has twice as many inhabitants as Spain, but Spain has four time as many murders as England, and both have capital punishment. Race, geographical position, and other factors enter into these differences. The Belgian murder rate may have been higher from 1853 to 1863 than in the succeeding decade because in the first decade Europe was nearer the social upheaval of 1847. Italy from 1878 to 1889 was nearer the disorder of 1870; today Italy next to Hungary is the Cain of the human family, and the abolition of capital punishment has not blunted her stiletto. The reason Connecticut has more murders than Rhode Island is largely due to the fact that Connecticut has two and a half times as many inhabitants as Rhode Island, and several more large towns. Maine has relatively more murders than Connecticut.

The murder rate in the United States for the decade ending in 1911 was for 11 eastern cities, 4.5; for 7 central cities, 8.1; for 3 western cities, 9.6; for 9 southern cities, 15.7. The murder rate for Milwaukee was 1.9; for Philadelphia, 3.9; for Boston, 4.7; for Manhattan and the Bronx in New York City, 5.4; for Chicago, 8.8; for San Francisco, 11.3; for Louisville, 16; for New Orleans, 23.1; for Memphis, 52.7. In 1908 the relative murder rate for the North Atlantic States was .04 per cent., for the South Atlantic States 4.3 per cent; for the North Central States, 1.4; but for the South Central States. 9.2 per cent. The relative suicide curve in the norther hemisphere is always this:

	U. States per cent.	Russia per cent.	Europe per cent.	Japan per cent.
Spring and summer	62	60	59	59
Autumn and winter	39	40	41	41

The homicides follow a similar curve. Sun irritation is a cause for these curves, and for the increase in the homicide rate as we go south in the United States.

A lax application of the laws in the United States is adduced as a reason for the high murder rate here. In 1908 there were 247 murders in Chicago and 145 in St. Louis, but only two of the 392 murderers were put to death. For the past twenty years in New York State of every 500 murderers 5 were executed, 90 were sent to prison, and 405 were acquitted. It is difficult to secure conviction where there is question of the death of the criminal. England in 1891 convicted 76 per cent. of its non-capital cases, but only 33 per cent. of its capital cases. Holland with no death penalty convicted 80 per cent. of its murderers during the past decade, Belgium 76 per cent. In 1911, in London, where they have the death penalty, 27 per cent. of the murder cases were convicted; in Manhattan Borough of the City of New York only 8 per cent. were convicted; London had 22 murders, Manhattan Borough, not a third as large, had 148.

The death penalty in itself has in certain conditions signally failed to prevent crime. Between 1749 and 1771 England hanged 109 men and women for shop-lifting alone. For six centuries England inflicted death for almost every crime in the code, in 1820 there were 222 capital crimes in the red list. Men and women were hanged for draining a fishpond; for stealing a shilling; for chopping down a tree; for cutting a hop-bind. Under Edward I a man was hanged for burning coal within the limits of London, and 103 hangings followed the Lent Assizes of 1783; yet England had as many criminals as any nation in Europe. Desperation from oppression, and familiarity with death, as in war, breed contempt for all punishment.

This is really not an argument against capital punishment. Executions inflicted even as weakly as they are in the United States are certainly preventive of many murders; and if the judgment were left to a board of competent men instead of the present ignorant, emotional, jury, doubtless capital punishment would be a more effective deterrent. The term effective is gravely misused of late. The deterrent effect of the sanction of a law should not be effective in a physical sense, but only in an emotive sense. It needs to be deterrent only in so far as it is in itself sufficient to induce a rational will to observe the law; and secondly, in the sense that there is a teleological proportion between the reward or pain consequent on the observance or violation of the law and that observance or violation. A sanction is not to be effective in the sense that it inhibits impulse, or overwhelms voluntary action. Within the last half-century we have lost a clear notion of volitional action, and substituted therefore what is erroneously called a scientific view. This scientific notion is that motives and sanctions are supposed to be inefficient, false, useless, if they do not infallibly produce a physical effect. All causality is now likely to be interpreted in term of mere physical causality. Christianity, for example, is called a failure because its appeals do not coerce the human will into subjection. A number of grave gentlemen, who should be wearing motley, have so discoursed since this present war overwhelmed the world. Christianity that forced men into subjection would not be religion at all. Man's chief merit as man is in his power of volitional activity; only brutes are effectively moved in the scientific sense.

AUSTIN O'MALLEY, M.D.

More Anglican Misrepresentations

THE Church Times of London, informs its readers that "it has just been decided at Rome that soldiers at the front may make their communions without being fasting"; that "priests who are acting as stretcher-bearers or hospital attendants, may say Mass daily in any decent place or even in the open air," and that "soldiers who have not time to confess, may receive the absolution collectively and be admitted at once to Communion, on the understanding that they shall confess later when they have the time. But the validity of the collective absolution is not conditioned by the fulfilment of this duty."

Thus the Church Times. Let us see now what Rome said on the matter. With regard to the soldiers its words are: "They may be admitted, servatis servandis to the Holy Eucharistic table per modum Viatici." It is true that those who so receive Holy Communion need not be fasting; but it is equally true, that the idea underlying the permission to receive in the way that the Holy Viaticum is received, is something very different from that which would be implied in a general concession of non-fasting communion.

As to the Masses to be celebrated by the priests in the hospital service, it is required that the place be, not only decent but also safe, and that there shall be no possible danger of irreverence.

Concerning the collective absolution, these conditions are required. Each one so absolved must make the act of contrition duly; the chaplains must explain to the soldiers that the absolution is valid only for those who have the proper dispositions, and that each is bound to make a full and complete confession should he come out of battle alive. This is something more than a mere "understanding that they shall confess." As for the words: "The validity of the collective absolution is not conditioned by the fulfilment of this duty." They are not to be found in the declaration of the Sacred Penitentiary. They are an addition of the Church Times, and an absurd one at that. The notion that the existence of an effect in the present moment can depend upon the fulfilment of a condition in the future, is incomprehensible. When the priest pronounces the words of absolution, the soldiers are either absolved, or they are not. If they fulfil all the necessary conditions at the moment, the absolution is effective; and the failure to carry out any resolution in the future can not possibly change that fact. Factum infectum fieri nequit. This is so obvious that we are compelled to suspect that once more the Church Times has been betrayed by its ignorance of Catholic matters it presumes to handle. What it had in its mind and would convey to its readers was, we suspect, the false notion, that once the soldiers are absolved from their sins in a collective absolution, the telling of those sins in an individual confession is no longer essential to the retaining of the state of grace. Should one determine to omit it, he would fail in fidelity only, but would not commit a grievous sin; and this false conception of the matter is apparently the origin of the substitution of "the understanding that they shall confess later" for the very definite words of the declaration of the Sacred Penitentiary.

But if the Church Times slips into blunders, its American counterpart, the Living Church, plunges into them with cheerful alacrity, quoting the Church Times under the heading, "Anglican Precedents Followed," and then adding these remarks:

> What is this but the application of Anglican principles in place of traditional Roman hardness?
>
> Fasting communion is much to be preferred; but where the choice must be between unfasting communion and no communion, choose the first.
>
> The accessories of worship are good; but the idea that there can be no celebration without precisely arranged altar and candles is—well, not Anglican.
>
> Collective absolution was legitimatized among Anglicans four centuries ago. If it is valid under one condition it must be valid under all.
>
> This new Roman rule does not mean a preference for unfasting communion nor for Eucharists in the open air, nor yet does it mean that private confession is hereafter to be tabooed. But by it Rome is simply following the tradition that was set by the English provinces four hundred years ago. It has not altered doctrine one whit; it has simply corrected a perspective.

Anglican principles in the matter of fasting communion are clear enough. Communicants receive into their mouths bread and wine and nothing else. They receive Christ in a heavenly and spiritual manner only, and the means by which they receive Him is faith. There is no reasonable connection between fasting and the receiving of bread and wine; nor can any be discerned between it and the faith by which the communicant lays hold of Christ. Fasting is a disposition of the body very suitable for those who are to receive Christ corporally into their bodies. The act of faith is in the intellect and the will, it is spiritual, and whatever union with Christ it produces is only spiritual. Hence the true Church of England has always looked upon fasting communion as superstitious, savoring of popery. Moreover, the principles of the Living Church and its party leave the choice in the matter to the communicants themselves. Not so the chaplains at the front. Catholics in such matters are accustomed to consult the supreme authority in the Church. Lastly, the soldiers who receive while not fasting, do so as if they were receiving the Holy Viaticum; as the Living Church would have seen, had it consulted the Acta Apostolicæ Sedis instead of trusting blindly to the Church Times. Holy Viaticum is not familiar to the Church of England mind; but should a clergyman of Church Times and Living Church principles after explaining it to a well-fed congregation, say: "Those who are fasting, will now receive communion in the ordinary way; while those who are not, will do so as if in preparation for death," we suspect there would be a shudder; there would be a general whisper: "What a dreadful man! How can he say such shocking things?" and the number of communicants would certainly be very small.

The Living Church has its own views as to decency and reverence in the offering of the Holy Sacrifice. It says very truly that "the idea that there can be no celebration without precisely arranged altar and candles, is not Anglican"; but it does not seem to be aware that the idea is, notwithstanding the decree of the Sacred Congregation of the Discipline of the Sacraments, very Roman, and that no priest would consider himself free by that decree from the obligation of having a proper altar, and of having lighted candles during the celebration of Mass. As to the "collective absolution legitimatized among Anglicans four centuries ago," leaving aside the questions, whether it was capable of legitimatization, and whether there was in the Church of England an authority able to legitimatize anything, we will merely point out that the so-called collective absolutions of the Book of Common Prayer are utterly different from that given to the soldiers. Besides the clergyman is yet to be found who, after "Dearly beloved brethren," for instance, admonishes the congregation of the dispositions necessary for the valid reception of absolution, and informs them that the absolution he is about to impart leaves intact the obligation, under pain of mortal sin, of confessing in detail all their grievous sins in the tribunal of penance.

The "new Roman rule," therefore, is anything but a following of "the tradition that was set by the English provinces four hundred years ago." One need not write to Rome to be assured that the Congregations in settling the matters submitted to them did not bestow a single thought on the Church of England. Moreover, their answers do not constitute a "rule," since they are concerned only with a particular case, neither do they give anything essentially "new," because they do no more than apply to the case in question, principles already venerable in the Catholic Church and the Roman Curia. If the Church Times and the Living Church are in good faith, one must conclude that the Anglican mind is singularly dense; if in bad faith, it is clear that High Church Anglicanism must be on its deathbed, since such means are used to keep a spark of life in it.

HENRY WOODS, S.J.

In the Midst of Life

IN the midst of life?

Read the following entries from the diary of Abbé Felix Klein, Chaplain to the American Hospital Ambulance:

> Very few deaths just now; only two or three a week. One this morning from that awful tetanus, from which we have been spared awhile, thanks to injections of serum. The soldier who died to-day was a poor lad of twenty. His kind American nurse always called him by his Christian name. I followed her example. The parents came from the country, arriving two hours late. They were set on seeing him again, and so we gave way, after telling them that they must on no account kiss him. I held the poor mother by the arm as the sheet was lifted. Thank God he still looked cheerful, even happy: Mon pauvre petit, dire que c'est toi! mon pauvre petit, mon pauvre petit! We knelt down and recited the Our Father. I could add nothing to "Thy will be done." The father tried to slip two francs into the nurse's hand, while the mother told of her last gift to her child, "a beautiful waistcoat which I had knitted myself, and which he wrote kept him nice and warm." They had expected the worst, and so they had brought a linen sheet from their home, a fine new sheet, in which to take him home. But that, of course, could not be allowed. Poor people—they understood and submitted at once, both of them, first to the inscrutable will of God, and then to the man-made rule.

This is one of a hundred moving-picture vignettes written from day to day by the kindly, large-hearted priest, who possesses what is so rare in a Frenchman of his type, an excellent working knowledge of English. Again and again he says kind words of the British soldier and the British officer. Thus one of the early entries in his book, that made on September 7, 1914, runs:

> At last our work has begun. We received this afternoon ten English wounded. One of them had been shot in the throat, another had a foot crushed. Others were wounded everywhere—in their arms, in their legs, in their bodies. Every one of them, with the exception of a poor wretch who was suffering from acute appendicitis, was gay and light-hearted. Some of them complained laughingly that they had not had their clothes off for weeks, or a good wash since they left England!

And a few days later:

> I was called up to an English soldier. They called me too late. He was already dead; also he was an Anglican. I saw that from his identification token (C. E., Church of England). But I blessed his poor body and accompanied it, praying for his soul, to the mortuary chapel with the nurse and the night watchman. As we went along, they put out the lights so as not to distress the other patients. But in the corridors the lights were turned up, and I was glad of it, for the passing of a human soul is not a leap from the light into darkness. When we reached the chapel we found another Englishman there, who had died during an operation. He was there alone, and I prayed for his soul also.
>
> This morning I gave absolution to a poor fellow from Lyons. He has very little of life, for his brain is bare and half his body is paralyzed. But he still has all his wits, and he can answer "yes" and "no" to questions put to him. His face lit up when I came to him and tears came into his eyes. . . . In the afternoon I administered Extreme Unction to an unconscious dying Irishman. In his pocket-book was a letter fully addressed to his mother; we shall add a line or two, telling her that he received the Last Sacraments. That will perhaps soften the awful news.

The Abbé's diary gives many glimpses of the early days of the war, and one reads with intense interest the testimony, gathered in many cases from the lips of many since dead, as to the general behavior of the enemy. The writer is evidently trying to be entirely fair, and he gives the good which he hears as well as the bad. His first entry of the kind is very favorable:

> Several of our wounded speak of the honorable conduct of the German officers. One man said, "I was in a ditch wounded, incapable of moving. A German major came up and gave me some bread and coffee. He promised to come back in the evening, or, if he could not do that, the next day. But the night and the next day passed by. He never came back, and the time seemed very long. In the evening, however, he did come back. 'I did not forget you,' he said, 'but I was too busy.' Then he had me taken up and looked after properly." There are, however, other stories. There are pitiful tales like this: "My arm was broken. I was losing a lot of blood, and I crawled out of the trench as it were on three legs. They came along and stripped and robbed me."

By the first of November, All Saints' Day, there was gathered together in the chapel of the American Ambulance a congregation which, as the Abbé well says, typified the passage in the Gospel for that day, which speaks of "all nations, and tribes, and peoples, and tongues." In addition to the French, English and American nurses, there were present English soldiers, Scotch soldiers, Irish soldiers and Turcos, clothed, where possible, in their uniforms. Some had been carried in still in their bedclothes, others wearing dressing-gowns; some came on crutches. They had come from every part of the entrenched line; from Dixmude, at the one end, had come an Irishman; from the Vosges, on the other, a Chausseur Alpine.

> Contrary to what we have always thought in France, we found the English very lively and animated. Perhaps because the war is so very close to each one of us, and to those we love, we can not force ourselves to be more than resigned and brave. They go further, and are positively gay. What is that young officer over there, who has just jammed down on his head a French infantryman's cap? He is an English lieutenant. Who are those soldiers, who are hopping about the corridor on their crutches and their wooden legs? Englishmen too. La Bruyère once said, sadly enough, that one must learn to laugh without being happy, or one may come to die without having laughed.
>
> When I ask these wounded Englishmen how they are, they always say, "Getting on splendidly." Yesterday I spoke to a man who had just had his leg amputated: How are you this morning? "Splendid, thank you!" Have you any news from home? "Yes, a letter from my mother." Does she know that they have had to take off your leg? "Yes, and like me, she thanks God that my life has been saved."

Many of the most interesting passages of the diary would only lose by being summarized. They include a most striking series of letters written by young Frenchmen, describing the first sight of mobilization in a French garrison town, together with accounts taken from combatants of more than one famous engagement. All these make most interesting and, indeed, pathetic reading.

B. BELLOC LOWNDES.

Corpus Christi

THE difference between Corpus Christi and all the other feasts of the liturgical year surely must be that in this festival heaven has come down to us, and we think of God not as dwelling afar off, or invisible to us, but as abiding with us; the Heavenly King throned day and night in the tabernacle; the Friend, the intimate, ever-waiting near: "My delight is to be with the sons of men." This must be the predominant thought of Corpus Christi, a thought that moves the faithful in some parts of Ireland to sing during the procession of the Blessed Sacrament the Christmas hymn "Adeste, Fideles," "Come and behold Him," for the veil that hides the reality is but a slight thing,

Faith our outward sense befriending
Makes the inward vision clear.

This divine condescension as of another Christmas is a note that is sounded throughout the whole Solemnity of Corpus Christi, and gives to the hymn at the canonical hours the tone of that tabernacling at Bethlehem.

All honor, laud and glory be,
O Jesu, Virgin-born, to thee:
All glory, as is ever meet,
To Father and to Paraclete.

If the Purification is the festival of the poor and aged, Corpus Christi is no less the festival of the children of the family. Nowhere is this more strikingly or more beautifully shown than in the antiphon to the Magnificat at First Vespers, a prayer which is unsurpassed in the profundity of its devotion and its child-like simplicity:

> O how sweet, Lord, is thy Spirit; for that thou mightest show forth the tenderness thou bearest for thy children, thou, with the most sweet Bread given from heaven, fillest the hungry with good things, and the rich, proud in the imagination of their hearts, thou sendest empty away.

So are gathered together the children of the Church around the Table of the Lord, sicut novellæ olivarum, "like the young olive trees;" so is heaven set down in the midst of a land of exile and a place of pilgrimage, from which there goes up daily, throughout the Pentecost season, the cry to Mary:

Lo, through a vale of tears we roam,
Sighing, we weep, oft-times we moan,
Eve's children exiled from their home.

The office of Matins, which is celebrated publicly only in collegiate and conventual churches, is one of the incomparable gems of the Roman Liturgy. The Invitatory is, so to speak, the motif of the feast. "Let us adore Christ, the King, who ruleth the nations: Who giveth fatness of spirit to them which eat of Him." In the hymn that follows, which is ascribed to St. Thomas, is a song of triumph.

Let this our solemn feast
With holy joys be crowned,
And from each loving breast
The voice of gladness sound;
Let ancient things depart,
And all be new around,
In every act and voice and heart.

The antiphons, the psalms and the lessons which follow are chosen to show the harmony between the Law, the Prophets, and the Gospel, regarding the mystery of the Eucharist, and in the sermon of the Angelical Doctor is summed up in one short sentence the thought of the whole Catholic world on this festival. "There is not, and never was, so great a nation, which had its gods drawing so near to it, as our God is to us." The whole office of Lauds is one song of praise, an exquisite blending of ancient psalmody with the poetry of the Catholic Church, extolling that Wisdom which came forth from the Most High. Sapientia ædificavit sibi domum: "Wisdom hath builded herself an house, she hath mingled her wine, and hath furnished forth her table, alleluia."

But it is in the Mass that the wondrous imagery and skill with which the Church has fashioned her liturgy are most striking. In the Mass the sacred chant combines with the liturgical words of praise to make a complete and perfect act of worship unknown before or since in the history of the world. As silver trumpets piercing to the limits of the universe there rings out the Introit: "He fed them with the fat of wheat, alleluia: and filled them with honey out of the stony rock, alleluia, alleluia, alleluia." And the choir takes up the refrain, as ripple after ripple spreads over the surface of a pool: "Rejoice unto God, our helper: sing joyfully unto the God of Jacob." In the Gradual and Alleluia-Verse there is again seen the parallel between the Old and New Testaments:

> The eyes of all hope in thee, O Lord, and thou givest them food in due season.
> V. Thou openest thy hand, and fillest with thy blessing every living creature. Alleluia, alleluia.
> V. My flesh is truly meat, and my blood is truly drink; he that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, abideth in me, and I in him.

The Sequence, composed by St. Thomas Aquinas himself, is one of the noblest poems in the Church's treasury of sacred Latin verse:

Praise, O Sion, praise thy Pastor,
Praise thy Saviour and thy Master,
High the choral anthems raise;
All thy utmost might it needeth,
For he all thy praise exceedeth,
Thou canst ne'er express his praise.
. . . . . .

Loud and solemn be our chanting,
Nor let joy nor grace be wanting,
In the gladness of the breast;
Let a solemn chant be raised,
While the Mystery is praised
Of the Holy Eucharist.
. . . . . .

Here beneath these signs are hidden
Priceless Things to sense forbidden,
Signs, not Things, are all we see;
Blood is poured, and Flesh is broken,
Yet in either wondrous token
Christ entire we know to be.
. . . . . .

Shepherd Good, true Bread and living,
Jesu, be to us forgiving;
Thou protecting, thou relieving,
In the land of all the living
Cause thou us all good to see;
Thou all-ruling, all-espying,
Feed'st us here till hour of dying;
There upon thy Bosom lying,
We with all the saints are sighing,
Fellow-heirs and friends to be.

The Procession of the Blessed Sacrament is the crowning act in this solemn homage offered to Eternal Reality veiled beneath the accidents of bread and wine. There is much of unbelief and materialism in the world, and if the Procession is to every Catholic an act of love, it is also a marching forth in battle array against every power of evil that lifts its ugly head against the ancient Catholic Faith. It is a sublime act of faith made in the face of a world that scoffs against every form of a belief in that which can not be evolved from the human consciousness. As an army with banners and spears, so this Christian army gathers itself about the altar. The King rides out beneath his canopy; the spearmen cluster round, while the way of the progress is strewn with scattered flowers. The clinking of the censers is faintly heard and the clouds of smoking incense arise as the chanters give their battle cry: Pange, lingua, gloriosi Corporis mysterium.

Of the glorious Body telling,
O my tongue, its mysteries sing;
And the Blood, all price excelling,
Which for this world's ransoming
In a generous womb once dwelling,
He shed forth, the Gentile's King.

And as this triumphal act of faith passes along on its solemn way the heart of the born Catholic is renewed again in loving memories, and to the convert comes an hour of proud service as of one called to the colors—for he has passed over from the hosts of error into the army of truth: it is a moment for which to live—and one for which to die. "Lauda Sion," "Te Deum," "Benedictus," "Magnificat," and many another are the songs that are poured out from grateful hearts on this day when God rides out borne in the arms of the priest. And when the Progress is finished and the King of High Heaven has blessed the children of His kingdom, there remains one last prayer, breathed in company with the great Doctor of the Blessed Sacrament:

Jesu, whom thus veilèd I must see below,
When shall that be given, which I long for so,
That, at last beholding thy uncover'd Face,
Thou wouldst satisfy me with thy fullest grace!

HENRY C. WATTS.

COMMUNICATIONS

Wasted Money

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It was my good fortune to be one of the sixty-eight persons who attended the second of the series of Laymen's Retreats given last year by the Jesuit Fathers at the University of Santa Clara, California.

A civil engineer of high standing in his profession, also a prominent officer of engineers in the National Guard of California, a leading physician of the Metropolis of the Pacific, a young legal practitioner and myself occupied seats at the same table in the dining hall. The three first-mentioned persons, as the phrase goes, "liked to talk," but, being men of ripe experience in the outer world, they, very properly, availed themselves but little of the privilege of conversation allowed by the "free time" periods of the Retreat. If they needed example in observing silence, it was given by the young attorney, who, being a devoted sodalist, knew the value of peace and tranquility during a spiritual retreat. Our close attention was given to the instructions, meditations, and other exercises of the Retreat, but following its close we discussed with much pleasure several topics of interest to Catholics, one of which was the extravagant and, from a Catholic standpoint, useless expenditure of money for floral tributes at funerals. Our conversation on this particular subject began while returning from a visit to the cemetery, a couple of miles distant from the University.

At the grave of the late James R. Kelly, for many years president of the Hibernia Bank, and for more than half a century Prefect of the Gentlemen's Sodality of St. Ignatius' Church, San Francisco, we remembered that, on the occasion of his obsequies, deservedly popular and highly-esteemed pioneer citizen that he was, the floral tributes of respect to his memory must have cost hundreds of dollars.

These floral tributes of respect to the memory of a most exemplary, upright citizen came from friends of every denomination, and beautifully symbolized the feelings of the donors and their tender sympathy for the bereaved family of the deceased banker.

But there was one particular token of remembrance presented to the latter, with which all the costliest flowers of the earth bore no comparison! It was an act of faith by the employees of the Hibernia Bank toward the soul of their beloved chief, which we, the engineer, the physician and myself, regarded as worthy of emulation by Catholics everywhere, especially by sodalities or members of other societies organized in the name of religion.

Instead of a costly floral tribute, the beauty and perfume of which would last only for a few hours, the employees of the Hibernia Bank presented to the family of the deceased a letter of condolence with the statement that they had arranged to have the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass offered twenty times for the repose of his soul!

What an edifying example! What a sharp contrast with the beautiful but simply pagan custom of piling up expensive floral tributes around the poor dead body that, in a few days, will rest in all the corruption of the grave? Can we Catholics not make an organized effort to amend, to some degree at least, this thoughtless waste of money that the etiquette and social amenities of modern paganism demand? My engineer friend, realizing the difficulties of such an undertaking, suggested that a society be formed with the title "Unknown Donors," and that suitably engrossed cards be presented to the surviving relatives of the deceased Catholic stating the number of Masses that were to be offered for his or her soul. The pastor, or other priest, by whom the Masses were to be celebrated might affix his name to the card before presenting it to the bereaved relatives. This is a subject of profound importance. I would like to see it discussed in your columns.

"Decoration Day" is approaching and, while I admire the custom of placing floral wreaths on the graves of our patriotic dead, the soldiers who fought under "Old Glory" and proved their loyalty to that revered emblem of our liberties, I should be glad to see the true meaning of the celebration expounded, so that the distinction between patriotism, or love of country, displayed in a fine form by the pagan people of Greece and Rome, and Christianity, or the love of Christ and His doctrines, may be shown its strongest and most impressive light.

San Francisco. A LAYMAN.

Some Troubles of the "Defenders of Liberty"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The amusing article on "Mrs. Nickelby and the Crozer Professor" prompts me to send you another specimen of Protestant "enterprise," as shown in the subjoined letter, which speaks for itself:

Syracuse. J.

NORTHERN CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE
ESTABLISHED 1841
$1.50 Per Year

HARRY E. WOOLEVER, Editor. 432 University Block Syracuse, N. Y.

We have received notice from the Third Postmaster General of the United States in which he indicates that it is obligatory for us to pay one cent postage on your Northern from now on unless you pay your subscription to at least within a year of the present date.

Under recent Postal regulations, it is necessary that no subscriptions be more than one year in arrears, if we are to enjoy the regular magazine rates of postage. However, we regret to trouble you about this matter. Your subscription has been allowed to run along in the belief that possibly it was not just convenient for you to pay the subscription when due or that it had escaped your attention. We shall be pleased to accommodate you in any way possible, but the Government insists that we observe this law and we believe you understand the circumstances.

You no doubt read the article in which we told of the Catholic attack on Bishop Burt of our Church, and therefore, you have some knowledge of the present attempt of Catholicism to dominate our country and overthrow our religion. You likewise know, without doubt, that the large daily papers are mainly controlled by the Catholics and that the Protestant religious papers are having trouble to meet the competition at this time. If the Catholics can crush out the church papers they have broken that one means of communication which gives us unity and makes us strong. Therefore, we do not want to lose a subscriber, for each one lost weakens our army. We are trying to make the paper of such interest to you and of such importance to the Church that you will give it your loyal support. An excellent picture of the Bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church is offered free to those paying a year's subscription in advance.

Enclosed you will find a statement of your account and your attention to this will help us in our fight for truth and religious liberty. If you could get some friend to subscribe, you would thus strengthen the forces of the defenders of liberty.

Trusting that we may hear from you by return mail and valuing any suggestions you may make concerning the Northern or that will extend its influence, we are

Yours very sincerely,
NORTHERN CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.
Per ———— Manager.

That "Raffle for Souls"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The article on the raffle for souls reminds me that I am in receipt of the following letter from Mr. Vedder:

CROZER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY
CHESTER, PA.
Department of Church History

MR. JAMES L. TOBIN,
505a Kosciusko Street,
Brooklyn, N. Y. JANUARY 29, 1915.

My Dear Sir:—I am sorry that I have been unable to fulfil my promise of giving you that name and address. I found that the man who sent me the paper is taking a furlough at his home, in one of the Southern States, and will not return to the field for several months; and I have been unable to learn of any one else who could supply the information you desire. I will keep the matter in mind, and if possible will put you in the way of obtaining this information.

Very truly yours,
HENRY C. VEDDER.

Nearly four months have passed since this communication reached me, and nothing further has come.

Brooklyn. J. L. TOBIN.

Prohibition

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In his latest communication Father Lambing suggests as a solution of the liquor question, "permitting manufacturers of liquor to sell or deliver to licensed retailers only." In other words this former apologist of prohibition methods would now leave us just where we are, save that he would abolish clubs, and endeavor to prevent intoxicants being carried into homes. What an extraordinary anti-climax!

Your correspondent also thinks that I "may" be too hard on the police and the politicians, etc. This, of course, is a matter of opinion. He harps a good deal on my expression, "a fundamental human right," and evidently imagines that I am inconsistent in at the same time insisting on this "right" and affirming that if anybody particularly desired it I would prohibit altogether the manufacture and sale of the more fiery intoxicants. But let me recall to Father Lambing's memory the admonition of the logicians: Distingue frequenter. If he will but distinguish in this instance he will easily see the point. My general proposition may be restated thus: Our Divine Lord changed water into wine, and He chose wine as one of the two creatures by means of which His Presence is perpetuated on earth. Whence it follows that any Christian who holds it to be morally wrong to drink wine is either incapable of reasoning or a Pharisee.

Now, wine is a beverage containing alcohol, in a greater or less degree, whence it follows that there is no moral obliquity associated with the consumption of a beverage just because it contains alcohol. But while this is quite true, yet the State has a right to specify, when the legislature may deem it necessary, that no beverage may contain more than a certain percentage of alcohol, and thus, indirectly, prohibit the manufacture, for example, of the stronger liquors.

There is little in Mr. Fitzgerald's letter to detain us. He admits that in the South prohibition does not prohibit, but adds that it is all right in the West. To which I reply that I shall require more proof of this claim than his mere assertion. The manner in which he misconstrues my quotation relative to Kansas sufficiently demonstrates the desperate lengths to which he will go in search of any sort of defence of an untenable position.

To sum up the entire subject, therefore, and for the last time asking the indulgence of your readers on this subject, I have failed to find in the communications of prohibitionists to AMERICA, during the present discussion, any serious argument against the principle that there is nothing morally blameworthy in the use of alcoholic beverages, whereas, on the other hand, Our Lord's example and the numerous passages of the Sacred Scriptures quoted by those correspondents who adopt my point of view, are conclusive evidence to the contrary. Prohibition, at the present time, is merely the last refuge of the sects which have allowed most of the essential doctrines of Christianity, one by one, to escape them.

Harrisburg. HENRY MAURICE.

Ye of Little Faith

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Having read in your issue of April 17, a short article headed "Ye of Little Faith," which referred to certain persons in America who were advocating the "control of births," it may be interesting to your readers to give them an account of the writer's personal experience of the effects of such unnatural conduct.

About thirty years ago I started life as a shopkeeper, and when about a year in business got married. The "lady next door" displayed the greatest interest in our general welfare and in a confidential conversation with my wife one day informed her that she regarded a large family as a great hardship, at the same time making a certain suggestion. My wife replied indignantly that in our Church we regarded such conduct as murder, and needless to say the suggestion was never again repeated. We lived beside this family for a number of years and were naturally anxious to learn what would be the ultimate result of the extraordinary ideas of marriage held by the worthy couple "next door." Well, they had two children, a boy and a girl, the favorite family I understand with many of their class. We saw those children grow up from childhood to maturity, idolized by their parents and possessing many admirable and attractive qualities. They were also most obedient and attentive to their father and mother. At last they obtained important commercial appointments and were likely to be of great assistance to their parents, but both took suddenly ill and were buried within a few months. Their father died shortly after and their mother is at present a desolate and wretched creature, without any apparent hope or consolation. Seeing all this it occurred to my wife and myself that God's ways are best and that any interference with His eternal decrees is bound to have disastrous results. Well may AMERICA say "Ye of Little Faith," for those only are happiest who place themselves in God's hands, accepting everything with resignation and gratitude which He deems best for their temporal and eternal happiness.

Dublin. P. T. D.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, MAY 29, 1915

Entered as second-class matter, April 15, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN;
Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Contributions for the Mexican fund may be sent direct to AMERICA.

Our Boys

THE challenge has been issued, who will accept it; the gauntlet has been thrown down, who will pick it up? A thousand, ay, ten thousand, one hundred thousand boys throughout the country are awaiting an answer. They have made known their need; they must have exercise and recreation. The congested homes of a great city furnish no opportunity for either; the streets of a metropolis offer no facilities for one or the other; there are few suitable Catholic club houses; non-Catholic associations abound on all sides. What is the boy to do; forego his exercise and recreation? That is a heroic act. Refuse to join a non-Catholic club? He does refuse and falls into greater temptations on the streets or elsewhere. What is the boy to do; join the non-Catholic club? He does so and finds himself in an atmosphere that menaces his faith.

Catholic boys, what a picture many of them present! Needing care most of all, they get the least care of all. Their sisters are surrounded by a thousand and one safeguards, too many at times; the boys are overlooked; they are the pariahs of the flock, disnatured torments to some, puzzles to others, a care to very few of those to whom sheep and lambs without distinction of sex were committed. The consequence is writ large on many a court record. After school days the problematic creature, boy, is left to evolve as best he may; only too often he evolves into a criminal. Scores, more than that, hundreds, of them, Catholic by Baptism at least, are in reformatories and refuges, witnesses not so much of evil as of neglect.

The challenge is issued; the gauntlet is down. What is to be done? Ignore the facts, and the problem grows. Theorize over methods, and still the problem grows; Work for the boy and the problem becomes less acute.

It is an odious thing to fix blame for present conditions. The blame is not on one or two sets of shoulders; fix it, those who care for such work. Ours the task to appeal once again to our Catholic laymen to help our Catholic boys. The boys are willing; they await the outstretched hand, the kindly word. The outstretched hands are few; the kindly words, scarce. Yet the boys are pleading for both, so too is the Ozanam Association. What answer will Catholic laymen give? The challenge is for them; the gauntlet is at their feet.

A Convent Girl and the Paris Fashions

"CONVENT life," confesses Miss Frances Starr on page 174 of a recent number of the Theatre, "has always appealed to me. The longing to spend a fortnight in one of them was always strong. When I read the play 'Marie Odile' and Mr. Belasco decided that I should play it, the longing to live for a time in a convent was augmented by what I believed was the actual need for it. I hated to come away and I shall assuredly go back."

"And, the reaction upon yourself?" queried Ann Archibald, the tireless interviewer. "I am sure it gave me a different outlook. It cleared my vision of some of the complexities that dim our eyes and made me see things with the simplicity of concentration."

Doubtless the diction of Ann Archibald is here at fault, for Miss Starr can hardly mean that these dimming complexities made her see things with the simplicity of concentration. However, this may be, among the objects which, after her stay in the convent, Miss Starr beholds with the simplicity of concentration, are frocks and shirtwaists from Paris. "I find them fascinating," she says on page 216 of the Theatre for April. "I do really think there were never so many models to have, especially for the young and slender. Here are two frocks from Henri Bendel's. And aren't these French shirtwaists things of beauty?" prattles this lover of concentrated simplicity and convent-life. Miss Starr, it should be noted, is by no means a neutral person, for "one of the duckiest of her frocks is of Belgian blue," and she always purchases her raiment from "those who import from Paris." Defending this custom, "she offered," reports Ann Archibald, "one argument among others, small but telling—the ingenious way in which the long cuffs of one of her shirtwaists were fastened. Buttonholes, six or eight, ran along the edges, links of pearlshaped buttons, joined by twisted strands of silk went through the buttonholes," as is the manner of our most approved convents. "Miss Starr was all enthusiasm for the present trends," concludes the faithful Ann Archibald, "and she did rather point her argument."

If this enthusiasm for Parisian modes is the result of a fortnight in a convent, it is suggested that Messrs. Worth and Bendel add a religious house to their already interesting establishments. From an internment therein, prospective customers might not gain a particularly deep insight into the religious life, but their eyes would be opened, as were Miss Starr's, to the beauty of ducky frocks of Belgian blue, and of shirtwaists, marvelous confections of Parisian art.

Clean-up Week

ABOUT this time the wise householder will sweep the street before his establishment, for this is "clean-up time." Matter has an unpleasant way of putting itself in the wrong place, and matter out of place, someone has said, is dirt, and dirt is both unsightly and unsanitary. There is nothing vague about clean-up week. It means you; it is a direct appeal to you, to sweep and garnish your own premises, making them a delight to the artistic and to the medical eye. "Never mind your next-door neighbor," is the advice of the clean-up man, "but sweep the ashes from your own hearthstone."

This is the era of the great clean-up. Our social life needs cleaning up, so do our political activities, and our morals, it is thought, would be the better for a good scouring. Hence the rise of the professional reformer, the improvement leagues, the national conventions of allied social and moral agencies, all hot on the trail of public and private iniquity. Their common purpose is admirable, but the methods of many are futile. Men are not reformed in the mass, but as individuals, and they are not reformed at all, except through the power of religion. Yet religion plays no great part in the counsels of a majority of these reformers.

The man who invented clean-up week was a true philosopher. He knew the value of an appeal to the individual. He knew that the mass is reformed by perfecting its constituent units. He knew that sermons on sweetness and light are poor substitutes for soap, water, and elbow grease. Catholics, as well as the professional reformers, may learn wisdom from the clean-up man. The fact that there are sixteen million Catholics in the United States, will not mean very much until, by adopting the method of the clean-up man, each individual has made himself a real not a nominal Catholic. "Sweep the ashes from your own hearthstone." And do it now.

The Cuckoo Controversy

"THE cuckoo came to London yesterday, a full week later than his usual date of arrival," wrote a correspondent of the London Times on April 28. An assertion like the foregoing annually starts a heated controversy in the British press. No sooner does some one publish a rash boast of having seen or heard the earliest cuckoo than correspondents from all parts of the United Kingdom bombard the papers with skeptical, reminiscent, statistical, patriotic, ornithological, or indignant letters. From Kent, for example, will arrive a communication throwing doubt on the Londoner's veracity, for the cuckoo has not yet been heard in Kemsing where he invariably appears first. But a Suffolk squire finds the recorded coming of the bird credible enough, for he remembers hearing one singing in the Metropolis on April 16, thirty-nine years ago. Then a Sussex correspondent sends an array of dates indicating the day the cuckoo was first heard in his county each year since 1789. An Isle of Wight sonneteer forthwith contributes some lines attesting that the eyes of all true Englishmen grow wet at the April cuckoo's call, a close observer then writes from Malling Abbey about the delicate shade of difference between the bird's May and July notes, and innumerable letters pour in charging this or that correspondent with inaccuracy, stupidity or worse. After the controversy has gone on for a month or more the editor impatiently announces, "We can publish no more letters on the cuckoo," and writes a leading article reviewing the alleged facts and giving his opinion of their significance. Thus the epistolary quarrel ends for that year, but is sure to start once more the following spring.

In this country, unhappily, we have nothing like the English cuckoo controversy. Though some of our rural weeklies may record in isolated paragraphs that "Mildred Perkins," for instance "found the first pussy-willow of the season yesterday;" or that "Mrs. Stephens gathered a bouquet of arbutus on April 25;" or will even hazard the statement that "a robin appeared in Sunny Valley two weeks earlier than last year," and that the "frogs have been peeping in Miller's Meadow with unusual vigor considering the cold May we have had," nevertheless there is seldom displayed anything like the Englishman's excitement over the arrival of spring's harbingers. As for a long and bitter quarrel starting in our metropolitan papers regarding the date of the bluebird's first appearance in a city park, it is not precisely an annual occurrence. Our lack of contentious enthusiasm for nature-study is perhaps a grave national peril. Let the consuls see that the State take no harm therefrom!

Ancient Carrion

IF Mr. Edwin Davis Schoonmaker has been correctly reported by the New York press, he does not believe in static monogamy. Kinetic monogamy, however, meets his approval, provided each successive choice of a mate be authorized by true "love." This is the morality flowing down from that fountainhead of our civilization, the divorce court; it is likewise the morality attributed by some naturalists, if memory serves, to the elephant and a few other beasts. This comment does Mr. Schoonmaker's alleged principles no injustice. In his eyes, "love" is but a carnal instinct, identical in brute and man. "The one thing we must learn about sex-matters is that the individual must do as he chooses."

This is no new philosophy. Nightly its peripatetic teachers recruit their pupils in the city's purlieus; day by day, pupils and teachers form ghastly schools in our "Morals Courts," our jails, our hospitals, our asylums.

So has it been from the day when veiled Thamar sat in the crossway leading up to Thamnas; and before. So shall it be to the end, with all who open their ears to the cry of the beast within, and work in their bodies, as St. Paul says, that which is filthy.

Mr. Schoonmaker is but serving his readers with ancient carrion; as old as sin and as unwholesome. One wonders why this fetid mass of corruption should be thought so new, so important, so uplifting, by the New York Tribune as to be heralded by headlines extending across four columns of the "Woman's Page." Does this vileness appeal to the women who read the Tribune? Or does the "Woman's Page" of this journal, along with similar departments in many an American newspaper, need a new editor? The Tribune has preached eloquently on the immorality of "tainted advertising," but still conducts its "Woman's Page" on the theory, apparently, that what most women want is carrion.

The Ladies and the Law Court

IN the good old days, before the fox trot happened on us or the womenfolk discovered that it was incumbent on them to live their lives in their own way, it was generally accepted that a woman's place was in the home. The doctrine is open to more than one interpretation, and its application might vary in the degree of its rigidity, but if there is one place more than another the outside of which is the best side for woman to be on it is the law court. For the law court, strange as it may sound, is not run as a species of municipal vaudeville.

In a law court, which might be situated within a hundred mile radius of New York, a particularly unsavory case was up for trial. The judge, with a fine sense of the fitness of things, remarked that some of the evidence might be shocking and said if any of the women or girls present did not wish to hear scandal they might leave the courtroom. The hint, strong as it was, was not acted upon, and the women and girls remained. There is but one inference to be drawn from the incident; the women who attended the court did wish to hear scandal, and, if the press reports be correct, they had their desires fulfilled.

Trial by jury in the open court is the most fair and upright method of legal procedure the world has ever witnessed, but that it should be taken advantage of by women, impelled by indecent curiosity, to listen with ears wide open and mouths agape to the unmentionable details of a sordid case, is something to make the "mere man," "sit up and take notice." It is the boast of Americans that their womenfolk exercise a greater influence upon public opinion than do the women of any other nation. But it yet remains to be seen whether any woman has benefited her generation by having her ears tickled with the indecencies of a case which the judge himself felt constrained to call "shocking." If woman cannot be convinced that her place is in the home let her at least be persuaded that it is not on the inside of a law court.

Agreeing to Differ

"I REPEAT and insist on it, and that settles it; 'The number of stars is odd.'" "Well, if you will not listen to reason, I most emphatically disagree with you. Any and every school-boy and school-girl is well aware of the fact that the number of the stars is even." You need no vast amount of experience to tell where this conversation took place and what stage it had reached. Think a moment. Didn't this tremendous discusion upon the exact calculation of the stars happen recently to someone, not known to you? Do you wish to read a communiqué on the subsequent history of this famous encounter? The combatants went down into the trenches, surrounded themselves with barbed-wire entanglements and discharged shots at random into the impenetrable darkness that lay between the opposing lines.

Of course, the only purpose of these mobilized disputants was to safeguard and advance astronomy. Imperialism never goes unmasked. It is taking up the white man's burden, or spreading culture or upbuilding civilization or abrogating peonage or nailing up the flag or modestly seeking a place in the sun or obeying the dictates of manifest destiny. These are the inspiring words emblazoned upon the banners which float above the wars of imperialism. So above the conflicts of controversy, truth, science, progress, amelioration of mankind, spread of enlightenment are the heralded mottoes, while all the time, below the clash of man with man, there rages a sub-conscious duel where personalities parry and thrust until after a time the paramount claims of astronomy yield to mutual accusations of asininity.

But why not be content to let insoluble questions remain unsolved? In the realms of fashion, whatever may be said of the monotony and ugly uniformity of men's head-gear, no fault can be found with the beauty and perpetual variety of bonnets. You are rather pleased that the outside of another's head is unlike yours, why should you feel like a submarine, cruising around to discharge a torpedo, because someone has not made the inside of the head like yours? Why should the holding of an opposite opinion constitute a perpetual grievance. To a burglar bars are a challenge, burglar-alarms an insult, and safes a constant menace to his content, but normal individuals pass by a bank without any impairing of their appetites. Who was it that advanced the theory that the complexion of our colored brethren is only an enlarged freckle, become conterminous with the corporal superficies, instead of beautifying the tip of the nose? The imperialistic tendency of freckles was developed in torrid zones. Is it not equally imperialistic to stretch an idea so far as to wish to have all minds draped in the dull hues of that one idea? Would you think of wishing to impose your Ethiopian views on a Caucasian friend unless you, like the original African freckle, were at the moment inhabiting a torrid zone?

"The number of stars is odd!" "The number of stars is even!" Very well, let them be so! Let the mercury not rise over the difference. Imitate the thrifty farmer who wouldn't allow his son to use the parlor thermometer for taking the outside temperature through fear of wearing out the tube. The wear and tear of human thermometers, subject to variations in heat, is much greater. "We agree to differ" is a phrase which puts its maker among the benefactors of mankind. It supplies a foretaste of the milennium where the lamb lies down beside rather than inside the lion, to which the lamb in rougher days would be assimilated. Bring submarines to the surface; let the snipers climb out of the trench, we agree to differ, instead of trying to reduce one another to the likeness of death and dust. Husband and wife, parent and child, brother and sister, man and woman, everybody, have you heard the good news? "We agree to differ." Come in and sit down to dinner. "We agree to differ," is a sweet, melodious, harmonizing dinner-bell.

LITERATURE

The Catholic's Bookshelf

MR. GILBERT K. CHESTERTON'S "ORTHODOXY"*

PERHAPS the most notable English book of this century is Mr. G. K. Chesterton's "Orthodoxy." It is notable as a comprehensive epitome and striking arraignment of the anti-religious thought of the day. It is notable as a human document detailing the process of a typically modern mind from agnosticism to Christian truth. In this respect it bears an analogy to Newman's "Apologia pro Vita Sua." Newman's work narrates the painful process of a sensitive soul from the defective Christianity of Anglicanism to the fullness of Christian doctrine. Newman's "Apologia" is typical of the nineteenth century. Chesterton's work sketches the process of a militant mind from the darkness of agnosticism to the light of Christianity. Chesterton's "Orthodoxy" is typical of the twentieth century.

Both seek the fullness of truth against odds. Education, environment, association, hold and retard them. Newman pushes through cautiously, painfully, fearfully, slowly, in anguish of heart and agony of mind. Chesterton smashes through boldly, combatively, swiftly, exulting in the strife of battle and the satisfaction of the issue. Neither is satisfied with the half truth; both are profoundly avaricious of the whole truth. Newman keenly feels the sacrifice he is making; Chesterton knows no regret; he loses nothing and gains everything. Newman felt the pangs of martyrdom; he was tearing up his life by the roots. Chesterton relishes the shock of conflict; he is glad to tear up his life by the roots.

Another notable characteristic in "Orthodoxy" is its method. In no sense is it scholastic. It eschews any formal treatment. Indeed I imagine that Mr. Chesterton has no sense of scholastic method at all. This is well. If "Orthodoxy" had been written after the manner of a formal treatise, it would have been gathering dust on the booksellers' shelves these several years. It is a popular exposition of truth, and properly follows the popular way of putting its arguments. Mr. Chesterton meets his opponents with their own weapons. It may be said that he is fighting the devil with fire, only in his hands it becomes celestial fire.

The antagonists of Christianity, up to within a few years ago, monopolized the popular field. Paradox, epigram, wit, humor, ridicule, sentiment, passion, audacity, what not, have been the instruments used in propagating their doctrines. Mr. Chesterton jumps into the arena and worsts them at their own game. He is as audacious as they are. He outparadoxes them, flashes epigram after epigram in their dazzled eyes, pours subtle ridicule upon them unsparingly, lashes them with his wit and drenches them with his humor. It has been said that he is too brilliant; a champion of truth should go more soberly. The trouble has been that the champions of truth have gone so soberly and ponderously that the enemy outdistances them. The race may be not always to the swift, but in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred it is. In the popular arena the tortoise has no place. Even if Mr. Chesterton be too constantly brilliant, at least he is not open to the charge of ever being dull.

In spite of its brilliancy "Orthodoxy" is a profoundly serious book. It essays to do two things, though Mr. Chesterton modestly declares that it is merely the transcript of his personal adventure in discovering Christianity. It is this and something more; it is a smashing defense of Christianity as a complete philosophy of life against the modern onslaught. Mr. Chesterton pursues with vivacious keenness the various turnings of modern thought to their ultimate lairs, which prove to be dens of utter darkness. The mechanical theory of the universe he traces to the madhouse. The materialist has shut himself up in the dingy dungeon of matter. He reduces all thought in the last analysis to the whirr of cogs, and himself a cog in the fatal clockwork. It is a simple and complete philosophy, as simple and as satisfactory as that of the inmate of Bloomingdale who thinks himself a chicken and goes about crowing. To be a cog is simplicity itself; all you have to do is to keep on cogging; and the universe, a series of cogs, is only an endless reduplication of the same ultimate simplicity.

The naturalistic explanation of the universe is not only lunacy, but it is the suicide of thought. In the name of thought it attacks religion and denies authority to vindicate reason. Having put authority out of the way, reason begins to question itself; the naturalists proceed to doubt the faculty of knowledge and end in the wildest skepticism. We cease to know that we know. The universe a machine, reason strangled by its own doubt, morality collapses in the void. The smash is complete. Modern thought makes the world a madhouse, wrecks reason on the rocks of skepticism and breaks freedom on the wheel of scientific fatalism. Here is the absolute bankruptcy of life, and life is all the time running furiously counter to all these negations. Here is an explanation that not only does not explain but actually ends in the banality that there is no explanation.

Discovering that modern thought constantly led him to a series of barren negations, and realizing all the while that life as constantly demanded fixed and positive foundations, if it were to be lived at all, and seeing that the purpose of these onslaughts was always the destruction of Christianity, Mr. Chesterton began to wonder if there were not perhaps something in Christianity which was fundamental with human needs. For if the assaults upon Christianity were really assaults upon the fundamentals of human living, then Christianity and human living must have some strange affinity or even identification. Christianity was assailed on all sides and for all contradictory reasons. Sifting the contradictions he found that they annihilated each other and left Christianity intact. In storming the citadel, its enemies destroyed each other. The paradoxes of Christianity he found to be the paradoxes of life. Christianity was the key to the lock and the only key. Human living demanded authority or it was lost. Reason unsupported by authority immediately tottered on its throne. Freedom without reason began at once to be spelled into fatalism. Christianity alone supplied authority, defended reason and safeguarded freedom. In attacking Christianity modern thought found itself driven to attack all three, and in attacking these it swept away the foundations of life. Examining the case from the historical side, he found that Christianity was always on the side of the sanities of life and the heresies on the side of the insanities.

*The second of a series of critical papers about books that should be in the educated Catholic's library.

Mr. Chesterton tells us that he set out seeking to discover the truth, and at the beginning of his quest he imagined that he could find the truth as some remote island in the sea, of which he might be the proud and happy discoverer.

> I have often had a fancy, he tells us, for writing a romance about an English yachtsman who slightly miscalculated his course and discovered England, under the impression that it was a new island in the South Seas. . . . I am that man in the yacht. I discovered England. . . . I am the man who, with the utmost daring, discovered what had been discovered before.

He set out to discover the truth and discovered Christianity.

I have said that Mr. Chesterton is brilliant; he has the brilliancy of the adventurer and he has all his courage to boot. He is a man who is unafraid and, like all brave men, he hates a sham. When he fights he fights furiously. His enemy is there to be killed, and he runs him through to the heart as every honest fighter must. He spits him on his weapon without vindictiveness, but heartily. The sham philosophies of the day he calls sham without scruple and proves them so. He is no respecter of follies, even though they be garbed in purple and fine linen. He characteristically declares:

> The vast and shallow philosophies, the huge syntheses of humbug, all talk about ages and evolution and ultimate development. The true philosophy is concerned with the instant. Will a man take this road or that?—that is the only thing to think about, if you enjoy thinking. The æons are easy enough to think about; any one can think of them. The instant is really awful; and it is because our religion has intensely felt the instant that it has in literature dealt much with battle and in theology dealt much with hell.

No book of the age has so summarily, boldly and effectively challenged modern thought with its silly shams, its pitiful absurdities, its crude logic, its sterile negations and its abysmal emptiness. "Orthodoxy" tells us no new truth, but it does set forth the old truth in a splendid way. It is novel in its method. For that we may be thankful. A champion of the truth should not go into the battle with rusty armor or with antique weapons. Mr. Chesterton's is a sword of flame, and the Prince of Darkness is mortally afraid of fire.

CONDÉ B. PALLEN.

REVIEWS

Dante's Divine Comedy. Translated by HENRY JOHNSON. New Haven: Yale University Press. $2.50.

It may be that the ideal translation of the "Divina Commedia" is yet to be written, but that of Henry Johnson, of Bowdoin College, just published by Yale University in commemoration of the six hundred and fiftieth anniversary of Dante's birth, is the best that has yet appeared in English. Though in verse, it is almost as literal as that of Norton in prose. And it has this rare quality, that the English is simple, both in choice of words and in construction, so that it reads smoothly and with few of those inversions and complex syntactical knottings that make many literal translations more of a task than a pleasure. Professor Johnson has wisely turned the terza rima of the original into blank verse. Dante's hendecasyllabics, with their triple rimes féminines, are an exotic in English and, as Cary says, "often totally unmanageable." Prose serves well enough for the student, who cares more for the precise meaning than he does for the form, but it can convey no idea of the beauty of a great poem, and the "Divina Commedia" is, first of all, a poem, a pure work of art, and only secondarily a treatise on theology, philosophy, politics and morals. Blank verse, then, seems to be the medium proper to such a translation.

Professor Johnson handles his blank verse well. It is true that here and there the meter halts a little, but the limping is so rare that it can easily be forgiven. He has rendered the original almost line for line. This accounts for the occasional inversions and involved constructions, for it would be impossible to follow the original, which has many intricate passages that are difficult to unravel, without transferring some of these knots into English. It is, however, astonishing to see how often and with what skill the translator has turned these Dantesque tangles into perfectly clear English. The translation with which it challenges comparison is, naturally, Cary's. Johnson has succeeded, where Cary often failed, in finding just the English word that precisely expresses the Italian. A typical example is in the rendering of Purg. III, 78-85:

> Come le pecorelle escon dal chiuso'
> Ad una, a due, e tre, e l'altre stanno
> Timidette, atterrando l'occhio e il muso;
> E ciò che fa la prima, e l'altre fanno,
> Addossandosi a lei s'ella s' arresta,
> Semplice e quiete, e lo'mperchè non sanno;
> Sì vid'io muovere, etc.

which Johnson renders:

> As sheep that come forth from the fold by ones,
> By twos, by threes, while all the others stand
> Timidly holding eye and nose to earth,
> And what the first one does the others do,
> Huddling so close to her, if she but stop,
> Silly and quiet, and they know not why;
> So saw I move; etc.

Cary's version is:

> As sheep that step forth from their fold, by one,
> Or pairs, or three at once; meanwhile the rest
> Stand fearfully, bending the eye and nose
> To ground, and what the foremost does, that do
> The others, gathering round her if she stops,
> Simple and quiet, nor the cause discern;
> So saw I moving, etc.

The differences are all in Johnson's favor. His "huddling close" is a faithful rendering of addossandosi, which Cary's "gathering round" is not. But Johnson, in translating Inf. V 137: Galeotto fu il libro e chi lo scrisse, has not ventured to do what Bryan and Cary did, try to convey the occult meaning of the name Galeotto. He translates: "Gallehaut was the book, and he who wrote it." Byron's "Accursed was the book," etc., will not do at all. Cary's

> ". . . The book and writer > Both were love's purveyors. . . ."

is nearer the true meaning, but "pander" is the right word if the name is to be translated at all. It is really an untranslatable phrase and needs a note of explanation.

Professor Johnson has abstained from any notes, probably because there is already such a multiplicity of editions copiously annotated. He has done wisely, also, in leaving the Latin quotations untranslated in the text and in giving the translations in an appendix. Yale is to be thanked for publishing this version of the "Divina Commedia" in the language of to-day, for from it the English-speaking world will get a clearer idea of the beauties of that unsurpassed poem than it has been able to obtain from any of the versions that have gone before. A. B.

The Spell of Flanders. By EDWARD NEVILLE VOSE. Boston: The Page Co. $2.50.

If the rest of the "Spell" series is as good as this it deserves high commendation. Just before the outbreak of the war Mr. Vose and three other Americans were "doing" Flanders, in a more intelligent fashion than is usually followed by tourists. They had planned beforehand to begin with the oldest towns and monuments, making Bruges, the first capital of Flanders, the center from which to visit Ypres, Nieuport, Dixmude and other villages that had been great cities when London was a townlet, and directing their footsteps chronologically, according to the foundation dates of the various objects of interest, to keep their history straight and "trace with their own eyes the gradual development of Flemish architecture and art." As they went along, whether on foot or railroading at will on a fifteen-day forty-franc ticket, they would observe with the interested but easy eyes of conscious amateurs, the towers, churches, bells, paintings, tapestries, sculptures, laces, wood-carvings, town-halls and quaint old houses, and study the people while drinking black coffee on the sidewalks. Happily they followed this admirable program, and what they saw and heard and otherwise acquired the author sets down with the fluent mastery of the born guide who knows both his subject and his audience. The history, arts, literature, industries and people of Bruges, Ypres, Courtrai, Ghent, Tournai, Mechlin, Antwerp and other towns of Flanders proper, from the twelfth century to the twentieth, are spread out in fascinating colors and fine proportion. The pervading good taste is equally notable in reference to Catholic matters, which necessarily figure large in any adequate picture of Belgian life or history, presenting therein a happy contrast to the "Belgium" of the London "Peeps at Many Lands" series, which is a bitter and ignorantly insular anti-Catholic tract. A good bibliography and index, and an excellent map facilitate the student's explorations, and some sixty fine illustrations, including an artistic Flemish cover, render the reader susceptible to "The Spell of Flanders." The text will bring him as completely under it as 500 pages may. M. K.

Prehistoric Man and His Story. By G. F. SCOTT ELLIOT, M.A., B.Sc. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Company.

The author of this volume has written a highly entertaining book, in simple language that can be understood by any person of ordinary intelligence. As was to be expected, the book is inconclusive, but not for that reason unsatisfactory. For, after all, the problem of man's origin belongs not to evolution, but to metaphysics and theology. Mr. Elliot appreciates this to some extent at least, and is driven to remark: "Common sense of mankind, whether in civilized or savage communities, draws an unmistakable boundary between the best animal and the worst man. But if we were to attempt to define this limit, we would at once be confused in psychological and metaphysical subtleties which, however diverting they may be, never seem to lead to a definite result." Here is the pith of the problem: the solution of man's origin lies beyond evolution, and evolutionists either will not or can not see their way to the final discussion. There is another admission, too, quite unusual in books of this kind, to the effect that the solution of every question discussed in the volume is always "a matter of probability." Such words disarm criticism and cause even a critical reader to blink at the numerous "might bes" and "may have beens" scattered over the pages. If the author had been more analytic in method he would have set forth many incongruities in the evidence offered for the ascent of man. For instance, on the evolutionary hypothesis, there should be progression in thinking powers, until at last the intellect blossoms full in man. Such, however, is not the case: some of the so-called lower animals show a degree of intelligence far superior to that found in the "higher" animals. It may be pointed out, too, that many a Southern negro, with his enormous feet, side-long shuffling gait, disproportionately long arms, receding forehead and chin and flat nose is physically inferior to the "reconstructed" Combe Capelle, Heidelberg and Galley Hill men, thus indicating that the "reconstructors" have overstepped themselves or else evolution falls down before a great difficulty. Many other lacunæ there are, too, but they have been discussed before in AMERICA. A critical reader lays aside the book more convinced than ever of the truth of the great Wasmann's words: "The higher we ascend in the systematic categories, and the more closely we approach the chief types of the animal world, the scantier becomes the evidence; in fact, it fails so completely that we are finally forced to acknowledge that the assumption of a monophyletic evolution of the whole animal kingdom of organic life is a delightful dream without any scientific support." R. H. T.

The Eagle of the Empire. By CYRUS TOWNSEND BRADY. New York: George H. Doran Co. $1.35.

Grocer Greatheart. By ARTHUR ADAMS. New York: The John Lane Co. $1.25.

Daybreak. By ELIZABETH MILLER. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.35.

"The Eagle of the Empire" is a tale of the last fighting days of the Emperor of the French. The author's picture of the great conqueror is a vivid one, his battle sketches are realistic, and he brings out tellingly not only the brilliance and glory of war, but the unspeakable horror of it all. The hunger, weariness and desperation of the rank and file during march and counter-march, attack and defence, leave on the reader's mind a strong impression not easily forgotten. The interest in the hero Marteau, who is a young officer in the Fifth of the Line, the "Terrible Fifth," as Bonaparte dubbed them, and the heroine, the Countess d'Aumenier, is sustained to the end. The description of the battle of Waterloo, which closes the tale, is very well done.

Arthur Adams in "Grocer Greatheart" tells of the adventures of a shipwrecked quintet in an unknown island of the South Pacific. There are a number of rather improbable situations contributing to form the plot, yet the element of surprise is cleverly kept up. The deciphering of the code that holds the secret to the treasure of the island is a bit far-fetched. Here and there Adams indulges in a deal of nonsense about reversal to the primal type, the cave-man, half-man, half-brute who, in the earth's early age, first "raised himself on his hind legs and knew himself lord of his cousins the beasts."

In "Daybreak" we have a weak story set in strong times. The period of Ferdinand and Isabella, the Spain of the Moorish wars, is poorly pictured by an unsympathetic writer. The spirit of the age, its Catholicism, the author fails to appreciate and, failing in that, there is not enough in the fiction of the narrative to hold any reader who has a passing knowledge of fifteenth century Spain. An inquisitor plays the rôle of "heavy villain," and the conventual life of the country is falsely described. G. C. T.

Bramble-Bees and Others. By J. HENRI FABRE. Translated by ALEXANDER TEIXEIRA DE MATTOS. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.50.

It is decidedly refreshing to turn aside from the wordy noise and hum of extravagant theorizers and tarry awhile with one who calls himself and really is a "translator of facts." For those acquainted with the works of J. Henri Fabre already published, nothing more need be said save to mention "Bramble-Bees and Others," this latest in the series of his translated essays. Readers of the earlier works will look for a manifestation of the same powers of keen observation, accuracy of description, charm of expression and sober, sane interpretation of facts. They will be in nowise disappointed. Vain, empty speculation he leaves to those who prefer thus to misspend their reasoning energies. He will none of it. His only prejudice seems to be in favor of truth. Everything must be weighed in the balance of facts. It may cost years of patient watching, but the author counts this as nothing, provided he is brought a little nearer the truth. When, after the work of years, his tiny insect friends refuse to answer the troublesome question "why," he is content to say "I do not know" with a frankness which is very engaging. They who seem to make it their chief concern to humanize the brute, elevating to the plane of intelligence the instinct so nicely adjusted by the all-wise Creator to the needs of the lower members of the animal kingdom, would do well to ponder upon the reflections of M. Fabre regarding this matter. They will hardly dare question his judgments, which are based in every instance upon facts extending over a wider range of years of observation and experiment than many of his readers count years of life. The book has been excellently translated.

E. P. T.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

R. & T. Washbourne, of London, have recently issued two pamphlets that Cardinal Mercier's admirers will be glad to read. The first is the official translation of his Eminence's Pastoral "On the Papacy" (two pence), which he addressed to the priests and people of his archdiocese on his return, last fall, from the conclave which elected the present Pope. The Cardinal writes a eulogy of Pius X, gives a discerning appreciation of Benedict XV, points out to-day's perils to Catholic unity, and shows that they are to be warded off by a general manifestation of greater loyalty to the Holy See. The other pamphlet, entitled "Cardinal Mercier: His Philosophical and Pastoral Work" (six pence), gives a brief sketch of the great Belgian Primate's services to learning and religion, describes the school of Neo-Scholasticism he founded at Louvain, enumerates his writings and furnishes a photograph of his Eminence.

"The Growth of English Drama," by Arnold Wynne (Oxford University Press, $1.15), gives the student details of plot, character and verse of the plays and interludes that led up to the finished Shakesperean plot. He has endeavored to give more complete information than can be found in Symond's well-known "Shakespere's Predecessors." His book presents side by side with criticism enough data to enable the reader to arrive at an independent judgment. Probably this is the only publication in which nearly all the plays of the "University Wits" receive separate treatment. As a result it is quite easy to study carefully here such men as Heywood, Udall, Sackville and Kyd and their influence on the development of the drama, and to follow from the beginning the evolution of the Elizabethan play. Mr. Wynne is at his best in his appreciation of Marlowe the greatest of all the University Wits, who by his poetic power rose above his fellows and touched the pedestal on which Shakespere stands alone.

Many of the essays in "Vanishing Roads" (Putnam, $1.50) give abundant evidence that the author, Richard Le Gallienne, is a hedonistic pagan to whom Christian morality, theoretically at least, seems to be an outworn superstition. He is fond of descanting on the sacredness of "Nature" with a capital "N" and on the folly of renunciation. There is a fair typist in the book whom he describes several times with enthusiasm. The critical and literary papers in "Vanishing Roads" are of more value than the essays on manners and men.——Florence L. Barclay has had published separately "In Hoc Vince" (Putnam, $0.75), a well-told story that appeared originally in "King Albert's Book." The tale, which relates how a Red Cross flag was made, is said to be true in its main details—but it is not worth seventy-five cents.

D. Manuel Cobrera Y. Warleta of the University of Valencia has translated into Spanish the valuable work of Father Vermeersch, S.J., on "Tolerance" (Herder, $1.45). The English version of the book was reviewed in our issue of April 19, 1913.——"Vida Popular San Vicente de Paul" (Herder, $0.50) is Father Pablo Simon's translation into Spanish of Mgr. Debout's little biography of the saint.——"Les Cloches des Morts" (Herder, $0.45) are some well-written reflections on the Church's solicitude for the dead by an anonymous author. The little book was written as a comfort to mourners, and the author died before it was published.——"The Earthly Paradise" (Herder, $0.15) by the Rev. John Henry, C.SS.R., is another of those useful little books on vocation. St. Alphonsus Ligouri's exposition of the advantages of the religious life is given and practical counsels are offered aspirants.

"Doodles" (Houghton, $1.00), a cheerful little lame boy, with a mocking bird for his pet and the famous "Polly" for his friend, is the latest creation of Emma C. Dowd, the author of the "Polly" books. As Doodles' character and adventures are somewhat like Polly's, her admirers will probably become his.——"The Mad Knight" and "Miralda" are new numbers of Benziger's Thirty-Five Cent Library. The first is an adaptation, for children, of a German version of Don Quixote, and the second, which is also from a German original, tells how a Cuban slave girl bought her father's freedom.——"Little Bird Blue" (Houghton, $0.75) is William and Irene Finley's interesting account of how two children reared an orphan bluebird. It was discovered, to the general amazement, that its dinners weighed more than the bird itself. The book is prettily illustrated from photographs.——In "Favorite Fairy Tales Retold" (McClurg, $0.75) Julia Darrow Cowles offers children twenty well-known fairy stories in a simplified form and with their ethical lessons emphasized.

"Vorwärts" (Allyn & Bacon, $0.80) is the significant title of a new German reader by Paul V. Bacon. Accepting the principle that the study of a foreign language should begin with reading, the author has written his "Vorwärts" as the simplest of readers for the youngest beginners of first year German. Simplicity and interest are happily combined with a clear, systematic treatment by example of the German syntax; and the readings are supplemented by "Questions and Exercises" that are well calculated to drive home the point of grammar under study, and impress the pupil's mind with neat, idiomatic phrases. Like "Im Vaterland," "Vorwärts" is a very attractive book, with poems, songs and many illustrations; and is full of interesting, instructive glimpses of every-day life in Germany. There is room for such a book in the schools.

"A Book of Answered Prayers" (Benziger, $0.45) is a naive and edifying account of how sinners, rocks and adamantine publishers have been moved by prayer. The little volume supposes in its readers a keen interest in all the author's doings.——"The Flower of the Field" (Benziger, $0.60) is a well-written book of meditations for young girls on the life of Our Lady from her birth till the death of St. Joseph. The Gospels, traditions and apocryphal works are drawn on for material, and practical lessons are driven home.——"Guiding Star for Young Men" (Society of the Divine Word, Techny, Ill., $0.50) and "The Child's Communion and Prayer Book" (D. B. Hansen & Sons, Chicago) are useful prayer-books. The first has, in an appendix, "Instructions for Young Men," by Father Mueller, and the second, which has been prepared by a Boston Sister of St. Joseph, is especially meant for little communicants.

Here are some five-cent pamphlets that have lately come to the reviewer's desk: "Shall I Be a Priest?" (Irish Messenger Office), by the Rev. William Doyle, S.J., which well sets forth to the young the dignity of the priesthood; "Catholic Echoes of America" (Catholic Truth Society of Pittsburgh), by Agnes Schmidt, who sums up in a sprightly dialogue the achievements of Catholic pioneers and patriots in America; "The Lay Apostolate" (St. Teresa's College, Winona, Minn.), by M. A. Molloy, A.M., Ph.D., a good paper, of which an abridgement appeared in AMERICA for August 22, 1914; "Missal Gems for Children" (Convent of Mercy, Los Angeles, Cal.), by Rev. Joseph O'Reilly; "The Holy Sacrifice of the Altar: Methods of Hearing Holy Mass; prepared for the daily use of school children," and "The Gospel of Pain," a good dissertation with literary embellishment on the mystery of suffering, by the Rev. J. M. Lelen (The Christian Year Publishing Co., Covington, Ky., $0.15 each), and a dozen five-cent pamphlets issued since the year began by the Paulist Press, of West Sixtieth Street, New York, and containing such attractive and varied titles as "The Catholic as Citizen and Apostle," "Philosophy and Belief," "Catholicism and Peace," "Darwin and Darwinism," "Mary, the Mother of God," "The Story of a Conversion" and "The Conventual Life."

BOOKS RECEIVED

Richard G. Badger, Boston:
The Smile of Mona Lisa. By Jacinto Benavente. $0.75; Maine in Verse and Story. By George A. Cleveland. $1.50.

Bobbs-Merrill Co., New York:
A History of Travel in America. By Seymour Dunbar. Four volumes. $10.00.

Doubleday, Page & Co., Garden City, N. Y.:
The Man who Rocked the Earth. By Arthur Train. $1.25.

E. P. Dutton & Co., New York:
The Interpretation of History. By L. Cecil Jane. $1.75. Jean Baptiste. By J. E. Le Rossignol. $1.50; Hermaia: A Study in Comparative Esthetics. By Colin McAlpin. $3.50; France in Danger. By Paul Vergnet. $1.00.

B. Herder, St. Louis:
The Life of Our Lord Jesus Christ in Meditations. By Maurice Meschler, S.J. Translated by Sister Margaret, O.S.B. Two volumes. $4.25.

Henry Holt & Co., New York:
The Limitations of Science. By Louis Trenchard More. $1.50; Home University Library: No. 91. The Negro. By W. E. Burghardt. No. 92. The Ancient East. By D. G. Hogarth. No. 93. An Outline of Russian Literature. By the Hon. Maurice Baring. No. 94. The Navy and Sea Power. By David Hannay. $0.50 each.

Houghton, Mifflin Co., Boston:
The Breath of Life. By John Burroughs. $1.15; Whither? Anon. $0.50.

The Macmillan Co., New York:
Alice and a Family. By St. John G. Ervine. $1.25; The Scarlet Plague. By Jack London. $1.00; College Life: Its Conditions and Problems. Edited by Maurice Garland Fulton.

McBride, Nast & Co., New York:
The German Army in War. By A. Hilliard Atteridge. $0.50.

John Jos. McVey, Philadelphia:
The Priesthood and Sacrifice of Our Lord Jesus Christ. By J. Grimal, S.M. $1.75.

G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York:
The Education of the Negro Prior to 1861. By Carter Godwin Woodson. $2.00; America to Japan. Edited by Lindsay Russell. $1.25; In Hoc Vince. By Florence L. Barclay. $0.75; Vanishing Roads. By Richard le Gallienne. $1.50.

EDUCATION

The Catholic Summer School

FOUR and twenty years ago a band of earnest men and women met at New London, Connecticut, to inaugurate a movement which has exerted a deep and wide-spread influence upon thought and life in America. This movement was the natural outcome of pre-existing conditions, yet the form which it has assumed presents features unique in our educational life. For years previous lyceums, debating societies, reading circles, had existed in many places. They arose to supply a need for general culture, were encouraged by pastors, given under the protecting shadow of the parish church and were regarded as an integral part of parish life. When, therefore, the suggestion was made that delegates from these various and scattered literary centers should meet at some convenient spot and hold a session in common, the response found expression in the meeting at New London. The session lasted four weeks. Its success was so pronounced that the devoted band determined on perpetuating the new institution by establishing it on a permanent basis. Ground was secured at Cliff Haven, N. Y., on Lake Champlain, three miles south of Plattsburg. Thus the Catholic Summer School of America came into existence.

THE PEOPLE'S UNIVERSITY

In origin and development the Summer School is an educational institution, yet it differs from any existing educational institution in nature, purpose and methods. Strictly speaking, our educational system embraces primary, academic, college and university training. Each of these departments fits into the other and prepares for the other, so that the child naturally and progressively passes from one to the other until, as a graduate from the university, he or she takes up the real work of life in the world. In this system so presented the Summer School finds no place; it stands apart. The reason is found in its nature and purpose. Our educational system covers the time of life familiarly known as "school days." Its aim and purpose is to train and develop youth. The Summer School, on the contrary, appeals primarily and directly to men and women who have passed through "school days" and are busied with the various avocations of life. In nature, therefore, it is a university of the people.

VALUE OF THE SCHOOL

That such an institution is a necessity in our times can not be questioned. We live in an age characterized by the remarkable and widespread diffusion of what is commonly termed knowledge. This so-called knowledge is varied in kind and quality. Commonly it is made up of opinions, very often false or misleading, and has little value for the real things of life. Thus an atmosphere is generated which exerts a bad influence on ideals and conduct. The persons who directly suffer are the men and women who live in the world, who read these opinions in the papers or hear them discussed at social gatherings, on the street or in places of business, yet have not the time for a careful and exhaustive examination into their truth or falsehood. Again many have leisure and the inclination to read on questions of the day, and yet are at a loss how to begin or continue a course of the kind. Besides there are many others who find time to continue their studies, who are doing excellent work in their own way, but want the stimulus which comes from contact and association with persons of like tastes and ambitions. For all these the Summer School is the meeting-ground where the right point of view on live questions is presented, the test for a true appreciation of values is pointed out and where intercourse with leaders of thought is an incentive to seek the better things of life.

METHOD OF THE SCHOOL

Hence the Summer School is called a school not in the strict meaning of the word as designating an educational institution where mind and will are trained and disciplined to correct habits of clear and sustained thought and conduct. It is a school in the wider meaning of the word, in that it is a preparation for life. Attendance there is a preparation for a better and more intelligent life as a Catholic and an American citizen. The class system is employed only incidentally. The ordinary methods for imparting knowledge are the lecture course, informal conferences and association. This was the plan of its founders, who secured for the Summer School a charter from the University of the State of New York in the department of University Extension. In this sphere it marks a phase of university life outlined and carried out by the great universities of the Middle Ages.

BENEFITS FROM THE SCHOOL

The Summer School therefore is an institution for general culture, not culture in the abstract but in the concrete, i.e., the culture required to lead a life of intelligent Catholic citizenship. Its aim and purpose is eminently practical. The subjects for the lecture courses are selected with the view to their bearing on the practical needs of life. The subjects are treated by experts so that the hearers may grasp the fundamental principles, obtain the correct point of view and the proper mental poise so necessary to face intelligently the real issues and problems of our day.

This is the nature and purpose of the Summer School. For a quarter of a century it has done its work, developing from small beginnings until it has become a great and powerful center of Catholic thought and life. Its success is due to the fact that our American people want such an institution and that in a measure it has supplied this want. As yet it is comparatively in its infancy. A great and ever-increasing power for good stretches out in its future. This is what impresses the thoughtful visitor—not its past or present, but its future; not its existence as a fact, but its possibilities.

JOHN T. DRISCOLL.

SOCIOLOGY

The Indian Problem

A STRONG "plea for justice" to the American Indian is made in Mr. Warren K. Moorhead's recent book on "The American Indian in the United States, 1850-1914" (Andover Press, Andover, Mass.). The volume is a calm but forceful presentation of facts, which speak louder than words. The spirit that runs through the book reveals a sincere desire and earnest effort to bring out the truth in its fulness. The author goes straight to the point, giving praise where it belongs and blame where it is deserved. The book adds another chapter to the long narrative of dishonesty and failure on the one hand, and poverty and disease on the other in our treatment of the Indian. The author's disinterested love for the welfare of the nation's wards was his motive for writing the book, notwithstanding all the labor its composition required and the many difficulties he had of collecting and sifting facts. No one who cares to be "up to date" in his knowledge of the American Indian and the Indian problem can afford to miss reading Mr. Moorhead's volume.

THE INDIAN'S FRIENDS

Few as the true friends of the Indian are to-day, it is gratifying to see the Supreme Court of the United States and the Department of the Interior, in their fight for justice and "square dealing," ever championing the cause of "these weak and defenseless people who are the wards of the nation and wholly dependent upon its protection and good faith." If more men with the knowledge and experience of Mr. Moorhead would come forth boldly in the Indian's defense, the mistaken policies which are the cause of many of the miseries the Indians suffer and have suffered will disappear. Let facts be known as they are, and not as they are distorted by the mischief-makers found within and without the reservations, who pretend to have at heart the welfare of the Indian, while in reality only seeking their own individual selfish interests.

THE PROBLEM'S GRAVITY

The author's presentation of the Indian and the Indian problem, however, is not altogether correct or complete. He deals principally with the Indian problem as handled by the whole machinery of the Indian Office under the Government of the United States, and shows what failures have characterized the past, how unsatisfactory conditions are at present, and how gloomy the outlook for the future. And this whole machinery of the Indian Office, because of its very nature, its lack of stability as to system, its constant change of officials, its incessant experimenting, which frequently is carried on by inexperienced individuals, its lack of personal interest, revealing the spirit of the hireling who goes as far as his salary and no further, will not and can not solve the Indian problem. It can never make the Red Man become a civilized, self-supporting, progressive American citizen, absorbed into the body politic of the Nation.

THE INDIAN'S RELIGIOUS EDUCATION

Although the first and fundamental factor here is religion, the civilizing influence of the religious work done among the Indians is not adequately treated by the author. Four lines are considered enough to record what the Catholic Missions have done for the true civilization of the Indians during the past sixty years. The book would greatly have gained in value, had proportionate justice been done to this fundamental subject. Next to religion, in the solution of the Indian problem, comes education. But education without religion will be detrimental rather than beneficial. A serious blow was dealt the welfare of the Indian when the Contract Mission Schools, Catholic and Protestant, were abolished by the Government; and a sad impression is left upon the reader when it is approvingly stated, in the words of Mr. Leupp, that the Government was forced to withdraw support from all denominational schools because the denominations, Protestant and Catholic, were engaged in an unchristian and uncharitable dispute as to who would receive the most money from the United States Treasury. Is this true history? "In real accomplishment, as proportioned to the outlay, the Government schools do not begin," concedes Mr. Leupp, "to equal the old Mission schools, and in vital energy they must always be lacking." The author himself remarks: "I do not agree with the widespread belief that through our general education of Indians we have raised their moral and religious tone." In this connection, be it added, that "it is neither necessary nor advisable that the Government should attempt the higher education of Indians." Is it not a general verdict, based upon experience, that non-reservation schools have been less of a blessing to the Indian than a benefit; that their product often is undesirable? Opinions about Indian schools must be cautiously accepted; general statements are bound to be misleading.

DAY SCHOOLS AN EVIL

There are three kinds of schools: non-reservation boarding schools, reservation boarding schools and day schools. All have their advantages or disadvantages according to their varying concrete circumstances. It is therefore incorrect to say, as does the author: "The day school surrounds the children, during school hours, with a wholesome environment and encourages them to work at home, in the field and in the garden, and promotes real education, culture and advancement." As a matter of fact, testified to by Government officials and inspectors and by my own experience of many years, the very opposite obtains with the day schools on the Crow Reservation. They are positively a setback and a detriment, a crying injustice inflicted upon Crow children, who deserve better treatment and protection. These children, in the tents, tepees or loghouses of their parents, are thrown back daily upon the unsanitary habits and uncivilized ways of the older Indians, who care little or nothing for the white man's civilization. Attendance, especially during the winter months, is very irregular; the children learn hardly anything, not even English; moral protection is lacking, and that is attended with most deplorable consequences, especially in the case of young Indian girls. From an educational, moral or sanitary standpoint, therefore, not a word can be said in favor of the Crow day schools. By their fruits they can be known, and they stand condemned.

THE REAL INDIAN

The most important factor in the solution of the Indian problem and the process of his civilization, is the Indian himself. I am afraid the book represents the Indian in too favorable a light. You must take the Indian as he is, with his mental and moral shortcomings. It is not his fault that, intellectually, he is of an inferior type. Yet it is this lack of mental capacity that lies at the bottom of most of the difficulties that are encountered in the solution of the Indian problem. The Indian must cooperate with the civilizing agencies that are at work for his betterment if good results are to be obtained. But it is precisely this cooperation on the part of the Indian that is lacking. He is lacking in intelligence, not good-will. This want of mental capacity accounts for the Indian's natural improvidence; his unsatisfactory manner of living at home; his almost total disregard of the laws of health; his inability to compete with the whites; his want of ambition; his spiritual dullness, etc. It is well known that, in matters of business, the Indian is at the mercy of any one who chooses to deceive him.

As to health, the average Indian is in a deplorable condition, indeed, quite helpless. Disease is rampant among them. Home conditions are such that if a case of tuberculosis or some other infection occurs in a household, the probability is that the disease will go through the entire family, living as they do in one-room habitations, overheated in winter and ill ventilated. In these mental and moral shortcomings of the Indians, through no blame of Indians or whites, must be found a considerable explanation of failures in the past, unsatisfactory conditions of the present, and our misgivings as to the future. You can not change the Indian at will. It must be a long, gradual process. Education must be imparted with the Christian religion as a basis, an ordinary common education within the reservation, and persevering, even compulsory, work at farming and stock-raising. Commissioner Sells has nobly proclaimed, as the policy of his administration, the great gospel of work. It is this gospel of work which, upon the foundations of religion and of a common education, must build up the civilization and salvation of the Indian, and bring about the solution of the difficult Indian problem.

L. TAELMAN, S.J.
Missionary to the Crow Indians.

NOTE AND COMMENT

For the first time in its history, extending over forty-two years, the National Conference of Charities and Corrections, recently in session in Baltimore, has chosen a Catholic priest as its President. He is the Rev. Francis H. Gavisk, Chancellor of the diocese of Indianapolis. Father Gavisk has been a member of the Indiana State Board of Charities for the last ten years, and has been actively engaged in the charitable and reformatory work in that State. Father Gavisk's election is a well-merited recognition of his zeal and successful efforts in behalf of the unfortunate. The Conference is to be congratulated upon its choice.

On May 19 a motion to continue the trial of the Government's case against the publishers of an anti-Catholic newspaper published at Aurora, Missouri, was overruled in the Federal Court at Kansas City. It appears that the defendants had asked for time to prove the truth of certain vile charges which they had alleged against the Catholic Church. In his ruling, however, Judge Van Valkenburgh held that in the action before the court, certain individuals named in the indictment, and not the Catholic Church, were on trial, and that even "were the defendants able to secure testimony on the points they have raised, it would not be admissable as testimony." "The question is, whether the defendants have violated the penal code."

The Ninth National Oratorical Contest of the International Peace Association took place at Mohonk Lake, New York, on May 20, Dr. Charles F. Thwing of Western Reserve University presiding. Six speakers, each of whom had been the winner, over about four hundred competitors, in three successive contests, college, State and group of States, competed. The first prize was voted by unanimous decision to Mr. Frederick W. Wennerberg of Boston College. News of other oratorical victories achieved by a Catholic college comes from the far Northwest. Gonzaga College, Spokane, met three State universities in public debate this year, Montana University, Montana State College and Idaho University. The first debate was triangular with the two Montana schools, and Gonzaga won both. In two debates with the University of Idaho, Gonzaga lost the first by a close decision, but won the second. Out of ten debates with these Universities during the last few years, Gonzaga has won seven.

"Pass a law agin' it" is said to be, in some districts, a favorite method of dealing with any public evil, and even with some evils that are not public. Mr. Joseph Hartigan, Commissioner of Weights and Measures in New York, reports that the laws of his State are fairly adequate, or would be, could they be enforced. Although the Commissioner has reported many offences to the Attorney General, not a single case has been prosecuted. More recently, presenting a number of cases to this authority, he was advised to apply to the District Attorney, who in turn told him to take his troubles to the Corporation Counsel. Even the most efficient public official might well be discouraged by these declarations of neutrality proceeding from men sworn to prosecute violators of law. Many a community, after embarking on the sea of social and other legislation, has discovered, to its surprise, that law, like a broom, needs a sturdy arm to wield it.

There is much that is good in a Bulletin recently issued by the Bureau of Education, "Education for the Home," by Dr. B. R. Andrews. Worthy of note is the author's emphasis on the fact that "it takes two to start a home, and the child has a father as well as a mother." Dr. Andrews believes that, in the making of a home, man's responsibility is equal to woman's, and he urges men to "become more conscious of the home and their relation to it." Few, however, will accept Dr. Andrews' statement that instruction in domestic science, beginning with the kindergarten and extending, if necessary, throughout the college course, constitutes the only cure for divorce. It is well that every girl should receive a thorough training in all the household arts, since the domestic infelicity which culminates in the divorce court is often occasioned by the wife's inability to care for the material welfare of a home. But even a good cook may have a bad temper, and an excellent housekeeper may be a Neo-malthusian. Domestic science is excellent within its own sphere; but it is neither a sacrament nor a sacramental.

Efforts to prevent the extension of the crack in the Liberty Bell have been unsuccessful. Since the clapper was removed and a steel strengthening frame inserted, the crack has spread to the top, and about the crown of the bell. This is most unfortunate, especially since, in the words of the New York Journal, "the final plans for the pilgrimage of this sacred relic" to San Francisco, have just been completed. "Pilgrimage" and "sacred relic" are curiously medieval terms, and thoroughly medieval was an action of President Wilson during the review of the Atlantic Fleet in the North River. As the band played "The Star Spangled Banner," the Chief Executive uncovered his head, and so remained for some time, although those about him urged that the raw weather would excuse the omission of this mark of respect. It is hardly possible that either the Journal or the President will be arraigned for idolatry or superstition, but within the last few weeks, these terms have been applied by a Protestant Sunday School journal to the reverence which Catholics show to the standard of the King of kings, the Cross of Christ.

"It would be too much," rages the New York Sun, "to expect the public schools to teach such outworn follies as the three Rs; and the public has to put up with many sciolisms and sillinesses nurtured in these expensive proving grounds of superfluity and flubdub." The cause of this outburst is the report that a Brooklyn principal ranged his pupils in the auditorium and taught them to sing, "I Didn't Raise My Boy to Be a Soldier," and "other ditties of the dove of pacificism." The unlucky principal also directed the gaze of his students to certain anti-war pictures with which he had decorated the walls of the building. If his taste in pictures is akin to his taste in music, the wrath of the Sun would seem to be justified. "The pity and horror of war," concludes the Sun," seem patent enough, but let our schools teach them, lest mere matters of fundamental education should find their way into these temples of the inutile." On the other hand, however, none will blame the principal for endeavoring to impress upon his pupils that war is generally a game in which everybody loses.

"Bar Makers Find Saloon Is Passing" is the headline in a daily paper. The largest manufacturer of bar fixtures in the United States, according to the report, has determined to retire from that business, and has converted an entire plant into a factory for phonograph cabinets and piano cases. This company, which also manufactures billiard tables, states that, if the billiard game is to continue in popular favor, "it must be divorced absolutely from the saloon." "We have discontinued the manufacture of bar fixtures," writes the secretary of the company, "for the reason that there is no longer a sufficient demand for them. We are convinced that the future of the liquor business will be in the café and hotel." This is probably the most important indication which has yet appeared that the saloon, as it exists at present, is to disappear. Through no reasons of sentiment, but purely as a matter of business, this company concludes that in future the manufacture of bar fixtures will be a profitless occupation. A harmless institution in itself, the saloon too often allowed itself the indulgence of an alliance with the lowest elements in the community and, as a result, all saloons, the harmless as well as the vile, are paying the penalty. Whether or not the liquor traffic has any future "in the café and hotel" depends entirely upon the willingness of the hotel and café to keep themselves aloof from the demoralizing influences which have made the saloon a thing of evil in so many communities.

Since the outbreak of the war, a few instances have been recorded in which Holy Communion was administered as Viaticum by deacons, but the story of a First Communion band, taken by the Tablet from La Croix is perhaps unique. As a Prussian battalion was approaching a little Belgian village, the terror-stricken inhabitants fled, the last to leave being a band of women and nuns, with the burgomaster and his family.

> The Mother Superior was surrounded by her community, for she carried under her mantle the ciborium from the chapel. The sound of firing grew nearer and nearer, and all gave themselves up for lost. Thinking that their last hour had come, they knelt down in a circle under the dark trees in prayer. The Mother Superior said the prayers for Communion, and then bending down before each, she gave them Communion, even the little children who had never before received. . . . So they waited, but gradually the sound of firing receded, and when the day broke they were able to make their way across the Dutch frontier.

On account of the war, many diocesan Eucharistic conferences will be abandoned, nor will it be possible to hold the International Eucharistic Congress. So far as Mass and the solemn administration of the Sacraments are concerned, it is still Good Friday in many stricken towns and villages in the war zone.

In an open letter addressed to the Buffalo Express, the Rev. R. W. Boynton administers a rebuke to that zealous patriot, Bishop Burt, which readily wins him a place among the enemies of our beloved country. In pursuance of his "call to arms," the Bishop had requested the Protestant clergymen of Buffalo to read a notice from their pulpits, inviting the attendance of the Protestant people of Buffalo at a series of lectures on "Protestantism and Education." Mr. Boynton refused to be a party to this proceeding, and his letter to Bishop Burt concludes with the following words:

> I do not intend to read the notice from my pulpit nor do I believe that it will be read from a number of the influential Protestant pulpits of this city. I am writing you publicly for the sake of informing our Catholic fellow-citizens that the methods of sectarian agitation in politics with which you seem to be identified do not have anything like the unanimous support of the non-Catholic part of the community and can not in the end succeed in the purpose which their promoters have in view.

It is true, as Mr. Boynton points out, that this miserable appeal to Anti-Catholic bigotry has little or no influence with men and women who know the high ideals proposed by the Church, and who are intelligent enough to understand that the Church can not be held responsible for the excesses of those nominal Catholics, who in their daily lives reject her teaching. But has the Bishop never heard of the fate of those who "sow discord among brethren"? It is indeed a weak and unworthy cause which is content to appeal to prejudice and ignorance.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XIII, No. 8
WHOLE No. 321

JUNE 5, 1915

PRICE 10 CENTS
$3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE
War Bulletin: May 25, p. m.-June 1, a. m.—Events in the East—The German Note.—The Italian Campaign—Other Items. Germany: National Feeling—A White Book. Great Britain: The "Coalition Cabinet"—Opinions on the New Cabinet—Pagan Projects. Ireland: A New Peril to Home Rule—Irish Organization. Mexico: Mexicans Starving 189-192

TOPICS OF INTEREST
The Ethics of Twilight Sleep—The Young Man and the Brotherhood—Athletics and Character—Artist, Priest and Exile — Catholic Summer Camps 193-199

COMMUNICATIONS
Prohibition—The Right to Educate Our Children—Birth Control: An Open Letter—Understanding the Middle Ages.....199-201

EDITORIALS
The Pope and the War — Blind Eyes — Lovest Thou Me? — Coeducation and the Race — Dodos and Mothers — The Times and the Belgian Priests — "Freebooting Pirates" — That Blessed Word Automatic 202-205

LITERATURE
As to Shakespere's Heroines.

REVIEWS: A Grammar of the Greek New Testament in the Light of Historical Research—Manuale Theologiæ Moralis Secundum Principia S. Thomæ Aquinatis—New Cosmopolis.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: April's "Best Sellers"—The Catholic World for June — "The Man Who Rocked the Earth"—"The Scarlet Plague"—"G. K. C's" Rumored Conversion—Some Verses —"The Forest of Swords"—"A Girl of the Blue Ridge"—"Jean Baptiste"—"In Those Days"—"Victors of Peace"—"Il Santo Evangelo."

BOOKS RECEIVED 205-209

EDUCATION
Educational Legislation 209, 210

SOCIOLOGY
Conscious Birth Restriction 210, 211

NOTE AND COMMENT
Needless Protestations — Negligent Parents — Critics of Private Charities — The Earliest Mentioned Nurse—Birth Control—Not Enough Men Communicants—The Stage To-day—The Kikuyu Controversy.....211, 212

CHRONICLE

The War.—Nothing of importance has been announced from the western battlefield. In spite of fighting of a very severe character, the lines remain practically where they were last week. German attacks in the vicinity of Dixmude have been repeated, but without notable result. At Ypres there has been a standstill. West of La Bassée the British have made further progress. North of Arras the fighting has been especially bitter, and the line from Angres to Rochlincourt has swayed back and forth, with the result still indecisive. Le Prêtre, east of Pont-a-Mousson has also been a storm center, with little gain for either side.

Bulletin, May 25, p. m.-June 1, a. m.

In the east there has been renewed activity at many points from the district of Shavli to the Rumanian border, with the Austro-Germans for the most part on the offensive. Ossowiec has again been subjected to bombardment, and there have been movements on the Rawka. Austria reports success at Kielce. The main interest, however, has been fixed on the Galician campaign. Here events have begun to proceed slowly, awaiting it would seem the fate of Przemysl. Berlin and Vienna both claim that the investment of the fortress is almost complete. Austro-German armies are said to have completely surrounded it except for a short distance to the northeast. Advancing from the south, they have captured Medyka. which is situated due east of the fortress; while from the north, after capturing Radymno, they have crossed the San, and are fighting their way southeast along both banks of the Wisnia. It is further reported that Przemysl is already being bombarded by heavy Austrian guns. The Russians have gained success north of Jaroslau, by taking Sieniwa from the Austrians and by forcing them to retire to the west bank of the San. This victory, however, will not give them a permanent advantage unless Przemysl can be relieved.

Events in the East

Germany's reply to the note sent by the American Government on the occasion of the sinking of the Lusitania, was received at Washington on May 30. The New York Sun's summary as contrasted with the positive stand of the United States is as follows:

The German Note

GERMANY asserts the Falaba's action in summoning aid caused the submarine commander to torpedo her before all passengers had escaped.

UNITED STATES holds that no potential menace to the submarine justified causing the death of the American passenger Leon C. Thrasher.

GERMANY says unjustified attacks on neutral ships are due to carelessness or suspicious acts of the vessels concerned.

UNITED STATES holds that on Germany rests the responsibility for not making mistakes.

GERMANY charges that the Lusitania was armed.

UNITED STATES has officially declared the Lusitania left New York unarmed.

GERMANY charges that the Lusitania was a British auxiliary cruiser.

UNITED STATES holds the Lusitania was a British passenger ship, not engaged in the service of the British Government at the time she was sunk, but operating only in her normal capacity of merchant service between New York and Liverpool.

GERMANY charges that England ordered British merchantmen to attack German submarines.

UNITED STATES holds that only evidence that the Lusitania did attack a submarine would make this contention admissible.

GERMANY declares herself unable to regard British ships undefended British territory.

UNITED STATES holds that the laws of humanity and nations forbid attacks on neutrals and merchant vessels on the high seas.

GERMANY charges that the United States law was violated by the presence of explosives on the passenger ship Lusitania.

UNITED STATES holds that the American law regarding explosives on passenger ships never applied to rifle cartridges.

GERMANY invites the United States to end submarine operations by obtaining a change in British trade policy.

UNITED STATES holds it cannot bargain in American lives or the rights of humanity.

The Italian campaign is well under way. The Italian troops are attacking the Austrian frontier in many places. No pitched battles have been fought, and the Austrians for the most part have been content to retire and retard the advance of the enemy. The Trentino has been invaded at four points. To the northwest of Trent Italians have entered the Tonale Pass and are moving southeast into the Versomiglio valley; further south they have advanced from Ponte Caffaro and are proceeding along the Chiesa. Still further south and to the east of Lago di Garda, they have occupied Monte Baldo and Monte Altissimo; and further to the east, almost due south of Trent, they are in possession of Monte Pasubio. To the northeast of Trent, Italian troops have advanced from Cadore but have not yet got across the frontier. Further east they have encountered stubborn resistance and failed to penetrate the Plöcken, Predila, and other less important passes, but have entered Austrian territory from the Friuli district and taken Caporetto, Cormons, Cervignano and Grado. At present they are striving to advance towards Goritz, Gradisca, and Montefalcone, at which last place they are supported by warships operating in the Gulf of Triest. The progress they have made has not been great at any place nor have they matched their strength at any point with the Austro-Germans. Apparently they took their enemy by surprise. It is reported, however, that large bodies of Austrian and German troops are being gathered at Innsbruck and hurried down into the Tyrol. But as railroad facilities are very poor in this district, it may be some time before a pitched battle takes place. In the district north of Triest the Austrians are said to be strongly intrenched east of the Isonzo river, where they have the high Julian moutains at their backs. Not until the Italians have crossed the Isonzo therefore is an important battle likely.

The Italian Campaign

British naval losses have been severe during the week. Two battleships, the Triumph and the Majestic, neither of them of the latest type, were torpedoed by submarines and sunk in the Dardanelles. In both cases the warships were covering the landing of troops on the Gallipoli peninsula, and in both cases many of the crew were saved. The ships were lost on successive days. On the same day that the Majestic went down the Princess Irene, a British auxiliary steamship, was blown to pieces as she lay at anchor in Sheerness harbor, almost in the same spot where the battleship Bulwark was mysteriously destroyed some months ago. Only one of the 322 who were on board is known to have been saved. British submarines report considerable damage done to Turkish shipping and transports in the Sea of Marmora. An American cargo ship, the Nebraskan, was severely damaged by an explosion, the origin of which is being officially investigated, off the coast of Ireland on May 25. No one was injured. The crew took to the boats, but seeing that the steamer would not sink, boarded her and made their way slowly back to Liverpool.

Other Items

Germany.—Though the Germans are still firm in a calm determination to wage the war to the bitter end, yet they are incensed against the Italians who, they declare, have betrayed a sacred trust in taking up arms for the Allies. There is also some feeling of resentment against America. A staff correspondent of the New York Times forwards the contents of a letter which indicates the nature of the feeling entertained by many. The letter, written to the Kreuzzeitung by Herr Ernst, reads in part as follows:

National Feeling A White Book

> Among our enemies I number also North America. To be sure it has not declared war on us, but with its shipments of war materials it has stepped to the side of our enemies. Our Government has done what it could. But the hour of vengeance will come; every crime is atoned for on earth.

The correspondent of the Times, in a spirit of fairness, places over against this citation, this editorial taken from another paper:

> To call a neutral State an enemy during this war and threaten him with punishment we do not consider to be exactly the pinnacle of policy. No one will take it in bad part that Herr Ernst thinks or feels what he pleases. But during a war more than at any other time one ought to be more careful to consider what feelings and thoughts one disseminates for publication.

A "White Book" recently issued answers the accusations of cruelty made by the Belgian Commission to the United States and by the Bryce Commission, by denying that undue severity was exercised toward the Belgians, and by making the following counter charges and statements:

> Concentrated attacks were made on the soldiers in violation of The Hague Convention. In some instances hot tar and scalding water were poured upon the Germans, and captured soldiers were maltreated. In Aerschot civilians fired from the windows of dwellings, and the German commander was treacherously murdered in the Mayor's house after being received there as a guest. In Dinant shots were fired on the soldiers from the cathedral. In Louvain priests urged the citizens to attack the troops. Shots were fired on hospitals containing wounded soldiers. The admission is made that Germans, set the houses of some of the offenders in Louvain afire, but it is asserted that the soldiers themselves checked the conflagration.

Great Britain.—The new Cabinet, as announced on May 26, consists of the following Ministers: Prime Minister and First Lord of the Treasury, H. H. Asquith, Liberal; Exchequer, Reginald McKenna, Liberal; Foreign Secretary, Sir Edward Grey, Liberal; Admiralty, Arthur J. Balfour, Unionist (new member); War, Earl Kitchener; Minister of Munitions, Lloyd George, Liberal; Chancellor of Lancaster, Winston Churchill, Liberal; Lord Chancellor, Sir Stanley Buckmaster, Liberal; President of the Council, Marquis of Crewe, Liberal; Lord Privy Seal, Viscount Curzon, Unionist (new member); Home Secretary, Sir John Simon, Liberal; Colonies, A. Bonar Law, Unionist (new member); India, Austen Chamberlain, Unionist (new member); Ireland, Augustine Birrell, Liberal; Agriculture, Lord Selborne, Liberal (new member); Attorney-General, Sir Edward Carson, Unionist (new member); without portfolio, Marquis of Lansdowne, Unionist (new member).

The "Coalition Cabinet"

Opinions on the New Cabinet

Mr. Asquith remains at the head of the new Coalition Cabinet as Prime Minister and First Lord of the Treasury, while Mr. Churchill is practically shorn of all authority by his appointment to the honorary post of Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. David Lloyd George is transferred, temporarily it is said, from the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer, his portfolio being given to Reginald McKenna, to a new post known as the Ministry of Munitions. This is an important change which, while it does not justify the bitter attacks made upon Lord Kitchener, seems to admit the criticism that shells and other ammunition have not been supplied in proper quantity and when required to the troops. The official announcement of the new Cabinet, which says that the names bear the approval of the King, contains the statement that John Redmond, the Nationalist Leader, was offered a place in the Cabinet. Mr. Redmond, did not accept, however, because of the party tradition which does not justify the presence of an Irish Nationalist in the Government while Ireland continues without home rule. Almost irrespective of their party views, the English press comment upon the new Cabinet without enthusiasm. The Liberal organs deplore the exclusion of Lord Haldane and the inclusion of Sir Edward Carson, but on the whole the impression is left that all are willing to make the best of a situation which they view as an unfortunate necessity. The press is unanimous in urging the country to accept the new Cabinet loyally, to abstain from carping criticism, and to recognize the unique responsibility, the gravest in the history of the nation, resting upon the Ministry. "To-day we are all under discipline," is a typical comment, "and owe unquestioning obedience to those who command the operations." The retention of Lord Kitchener indicates the confidence felt in him by all parties, and it is felt that since many of his duties will now be assumed by the Minister of Munitions, he will be able to apply himself more directly to his paramount task, which is "to make" soldiers. On the other hand, the resignation of Lord Fisher has been accepted, and his successor is Sir Henry Bradwardine Jackson. The new First Sea Lord was born in 1855 and entered the Navy at the age of thirteen. He is widely known for his services in connection with the development of wireless telegraphy in the Navy. For his work in electrical physics he was made a Fellow of the Royal Society.

Pagan Projects

Many non-Catholics share with Catholics the view that the passage of an Act placing the offspring of unlawful unions exactly on the level with children born in wedlock would be a profound calamity to the country. Certainly it would encourage those who are inclined to take a lax view of the sanctity of marriage, and who are working for more liberal facilities for divorce, to persist in their attacks on the laws of marriage. Speaking in London, Father Bernard Vaughan did not hesitate to use strong language in connection with this and other pagan projects which a blatant minority are vigorously promoting. "We have been told again and again that unmarried mothers must not be blamed; that the khaki men having so bad a time in the trenches should have been given a better time at home; whatever he likes to have he should have, and the country should be thankful that he leaves behind him an unmarried mother with children to be in the future the supporters and builders of our Empire. A Christian people talking like this? Snapping their fingers in the face of Christ, shrieking out, 'We will not have this Man to rule over us, we will be ruled by pleasure.' We shall have to be scourged yet more before we are brought to our knees to beg God's pardon."

A New Peril to Home Rule

Ireland.—Mr. Redmond's action in holding up the Munition Areas Bill until the discrimination against Irish liquor industries was removed forced Lloyd George to drop his surtaxes on heavy beers and high grade whiskies. Mr. O'Brien deserves the credit of compelling a division on the question, the first since the war, and thus frustrating Mr. George's plans. His apparent purpose, under pretext of keeping British munition workers sober, to weight still further Ireland's heavy burden of disproportionate taxation, has weakened Irish confidence in the Government's good faith, and, on the other hand, many English Liberal organs and representatives have threatened to take revenge on the Irish Party when the Home Rule Amendment Bill comes up for settlement. The announcement immediately thereafter of a Coalition Cabinet, in which Sir Edward Carson is Attorney-General, has created further misgivings regarding the future. It means that Home Rule will not be established during the present Parliament, no matter what the course of the war, for the dissolution of the Cabinet will be followed by a general election, and if the Unionists win, which is just as likely, since they will have equal credit for the conduct of the war, they can so draft the Amendment Bill as to nullify Home Rule. The Irish Party issued a statement approving of Mr. Redmond's refusal to enter the Cabinet and urging the resumption and continuance of active organization at home "until the Irish Government is in actual control of every inch of Irish soil."

The Gaelic Athletic Association's recent reaffirmation of its rule excluding police, soldiers or army pensioners from membership was brought up before the House of Commons by the Unionists, who claimed that, as this association consisted of the flower of the young men of Ireland, its action restrained recruiting and was tantamount to treason. A circular has been issued from the Civil Service department forbidding all officials to accept or retain membership in the Irish Volunteers. As this organization is for the defense of Ireland only and for no rebellious purposes, and as officials had full liberty to join the Orange Covenant, which was directed against the authority of Parliament, the discrimination is regarded as an act of bad faith from a Home Rule Government. The Gaelic League, one of the few really Irish movements not yet charged with disloyalty, is extending its organization widely, and its summer colleges and Feisanna this year are having unprecedented success.

Irish Organizations

Mexico.—The strange silence maintained about the horrible conditions that have obtained in Mexico for months past, has at last been broken by official statements from the President and the Red Cross Society. The substance of both messages is that Mexico is starving; a fact well known to readers of AMERICA. Despite the hunger of the people Carranza seized 600 tons of grain shipped into the country for popular relief, and then denied the existence of famine. The Red Cross statement is as follows:

Mexicans Starving

Conditions in Mexico are growing steadily worse. At Monterey several thousand persons are fed daily. Many refined families apply at night for aid. The farmers from the surrounding country are coming to the city to buy corn to feed their workmen and families, but can not obtain it. Multitudes are on the verge of starvation. At Durango the Government's efforts to keep down the price of food supplies failed, as buyers from Monterey and Torreon, where famine prevails, are willing to pay any price. Food supplies are becoming so scarce and the cost so high that the poorer classes are unable to buy, and are in a deplorable condition.

At Tampico all food is about exhausted. There is no flour and very little corn. The conditions in outlying districts are still worse, and tales of the starvation of the poor peons are constantly coming into the city. At Vera Cruz and in the surrounding country famine conditions prevail. At Jalapa, the capital of the State of Vera Cruz, the general condition of the town is appalling. Money was raised by the Chamber of Commerce to relieve the distress and corn was imported, but the funds were soon exhausted. The local civil authorities then took up the matter, with little success. The day that no car arrives the town goes hungry. Most distressing scenes took place at the Municipal Hall when these rations were distributed. Some 2,500 women were collected at 7 o'clock in the morning to get in line for the distribution, which began at 11, and standing in the sun so long, unable to move for fear of losing their places and their chance for a mere handful of corn, resulted in many cases of fainting from exhaustion, some were injured, and on several occasions one or two have been killed. Many, after waiting for hours, went home crying, for the supply ran out, and, summing up the case, it means the practical starvation of the town. On the west coast the inhabitants are reported as starving. Acapulco is practically without food supplies and conditions are most distressing in all that region. When a boatload of corn was brought into Acapulco the rush of the people was so great to get some of the grain that several children were trampled to death and a number of women injured.

In Mexico City the situation is very grave and the shortage in all cereals is felt intensely. As early as March a hundred thousand persons were reported suffering from hunger. Conditions have grown steadily worse, and many are starving. Mules, horses and oxen have been killed or exported, as there is nothing to feed them. For the food supplies that remain fabulous prices have been reached, so only the rich can buy. Epidemics of smallpox and typhus fever prevail, and medicine is prohibitory in price. The city has 600,000 inhabitants in danger of perishing from hunger, misery and epidemics. Serious food riots have taken place. While the Government was distributing some corn to relieve the food situation, a crowd of about 8,000 people gathered, by far larger than the amount of corn available for distribution. On account of the state of weakness to which hunger is bringing this people and the heat and the crush of the crowd, anxious not to return with empty hands, about 250 people fainted and had to be carried to the Red Cross Station to be attended.

The President's statement which is in the nature of an appeal to the American people, reads:

WASHINGTON, May 28.

TO THE PUBLIC:

The American people, with characteristic generosity and an impartial spirit of brotherhood with all nations, have contributed liberally toward the relief of the appalling suffering caused by the unprecedented war in Europe.

There has now arisen a condition of equally great suffering and need close to our own borders. Due to several years of internal disturbance the unfortunate people of many parts of Mexico have been reduced to the verge of starvation and unless aid is rendered they may die in great numbers for lack of food.

The American Red Cross is ready to undertake relief work for the benefit of the Mexican people. I appeal most earnestly to our people, therefore, to contribute both money and supplies of food to mitigate the suffering and misery so close at hand. All contributions in money may be sent to the American Red Cross, Washington, or to its treasurers. Those who are able to contribute corn, rice, beans or flour are requested to communicate with the American Red Cross headquarters, Washington, for instructions.

WOODROW WILSON.

These pitiable conditions are further emphasized by this wire from the American consul at Monterey:

The Monterey Chamber of Commerce has asked me to appeal to the American National Red Cross for food for the starving people of Monterey. The Chamber of Commerce has stood nobly by the people, but has reached its limits. The commanding general assures free freight and free duties. The city is without food and the people will starve unless help comes quickly.

We do not want money, but most earnestly beg for corn, beans and rice. If we can have help for three weeks until green corn and garden stuff come on we will be safe, but we must have corn, beans, rice and flour or starve. . . .

TOPICS OF INTEREST

The Ethics of Twilight Sleep

ONE of our latest social fads is childbirth in twilight sleep, and this has serious moral bearing. A method of effecting painless childbirth through the use of scopolamine and morphine was used first in 1902, and in 1906 Dr. Gauss of the University of Freiburg in Baden reported a series of five hundred such cases. The woman's condition in his clinic was called a Dämmerschlaf, a twilight sleep, because she is somnolent and wholly or partly unconscious of pain. Many American obstetricians tried the drugs about 1903, but they quickly abandoned the method. Recently the process has been revived in this country because of exploitation in periodicals like McClure's Magazine, the Ladies' Home Journal, the Cosmopolitan, and the Metropolitan. The articles in the magazines were written by persons who are not physicians, and the erroneous statements are dangerously misleading. The Ladies' Home Journal, however, while favoring the method, published letters from several leading obstetricians in the United States, all of whom are opposed to the use of these drugs during parturition. There are, nevertheless, a few skilful obstetricians who employ the method and approve it under certain restrictions. In the best hands the treatment is dangerous, and when employed by incompetent physicians it is frequently fatal to the child.

Scopolamine, one of the drugs used in this method, is an alkaloid obtained from the roots of Scopolia Carniolica, and it can not be differentiated chemically from hyoscine. Both scopolamine and hyoscine act upon the cerebral cortex, and produce sleep; they depress the center of respiration, and the motor centers of the spinal cord; and they intensify the action of morphine and other narcotics. Occasionally patients are found who have an idiosyncracy against scopolamine, and are intensely or even fatally poisoned by extremely minute doses, but these cases are altogether exceptional. Babcock [Proceedings Amer. Therapeut. Soc. 1912] reported a curious case of a negress who was fatally poisoned by scopolamine. After all respiration had ceased for twenty-five minutes he resuscitated her so that she lived for forty-three hours. By the way, there are innumerable cases like this which prove that the soul does not leave the body when breathing and heart-beat cease in apparent death, and absolution may be given, or rather must be given, as late as an hour or more after the apparent death of a person to whom the priest comes late.

Morphine, the main drug in the twilight sleep method to which scopolamine is an adjutant, is made much more powerful in its effects by the addition of scopolamine, and whenever morphine and scopolamine, or any similar drug, are given hypodermically to a pregnant woman, as they are administered in this method, they are at once carried by the blood to the child. Children up to adolescence all withstand the action of morphine badly, and a child in the womb is readily overwhelmed by it, especially when it is intensified by the scopolamine. Just in this fact lies the chief moral crux in the use of the twilight sleep process of obstetrical delivery. Commonly the woman goes on to the end safely, if in competent hands; but if constant watch is not kept by the very bedside by a skilful observer the baby is not only liable to be killed, but it almost surely will be killed. And its danger is not from the drug alone directly.

If it happens that the mother is especially susceptible to scopolamine or morphine the first will cause delirium and the second coma, or the respirations may become arythmic and be reduced to four or five a minute, instead of about eighteen. The kidneys may be so affected by morphine that total suppression of function is brought about. Labor may be prolonged, and an atony caused which will result in grave hemorrhage. These are all exceptional conditions but liable to occur, and often there are no premonitory symptoms. Some of the lay writers on this subject dwell upon the importance of the variable dose of the drugs, and they try to make out two schools—one the constant-dose operator and the other the man that varies the dose to suit the patient. Any rational physician suits the dose to the patient.

In the Journal of the American Medical Association for May 22, 1915, Dr. Baer, an obstetrician of the Reese Maternity Hospital, Chicago, reported sixty twilight sleep cases—the series ended on February 5 last. These show that even under the most favorable conditions in a maternity hospital the results were very unfortunate in all but about five of the cases. The rooms in which the patients were treated were large, and had sound-proof walls and doors, the nurses were selected carefully and were always in attendance and there was a physician present constantly.

Of the sixty cases, twenty-six were tabulated as "no success." In half of these twenty-six the drug had no effect whatever, or so slight an effect it was of no avail. A few women were made very restless and delirious, six had to have restraining sheets put on them, one tried to kill herself and had to be shackled for four days, another woman was poisoned, two babies were nearly killed, one mother was nearly killed, and she was a supposedly ideal case for the treatment, and one woman with her baby was killed. Even among the only six cases tabulated as "completely successful," one woman was very delirious, throwing herself about in a maniacal manner. The woman that was killed had not received pituitrin, but her death was like that which often occurs after a premature use of this drug. Thirty-two of the women complained of a thirst so intense as to be pitiable. Headache and vertigo were observed in twenty-four cases; the headache caused severe suffering in several women and lasted for days, yet these same women without the scopolaminemorphine treatment would have been done with all trouble after from eight to eleven hours. Pain was not decreased in nineteen of the women, restlessness was present in eighteen, and a "ghastly" delirium in nine.

Dr. Polak, professor of obstetrics at the Long Island College Hospital, reported fifty-one cases of successful twilight sleep delivery as happening before December, 1914, in his clinic, and since then he has more than doubled the number. There is no reason for doubting his statements. The reports, however, from Freiburg are not reliable. Dr. Joseph B. De Lee, professor of obstetrics in the Northwestern University, Chicago, is one of the best authorities in his specialty in America, and he tried the method in 1903 but abandoned it. In 1913 he visited the maternities in Berlin, Vienna, Munich, and Heidelburg, and he found that all these had tried the method and had rejected it. He studied ten cases in Professor Krönig's clinic at Freiburg and he tells us his impressions were "decidedly unfavorable to the method of twilight sleep. In all ten cases the labor was prolonged; in two cases for forty-eight hours. In three cases pituitrin had to be given to save the life of the children, and if this drug is given early in labor, as it had to be given in these cases, it is likely to rupture the uterus. In five of the cases instruments had to be used owing to the paralyzing effect of the drugs, and the results were bad. Besides several of the women became so delirious and violent that ether had to be used to control them, and as a result their babies were born narcotized and asphyxiated. One child had convulsions for several days."

This is only a part of the whole miserable description, which is such that it can not be printed except in a medical journal. Evidently the men who are reporting long series of absolute successes have peculiar standards of success, or peculiar standards of veracity.

The method is impractical from any point of view except in a hospital and where an expert obstetrician is present continuously. Even in these circumstances it fails often with women who need it most, and the baby may be killed. Secondly, morphine is always dangerous to the life of children, and morphine plus scopolamine is more so, and the younger the child the greater the danger. This danger is so great that the relief of the mother from pain, which is certainly very great, does not justify the risk of the child's life even in hospitals and under the care of skilled obstetricians.

AUSTIN O'MALLEY, M.D.

The Young Man and the Brotherhood*

THE eyes of not a few of our young men are anointed with that marvelous light which St. John speaks of, and which enables them to realize "what shadows they are and what shadows they pursue." Over such choice souls the world holds no sway, for they are conscious of the truth of the saying of a' Kempis: "All is vanity except loving God and serving Him alone." Frequently and insistently do the beauty and advantages of a life "hid with Christ in God" appeal to them. And yet, ardently desirous though young men of this other-worldly type may be to lead such a life, not infrequently does it happen that, for one reason or another, they do not regard the priesthood as their goal. That sacred calling has for them no attraction. Some of the youths in question shrink from the holy ministry because of the heavy responsibility it involves; others feel reluctant and ill-prepared to enter on the long course of studies ecclesiastical students have to undergo. For the young man then, whom the world solicits in vain, but who does not feel drawn to the priesthood, is there no place in the courts of the Lord? Must such a choice soul remain in the world dragging out perhaps an aimless existence?

"In my Father's house there are many mansions." And so in the Church exists a state where the young man in question may have ample scope for his zeal and at the same time find the very haven and harbor of safety which he has been seeking for his soul's rest. Not that he is to lead an existence merely safe and sheltered: on the contrary, in his capacity as a Christian teacher he is to be a very outpost of Christian faith, but he is to draw his strength from that inner source of the hidden life where power is truly made perfect. Religion, his vows, his peace give him the very leverage he needs, add the fine temper to an instrument kept bright by constant service, and equip him mightily to meet and, so far as in him lies, make better the world. The state that offers this opportunity is the Brotherhood.

I fear we lose sight of the fact, Bishop Schrembs writes, that boys and young men who do not feel any vocation to the holy priesthood might readily and gladly consecrate their lives to God in some teaching community of Brothers, were their attention called thereto. The various Brotherhoods are glad to offer exceptional facilities to good boys who give a fair promise of a genuine vocation. . . . Brothers have an important part to play in the wide activities of the Church.

Indeed, to name but one field that awaits many more such laborers, they are imperatively needed for the full development of our Catholic high school movement.

"Who grasps the child," said Francis Thompson, "grasps the future." The apostolate of imparting to the young a knowledge and love of God and godliness is one of the most cherished works of the Church. To this apostolate have the members of our teaching Brotherhoods consecrated their lives. A noble mission it is, one that affords a most attractive and meritorious occupation to the young man who wishes to take an active part in promoting God's glory and the welfare of the Church. The teacher of a group of youths, as a writer has very well said, and his words are especially applicable to the religious teacher, combines the offices of the pastor and the parent. Bishop Byrne, of Nashville, has pointed out that the teacher's calling "has an advantage in some respects over the priesthood. The teachers are constantly with their pupils, shaping their souls, coloring them, informing them, making them instinct with life and motives, and giving them high ideals and worthy aspirations." The instructor who spends six hours a day with the child, Dr. J. G. Holland used to say, spends three times as many hours as the father does and twenty-fold more time than the pastor. No wonder that the doctor added: "I have no words to express my sense of the importance of the teacher's office." Should not such utterances be an incentive to our young men to consecrate their lives to the apostolate of Christian education? Tens of thousands of the choicest children of the Church, inspired by the love of God, have been alive to the solid service they could render their Heavenly Father by adopting teaching as a vocation and not merely as a stepping-stones to some other profession or business. As religious educators such persons become associated with Christ Himself in the salvation of souls. "The apostleship of the Church in these present times I consider principally to be in the hands of Christian teachers," declares Archbishop Ireland—a weighty statement indeed. Were the nature and rewards of the Brother's vocation really known to our young men, it is certain an increased number of them would embrace that state. The mission of Christian education Archbishop Ryan considered to be far above that of any learned profession, and second only to the Divine Ministry.

*The thirty-fourth of a series of vocational articles.

What studies should the young man who aspires to a teaching Brotherhood have made? No hard and fast rule is laid down. There is no formal entrance examination as a condition of admission, nor is a high school training necessary, but if one has made such a course, so much the better. One who has creditably passed the grammar grade branches need have no diffidence in his ability to prosecuute satisfactorily the program of studies mapped out for novices in a Brotherhood. These programs are becoming more and more thorough and extensive, because within the last decade the sphere of activity of our Brotherhoods has been changing. Now, many such institutes are devoting their energies largely to the work of the high school.

It may truly be said that never was the demand for Brothers so insistent and their apostolate so wide, so powerful, or so interesting, as at the present time. "More and more the need of teaching Brothers is felt," a venerable prelate tells us, having particularly in mind the apostolate of the Catholic high school. "It is a rôle which no others can adequately fill; and the work of parish priests will always be incomplete, in one way or another, if the Brothers are not there to prepare and support that work."

Not all Brothers, however, are engaged in the class room. A variety of occupations is to be found in our Brotherhoods, so that young men who have no aptitude for study, nor a desire for teaching, can render useful service in some of the industrial or clerical occupations carried on in connection with Brothers' establishments. In not a few of these houses nearly every trade and craft has its representative. Many of the religious also are engaged as secretaries, treasurers, stewards or disciplinarians in boarding schools. This multiplicity of employments is not without its advantages. Brothers for whom the class room has no attraction, or for whom the stress and strain of teaching is too hard, may readily find in the cloister some more congenial employment. Even in the humblest occupations in a religious community one can contribute much to the success of its apostolate. "In the king's service," runs the adage, "nothing is small."

"How am I to tell if I have a vocation for a Brotherhood? What are the signs?" a young man may ask. Two things are ordinarily required, say theologians, and are sufficient to determine one's vocation: a fitness for the work, and an inclination to become a religious. All the qualities necessary to enter the religious state, Archbishop Elder reduced to three: good will, good health and good sense.

The young man who contemplates entering a Brotherhood will find much that is helpful and interesting in the following works: "The Religious State," by St. Alphonsus; "The Choice of a State of Life," "What Shall I Be?" "Paradise on Earth," "In Thy Courts," "A Gateway to the Religious Life," "An Earthly Paradise," and "Out of Many Hearts: Thoughts on the Religious Vocation."

Notre Dame, Indiana. BROTHER AIDAN, C.S.C.

Athletics and Character

IF athletics are not advantageous to health in spite of all the claims that have been made, at least the advocates of our modern educational devotion to athletic competitions will insist that they form a fine training of character. Boys and young men learn on the athletic field the necessity for repressing self, cooperating with others. Above all, they learn the precious lessons of self-restraint, for any tendency to resentment notoriously preoccupies a player's attention so much that he loses zest for the game. All this by teaching him to take the worst with the better in sport, lays a fine foundation for the game of life. Besides physical exercise burns up energy that in youth is so prone to accumulate and flow over into dangerous spheres of activity or excesses of one kind or another, and so athletics are a real moral factor in our schools. It has ever been the tradition of the athletic squad that there must be no indulgences. Hence cigarettes, alcoholic liquors and sexual divagations of all kinds are frowned upon and thoroughly repressed by the good spirit created among the boys themselves, without the necessity for mean espionage.

It may be admitted that the feeling that excesses of any kind would impair their physical efficiency and disturb their ability as athletes, acts as an effective motive for a time in lessening excesses and indulgences of many kinds. The general idea is that such times of self-discipline have a definite effectiveness in the formation of habit, and help toward an enduring purpose in self-restraint. Undoubtedly in so far as such conditions obtain, the effect is good. When it is recalled, however, that the motive for this self-restraint is low, and consists only in the desire to keep the body at its highest level of physical ability, it is more than doubtful whether it has much effect in producing any real habit. There is a very definite tendency to reaction immediately on the breaking of training, which often has serious consequences. As a matter of fact the accumulation of physical energy and the definite attempt to create a machine as physically efficient as possible leaves young men after training in a physical condition in which, unless a great deal of physical exercise is taken, there is unusual energy constantly manufactured, and this energy is apt to be used up in the machine itself with short-circuiting evil of many kinds as a result.

This is not mere theory; it is very well recognized by college and university faculties from rather frequent experiences. College men have been known to celebrate the breaking of training by special indulgences of the flesh, arranged for beforehand, looked forward to for weeks and carried to extreme excess. Under these circumstances it is easy to understand that much harm is done rather than good. Indeed the training table with its regulation of diet entirely for the purpose of producing physical efficiency, that is, of making as perfect an animal as possible for the time being, has many unfortunate results. The strain of excitement and intense anxiety which often produces in young men the state called "going stale," is really a highly neurotic, rather emotional condition with large elements of hysteria in it. Young men who have been beaten in a big game are known, and indeed many magazine stories tell about them, to have broken down and wept in their dressing rooms after the game. Anything that tends to produce such a state of mind and body, far from encouraging self-restraint, rather has the opposite effect, and while for the time the athletes, because they are under surveillance and feel the yoke of the honor of their college on their shoulders, may keep from indulgences, the effect upon character and personality is as a rule only temporary, and it is questionable whether it is not harmful in the end.

It is often said that strenuous athletics make men capable of standing pain without whimpering and thus keeps them from becoming what a worthy ex-president called mollycoddles. The capacity to stand pain when a crowd is looking on is a very different thing, however, from the ability to bear physical and mental anguish when one is alone, and the supreme trials of life usually come at moments when men have a great sense of loneliness. What we need is not the man who can in the midst of publicity brazen it out and conceal his feelings and through human respect keep from making a spectacle of himself, but the man who in modest obscurity can do his duty, cost what it may, of sacrifice or pain. Professor Dwight, of Harvard, knowing that he was doomed to die from cancer, perfectly sure from day to day of the advance of his disease, realizing that there was absolutely no hope, and feeling the ravages of the infection ever more and more, yet continuing his classes and his laboratory work, gathering in the scattered ends of work that he had not yet completed, and bringing it to as fine a termination as possible, is a much better example of heroism than the man who before applauding thousands, refuses to allow any manifestation of pain to escape him lest he should be disgraced.

There is the story of the Spartan boy who having stolen a fox concealed it beneath his outer garment, and fearful lest it should be discovered, permitted the animal to tear out his vitals rather than reveal its presence. This is of course Spartan fortitude. It resembles much more nearly the fortitude of the American Indian in the old days. It needs no physical training to act thus, if the mind is firmly made up and the character has been thoroughly strengthened by high motives. A late General of the Jesuits refusing to take an anesthetic for the removal of his arm at the shoulder and standing the pain so well that his surgeons said that it seemed to be wax and not flesh that they were cutting, is an example of what training of the interior life can do. Very few of those who know the real power of even the gentlest of men, and apparently the most delicate of gentlewomen, to stand pain, have any idea that the supposed hardening process through which the prize fighter, the football player and some of the others go, is at all equal to training of character in its efficiency to enable the individual to withstand pain.

It has sometimes been said that rough and even criminal natures can be made better by training in athletics. It is not infrequently true that in reformatories some of the undernourished, muscularly defective, slum-raised prisoners seem to be incapable of improvement in conduct and unable to profit by such instruction as would fit them for useful service in later life, until they have been brought up to normal health. In the experience of the Reformatory at Elmira in New York, it is noted that many of these unfortunates from the city have neither the desire nor the capacity for the simplest instruction; but after a course of physical training, there appears the ability to profit by mental training. These are, however, very exceptional cases. It is a question of health and not of strength with them. I need scarcely say that it is not on such poorly nourished defective specimens of humanity that our athletic training is exercised in colleges. On the contrary it is on those of robust body and thorough muscular development that the trainers depend. It is just because competitive athletics distract the attention of those in charge of the departments of physical education from the weak and delicate who might be really improved in health and strength and vigor of mind as well as of body, to center their efforts on those who already have more than enough of the physical in their nature, that intercollegiate and interscholastic athletics are particularly undesirable.

A careful writer on the subject said in the California State Journal of Medicine for October, 1913:

> There can be no question as to the desirability of a fairly-developed muscular system, kept in reasonable activity both for its effect on the organism as a whole and the brain in particular. It is, however, to be observed that, considering the classes with which we are dealing, namely the students of high schools and universities, cases of muscular deficiency such as those encountered in Elmira are very rare.

When they do occur very little is done for them and the weaklings take their athletics sitting on the benches, "rooting" for the team or after journeying to some distant town they spend the night and the money they have won by betting, in riotous excesses of various kinds; at least so the newspapers tell us.

A very serious disturbance in the ethical field produced by competitive sports between colleges is the encouragement to betting which it affords. Many a boy at college gets a thorough course in the laying of odds from betting on the college team. That leads to all sorts of abuses. A year or two ago the story ran that the most important member of the team of a large university was offered a considerable bribe in order "to throw the game." He was known to be a man working his way through college, and money might therefore seem much to him; this in spite of the fact that athletes who work their way through college do not have to work very hard and are not infrequently paid so well for little work that it is evident their jobs are only an excuse to keep them from violating the rule of receiving money directly for playing on a team. It is probable, however, that the sum of money mentioned in the transaction was larger than this young man had ever seen together at any one time. There is doubt whether the bribe was ever offered. It was surely not accepted, but the police had to protect, from the students, the man who was said to have offered it. Apparently they were afraid that such temptation might win their players and anyhow they were not willing to treat the incident with contempt. They had been educated to know how much of a temptation money is.

The other serious abuse is the condition that obtains so often in cities after a big game has been played. These abuses were so flagrant when the big games were in New York that the universities had to take them out of the city. It was feared at first that this would injure the gate receipts, and the gate receipts are the sacred "cat" of college athletics and must not be touched, or there will be serious disturbance among those interested in athletics. Literally millions of dollars a year are now spent in various ways on athletics in this country; gate receipts are enormous, there are scandals in the handling of the money that are hushed up; there are scandals in the allotment of tickets, influence, and pull, and push of all kinds are used in the scramble to get seats, and all of this is the introduction that the young man at the university has to life. He certainly learns the game of modern life and comes to believe that success is the one thing that counts and that looking out for oneself and one's immediate friends, quite regardless of other people, is the supreme rule.

The men who win money on bets, naturally spend it liberally and there are big suppers, and now that the games are held away from New York City the students take the evening trains into the city and celebrate "properly." Broadway knows of their coming and gets ready for them and there is a glorious time.

Some may think this an exaggeration. It is of course, if it be considered to apply to a great part of the student body. Fortunately most college students are not in a position to spend money quite as liberally as this would indicate, but the "golden youth," whose example is so infectious, do it regularly. The reporters of our New York papers could tell stories about them and the general happenings after a big game that would make rather startling reading if they were considered fit to print. These are the abuses connected with athletics and though from the abuse no argument holds against the proper use of a thing, yet they seem almost inevitably connected with a development in modern education that the physician, the educator, the moralist, practically agree in condemning. Yet this development instead of growing less under the shadow of their disfavor is actually growing larger and has spread from the colleges and universities to the high schools and is now in course of introduction into the grammar schools, and this all over the country. It represents a most interesting state of affairs. In the concluding paper I shall discuss why this state of affairs has developed and continues.

JAMES J. WALSH, M.D., PH.D.

Artist, Priest and Exile

THE story of the Mexican Studio in New York City is the story of four hundred Jesuits of Mexico, driven by persecution from their homes and churches, and scattered abroad penniless, some in the United States, others in Cuba, and others yet in different parts of South America. It is the story of an artist to whom natural talents and endowments were but secondary to a vocation to the priesthood and the religious life; of one who, in the day of poverty and distress, has again taken up his brush and color-box to bring some little aid to his exiled brother priests, with one of whom he is conducting the Studio.

Father Gonzalo Carasco, S.J., the artist, is a native of Mexico. As a young man he studied art under Mexican, French and Italian masters in his native country, where he was entered as a student at the National Mexican Academy in Mexico City. At the Academy his artistic ability was clearly established, and at the end of his course he decided to go to Europe, to make a tour of the principal galleries and museums. But, almost on the eve of his departure, he felt a call to the priesthood and the religious life, and, at the age of twenty-five years, definitely laid aside all thought of a career as an artist in the world to enter the Society of Jesus. After his novitiate at San Simon, Michoacan, and having made his studies at Saltillo, Mexico, the young Jesuit was sent by his superiors to Spain, that he might copy the principal masterpieces in the El Prado Museo, at Madrid. In this famous gallery he specialized in the painting of heads, modeling himself somewhat after Murillo, for which master alone Father Carasco can be said to show any Spanish inclinations at all. His sympathies and early training, however, drew him to the French and Italian schools and not to the Spanish.

In the course of time Father Carasco returned to Mexico and was ordained to the priesthood. In the hours available from his priestly work he painted many pictures, especially portraits; some of them were in churches, others in colleges. It is advisable to say "were," for now these same pictures have either been stolen or destroyed by the Mexican bandits and others; more than one have managed to find their way into this country, although their location is, of course, unknown save to their present owners. In the great Basilica of Nuestra Señora de Guadaloupe there is, or was up to the time of the revolution, a painting of heroic proportions, said to be one of the largest paintings in Mexico, representing the "First Miracle of Our Lady of Guadaloupe"; this painting is by Father Carasco. There is hope that the great size of the painting may have made it impossible for it to be removed from the Basilica, though that is no guarantee that it has not been riddled with shot.

At the time when the present revolution broke out in Mexico Father Carasco occupied the honored position of Rector of the Collegium Maximum, at Tepotzotlan. When the troops of Carranza took possession of the town the college was seized, and an American, serving as officer under Carranza, was placed in charge. His first act was to imprison Father Carasco and four other priests. Next he set out to explore the college, with the idea of securing loot. Then it was that he saw a number of paintings and, asking the name of the artist, was told that they were painted by Father Carasco. The adherents of the Mexican revolution are distinguished neither for learning nor other refinements of any kind and, with an eye to the future, the American Carranzista tried, by every means in his power, to win the rector of the college over to his party. In this he was, of course, unsuccessful, and Father Carasco was made a close prisoner in consequence. After two days Carranza himself arrived in Tepotzotlan, and Father Carasco was brought into the presence of the revolutionary chief. Carranza forced Father Carasco, by means of violent threats, to paint his portrait and, when he had done this, tried to get him to throw in his lot with the revolutionists. The priest refused even to entertain the idea. He was then urged to abandon the Catholic religion, which, very naturally, he scorned to do. Carranza himself even offered to make him Director of the National Mexican Academy, and the bait was disdainfully cast aside. So, by the direct orders of the chief, Father Carasco was exiled from Mexico.

The art of Father Carasco, as shown by examples of his work on view at the Mexican Studio, displays an intense devotion and spirituality, as though the hands which have been consecrated to offer the Holy Sacrifice were striving to convey some spiritual truth through the painted canvas. There is a richness of color, striking yet subdued, carrying with it a thought of glaring sunlit squares without, and cool, shaded porticoes within: a gentleness, a purity, and an indescribable something that may best be defined as national temperament, if such a term may properly be applied to the emotional effect of any painting. Father Carasco has found his inspiration in the conventional school of Christian art, in devotional subjects, as also in portraiture, and has strongly imprinted upon his work the force of his own personality and the expression of the highest artistic ideals of his native Mexico. At this writing Father Carasco has in process of completion a large canvas figuring the spiritual conquest of Paraguay by the Jesuits. The scene is a river winding through a tropical forest. A raft moves up the river, and on it is seen a small company of Jesuits, some with musical instruments, others with books of psalmody. All are engaged in singing the divine praises, and with them are two Indian converts. The only arms of the party are their beads and the peaceful instruments of music. A party of Indians on the river bank is seen rushing down, surprised beyond expression at the sight of this company of white men in strange habits and unarmed. It is hoped to place this picture on public exhibition shortly.

The Mexican Studio is not a bureau for soliciting alms, nor is it connected in any way with any party in Mexico. It is the noble-hearted effort of one who is a great artist, a Catholic priest and an exile, to provide by his brush and skill some little sustenance for four hundred fellow priests of the Society of Jesus who, like himself, have been cast out from their home and country. Since he became a Jesuit Father Carasco has consistently refused to use his artist's skill as a means of commercial advantage; now he offers it, not for himself, but for those who are in need. Patrons of the Mexican Studio, therefore, not only have the privilege of possessing masterpieces of art, but will hold for all time, in each picture from the hand of Father Carasco, a memorial of the blood, the sighs and the tears of the priests whom the persecutors of the Church have driven out of Mexico.

HENRY C. WATTS.

Catholic Summer Camps

TO the careful parent the most anxious time of the year is the vacation period, and for the son these holidays are filled with perils. Released from the daily duties school imposes, convinced that each day is intended for recreation purposes, the average boy in his undirected search for amusement unconsciously braves the dangers of ill-advised companionship and means of pleasure. Associates of his own years are necessary; his activity must find in games an opportunity to give vent to youthful spirits, the boy's inborn craving for knowledge and adventure will not be stifled. Whether the lad stays at home or at a summer resort the conditions are similar and constant supervision is practically impossible. The camp alone can fully supply the boy's needs. For there his companions are carefully chosen for him, his love for sports is satisfied, the world of nature, with its wonders of sky and woods and lake, is always close to him, and, best of all, the camp is under the direction of earnest men who are wholly occupied in planning his pleasures, guarding from dangers and teaching him the boy's lore of the wild.

Filling as it does the gap in the school year to the complete satisfaction of the boy and to the great relief of his father and mother, no wonder the summer camp has been so successful. In New England alone about 400 camps are yearly affording thousands of boys a season of exhilarating out-door life and promoting their physical and moral growth. Nor is there any hardship in the boy's living under wind-swept canvas, for in practically every one of the camps enumerated are buildings containing a kitchen, dining rooms, lockers, lavatories, a library, and particularly a big hall, where, about an open fire, the evening can be spent and rainy days passed in comfort. The tents are always elevated above the ground, furnished with a good floor and well equipped with flies, so dampness or rain are kept out. Canvas rowboats, sailboats and launches give unlimited fun afloat, and no camp entrusts any of its flotilla to a boy who has not passed adequate swimming tests and who has not proved that he knows how to handle himself prudently and to manage a boat skilfully.

The summer camp is the solution of a serious educational problem. A vacation passed there ceases to mean a complete break in the process of a boy's development, for under the disguise of woodcraft, the making of collections, manual training, first-aid work, navigation and like activities, the boy is storing away useful information and taking a laboratory course in subjects that schools can only teach from manual and specimen. The routine varies, of course, from that of student life, but those qualities of character fostered in school are by no means neglected in camp. For there the virtues of obedience, attention, observation, courtesy, regard for others' rights, self-control, resolution and courage become real habits. A boy's health and strength, moreover, are remarkably promoted in these camps, for a whole summer passed in the open with supervised athletic work and carefully graded exercises, good food and purest water can not fail to send the boy home with a sound, vigorous constitution.

Mens sana in corpore sano is the slogan of all camp directors. But in the Catholic camp great stress is also laid on the importance of the boy's keeping his soul in good health. Parents appreciate this, and they have seconded so well the enterprise of those who have started camps for Catholic boys that to-day our camps in clientele, equipment, environment and management admit no superiors and few peers among those conducted by non-Catholics. Other camps with less material pretensions, though directed with equally high principles, extend their benefits to boys whose fathers desire, but can not afford the best. Such camps, whether conducted by priests, Brothers or earnest laymen are attaining the same end that the Catholic school always has in view: the protection of the child's precious heritage of faith during the most impressionable period of his life.

A boy's associations and environment have, of course, a strong influence on his character formation. Consequently his intimate contact with masters and acknowledged leaders, his constant intercourse with companions, in fact, the whole atmosphere of camp ought to be pervaded by a thoroughly Catholic spirit. It is not enough that all nature should eloquently proclaim its Creator's power and majesty; it is not enough that the masters should be Christian gentlemen. To keep the boys' belief and practice vigorous, something more is required, namely the Sacraments, the presence of the Holy Eucharist, the priest's influence and that of masters who take the lead in performing acts of devotion and virtue. Therefore all Catholic camps number on their staff seminarians whose priestly training and aspirations well fit them for a work which is admirably in keeping with their vocation. Their presence in the camp makes a high standard of discipline and conduct on the part of the boys easier to maintain.

It is beyond the scope of this paper to say much about camps conducted by associations and church organizations, for that work is of a different kind, being practically recreational, and necessarily so because of the constantly changing membership, for the boys stay in camp but a short time. And if the advantages derived from the life at the remote, long-season camps are not to be had from this class, still many real benefits are offered. The zeal and love of the promoters and executives are carrying on the more important work of making it possible for our young men and boys to pass a vacation under Catholic auspices, and they are thus lessening the influence of a wealthy sectarian organization, which uses the summer camp as a very enticing lure for our unsuspecting youth. Indeed, the initial movement for the formation of organized summer camp work among boys of the poorer class, was largely motived by the realization of the gravity of this danger. Experience and observation had pointed out unmistakeably that for boys who had no other hope of an outing, associations such as the Y. M. C. A. and the non-Catholic Boy Scouts had an attraction that was extremely hard to resist.

J. T. B. FISHER.

Director of Camp Namaschaug.

COMMUNICATIONS

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

Prohibition

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Our lovely critic in Scottdale said in the Pittsburg Observer for May 6, 1915, page 2, that the ministers of the Episcopal Church, who in their communion service place the cup of alcoholic wine to the lips of every man and woman, of every boy and girl, are "wolves instead of shepherds." Then he sat down and wrote a letter, telling me how "we must cater to not well-informed Protestant minds, to gain them for Christ the Good Shepherd." The method of catering to not well-informed Protestant minds and of gaining them for Christ by stigmatizing their ministers as wolves, is new to me. I never employed it, and I am not prepared to employ it in the future. In the early Christian Church Holy Communion was administered under both species to men and women, to boys and girls, even to infants. Pope Gelasius and Pope Leo the Great ordered that the faithful should either receive Holy Communion under both species, or not at all (see "Catholic Encyclopedia," Vol. IV, p. 177). They issued these orders for the purpose of detecting pretended Catholics of the Manichean stripe, who condemned the use of wine.

Our critic introduces to us Bishop Canevin who "said in an address in Cleveland some few years ago that sixty thousand die from drink every year in the United States." Congressman Richmond P. Hobson said "some few years ago," in his book "The Great Destroyer," p. 9, that in our country "700,000 men are cut off untimely every year by alcohol." The Rev. "Billy" Sunday said "some few years ago" and recently (in Philadelphia) that the number of persons killed in our country every year by alcohol is 600,000. Other "dry" agitators said "some few years ago" that this number is 85,000; others again that it is 40,000. Their "figures" are anywhere between 10,000 and 700,000. Now, there is Mr. Jason Martin who proves in chapter IX of his recently-published book "The Fallacy of Prohibition" that "some few years ago," in 1911, the number of deaths from "alcoholism," i.e., from the abuse of alcoholic liquors, was 4,602 in the whole United States and never reached the 5,000 mark. His proof is taken from United States "Mortality Statistics for 1911," page 59. There is quite a difference between 4,602 and 700,000. God bless the dear souls of our "dry" arithmeticians! In our younger days when we went to school, 'rithmetics were taught with a hickory stick, and if we poor fellows turned out solutions of an arithmetical problem, which varied between 4,602 and 700,000, the best we could do was to get ready for the reception of a solid spanking. It's a pity that wholesale hickory stick has been relegated to the attic! Bishop Canevin either did not make the assertion, attributed to him, or he was deceived by some "dry" spouter. He never declared and never will declare for state-wide or nation-wide prohibition.

Note that, according to "Mortality Statistics for 1911," pages 59 and 133, the average rate of deaths from alcoholism was 4.9 per 100,000 population and that cities in "dry" States contributed large quotas to the number of 4,602 persons who died from the abuse of alcoholic drinks. The rate of deaths from alcoholism was, for instance, in the cities of "dry" Maine 8.9 per 100,000 population, while the rate of deaths from the same cause in the cities of "wet" Kentucky was only 3.2 per 100,000 population. Is it reasonable to force 100,000 persons on the "water wagon," because five of them ruin themselves through the abuse of alcoholic liquors? If it is, sound logic demands that we prohibit first the use of milk and water as beverages. For Dr. Joseph M. Matthews, formerly president of the Kentucky Board of Health, stated recently that "for every death produced by whiskey, there have been 1,000 deaths produced by drinking impure milk, and for every single death produced by whiskey there have been 3,000 deaths from drinking contaminated water" (quoted by J. Martin in chapter IX of his book). This statement is confirmed by United States "Mortality Statistics for 1911." The death-rate from typhoid fever alone, which is caused by impure water, exceeded four times the death rate from alcoholism.

Mannington is in a "dry" State, indeed. We are supposed to have "the most drastic prohibition law." But to judge from the number of "jolly fellows" who stagger along the streets of our cities, particularly on Saturdays, there are no signs of an excessive drought hereabouts. Of course, a man can not buy a glass of beer in a decent place, neither can he have it imported from another State. But if he visits one of our "speak easies" and owns the necessary coin, he can get all the "firewater" he wants and more than he needs. Our Tax Commissioner, Fred Blue, will die of the blues long before he succeeds in enforcing our "drastic prohibition law." The stupidity of our "dry" agitators reached its climax when they thought that they could wipe out men's appetite for alcoholic drinks simply by "rolling up" a large vote for the prohibition amendment. You can vote a State "dry," but you can not vote the people of a State "dry."

Our critic guessed well when he said that "fibbing may be one of the vices increased by prohibition." Prohibition breeds here, like everywhere else, hypocrites, sneaks, liars, "dope fiends," "boot-leggers" and drunkards. The increase of this crowd is the punishment we justly deserve for having attempted to "amend" the divine law that allows the moderate use of alcoholic liquors. But the time will come sooner or later when the people of West Virginia will shake off the Turkish yoke of prohibition. I stand for licensed and properly conducted saloons, instead of for "unlicensed saloons" which are veritable hell-holes. Not drink, but the abuse of drink, causes a number of evils. Men must be blamed for the abuse. To make things responsible for evils that are in reality caused by men themselves, is rank idiocy.

Mannington, W. Va. C. J. KLUSER.

The Right to Educate Our Children

To the Editor of AMERICA:

To supplement your excellent editorial entitled "Food for Thought," would it not be opportune to remind your readers, particularly those residents of New York State, of their rights and duties in regard to the education of the young. Under our system of government, the legislative power is primarily in the people and in the legislative body only by delegation from the people. In that body this power is subject to such limitations as the people may have imposed at the time of delegation. Hence, it is our duty to scrutinize every provision of the proposed Constitution which will empower our legislators in the future to enact our laws. The proposed section may be hereafter the source of mischievous legislation. It is safer to remedy this in radice. No infringement of our right to educate our children should be written into our Constitution even by implication.

In division VIII of the encyclical Sapientiæ Christianæ, promulgated on January 10, 1890, His Holiness, Pope Leo XIII said:

> We are unwilling to pass this point without exhorting here especially the fathers of families to regulate by these principles the government of their homes and the education of their children. The family is the cradle of civil society, and to a great extent it is in the domestic circle that the destinies of the states are prepared. Therefore those who would destroy Christian institutions begin by attacking the principle of the family by seeking to corrupt in it its most tender offshoot. They do not allow themselves to be turned aside from their object by any consideration of the fact that they can not accomplish that object without perpetrating upon the parents a most cruel outrage, for to those parents belongs, by virtue of the natural law, the right to educate those to whom they have given life, and with that right goes the obligation to shape the education so as to bring the children to that end for which it was permitted the parents to transmit to them the gift of life. . . . It is therefore of strict obligation upon the parents to repel vigorously all the unjust violence sought to be done in this matter and to preserve the exclusive right they have over the education of their children.

Brooklyn. CATHOLICUS.

Birth Control: An Open Letter

To Clara Gruening Stillman,
Secretary Birth Control League.

MY DEAR MADAM:—A careful searching of memory and an anxious examination of conscience have not enabled me to discover any act or utterance of mine which would justify you in expecting that I should consider favorably your invitation, which I have received, to become a member of the Birth Control League. I regard the practice which your organization desires to promote as immoral, degrading and stupid. The so-called contraceptive devices are intrinsically immoral because they involve the unnatural use, the perversion, of a human faculty. One of the most important human faculties is used in such a way as to frustrate its natural end. Such conduct is quite as immoral as self-mutilation, or the practice of solitary vice. Any person who rejects this fundamental moral principle concerning the wrongfulness of perverting a faculty, must logically hold that there is no such thing as intrinsic immorality, that moral badness is always identical with individual disutility, and that anything is right which any individual thinks is useful for him.

The practice in question is degrading because it perverts conjugal intercourse from cooperation (potential if not actual) with the Creator into a mere means of sensual gratification. It brings them down to the level of mutual instruments of indulgence. The disgusting calculation and repulsive artifice which characterize the various contraceptive devices, tend inevitably to diminish conjugal reverence, self-respect and mutual respect. It is doubtful whether any normal man or woman ever began such practices without suffering a severe moral shock, or continued them without serious moral degeneration. It is not surprising that men and women who thus pervert one of the highest functions of life, and the most intimate relation of marriage, should grow obtuse in their perceptions of the sacredness and exclusiveness of wedlock, and of the binding character of conjugal obligation. It is not a mere coincidence that childless marriages, and one or two-child marriages should form such a large proportion of the cases in which divorce is sought on "statutory grounds." Incidentally I would observe that, so far as I know, physicians are practically unanimous in declaring that all the contraceptive practices are in some degree injurious to health.

These practices are stupid because they are so evidently subversive of the end which the Birth Control League professes to promote; namely, human welfare. And the advocates thereof are short-sighted and superficial. They have not learned the obvious lessons of human history, nor grasped the fundamental facts of human psychology. They fail to realize the inevitable by-products of the practice. It is probably true that if the poorest laborers could restrict the size of their families, they could raise their standard of living, and increase to some degree their material welfare. But this is only one of the consequences. When we take a comprehensive view of the situation, we find that any group, class, or nation that once becomes addicted to the use of contraceptives does not give it up after the immediate material ends have been attained. They are not content to take advantage of these devices merely until they have reached a level of reasonable comfort. They continue them in the interest of ease and luxury. This is what has happened and is happening in those sections of the middle and upper classes that have adopted the abominable vice, and there is no good reason to hope that the poorer classes would fail to follow their example.

Now, the restriction of the number of children to one, two or three for the sake of ease and material satisfaction inevitably produces a disinclination to endure hardship, an inability to put forth painful effort, and a general weakening of moral fiber. This means a decline in every sort of efficiency; for the capacity to endure and the ability to do without, will forever remain the essential conditions of achievement. Talk as we will about "the joy of work," the sober fact is that every kind of labor involves painful exertion if it is carried on continuously, effectively, and up to the limit of one's capacity. There are few if any active persons who would not find it more pleasant to diminish considerably the amount of time and effort that they spend at their tasks. Now, a social practice, like the use of contraceptives, which aims at a life of ease and a shirking of unpleasant duties, reduces fatally the power of endurance, and the ability to carry on sustained and effective labor. It affects the few children that are born even more than the parents; for it deprives them of the necessary training in endurance, and keeps before them the bad example of their luxury-loving elders. They are not only small in quantity, but poor in quality; that is, in moral quality, which is the supreme human quality. The social group that has thus weakened its moral fiber inevitably declines in social power and importance. Witness the decadence of the New England strain in our own population; the condition of the French nation, as described and deplored by such authorities as the great economist, P. Leroy-Beaulieu; and the imminent degeneration that threatens certain sections of the English-speaking peoples in more than one country, as set forth in detail by Mr. Beale in his "Racial Decay."

I have no intention of denying that large sections of the laboring class have only too much opportunity to cultivate their capacity for endurance. They would be not only more comfortable but more efficient if this opportunity were considerably diminished. But the only safe way to bring about this result is by bettering their condition economically. The remedy advocated by the Birth Control League is futile and disastrous, inasmuch as, in the long run, and sometimes in the "short run," it impels its votaries to the other extreme, to the pursuit of ease and luxury, and to the adoption of ideals and practices which inevitably produce moral deterioration and a serious decline in efficiency. Wherever the small family cult is practised, it is both the effect and the cause of a conception of life which regards an indefinite increase of material satisfactions and sensations as the highest good. It involves the most far-reaching exemplification that the world has ever known of what Carlyle called "pig-philosophy." Why should we be in haste to fasten this curse upon the laboring classes? Until such time as the poorest laborers are put in possession of living wages, they have within their power an entirely innocent means of keeping down the number of their offspring, namely, conjugal abstinence. Those parents who have sufficient moral strength to adopt this means will be in no danger of character-degeneration through the presence of a small instead of a large family. Those who do not feel equal to this sacrifice can not afford to run the risk of the moral deterioration which follows the use of contraceptives. They need that natural and compulsory form of self-denial which a large family involves. I am well aware that it is easy to find exceptions to the dire consequences that I have attributed to the practice of the small family cult; but my statements apply to large social groups, and assume that the practice is maintained through two or three generations. In these conditions experience has shown, and continues to show, that the thing is socially disastrous.

Were I a believer in the doctrine that "the end justifies the means," I should, as a Catholic, rejoice in every extension of the nefarious practices advocated by the Birth Control League. For I should feel assured that every such extension was hastening the day when Catholics would become the predominant element in our population. Already the tendency in this direction has been considerably accelerated through the prevalence of the small-family cult among non-Catholics. Unfortunately many Catholics have been, to some extent, contaminated by the bad example set in this matter by their separated brethren. Nevertheless, the extent to which Catholics will become addicted to this vice will always remain relatively insignificant. For the Church will forever oppose it as something intrinsically and eternally immoral, and will deprive those who persist in it of access to the Sacraments. In the struggle for existence which the use of contraceptives has created, the Catholic element in our population will survive because it is the fittest to survive; that is, because the Catholic element will retain and sustain those moral qualities that are the chief factor in fitness for survival among human beings. The mass of Catholics will continue to cultivate those qualities which are the only safeguard against the development of rotten hearts and flabby intellects. Catholics will have not only the quantity, the numbers, but the quality as well; for in the nurture of human beings quality can not be maintained without quantity. The clearest proof of this statement is the fact that, as between, say, one hundred large families of the poor and an equal number of middle-class families who represent the second generation of votaries of the small-family cult, a larger number of efficient and achieving persons will arise out of the former group than out of the latter.

I am invited to send two dollars for membership in the Birth Control League. I must respectfully decline, with the observation that I had much rather give the money to an organization for the training of prize fighters. It would aid in the development of at least some manly and human qualities.

Yours, "more in sorrow than in anger,"

St. Paul. JOHN A. RYAN, D.D.

Understanding the Middle Ages

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I wish to enter a protest with regard to the article you admitted to your pages of May 13. Your contributor, Vincent M'Nabb, therein ventured to repeat for the benefit of your readers certain rules he had drawn up for a friend of his, rules calculated in his opinion to create sympathy with and right understanding of the Middle Ages.

For the Middle Ages, Father M'Nabb would seem to have a small admiration. And that should be to him a grace and a benediction. He has also, however, a touch of "the artistic temperament," a wholly recent disease; and his ideas as well as his admirations have become thereby distorted and false. The letter he has written to his friend MacEdon, and sent to AMERICA, is the letter of a prig. Had he a truer understanding of the medievalists, he would have known them as sincere and rational Christians. Sincere, they would have despised the affectations and silly attitudes which Vincent M'Nabb dreams for them. Rational, they would have made short work of superstition and sentimentality such as his. Christian, they would have been more reverent and sensitive of the sanctity of their Faith, in reference to their Divine Founder.

To anyone who knows the sense and restraint of such poet-theologians as Aquinas; of such leaders and thinkers as Antonino of Florence; to anyone who knows the singleness and sincerity of purpose displayed by the craftsmen of the Middle Ages, the vaporings of your contributor are as untrue as they are silly. He should be told that there still exists a living tradition in lineal descent from the Middle Ages. Aquinas would have no sympathy with such clever journalistic insincerities as your contributor ascribes to the medievalists.

New York. MODERN FRIAR.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, JUNE 5, 1915

Entered as second-class matter, April 15, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Contributions for the Mexican fund may be sent direct to AMERICA.

The Pope and the War

WELL-INFORMED Catholics have always protested against the state of subjection to which the Pope has been reduced by his present position in Italy. Not opposition to the aspirations of a nation, but deep concern for the interests of God has been at the root of their attitude. The high function of Supreme Pastor demands untrammeled freedom. The Father of all nations should be the subject of none. His is a universal sovereignty, and hence he should be at liberty to communicate with all peoples at all times. Although temporal power is not essential to the idea of supernatural supremacy, no one can fail to see how much it facilitates its exercise; for the popes, in spite of their exalted dignity, are human beings and as such must work through human agencies. Any situation therefore, that makes it likely or even possible that contingencies shall arise in which the interests of a temporal power may demand that a barrier be erected before the Throne of the Fisherman, is to be deprecated, and of its very nature must be pronounced unsatisfactory. In such a state of affairs no Catholic can willingly acquiesce. Even with the best of good will on the part of the Government whose subject the Pope is claimed to be, the danger of restrictions being put on the Holy Father can not be eliminated. He ought therefore to be free, absolutely free, free to come and to go, to send and to summon, to write and to be written to, and to communicate with the whole world without the permission of any earthly power. By the very nature of things it ought to be beyond the jurisdiction of any single person or any group of persons in any way to hamper or question or censor the intercourse he may deem it advisable to hold with his children.

That this point of view is justified by the present war must be clear to any one who reflects on the matter. La Legge delle Guarentigie, commonly known as the Law of Guarantees, passed by the Italian Government, May 13, 1871, professed to assure the Holy Father of his independence. It will be remembered that Pope Pius IX protested the following year that the full measure of freedom necessary for the proper exercise of his office could not be secured to him by any such guarantees. Obviously the Parliament that passed the law might abrogate it. Besides, even though the law remained on the statute book, circumstances might arise which would curtail even the sorry independence allowed by the Legislature.

Events of the last two weeks have justified the foresight of the Holy Father. For a time the whole Catholic world was a prey to anxiety lest the Italian Government might think it necessary to interfere with the working of the Law of Guarantees, and lest the Envoys of Austria and Germany to the Vatican might be sent their passports at the time the Ambassadors of those two countries to Italy were dismissed. Fortunately this step was not deemed necessary, and so there has been no breach of faith on the part of the Italian Government. Although the Pope has been spared this affront, yet the situation that he deprecated has actually come to pass. The Austrian and German Envoys to the Vatican have retired from Rome for the time being, not at the request of the Pope, but by force of circumstances and on their own initiative, communication with their own Governments having become practically impossible. Had the Pope a kingdom of his own, were it never so small, where he ruled supreme, he would still be in official communication with sixty millions, more or less, of Catholics whose public representatives it was thought wise should be withdrawn. The incident is highly instructive, especially for those Catholics who have allowed themselves to talk glibly but foolishly about the advisability of a separation between the temporal and supernatural power of the Pope.

Blind Eyes

A LEARNED association in Washington is in search of a workable code of morals. It proposes to use this code as the basis of a moral system to be taught in the public schools. Substantial prizes are offered to stimulate the constructive faculties of silent Solons and dubious Dracos, hidden, it may be, in remote quarters of this fair land. The association's quest proves this at least: that there is a decided need of moral instruction in the schools. We have put religion out of the schools, and year by year, the absurdity of the absolute divorce, zealously maintained between secular and religious instruction, becomes more apparent and more harmful. But matters are not to be mended by insisting further upon a divorce between religion and morality, which, it would seem, the association proposes to do. At its best, morality without religion is a morality with a purely human sanction, a species of transcendental sumptuary legislation. In its average, it is a morality based upon motives suggested by expediency. Always, it is a cold abstract system, with an appeal no stronger than that offered by a set of statistics.

Who was the man who suddenly discovered that all his life he had been speaking prose? Some day, it may dawn upon these learned men that the world already possesses a system of morality worth trying. It is based upon the Ten Commandments and the Sermon on the Mount. A copy of these two documents would merit, although it probably would not win, the association's first prize of a thousand dollars.

Lovest Thou Me?

JUST after the miraculous draught of fishes that occurred during the first year of Christ's Public Life, St. Peter cast himself humbly at the Saviour's feet and told how unworthy he was of having Christ as a friend, and again some two years later, shortly after another marvelous haul of fish, the Prince of the Apostles was not afraid to ask even the Searcher of Hearts Himself to bear witness to the strength and sincerity of the love he felt for the Master. The attendant circumstances of both miracles likewise indicate admirably the strength and sincerity of the Master's love for Simon. Both times Christ was, of course, perfectly aware that Peter and the other fishermen had toiled the whole night long but had caught nothing. He realized too, how tired, hungry and discouraged they were. So He first relieved their immediate temporal needs. Before calling Simon to the apostolate, Christ filled with fish the boats of Peter and his partners. Prior to conferring the primacy on Simon He invited him and his followers to breakfast. While bringing to a successful issue matters of the highest spiritual importance, Our Saviour, be it noted, does not at all neglect temporal details of trifling moment. So when the Apostles reached the shore of the lake that Paschal morning long ago, they found that the Master had ready for His "children" "hot coals lying, and a fish laid thereon and bread," they heard Him bidding them add to the meal choice portions of their own catch and they beheld Him serving them Himself.

Having lovingly refreshed His guests with material food, thus making that lakeside breakfast beautifully symbolize what He was about to do, the Good Shepherd commissioned St. Peter and all who should follow that Apostle in the pastoral office, to feed the lambs and sheep of the flock affectionately and carefully till time should be no more, completing and perfecting in this way the organization of the Church. Moreover, in asking Simon Peter before making him Chief Shepherd, "Lovest thou Me?", Christ plainly showed that the main requisite He seeks in those who, whether priests or laymen, would assist in feeding the Lord's flock, is a strong attachment to Him. No one can offer the Sacred Heart effective reparation for others' disloyalty until he has first proved by the daily beauty of his life his own passionate interest in the success of the Master's cause. "Lovest thou Me?" is the question Christ is constantly putting to each Catholic. Happy is he who can answer sincerely with St. Peter, "Lord, Thou knowest that I love Thee," for the spectacle of such a man's practical piety "edifies the Church" and feeds generously the Good Shepherd's flock.

Coeducation and the Race

THE question of the education of women has been under discussion of late, with the usual result that opinions very diverse in character have been expressed. Provost Smith of Pennsylvania University, where coeducation of the complete type exists, finds Pennsylvania's system unsatisfactory and advocates the construction of a new building to be devoted exclusively to the use of the female students, some of whom "seem to be more interested in the male students than in acquiring knowledge." He would have the new college "a long, long way from the University buildings," and although he would retain the same teaching staff for both sexes, he would have the lectures given to the young men and young women separately. At the same time the Commission of the University of Pittsburgh appointed to investigate the institutions where women alone are educated, comes to the conclusion that women's colleges as at present constituted are a menace to the future of the race, and urges all parents to "send their daughters to coeducational universities or at least to semi-coeducational ones, such as Harvard and Columbia." The reason for this position is the rather startling assertion that "women's colleges are hastening the extinction of the old American stock," because they fail to give their students either the inclination or aptitude to become wives and mothers. The refusal to enter the state of matrimony, or to abstain when they do enter it, from the practice of race suicide, is upheld by the Commission from statistics, the accuracy of which, however, has been seriously questioned or denied by the officials of a number of women's colleges. Coeducation is held up as the solution of the difficulty, as it would give young women the opportunity to meet young men.

The discussion is an instance of the state of mind which ignores the real solution of the difficulty and grasps at half-way measures that must strike every one as hopelessly inadequate. If the faculties of women's colleges would teach their students the sanctity, stability and nobleness of the marriage state instead of allowing them to grow up with the notion that it is a mere passing contract, with no higher purpose that the individual's pleasure, no other sanction than the individual's whim, no other permanence than the individual's caprice; and if they would in addition impress on them some of the elementary and obvious obligations that spring from the natural law, the problem that they find so disquieting would cease to be a problem at all. Starting from the false premises which are taught under the guise of such doctrines as eugenics, it is no wonder if the students adopt false standards of conduct, involving the repudiation of fundamental responsibilities. In doing so they are only logical. Not the students but the educators are chiefly to blame. Not coeducation but simple instruction in the primary precepts of nature is the need of our young women.

Dodos and Mothers

DODOS are extinct; faithful mothers are tending the same way, especially where money is plentiful. Nowadays the fashionable matron who deigns to become a mother seems to think that her duty is done, once her child is born. The infant is committed to a nurse; the mother plays bridge and drinks "highballs" in winter, and flits from resort to resort in summer. The baby grows; the mother sees it for a few minutes a day, when she happens to be home. Still the baby grows, in body at least; it is a pert domineering little prig by this; its will is law; nurse and governess are its servants. They can accomplish nothing; after all no one can replace a parent, and violation of the natural law has sanctions. The child is at school now, a froward, petulant creature, abnormal in a thousand ways. Its training is difficult and never fully accomplished. It leaves the school deficient in ideals and will power. And the mother? She was irresponsible before, she is a fool now, less a mother than ever; more intent on the world and the things of the world. A doting mother, the creature is called. Her daughter is flung into gayeties of a thousand sorts, thrown into the society of so-called desirable gentlemen, cads who never knew a manly instinct in their whole existence. The girl tossed on society's waves, distracted and flattered, loses the little sense she had. The rest comes naturally; the cause of it is a creature, who though called a mother, is just a plain idiot.

The "Times" and the Belgian Priests

JUST now AMERICA's mail contains many protests against an article in the New York Times, accusing Belgian priests of a hideous crime. For the consolation of those troubled in spirit, the editor of AMERICA begs to say that he addressed the following remonstrance to the editor of the Times:

To the Editor of the Times:

May 24, 1915.

An article on war babies in the Times' Book Review for May 23 contains the following sentence:

> "Such is the feeling aroused that in Belgium priests have openly advised women to commit infanticide rather than rear children of invaders."

This horrible statement is not only offensive to your Catholic patrons; it is also a grave injustice to heroic and God-fearing men. To their already great sufferings must now be added the sense of wrong that comes from a calumny which depicts them as Herods. One would have thought that the writer of the article would have first made sure of her grounds before penning such an odious charge. A word of inquiry would have brought her the information that Bishop de Wachter, Cardinal Mercier's auxiliary, has twice denied publicly and absolutely that such advice was given by a Catholic priest.

A keener sense of responsibility on the part of your journalists who deal with matter touching the Catholic Church would be very much appreciated by Catholic readers. In the present instance ordinary care would have saved those of us who know the Belgium clergy the humiliation of seeing their friends ranked among the abettors of murder.

Respectfully, etc.,

R. H. TIERNEY, S.J.
Editor of AMERICA.

The Times printed this version of the letter:

A CATHOLIC PROTEST

To the Editor of the New York Times:

An article on war babies in The Times of May 23 contains the following sentence:

> "Such is the feeling aroused that in Belgium priests have openly advised women to commit infanticide rather than rear children of invaders."

This horrible statement is not only offensive to your Catholic patrons, but it is also a grave injustice to heroic and God-fearing men. To their already great sufferings must now be added the sense of wrong that comes from a calumny which depicts them as Herods. One would have thought that the writer of the article would have first made sure of her grounds before penning such an odious charge. A word of inquiry would have brought her the information that Bishop de Wachter, Cardinal Mercier's auxiliary, has twice denied publicly and absolutely that such advice was given by a Catholic priest.

NEW YORK, May 24, 1915. R. H. TIERNEY, S.J.

A last word. Protests from patrons are always welcome, but in instances of this kind they are effective only when addressed to the offenders.

"Freebooting Pirates"

THE writer of history is at an enormous advantage when he knows his subject, and so, when Mr. Poultney Bigelow wrote recently in the New York Times on the Prussian character, he had the advantge of receiving his early education at a gymnasium, in Berlin, in company with the present Emperor of Germany; though whether that justifies him in his conclusions rests with himself, and those who know the German nation. The concluding remark of Mr. Bigelow is more general. He writes: "The South Germans . . . flourished when the forests and swamps of Prussia were still fields for freebooting pirates in the garb of sturdy monks and castle-building friars."

It is quite possible that Mr. Bigelow wrote with his Chaucer open before him, at the passage where the knight fought "against the heathen in Prusse," and with a pedantic preciseness identified the heathen with the monks and friars who generally dwelt on heaths and in other barren places. Even so, such an etymological excursion would make a severe tax on his imagination in order to square with the description of "freebooting pirates." The plain fact is that whatever qualifications Mr. Bigelow may have for enlarging upon the forests and swamps of Prussia, his knowledge of monks and friars is lamentably deficient. Sturdy the monks must have been, their exploits with the spade and plow, the swamp lands they reclaimed, the monasteries, churches and schools they erected all bear evidence of that. Their labors in art, music, literature and crafts of every kind were not exactly the accomplishments of freebooting pirates; nor has castle building been commonly regarded hitherto as something characteristic of the friars, who for the most part lived in wretched shacks in the slums of cities. There is more than a touch of "Ivanhoe" in Mr. Bigelow's estimation of the medieval religious Orders of Prussia. If, unfortunately, he finds himself unequal to discriminating between the monastic orders that have kept their Rule and still survive, and the military orders, that did get out of order and were suppressed, a dignified silence were more becoming than to label as "freebooting pirates" a body of men whose chief aim in life was to attend to their own affairs.

That Blessed Word, Automatic

"AUTO" was once a suspicious addition to a word. Autocrat was disliked; autobiography was not in great favor. Now all is different. Nothing is more desirable in life or more attractive in advertising than "auto." We are hastening to the paradise of automatism. Homer's imagination was considered extravagant when he dreamt of self-growing crops for a farmer's paradise and self-sailing ships for a nautical paradise. Now such dreams would leave the most simple reader unmoved. Plowless fields and rudderless ships are tame to modern minds. From twilight sleep and the motherless incubator to euthanasia and the auto-hearse, life is growing ever more effortless and more automatic.

Painless study is approaching. When you left the nursery for school, the educational value of play was not properly appreciated. The idea of the teacher seemed to have been to keep you working all the time at home as well as at school, and it was the idea of your parents, jealous of the teacher's tasks, to heap up a thousand additional chores for you to do throughout the intervening spaces of your life. Play in your boyhood or girlhood was a kind of piracy with mysterious whistles and stealthy exits and fearful moments of expectant discovery and the thrill of narrow escapes. Now play is a whole science in itself with curriculums and diplomas and professors and all that. The park and play-ground are the university of to-morrow. Bookless schools are on the way. Photography and the moving picture have replaced the novel, the short-story, the newspaper, cartoons, advertisements, comic supplements, sports and all. Is there any reason why history should not go on the screen and poetry too? The crusaders could fare across the world on one reel. "Wait a moment please." Then on the next reel Mary, Mary's lamb, Mary's school, would serve to unfold to delighted eyes the tragic poem, which in more barbarous days would be laboriously transferred to a rebellious memory.

All music has been automatized by a punctured paper or a dinted record; mathematics is handled by the comptometer; escalators and moving platforms take you up where the autocars have set you down; fireless cooking, predigested food, and eupeptic tablets have made eating in all its stages automatic. If some muscle or organ should fail in its duty, the offending member is harnessed to a machine and an electric current, and exercise is given to you without exertion on your part. But why worry about members? They may soon be atrophied to ornaments. Walking will eventually be one of the lost arts. Many occupations of the fingers have gone. For letters you may talk into a tube, puncture a paper, run the stencil through a type-writer, let your letter pass on to a folding, sealing, stamping machine into a pneumatic delivery which will pass on the letter to your friend across the continent, there to be self-opened and thrown on the screen for his easy perusal. Fingers may serve to display jewelry, but if they have been eliminated from writing and music, why not from all else? You can play an orchestra by pressing a button; will not a switchboard soon be enough to carry on war?

Self-starters, self-speeders, self-stoppers, these are the triumphs of automatism. Yes, but what of self-restraint, self-denial, self-control? "Not so loud!" Light a candle or in extreme cases make out a check. Religion can not escape the monopoly of automatism. Let religion be all feeling. "One impulse from a vernal wood" will make one feel holy for a week, if the automobile does not figure in the Monday morning casualty list. Feeling is spontaneous and apparently automatic. To be virtuous is to check and control feeling; it is to act in accordance with principle; it is to be obedient to law. Wanted, an invention to make all virtues self-acting and frictionless! On with the spread of automatism!

LITERATURE

As to Shakespere's Heroines

THE fact that Shakespere created many heroines and no hero is often noted, and because of his profound knowledge of human nature is considered incontrovertible proof that women are more noble than men, more beautiful of character, truer, tenderer, more gently strong. Every woman applauds the conclusion, but does it flow from the premises?

That Shakespere had intimate knowledge of human nature is never questioned even by critics who struggle against the current of general opinion and grant him little or no other excellence. He saw clearly into the minds and hearts of kings and peasants, of queens and of their serving-maids, of courtiers and cardinals, of knaves and fools; saw not only their virtues and their vices, their loves and hates, but their little weaknesses, their fads and follies. Every play, each scene of every play, bears witness to the breadth and depth of this insight. He had, also, and that was essential to his success as a playwright, a thorough understanding of his audiences. For them he wrote; on their approval his fame and fortune waited. Readers of the plays there were none in his day, and of posterity he thought not at all, as is manifest from his neglect of any effort to preserve the manuscripts of even the greatest among his dramas.

Now, in the days when the Globe Theater was the wonder and the admiration of English play-lovers, London's newest attraction, the more alluring because all drama was still frowned upon in many quarters, audiences were made up largely of men. Women formed but a small minority. It was men, then, for whom Shakespere wrote. Herein lies—does it not?—the reason that his scenes, often reeking with bloodshed and crime, crowded and over-crowded with horrors, are sweetened by the gentle loveliness of such women as Cordelia, Portia and Desdemona, rather than redeemed by the courage and manliness of heroes whom, we can not doubt, he could easily and sincerely have created had he so desired. It was Cordelia who, in the greatest of his dramas, makes bearable the sight of the tragic misery which treads upon the heels of her "old kind father's" folly; she, who atones for her sisters' perfidy and ingratitude, too hideous to give aught save pain to the audience were not the thought of her truth and goodness and deep, reticent affection ever present, sweetening each terrible scene. Without Ophelia Hamlet were a nightmare of such doubts and torture of mind as men shrink from recalling. She, very loving in her childlike way, fair and frail and exquisitely sensitive, is some one to admire, to pity tenderly, to love chivalrously: the sole bright spot in a world of gloom.

Hero or heroine soars high above the average level of our human nature and closely approaches the ideal. It would be difficult indeed to find heroic one merely better than ourselves, one not also dissimilar. A woman will find her ideal in the man who knows no fear, who is strong with the strength she lacks, tender towards those weak like herself, aggressive when she would shrink; on the other hand, a man will kneel to gentleness, sweetness, lovableness, delicacy of wit, lightning-like intuition; qualities, one or all of which are the charm and glory of Shakespere's heroines. No man would ever have gone home to dream of a warrior who in battle braved dangers but little greater than he himself had faced and overcome in the never-to-be-forgotten day of the Armada, or the gallantry of one not more gallant than Sir Walter Raleigh and a score of courtiers whom he saw frequently, perhaps knew well, and found very much like himself.

Shakespere knew his audiences; we may be certain of that. He studied them as he studied each phase of humanity that came within range of those deep-seeing eyes of his. The greatest of English poets, he was also the most practical; a consummate artist, he was at the same time a good man of business. So, wisely both for his own success and the highest pleasure of his audiences did he appeal to the chivalry of a generation of men among whom medieval reverence for womanhood was yet strong and to which they clung the more loyally that its foundations had been rudely shaken. And, exalting all women in exalting one, he could touch their hearts where each one's love was deepest and most sacred. The charm of his gentle, tender heroines was the charm those men knew and cherished in their sweethearts and their wives, their old mothers and their half-grown daughters. The sad, lonely hearts of old men glowed when on the stage was vividly portrayed what they had vehemently loved in their youth, deeply loved and reverenced in mature years, whose loss had left them broken, helpless and lonely. In the girlish grace and delicate ardor of such heroines as Shakespere presented, men, younger by some years, worn by the ceaseless struggle for a livelihood, only less bitter then than now, found rest for minds weary with hum-drum affairs, and had their hearts refreshed and thrilled in a way that found an outlet in unexpected caresses for wives growing old beside them, but once young and in their eyes as beautiful and as winsome as Juliet or Rosalind. Youths joyously learned to love more truly fair, shy little English maids, because Cordelia taught them what depths of loyalty and tenderness were hidden in their timid, girlish hearts; to rate more highly their buoyancy, learning from Portia how noble is the spirit which hopes always for the best, how noble and how strong; to appreciate more nearly at its worth sprightliness such as Rosalind's, trustfulness such as Desdemona's. In these ways did Shakespere's heroines, painted with a sureness of touch and a delicacy all his own, set on fire the souls of men who would have been as stone before faultless warriors and scrupulous statesmen; who would have sneered at gentleness in kings and meekness in cardinals.

Not one of the plays has a hero, nearly every one a heroine so good as to remain a symbol of all that is best in poor human nature, so charming as to be for all time a type of what is most attractive in womanhood; and Shakespere "held the mirror up to nature." Granted willingly, the implied conclusion: but perhaps it would be generous and honest as well, to admit that, because every rule has exceptions, there have been and are such beings as heroes, and to question whether Shakespere, writing to please, not possible readers, not posterity, but the hundreds of men who, day by day, year after year, thronged the "yard" of the Globe Theater, really wrote with strict justice.

FLORENCE GILMORE.

REVIEWS

A Grammar of the Greek New Testament in the Light of Historical Research. By A. T. ROBERTSON, M.A., D.D., LL.D. New York: George H. Doran Company. $5.00.

This excellent work of Dr. Robertson is really monumental. The mere bulk of it, 1,400 large, clearly-printed pages including a preface, an extensive bibliography and complete indices, would entitle it to this distinction even apart from the scholarly character of the work. In his preface he writes, "The book is grown so that in terror I often hold back." New Testament students will thank him for having kept to this work. From beginning to end the book is interesting and instructive. Comparative philology, the history of the various elements that make up grammar, apt illustrations of New Testament usages from the Greek dialects, from inscriptions, from contemporary literary writers, from the ostraca and papyri, the tracing of single words or expressions from Homer through the Atticists to the Alexandrians, from the Alexandrian period to the Byzantine, and at times to their present setting in modern Greek, give a fascination to the study and life of the traditionally dull, dead grammar.

Large as the book is, however, and complete in every detail, the volume adds little if anything to our knowledge of New Testament Greek, or the relation of the ostraca and papyri to its study. Deissman, Blass, Debrummer, Moulton, Milligan, Mayser, Wilcken and a host of others covered their own respective fields before Dr. Robertson. The real value of the book lies in this, that he has made a clever collation and synopsis of all that is best in the great grammarians and philologists. So thorough is this synopsis and so complete the references on every page that an ordinary student might dispense with other grammars and a specialist use it as an invaluable book of reference. There are, moreover, illuminating points of his own, and in the treatment of particular difficulties, as, for instance, in the arrangement of the conditional clauses, the author has the clearness and brevity of a gifted teacher. The illustrations of idiom from the vernacular while not always happy are suggestive.

Where all is so good one does not care to find fault. Yet the slavish following of other grammars has at times led Dr. Robertson to make citations that have to be corrected in the course of the work. We find an instance in point on p. 91, where we read: "The use of ἐν τῷ and the infinitive so common in Luke appears in the papyri." No reference to the papyri is given. Later: "The construction occurs in 'classical historians, in Polybius, and in papyri'" (p. 107), and we are referred to Moulton Prol. p. 14 (1st ed.). Further on we read, "But Blass observes that the classical writers did not use ἐν τῷ in the temporal sense of 'while' or 'during'" (p. 1072), and Dr. Robertson observes that Moulton yields the point in his third edition. So the ἐν τῷ so common in Luke in the sense of 'during' is not classical, and as yet we have no reference to the papyri.

One other instance: "The future participle is very rare in the New Testament, as in the papyri and κοινή generally" (p. 374). On p. 1118: "As already shown the future participle is much less frequent in the New Testament (as in LXX) than in the κοινή generally (as in the papyri)." On page 1119: "In the papyri I note it more frequently than in the New Testament," he writes and gives two examples, one from P. Goodspeed 4, and one from P. Tb. 33. A cursory glance at the Oxyrhynchus papyri shows its frequency is under-estimated. e.g., O. P. III. 496 (127 A.D.) seven times; O. P. III. 494 (156 A.D.) three times; O. P. I 58 (288 A.D.) twice, etc.

Considering the extent of the task and the endless sifting of material it exacted, the compression of so much in so relatively small a compass is admirable. Style must suffer in such compression. This is not the first book that has been surfeited with "as a matter of fact," as an introduction to a personal opinion. To "the now time" (p. 347), "cuts no figure" (pp. 489, 1008) and other similar expressions the Englishman who is quoted on p. 69 as saying that "the purest English known to him is spoken in Edinburgh and Louisville" might take exception. "The majority of well-educated people determine correct usage (the 'mos' loquendi, as Horace says)" (p. 31). Where may we find "mos" loquendi in Horace? And what perversity led Dr. Robertson to quote in the defense of the study of Greek a professor of Kalamazoo College? "Greek yet remains the very best means we have for plowing up and wrinkling the human brain and developing its gray matter, and wrinkles and gray matter are still the most valuable assets a student can set down on the credit side of his ledger" (p. x). If this is the result of Greek training, let us have none of it! O.

Manuale Theologiæ Moralis Secundum Principia S. Thomæ Aquinatis. In Usum Scholarum. Edidit DOMINICUS M. PRÜMMER, O.PR., Prof. in Universitate Friburgi Helvetiorum. Tom. I, II, III. S. Ludovici: B. Herder. $7.50.

So many works on moral theology have been published of late years that the author of these three volumes is careful to justify their appearance. There has been a tendency on the part of moralists, he argues, to incline too much toward casuistry, while some have paid so little attention to the discussion of principles that their books can almost be described as mere catalogues of sins. Father Prümmer's purpose is to reverse this order by insisting mainly upon the fundamental truths, trusting that their application will be sufficiently easy if the principles themselves have been thoroughly understood. The necessity of casuistry is not, of course, denied, but he assigns it a subordinate place. For authority and precedent Father Prümmer refers to the Angelic Doctor, who, in that portion of his "Summa Theologica" which deals with morals, "has little to say of the particular sins but much of the particular virtues." His conviction is that, from an intimate knowledge of the nature and exercise of the different virtues students will be enabled to form correct judgments of the opposite vices, and that such a method possesses the further advantage of affording the priest a valuable guide in the confessional, the pulpit, catechetical classes and in his own spiritual life. Adopting these methods and quoting extensively from the writings of his own great teacher, he believes that he can justly call his work a "Thomistic Moral Theology."

The author possesses the gift of great clearness in thought and expression, which is of prime importance in a work of this kind. Modern questions are plainly treated, though here naturally a variety of opinions will exist. Against pure probabilism as well as against probabiliorism and equiprobabilism, a series of objections is urged, for example, which the author considers unanswerable. He therefore accepts without hesitation the more recent systema compensationis seu rationis sufficientis, according to which we are not to follow a less probable opinion in preference to a more probable opinion, without first weighing the gravity of the doubtful law and the degree of probability contained in the opposing opinion. The weightier the law and the more probable its obligation, the stronger must be the reason against it. It is not in place here to discuss this point or to consider the force of the author's objections. He, of course, admits that confessors who follow this system have no right to impose it upon their penitents, nor can they strictly require that a penitent submit to an obligation to which he is not bound according to the principles of probabilism.

J. H.

New Cosmopolis. A Book of Images. By JAMES HUNEKER. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50.

This is a volume of entertaining essays from the pen of a clever journalist who knows perfectly the New York of to-day and of thirty years ago, who has also visited the great cities of Europe and has never failed, while on these travels or excursions, to use his eyes and ears. The first eight papers deal with Gotham and its environs, the next seven with foreign capitals, and the last two with Atlantic City and Newport. Mr. Huneker first takes you through New York's East Side, destroys many fables that are told about it, calls attention to a very human ball game being played in Yiddish, and assures you that the natives regard settlement workers or "white mice" as "misguided busybodies," who "pry, pry, pry and ask insulting questions." There is a good chapter on the "Lungs" or parks of New York, each of which the author describes in picturesque language; he takes you with him on a delightful voyage by water around Manhattan, and commiserates the fate of those who desert New York in summer, for they "miss a lot." Coney Island Mr. Huneker abominates, and passes this stricture on moving pictures:

> This shadowland is never dramatic, never poetically suggestive, never human. . . . A diversion for children, an aid to science, an entertainment for deaf-mutes, but not an art for intelligent people. What has become of our taste these latter years? "Canned" music, mechanical pianos, moving pictures, dancing, these be thy gods, Philistia!

The author maintains that in reality New York is no busier than other cities. It only pretends to be. "It is necessary for our municipal vanity to squeeze and jam and rush and crush." As for New York crowds being "good-natured," he well objects that "good-natured is hardly the word—timid, cringing, cowardly are better words."

Mr. Huneker is a warm admirer of Vienna and its citizens, he likes the Belgians, and has a tender love for Ireland, "the most beautiful country on God's footstool," but thinks that "there are too many able-bodied lads and lasses taking orders and filling convents when they ought to be better employed in fathering and mothering families." But the author should have seen that it is largely because the priestly and religious life is held in such high honor in Ireland that race suicide is practically unknown there. If the country's birthrate has fallen off, emigration is the cause. W. D.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

According to the Bookman, the six novels that sold best in this country during April were these: "The Turmoil," "Pollyanna Grows Up," "Angela's Business," "The Valley of Fear," "The Harbor" and "Ruggles of Red Gap." This is a more consoling list than usual. All the stories mentioned except the second have already been noticed in AMERICA, and "Pollyanna" always deserves commendation.

The contents of the Catholic World for June are as follows:

"Evolution and Progress," by Edmund T. Shanahan, S.T. D.; "Our Lady of the Woods," by Dora Owen; "The Same Forever," by Florence Gilmore; "Drought," by Charles L. O'Donnell, C.S.C.; "Keeping Up with the Protestant Tradition," by James J. Walsh, M.D.; "Maurice de Guérin," by Virginia M. Crawford; "The Rose Window," by Eleanor Tanner; "Cooperation a Partial Solvent of Capitalism," by John A. Ryan, D.D.; "The Sea Winds," by Caroline D. Swan; "Our Lady's Roses," by N. H. Watts; "Galicia and the Russian Church," by F. A. Palmieri; "California the Wonderful," by Thomas Walsh, and "White Eagle," by L. P. Decondun.

In so varied and appetizing a menu all Catholic readers should find something to their taste. "New books," "Foreign Periodicals," "Recent Events," etc., offer, as usual, interesting matter.

Arthur Train's "The Man Who Rocked the Earth" (Doubleday, $1.25) and Jack London's "The Scarlet Plague" (Macmillan, $1.00) are recent novels of a sensational character. As a war prophet Mr. Train is plausible but not convincing. His book is a network of technicalities and electrical terms, warranted to put the lay mind in a complete whirl as it attempts to follow the drift of the narrative. Yet the function of the modern fiction is not to induce thought in the reader! The only clear impression the novel conveys is that of the pigheadedness of one of the belligerents in the story. As for "The Scarlet Plague," the fact that in sixty years from now some forty persons, who represent the sole survivors in America of a terrible plague, and their descendants, should degenerate into semi-savages is—well, a strain even upon the most voracious devourer of fiction. The episodes of the story are unusual and varied, but the whole picture is depressing in the extreme, and the little philosophical touch at the conclusion is rank pessimism.

The rumors of Gilbert K. Chesterton's conversion to Catholicism may well be termed "persistent." It is the London correspondent of the Boston Evening Transcript who is spreading them now. He writes:

> The good news has come from Beaconsfield that "G. K. C." is able to leave his room and hopes shortly to resume his literary work. Every one of Chesterton's friends is glad, and their name is legion. A very hearty welcome will be given to him when he next appears in public—as hearty as the welcome now being given to "G. K. C.'s" "Poems," which Messrs. Burns & Oates have just published. This volume contains Chesterton in all sorts of moods. It is divided, says the announcement, into six sections—(1) war poems, including "Lepanto" (2) love poems, (3) religious poems, (4) rhymes for the times, including the "Ode" to Mr. F. E. Smith, (5) miscellaneous poems, and (6) ballades. Regarding the inclusion of the religious poems in this volume, and the fact that it is being published by the leading Catholic publishers in London, I wonder if I am going beyond the bounds of courteous comment if I say that the circumstances are significant. For a long time in literary circles it was rumored that "G. K." had become a Catholic, but I can not remember that any definite avowal or denial was ever made by him or his friends. That the poems should bear the Burns & Oates imprint seems to me a confirmation of the rumor.

"Gilbert," writes one who knows him well, "was not the fellow to face death without showing his true colors and waving them during the last great charge. I think that you will find that some time from now his conversion will be announced." No one would rejoice more at this good news than Mr. Chesterton's American Catholic admirers.

In a brochure entitled "Some Verses, written in honor of the Church and dedicated to Saint Catherine of Siena, by Maria Longworth Storer," there are devotional lines that are also poetical. What the author says of Pius X is no less true than beautiful, and the poem "Domine, Non Sum Dignus" begins thus:

> Dear Lord, I thank Thee for the veil of clay
> That (like a smoke-stained crystal) keeps away
> The overpowering glory of Thy Light;
> Else would my soul, its scarlet sins laid bare,
> Shrink backward in a frenzy of despair,
> Praying the earth to hide me from Thy sight.

"Give me a word to rhyme with faith," pleads Ambrose Leo McGreevy, the author of "The God of Battles and Other Verses" (Sherman, French & Co., Boston, $1.00). But "wreath" is the only word his churlish hearers offer, so the rhyme, it must be owned, is not a good one. The thirty sets of verses in the attractively-printed volume are varied in theme but lacking in finish. "The White Ships and the Red," the admirable poem on the Lusitania that Mr. Joyce Kilmer contributed to the New York Times for May 15, is an excellent example of how a true poet can rise to his subject. ——Lafcadio Hearn's translation of "Japanese Lyrics" (Houghton, $0.75) is a collection of short poems embracing "Verses for Children," "Poems on Insects" and "Japanese Myths." The concise English version is printed on pages facing the original Japanese, and the explanatory notes give the reader further insight into the naturally poetic mind of the Japanese people.

In "The Forest of Swords" (Appleton, $1.30) Joseph A. Altsheler, a prolific writer of juveniles, carries a French aviator and his American friend through the days of the Kaiser's advance on Paris and graphically describes the part the young men played in the battle of the Marne. The book is filled with innumerable adventures but plot there is none.——Payne Erskine's story about "A Girl of the Blue Ridge" (Little, Brown, $1.50), in spite of its tedious dialect, is a likeable novel. Family feuds and moonshine stills are of course unavoidable in these tales of the Blue Ridge. If we must continue to have such books the author's way of writing them is acceptable.——A convent "is a refuge, a blessed retreat for those who are discouraged, for the weary, the sad at heart, but for the young, the strong, the brave, the world is a better place," are the words that J. E. Le Rossignol makes "Jean Baptiste" (Dutton, $1.50) say to the girl who left the Ursuline novitiate to marry him. The novel is a story of modern Canada, written, it would seem, by a Protestant who has painfully "gotten up" his Catholic setting, but is quite incapable of understanding the Church's true spirit. The book contains some brutal and improbable scenes, but Mère Tabeau is a well-drawn figure.

"In Those Days" (Jewish Publication Society, Philadelphia) is a pretty little story of Jewish life in the Russia of Nicholas I. As the tale unfolds the reader not infrequently finds himself wishing for an explanation of some of the Jewish expressions that are used, the meaning of which he guesses; and behold a tiny dictionary of these very words is found at the end of the volume, its existence not even hinted at by directing numerals or other device. The story will have a special appeal just now in that it gives an insight into Russian methods of training those enormous armies of which we read.——A conglomeration of facts does not make a story any more than a heap of bricks constitutes a building, nor can a dull mass of statements be quickened into art by the occasional inversion of a sentence, nor may enthusiasm for a cause be roused by the interjection of a raucous imperative tagged to the end of a recital. The little volume "Victors of Peace" (Harper's, $0.75) labors under these defects. Yet F. J. Gould, the author, receives in the introduction and preface high encomiums as a story teller.

Zealous Methodists who are given to expressing their horror at the way the "Romanists" withhold the Scriptures from the people, especially from the people of Latin countries, ought to be given a copy of "Il Santo Evangelo Illustrato ad Uso della Gioventu," published by Guiseppe Vaccarezza, of Piazza Fossatto, Genoa, Italy for this excellent version of the Gospels is actually intended to be widely circulated among the people. It is edited by a Jesuit, bears several imprimaturs and is well furnished with literary, dogmatic and exegetical footnotes, appendices, etc.

BOOKS RECEIVED

D. Appleton Co., New York:
The Forest of Swords. By Joseph A. Altsheler. $1.30; The Teaching of English. By Paul Klapper. $1.25.

Benziger Bros., New York:
St. Juliana Falconieri. By Marie Conrayville. $0.30; The Message of Moses. By Rev. Francis E. Gigot. $0.15; The Catholic's Ready Answer. By Rev. M. P. Hill, S.J. $2.00.

Catholic Truth Society, London:
A Simple Mass and Communion Book; How to Follow the Mass (For non-Catholics). By Rev. F. E. Pritchard; Antonio Rosmini. By Rev. Daniel Hickey; Lacordaire and Montalembert. By M. M. C. Calthrop; Some Children of St. Dominic. By Marie St. S. Ellerker; Fasting and Abstinence. By Allan Ross; The University of Louvain. By Rev. J. G. Vance.

Christian Press Association, New York:
Stray Leaves of Traces of Travel. By Alexander MacDonald.

Columbia University Press, New York:
The Ballade. By Helen Louise Cohen. $1.75.

Dodd, Mead & Co., New York:
Women Under Polygamy. By Walter M. Gallichan. $2.50; The Tourist's Maritime Provinces. By Ruth Kedzie Wood. $1.25; Five Fronts. By Robert Dunn. $1.25.

Doubleday, Page & Co., Garden City, N. Y.:
The American Books: The American Navy. By French E. Chadwick; American Literature. By Leon Kellner; Municipal Freedom. By Oswald Ryan; The Indian To-day. By Charles E. Eastman; The American College. By Isaac Sharpless. $0.60 each.

J. Duffy & Co., Ltd., Dublin:
The Red Spy. By D. M. Lenihan. $1.00.

Harper & Bros., New York:
Educating the Child at Home. By Ella Frances Lynch. $1.00.

D. C. Heath & Co., New York:
Rational Athletics for Boys. By Frederick J. Reilly. $0.30.

Houghton, Mifflin Co., Boston:
Sundown Slim. By H. H. Knibbs. $1.35; Some Imaginist Poets: An Anthology. $0.75.

Longmans, Green & Co., New York:
The Personality of Christ. By Dom Ansgar Vonier, O.S.B. $1.75; The Mass: A Study of the Roman Liturgy. By Adrian Fortescue. New Edition. $1.80; Pragmatism and the Problem of the Idea. By Rev. John T. Driscoll. $1.50.

G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York:
The Unveiling: A Poetic Drama. By Jackson Boyd. $1.25.

Ferdinand Schoeningh. Paderborn:
Characterbilder der Katholischen Frauenwelt. Von Dr. Michael Faulhaber. M 2.40.

Society of the Divine Word. Techny, Ill.:
The Most Vital Mission Problem. By Rev. Frederick Schwager, S. V. D.

Chas. Scribner's Sons, New York:
Camp Craft. By Warren H. Miller. $1.50; John Huss. By David S. Schaff. $2.50.

Fred'k F. Stokes Co., New York:
The Life of General Joffre. By Alexander Kahn. $0.50.

EDUCATION

Educational Legislation

THERE is now before the Massachusetts Senate a bill which, if enacted, will make it unlawful for any public school committee or superintendent or supervisor of public schools to require or solicit from an applicant for a position in the public schools any information relative to the candidate's religious belief or practice. It further provides that no appointment to positions in such schools shall be affected by religious opinions or affiliations. A penalty, a fine of $50 for each violation, is imposed.

The bill now before the Senate was passed by the House on May 5, after a stormy passage, in which several amendments were suggested to remedy alleged defects in the initial draft of the bill which, it was held, would make the bill unconstitutional. The attitude of the House in reference to the proposed legislation is shown in the vote securing the passage of the bill, 121 voting in the affirmative and 95 in the negative.

THE TEACHERS' REGISTRATION BUREAU

At present, and in addition to numerous teachers' agencies in Boston, there is in the office of the Massachusetts Board of Education a department known as the "Teachers' Registration Bureau," conducted and maintained by the Board of Education from appropriations granted by the Legislature. The aim of the Bureau has been to secure for applicants openings in various schools, without the cost generally attending such work when performed by other agencies and private concerns. The initial expense of registration in this Bureau is $2.00. In return, the applicant's name is to be retained and utilized by the Bureau until an appointment is received.

One of the first questions asked by the bureau of an applicant for a public school position is in reference to religious belief and practice. In one case that came within my personal observation, an applicant, peculiarly well qualified in every respect, was told that a position was open to him in a locality not far distant from Boston, provided the applicant would join the Baptist Church and adhere to the regulations of that organization. This was in Massachusetts, where the educational atmosphere is said to be of purest ozone. Organized systems are in vogue in many of the New England cities and towns to eliminate the Catholic teacher from the public school, and to keep out of the teaching ranks of State instructors those who profess the Catholic religion.

In a State normal school system in Massachusetts which has already expended on ten institutions over $12,000,000, a system that is to-day costing the State over $500,000 annually, there can not be found a dozen Catholic teachers in the advanced branches of instruction.

"PERNICIOUS ACTIVITIES"

The consistency of the action of the State Board of Education in its recent attempt to obtain certification of all public school teachers is interesting, when we consider that no examination is ever required of teachers appointed in the normal schools. In these institutions appointment in each case is determined "upon the recommendation of the principal with the approval of the commissioner." This system, if such it can be called, places a premium upon graft and favoritism, and is by no means consistent with the aims of a properly-equipped Board of Education.

The folly of requesting the religious status of an applicant for a public school position is apparent, when we consider that no public school official in this part of the country, and I doubt if in any part, is capable of understanding fundamentally the nature of the reply "I am a Catholic," save that the reply in nine out of ten cases, furnishes that official with material to use for the purpose of side-tracking the applicant. Under a banner of "fair and impartial consideration" the Bureau of Registration of the Board of Education indirectly seeks to forward certain favorites and to influence school committees in the selection of teachers. This is to be expected from the great machine that is found in the State system of education in Massachusetts.

JUSTICE TO ALL

To stop active persecution of Catholics seeking school positions in Massachusetts is but part accomplishment of the greater task of giving to Catholics and all others, no matter of what religious belief, a fair and impartial opportunity to compete upon an equitable basis for honors in educational and in all fields of endeavor. When Massachusetts has crossed the bridge of prejudice in educational work, and she is far on this side of it yet, let us hope that some public-spirited citizen will apply the torch to the bridge, thus guaranteeing progress.

LESTER B. DONAHUE, Ph.D.

SOCIOLOGY

Conscious Birth Restriction

ARE we brutes, or have we fallen to a level below the brute, for which there is no name but perversion? A brute may be held in some respects a noble creation, swift of foot it may be, glossy of coat, a delight to the eye. Even your hog with ringed nose tip-tilted above the swell of the mire, is as God made him. He has no rational soul; but he is absolutely true to his instincts. Within his lowly sphere, he fulfils, by the compulsion of nature, it is true, Falstaff's resolution to live cleanly as a gentleman should. For he is no pervert. He has no desire to limit or end his kind. In comparison with the beast which the harpies of modern social progress would make us, he is a ministering angel, kindly, gracious and lovable.

IS MAN A BRUTE?

In the pages of certain American newspapers and magazines, this social progress is "gabbling like a thing most brutish." We are regaled with details hitherto confined to the pages of text-books on veterinary science. Whether or not the methods of birth restriction therein recommended are fit and profitable may be left to the decision of the expert stock raiser. They are intended for brutes, and they may be suited for brutes, but man is not a brute. He has a rational soul. Independently of divine revelation, he knows the difference between right and wrong, and he can not free himself from the responsibility attaching to acts freely posited. He differs, therefore, and essentially, from the beast of the field. To apply the methods of stock raising to the human race is a thing more vile and stupid than any plot cooked in the befuddled brain of drunken Caliban, at home in his mud. For Caliban, be it remembered, very like a hog in many respects, like a hog was no perverter of the law of his nature.

THE NOISOME ARGUMENT

According to Section 1142 of the New York Penal Code, to give information leading to race suicide is a misdemeanor. "This law," says an apostle of modern progress, "is a disgrace and a scandal." "The most progressive men and women," warns another, "can see the danger to the race in this and similar archaic legislation." "It is a matter of common supposition," adds a third, "that contraceptives are used by the well-to-do and better-educated classes. It is fairly evident that such methods are not being used by the poorest and most ignorant people (such, e. g., as the parents of Abraham Lincoln). Thus the rate of increase is coming fastest from those who, by their physical and mental status and their environment, are least able to bring into the world healthy children, and to raise them to be efficient men and women." "Any person with a scientific education," argues a lady, who recently sued for wages due her for advocating, as a disinterested witness for "the uplift," certain moving pictures banned by the New York police, "must believe that this law should be repealed. The knowledge of birth control should be given to all classes." This is the noisome argument of the "uplifters," most of them, to our shame be it confessed, women, who are endeavoring to repeal or amend Section 1142, the one poor, slender bar which prevents those for whom statute law is the sole norm of morality, from doing what they can to put an end to the human race by frustrating the law of nature.

The ostensible purpose of these vampires of society is to improve the human race. This they will do by popularizing a practice which directly and primarily makes the continuance of the human race impossible. Without restricting marital rights, this practice will relieve the contracting parties of the burdens incidental to the rearing of children until such time as husband and wife are able to perform these duties satisfactorily. When this stage, economic, physical or moral, has been reached, it is proposed to allow the laws of nature to operate without interference. It is also plain that a general knowledge of effective contraceptives will be of great value to persons contemplating or sustaining illicit unions.

THE FUNDAMENTAL ISSUE

It may be remarked at the outset, that no proof is offered, or can be offered, tending to show, first, that the physical organs functioning in procreation, are made fitter for their office by deliberate, habitual misuse; or, secondly, that the moral and psychic changes induced by this practice, and affecting the domain of the will, strengthen the individual to assume the necessary burdens of parenthood. But apart from these considerations, and granting for the moment that, year by year, thousands of human beings come into existence diseased and crippled, to fill our foundling homes, or to pass from surroundings of poverty and vice into hospitals, lunatic asylums and jails, let us come to the fundamental point at issue: Can men and women freely posit the act of which procreation is the natural term, and licitly shirk parenthood?

To this question, a negative is the only possible answer. No interference with the law of nature can be tolerated, whether the act leading to procreation be promiscuous, or sanctioned by the bond of marriage. If, in a given instance, valid reasons make the natural result of the union of the generative principles inadvisable, this end must be attained, not by a perversion of the functions of nature, but by abstinence.

THE NATURAL LAW

This position, championed notably by the Catholic Church, is founded neither upon an arbitrarily chosen basis of man-made morality, nor upon changing reasons of expediency. It rests upon the natural law, the rule of conduct found in the constitution of our being. It was to this law that Cicero referred when he spoke of that ordination "not written, but born within us; which we have not learned or received by tradition, or read, but which we have sucked in, imbibed, from nature itself." St. Augustine, one of the master-minds of time, defines it "as the reason or will of God, commanding the observance of the natural order and forbidding its violation"; St. Thomas, as "the rational creature's participation in the eternal law." It is not given by supernatural revelation; both in being and in point of time, it is prior to revelation, strictly so called. It presupposes, as Kant admits, that knowledge of God which is acquired, not through revelation, but by reason; and its purpose is to guide all contingent beings to their natural end.

A master of jurisprudence, Blackstone, offers the following illuminating comments upon the natural law:

> As man depends absolutely upon his Maker in all things, it is necessary that he should in all points conform to his Maker's will. . . . This will of his Maker is called the law of nature. . . . When He created man and endued him with free will to conduct himself in all parts of life, He laid down certain immutable laws of human nature. . . . He laid down only such laws as were founded in those relations of justice that existed in the nature of things antecedent to any positive precept. . . . These are the eternal immutable laws of good and evil . . . which He has enabled reason to discover, so far as they are necessary for the conduct of human actions. . . . This law of nature . . . is binding all over the globe, in all countries and at all times: no human laws are of any validity if contrary to this.

PERVERSION

It is not necessary, then, to invoke supernatural revelation to show that acts militating against the preservation of the human species are in violation of the natural law, for, as Blackstone points out, this law is made known to man "by reason, so far as is necessary for the conduct of human nature." Man has, by his nature, the propensity and power to propagate his kind. This power, unless we are to accept a philosophy of hedonism and anarchy destructive of all society, is not given primarily for the good of the individual, but for the good of the species. Man can not attain the development suggested by nature without society; society can not exist if the generative function be perverted. The preservation of the human race, imperatively demanded by right reason and order, can be secured only by the means provided by nature. According to nature's law, the effect of the union of the generative principles is, de se, procreation. But the use of contraceptives effectively prevents procreation. It is, therefore, a violation of the natural law, and of its nature, forbidden.

AN OBJECTION

To this argument, the following rebuttal has been offered. It is not intended to advise a permanent use of contraceptives. Like every human faculty, the generative power is to be exercised only under a wise restraint and with full understanding of its consequences to the individual and to society. But the natural law is not defeated by a single isolated act, or, indeed, by a series of such acts, restricted to a given pair. On the contrary, the true purpose of the law, the conservation of society, is best served by producing, through selective processes, a stock which will evolve a more highly perfected race.

In reply, it must be said that the time-limits proposed by the advocates of birth restriction have no bearing on the argument. Common sense bears witness that the essential morality of an act is determined by its agreement or disagreement with a fixed norm; and this without reference to past conduct or to resolutions for the future. Lying is lying, whether I propose to give over lying after a single isolated infraction of the truth, or whether I have the unalterable determination of lying as long as I have breath. An individual is rightly called a thief despite his intention to tread the ways of honesty after he has acquired a competency by thieving. Furthermore, it is nothing less than anarchy to sanction a violation of law on the ground that a single infraction does not effectively destroy the general purpose of the law.

Equally outside the question is the avowal of these advocates, that their sole intention is to improve the human race. The end does not justify the means; and it is with their methods, not with their intentions, that precise issue is raised. The order that is in the essence of things postulates that a faculty attain the end to which its nature impels it, and for which it is primarily and essentially intended. Such interference, then, as effectively prevents the faculty from attaining its end, violates the nature of that faculty. To uphold the contrary of this propositions involves a denial of the existence of the natural law. Now, no argument can obscure the fact that the primary end, intended by the very nature of the generative principles, is procreation; for these principles by their nature tend to this end and to no other. But the use of a contraceptive directly and effectively prevents the generative principles from attaining the end for which they are primarily and essentially intended, and is, therefore, an act specifically prohibited by the natural law.

THE ETERNAL NIGHT

Times have changed from the days when mother, wife, child, were terms which bore about them a sweetness and a sanctity almost supernal. We have thrown God out of our literature, our philosophy, our politics, our schools, our practical lives, and now we are taught that it is holy to eliminate Him completely from our very nature. Hence we are brought face to face with that most horrible of corruptions, the unnatural rottenness that is worked by fleshly lust unchained. In the first chapter of Romans, St. Paul bears witness to the fearful perversion of a once hardy, virile people. What stands between us and like ruin, if the counsels of these modern apostles of unutterable vileness, "whose very name it is a shame to speak," prevail? The truth of the living God, the law expressed in their nature, they made a lie; for this cause God gave them over to shameful affections. It is inevitable. Blot out God, and eternal night descends; and through the reeking vapors, the harpies hasten to feast upon this decadent mass that once was decency, high-mindedness, the purity of womanhood and the honor of man.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Wholly uncalled-for protestations of patriotism have been rather frequent of late from some of our Catholic societies. The secular press considers well worthy of note the fact that "Three thousand Catholic —— pledge their loyalty to ——" or that "Resolutions were drawn up by the Catholic —— attesting the readiness of the members to defend their country," etc. But why should Catholic bodies consider it necessary to write or say such things? The story of Catholic patriotism is written so clearly in the history of this country, from the Revolution to the Spanish war, that these protestations of loyalty are altogether needless. They would seem to admit there is some truth in the Protestant Tradition's assertion that a good Catholic can not be a patriotic citizen. Let us have done with these protestations. They smack too much of an apologetic attitude on the part of Catholics that should now be an anachronism.

"The number of young women who are totally unable to manage a home," says a writer in the Baltimore Sun, "has increased rapidly, especially in the great cities. Their unfitness to become home-makers and housekeepers must be recognized as a factor of instability in home life, and therefore, in the life of the nation." Who is to blame for this unfortunate condition of things? Whether they are at fault or not, no good result is obtained by berating these unhappily unskilful young women. Like the dead, they are indifferent to blame; unlike the dead, nothing good can be spoken of them. Perhaps the responsibility must be traced to the mothers who have been foolish enough to rate their daughters' proficiency in dancing and music more highly than skill in sewing and cooking. A New York paper remarks that a trip up Broadway by night makes one wonder what mothers are for. It does, and so does a trip to the Juvenile Court, and nowadays even our small towns have a Broadway and a Juvenile Court. They always will possess these ornaments of our modern civilization, until, in the words of a Chicago Juvenile Court judge, "the parents get back on the job."

Mr. W. R. Stewart, President of the New York State Board of Charities makes a suggestion worth while when he says that the private charities stand more in need of help than criticism. In this he does not agree with a gentleman from New York City, who at a recent national convention won a certain notoriety by charging a number of private charitable institutions with gross mismanagement. Mr. Stewart thinks the best way to remedy this condition, where it exists, is to pay the institution an honest wage for honest service. The New York gentleman, however, thinks that the only remedy lies in the abolition of the private institution, and the assumption of these charitable activities by the State. The great merit of this plan is to be found in the fact that although it involves an increased cost to the taxpayer, it will supply many a disinterested social uplifter with remunerative occupation.

Recently, in addressing the graduating class of a Catholic training school for nurses, a well-known surgeon reviewed the history of nursing, and in the course of his remarks observed that a she-wolf is the nurse earliest mentioned in the annals of ancient Rome. Much to the amusement of his hearers, the surgeon then devoutly expressed the hope that none of the young women then graduating would ever so act in the sick-room that anyone could reasonably suspect her of being related to the nurse of Romulus and Remus. Judging by what is occasionally published in the papers, that kind of nurse is not altogether extinct. But the Catholic nurse, it was pointed out, had to be a woman thoroughly capable, not only of promoting her patient's physical well-being, but his spiritual also. So she could ill afford to be a person whose character or disposition would suggest any kinship whatever with the nurse of Rome's founder.

The propaganda which is being carried on to effect a reversal of what has hitherto been the universal public opinion on the matter of birth control is showing an alarming activity. Not only have the magazines openly advocated a practice, the mere teaching of which is a criminal offense, but physicians have joined forces to try to create a public sentiment which would lead eventually to the repeal of such legislation as has so far safeguarded the observance of the laws of nature. Indeed, those who profess themselves promoters of the movement have expressed the confidence that not more than two years will be needed to remold the general attitude of the people toward this vital question. At a recent meeting held in New York City, at which five hundred persons attended, most of whom were women, and during the course of which at least nine doctors, all more or less prominent, spoke in favor of birth control; the usual arguments were advanced and afterward given complete publicity in the newspapers. Of course practical Catholics will not be affected by such expressions of opinion; the position of the Church on the matter is absolute. She is uncompromising in her opposition to the use of contraceptives; unhesitatingly she excludes from her Sacraments those who adhere to the practice. Nor will the fact that a number of physicians have advocated it influence those who can think for themselves, for they know perfectly well that a degree in medicine, while it is a guarantee of certain medical knowledge, gives no authority whatever in the matter of morals. And so when one woman physician said that the right to bear children or to refuse to bear them are fundamental rights which are not arguable, she was dogmatizing on a matter which lay altogether outside her province. And yet her words will unfortunately be repeated and accepted by the ignorant, and will be acted upon, and in the reprehensible sense in which she meant them.

An outspoken French journalist complained, some time ago, that the Catholic education and preaching of to-day are giving the Church too many communicants and not enough men. He would imply that frequenting the Holy Table is not conducive to robust piety. If anything has happened in France or elsewhere to give color to the justice of the charge, plainly it is not Communion that is to blame but the communicants. Achilles, the fable runs, was invincible in battle because he had fed on the marrow of lions. But Catholics who are often nourished on the Flesh of the Lion of Juda will really become valiant defenders of their faith, if they only use frequent Communion properly. Receiving Our Lord often, far from being a barren spiritual luxury, would be of invaluable assistance in supplying the soul with that strength and wisdom the Catholics of to-day particularly need. So it should not be said that there are now "too many communicants and not enough men," but rather, not enough men who are communicants.

Mr. J. H. Barnes, an "old-time actor," is thus impressed by the theater of to-day:

> I see a stage, where our great Shakespere is over-embellished and underacted, and often very faultily read—where the scene painter and upholsterer triumph to the exclusion of the poet's fancy, his immortal lines and collossal studies of human nature. I have seen Sir Johnston himself have a great difficulty in getting members of his own company to give adequate emphasis and meaning to the author's lines. I see a stage from which romance and charm are almost entirely banished, where filthy, sordid, realistic, ugly so-called problems, neither amusing, ennobling nor interesting, except to a very few advanced thinkers, are perverting the young and disgusting the old, and so deadly dull as to kill the theater habit among the public.

So the public has contracted the "movies habit" instead and flocks to see a "best seller" of yesterday thrown on the screen. The Catholics among the spectators doubtless derive great edification from an elaborate film play now widely exhibited in which a very modern Pope is represented walking freely about the city of Rome, becoming a party to a bold conspiracy, winking at crime, pardoning an unrepentant murderer and receiving in his private apartments a man's mistress who piously clamors for shrift from no less a person than the Holy Father himself.

The pronouncement of the Archbishop of Canterbury on the Kikuyu controvery decides none of the issues fundamental to the matter. In a letter to the Bishop of Oxford, Dr. Darwell Stone says that it would be a mistake to regard the primate's remarks as binding upon the Province of Canterbury, and the bishop assents to this view. As prelates of an establishment priding itself on its comprehensiveness, every Anglican bishop will doubtless continue to think and act on this matter as he chooses.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XIII, No. 9
WHOLE No. 322

JUNE 12, 1915

PRICE 10 CENTS
$3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE

The War: Bulletin, June 1, p. m.-June 8, a. m. —The Fall of Przemysl—The Italian Campaign —Other Items. France: Workmen and the War. Germany: National Confidence. Great Britain: "Deadly Complacency" — Organizing the Workers. Ireland: Irish Action and Sentiment — Other Items of Interest. Mexico: Chaos, Famine 213-216

TOPICS OF INTEREST

The Religion of the Future—Every Woman—Our Young Men—Thoughts About Heredity—The End of Socialism—The Dog or the Baby—Euripides in New York.....217-225

COMMUNICATIONS

Vaudeville—Has Germany an Established Religion? — A Catholic Correspondence School — Prohibition — Is Dante Read? — The Veto in Papal Elections—Masses or Flowers for Funerals—Notes on Landmarks—"Mrs. Nickleby and the Crozer Professor".....225-229

EDITORIALS

Magna Charta's Seventh Centenary—The One Impediment — Cheap and Precious — "Soyons Distingués"—A Mayor and the Stage—"Westward Ho!"—The Ave Maria's Fiftieth Year—The Difficulties of Aliens.....230-233

LITERATURE

"American Thought."

REVIEWS: The Catholic's Ready Answer — The Life of Cervantes—Collected Essays—Panama and Other Poems—The Man Behind the Bars—The Friar Preacher, Yesterday and To-day—Famous Days and Deeds in Holland and Belgium.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: The current Catholic Mind —Pax in a New Form — "Life of General Joffre"—"Fits and Starts"—Father Vaughan on Mgr. Benson — "The Wild Knight" — "A Florentine Cycle and Other Poems" — "The German Army in War".....233-237

EDUCATION

University Extension Work in Massachusetts. 237, 238

SOCIOLOGY

Convent Inspection: A Second Grim Fairy Tale. 238, 239

NOTE AND COMMENT

Academic Freedom—The Drift Toward Secularizing Christianity—Improper Employment of Children—What Parochial Schools Contribute to the General Welfare of Society—Protestant Ministers in Politics—Public School Exercises in Churches — Father Maturin's Requiem — Death of Rev. Timothy J. Brosnahan, S.J. 239, 240

CHRONICLE

The War.—In the west the situation has been marked by no important change. Not that there has been any cessation in the determined fighting that has been going on for weeks north of Arras, on the contrary the fighting has been if anything more continuous and costly, but the results seem to be nothing more than a few hundred yards gained by the Germans east of Ypres, and a series of similar gains by the Allies, some of which were lost almost immediately, to the east and south of Souchez, in the village of Neuville, and in what is known as the Labyrinth, south of Neuville. Similar slight gains are claimed by the Allies in the Le Prêtre forest.

Bulletin, June 1, p. m.-June 8, a. m.

The fall of Przemysl, though not a surprise, came more quickly than was expected. On Wednesday three of the forts to the north of the city were reported to have fallen, on Thursday two more were captured, and early Friday morning an assault was made on the fortress itself by the Bavarians from the north and by the Austrians from the west and southwest. Little resistance was encountered, and few captures were made. Apparently the Russians had made up their minds to defend it only so long as was necessary to cover their retreat and remove supplies. Their own bombardment had destroyed much of its defenses which had never been very strong on the western side, while to hold it meant a lengthening of their line which, so Petrograd reports, would have been strategically inadvisable. After capturing the city the Austro-Germans continued their drive and are now said to be in the vicinity of Mosciska, eighteen miles to the east. To the northeast of Przemysl, at Sieniawa and Rudnik, beyond Jaroslau, the Russians are still more than holding their own, and are endeavoring, it would seem, to encircle the left wing of the Austro-Germans and to cut their communications with Cracow. Southeast of Przemysl, however, the Austrians are advancing in several directions towards Lemberg. They have followed up their victory at Stry and are reported to be in the vicinity of Mikolajow, north of the Dniester, some twenty-five miles from Lemberg. Further to the southeast, they have crossed the Dniester, having driven back the Russians beyond Zurawno and Kalusz. In Bukowina also the Austrian lines have been strengthened and have succeeded in driving back the Russian offensive to the river Pruth. The campaign of the Russians in Galicia is generally regarded as having completely collapsed, and it is believed that not only will they fall back on Lemberg, but will retire to Russian territory. Already their military headquarters are said to have been transferred to Brody, which is close to the eastern border of Galicia.

The Fall of Przemysl

The Italians continue to make progress in both of their campaigns. Without having encountered anything like serious resistance from the Austrians, they are advancing into the Trentino from many quarters. Leaving the Tonale pass, they are moving southeast towards Trent. Further south but still on the west, they are following the Chiesa and have occupied Storo, while from the south they are ascending the Adige river and have taken Ala. To the southeast of Trent they are engaging the Austrians at Fogaria and on the Lavarone plateau, and to the east they are advancing along the Sugano valley. In no case, however, has anything more than skirmishing taken place. Riva, Rovereto and Trent are their evident objectives. Along the Isonzo river little has been gained during the week except the capture of Monte Nero, which has given the Italians an advantageous position, from which they are shelling Tolmino. Montefalcone also is being bombarded. At both places the Austrian defence is stiffening.

The Italian Campaign

The German Government has admitted her responsibility for the sinking of the Gulflight, the torpedoing of which is attributed to a mistake by the officer in charge. Germany expresses regrets and proposes to pay such indemnity as shall be fixed as just and satisfactory. The text of the note is in part as follows:

Other Items

> Upon scrutiny of the time and place of the occurrence described, the German Government has become convinced that the attacked steamship was actually the American steamship Gulflight. There can be no doubt, according to the attendant circumstances, that the attack is to be attributed to an unfortunate accident and not to the fault of the commander. The German Government expresses its regrets to the Government of the United States concerning this incident, and declares itself ready to furnish full recompense for the damage thereby sustained by American citizens. It is left to the discretion of the American Government to present a statement of this damage, or, if doubts may arise over individual points, to designate an expert who would have to determine together with a German expert the amount of the damage.

The case of the Cushing is still under German consideration, and the request has been forwarded to our Government to furnish such facts as will clear up doubts that still exist. The substance of the official statement is:

> It has not been possible by means of an inquiry to clear up fully the case of the American ship Cushing. . . . However, that the ship attacked was the American steamer Cushing is possible considering the time and place of the occurrence. Nevertheless the German Government accordingly requests of the American Government that it communicate to the German Government the material which was submitted for judgment in order that with this as a basis a further position can be taken in the matter.

These extracts from the German official communication show that there is a disposition on the part of the Imperial Government to meet some of our demands. One of the issues raised by the United States is practically disposed of, and for the second a solution seems probable. And yet the understanding between the two countries has not improved during the week. Relations are still strained, and no betterment can be expected until it has been made known what attitude our Government intends to take on the broader issue raised in the American note to which Germany made so unsatisfactory a reply.

The sinking of merchant ships, among them four neutral vessels, continues in the war zone, the British admitting the loss of eight British ships during the week ending June 2. In the Dardanelles numerous engagements between land forces have taken place, and the Allies have gained two miles on a three mile front. In the Caucasus the resistance of the Turks is said to be rapidly breaking down.

France.—Much of the success which has attended the French arms is said to be due to the assistance generously given the State by private engineers and by the sacrifice of skilled operatives in the workshops. Hence the proposal made in the House of Deputies, to transfer from the auxiliary ranks to active service every mobilized man capable of performing military duty at the front, has aroused considerable opposition. The heads of industries engaged in manufacturing war material have represented the unwisdom of a plan which would withdraw trained operatives from occupations for the general good, in which skill and experience are an absolute necessity. Their protest points out, possibly with a touch if irony, that a number of young men, able to fight, are now driving automobiles at the command of various Government officials, and that others are engaged in minor and almost unnecessary positions in many Government departments. The operators hold that it would be a wiser policy to send these men, who could be easily replaced, to the front. They further propose that not only shall the men now engaged in the manufacture of guns and shells be left in the auxiliary ranks, but that soldiers now at the front who could be more usefully employed in the preparation of munitions of war, be withdrawn from active service and be assigned to the factories. Speaking before the House of Deputies, in offering a bill for further credits, the Minister of Finance announced that by June 15 the war would have cost the country nearly five billion dollars. The average monthly expenditure, he said, was about three hundred million, yet the credit of the country is unimpaired.

Workmen and the War

Germany.—Despite overwhelming odds, the nation is still confident of success. Marshal von Hindenburg states that the hours of campaign will be prolonged by Italy's intervention, but that nothing can change the final result, success for Germany. Count von Posadowsky, former Minister of the Interior, permits himself to discuss the nature of the indemnity Germany will demand, and states that two subsidiary problems to be solved are commercial and shipping arrangements with the enemy and cession of territory. The future prosperity of the nation, he declares, depends on the indemnity, since nothing else can save Germany from taxation, which would reduce the standard of living and set the nation back in many ways. The confidence engendered by such discussions has been heightened by an official announcement that 900,000 persons are now interned in 247 camps. The camps are widely scattered throughout the Empire, no doubt for safety's sake, but also with the probable intent of giving as large a number of people as possible proof of the success of the German armies. A number of the prisoners are working on farms and, if seemingly well authenticated reports be true, the laborers are paid a wage of 12 cents a day; the currency consists of stamps, which can be exchanged for goods in the camp canteen.

National Confidence

Great Britain.—"Deadly Complacency" is a significant term describing the temper of a large group of the English people, which owes its origin to the London Times. There are indications, however, that recent events are having the effect of changing this "complacency" into a realization of a grave danger. Yet it should be clearly understood that the late change in the Ministry does not indicate a popular disapproval of the war policy adopted by official England. "Criticism has never been directed against the policy of the war," says the Times. "It has been exclusively aimed at defects in its direction. The country grew uneasy, not because it had any doubts about the wisdom of the war, or its ultimate issue, but because it feared that enough was not being done, and that some branches of our preparation for its resolute continuance were not being conducted with sufficient rapidity and success." The British press insists that Great Britain's position in the war has been hampered by the fact that at its outbreak she was not prepared to wage an aggressive, determined campaign on the continent against a large, well-equipped and well-trained army, and asserts that even to-day the failure of a large number of able-bodied men of military age to enlist shows how shallow is the common understanding of the seriousness of the conflict.

"Deadly Complacency"

"The war," says the Times editorially, "will be won in our workshops as well as at the front, and the better organization of our workshops is one of the principal objects in view" in the formation of the new Ministry. It is said that the Unionist members in Parliament are demanding that all workmen engaged in the manufacture of supplies and munitions for the State be put under a direct Government control, which would amount to martial law. In his Manchester speech, Lloyd George said that while it was not his intention to brandish his powers under the Defence of the Realm Act, nevertheless those powers were very great, and would enable the Committee which he proposed to establish to remove unnecessary labor difficulties with completeness and dispatch. The sum of the Minister's speech was that the German victories in Galicia were due solely to an overwhelming superiority in equipment. Had the Allies in the west been on an equal footing in this respect, the enemy would long ago have been driven from France and Belgium. In regard to the proposed State control of factories, the Minister said that all such plans must be drawn up for the benefit of the State, and not for the purpose of increasing the profits of any individual or of any private corporation. "I come as an emissary of the State," the Minister went on, "to carry the most urgent message ever told to the ears of a Manchester audience. Our country is fighting for its life, for the liberties of Europe, and upon what it does, upon what it sacrifices, depends the issue. It depends more upon the masters and men running the workshops than upon any part of the community, whether Great Britain will emerge from this colossal conflict beaten, humiliated, stripped of power, honor and influence, and a mere bond slave of cruel military tyranny, or whether it will come out triumphant, free, and more powerful than ever for good in the affairs of men. I come here to tell you the truth. Unless you know it, you can not be expected to make sacrifices. The German triumph in Galicia is due entirely to superiority of equipment. I am here to ask you to help us to equip our armies with means for breaking through the enemies' lines, and I know you will do it." "We were the worst organized nation in the world for this war," concluded the Minister, "which shows how little we had to do with precipitating it." In his Liverpool speech of June 4, Mr. George spoke in the same strain. He introduced a new element when he suggested that, for the duration of the war, all union regulations should be so suspended as to allow every available man and woman to engage in the work necessary for carrying on the war with success and insinuated that the Government would ask or enforce this concession. Both these speeches have met with the general approbation of the press. "The nation has listened with gratitude and relief," comments the Times. "Here at last they see a statesman who rises to the greatness of the crisis upon us. Mr. Lloyd George has done more to rouse them in forty-eight hours than all the Ministers together during many months." The Daily News, on the other hand, hints at exaggeration in the Minister's recital, and doubts the value of forced labor and martial law in the workshops. "We are not yet satisfied that this is the best way to make labor pull with the Government."

Organizing the Workers

Ireland.—A recent census shows that whereas in England and Wales the Constabulary are as 1 to 815 of the population, in Ireland they are 1 to 316, and their relative costliness is in like proportion. Moreover, there are some twenty thousand trained troops, and according to some estimates considerably more, in garrison in Ireland, besides an additional twenty thousand of the Carsonite Volunteers who, after over a year's training by army experts as an anti-government force and eight months' training at the Government's expense, have not yet gone to the front, whither the Nationalist Volunteers were sent within a few weeks after enlistment. Whether this, or traditional anti-enlisting sentiment, or the suppression of organs that advised Irishmen to serve their country at home, or the evolution of a coalition government that included Sir Edward Carson and Lord Lansdowne, the Orange leaders, as important Cabinet officers, or the secret distribution of anti-enlistment literature, has had a cooling influence is unascertainable, but the fact that recruiting is a failure is certain.

Irish Action and Sentiment

The agitation among the liquor manufacturers and retailers that caused the Irish Party to overthrow Mr. George's anti-liquor surtax policies appears not to have been as well grounded as at first appeared. England produces more whiskey than Ireland, Scotland more than twice as much, and each country consumes it in like proportion. The Dublin Leader contends that apart from the detrimental effects of undue consumption of liquors, the deflection of the energies largely wasted on distilleries and breweries into really productive industries would be vastly beneficial to the nation. Lord Wimborne, the new Viceroy, has been usually felicitous in his speeches, but has studiously abstained from comment on the Nationalist addresses that pictured him as ushering in a native Parliament. His recent glorification of Loftus, that founder of Trinity College who confiscated Catholic lands and properties for his personal and political purposes and put Archbishop O'Hurley and many other Catholics to painful deaths, has provoked the Irish Catholic, an ultra-loyal organ, to indignant protest. Messrs. Healy and O'Brien, claiming credit justly for initiating the attack on the Lloyd-George measures, have been renewing their campaign against Mr. Redmond on the ground that he permitted the previous over-taxation, the closing of the port of Queenstown, and various other acts detrimental to Ireland. The feeling against the Irish Party's recruiting policy lends new strength to their dwindling support, though in that matter they are as strongly committed as Mr. Redmond.

Other Items of Interest

Mexico.—Chaos still obtains in Mexico, and now that our press has begun to print facts long known but concealed from the public, the real state of affairs is beginning to be realized. During the week the President issued the following statement:

Chaos, Famine

For more than two years revolutionary conditions have existed in Mexico. The purpose of the revolution was to rid Mexico of men who ignored the Constitution of the republic and used their power in contempt of the right of its people, and with these purposes the people of the United States instinctively and generously sympathized. But the leaders of the revolution, in the very hour of their success, have disagreed and turned their arms against one another. All professing the same objects, they are, nevertheless, unable or unwilling to cooperate. A central authority at Mexico City is no sooner set up than it is undermined and its authority denied by those who were expected to support it.

Mexico is apparently no nearer a solution of her tragical troubles than she was when the revolution was first kindled. And she has been swept by civil war as if by fire. Her crops are destroyed, her fields lie unseeded, her work cattle are confiscated for the use of the armed factions, her people flee to the mountains to escape being drawn into unavailing bloodshed, and no man seems to see or lead the way to peace and settled order. There is no proper protection, either for her own citizens or for the citizens of other nations resident and at work within her territory. Mexico is starving and without a Government.

In these circumstances the people and Government of the United States can not stand indifferently by and do nothing to save their neighbor. They want nothing for themselves in Mexico. Least of all do they desire to settle her affairs for her, or claim any right to do so. But neither do they wish to see utter ruin come upon her, and they deem it their duty as friends and neighbors to lend any aid they properly can to any instrumentality which promises to be effective in bringing about a settlement which will embody the real objects of the revolution—constitutional government and the rights of the people.

Patriotic Mexicans are sick at heart and cry out for peace and for every self-sacrifice that may be necessary to procure it. Their people cry out for food and will presently hate as much as they fear every man in their country or out of it who stands between them and their daily bread.

It is time, therefore, that the Government of the United States should frankly state the policy which, in these extraordinary circumstances, it becomes its duty to adopt. It must presently do what it has not hitherto done or felt at liberty to do, lend its active moral support to some man or group of men, if such may be found, who can rally the suffering people of Mexico to their support in an effort to ignore, if they can not unite, the warring factions of the country, return to the Constitution of the republic so long in abeyance, and set up a Government at Mexico City which the great powers of the world can recognize and deal with—a Government with whom the program of the revolution will be a business and not merely a platform.

I, therefore, publicly and very solemnly, call upon the leaders of factions in Mexico to act, to act together, and to act promptly for the relief and redemption of their prostrate country. I feel it to be my duty to tell them that, if they can not accommodate their differences and unite for this great purpose within a very short time, this Government will be constrained to decide what means should be employed by the United States in order to help Mexico save herself and serve her people.

Villa is disposed to hearken to this warning, thus showing himself craftier or more humane than Carranza, who will yield when forced to do so. The American Society of Mexico has issued a long statement from which the following passage is taken:

Owing to the demoralization of Government offices and the fact that belligerent factions dominate different portions of the country, there are no official figures available on crops or stocks of food supplies, but the most reliable statistics compiled by grain dealers show that the shortage in this year's corn crop of Mexico will be 1,100,000 tons, or 61 per cent. The 39 per cent. will not be marketable before November, and months before that time present stores will have been exhausted. The importation of corn virtually is prohibited by the prevailing high price in the United States and the fact that the Mexican peso is worth to-day only about eight cents in American money.

This is set off by the subjoined citation from a speech of Deputy Marines Valero, made in the Convention of May 7:

It is a sickening spectacle to see revolutionary leaders stealing, raping and assassinating. They are fighting merely to obtain an automobile, steal, assassinate, carry off young girls, and commit numerous outrages too terrible for description.

Here is a splendid summary of the revolution and its effect.

TOPICS OF INTEREST

The Religion of the Future

NOW that men, heart-sick with fickle temporalities, are beginning to turn once more to the skies, they behold the Star of Bethlehem, alleged to have been extinguished by the French Directory about a decade back, sparkling as majestically as it did two thousand years ago over Judea's hills. It is indubitable that religion is again coming into its own; indeed to what could the quivering soul cling in the present mad seethe of human affairs save to the Rock of Ages? Our novelty-loving modern spirit of thought, however, is stirring mischief into the great revival. Instead of advocating a return to the sterling form of faith on which the centuries have stamped their approval, scholars are striking out along lines of their own. From the pages of the Forum, Henry W. Wright, professor of Lake Forest College, breathes a representatively misleading concept of what the religion of the future will be.

In place of the creed of Christ for which hearts are so hungrily calling, he modestly and generously substitutes a religion of his own. The purpose of his preferred system is to surpass prevailing types of Christianity—to sway men more effectually. Briefly, he would saturate religion with democracy until the mustiness of centuries is washed out. He would make social, rather than individual perfection, the aim of religion: apparently oblivious that Christianity has always aimed at both.

Mr. Wright is a philosopher. One can not but judge his incursion into the field of theology rather rash. Surely it would be better for him to let divines determine our religious needs. But, able in things of the mind, he can not resist the temptation to prescribe for the heart too. Genius is notoriously and painfully lop-sided. No wonder the Wright doctrine is perilously unsteady.

The assumption on which our Professor's thoughts evidently rest, the failure of prevailing forms of Christianity, is obviously queasy. Not to Christianity, but to men themselves, must this apparent unsuccess be primarily imputed. There is not a single precept in the dispensation of Christ which, if duly observed, does not make for the ennobling of individuals and humanity. That with God's grace we have had sufficient strength to conform to the law if we willed to do so, conscience can tell. Let us be fair enough to place the fault where it belongs; that is, on our own heads. The old Christian régime has not proved inefficacious and worthy of abolition. The Church which Christ built on a rock does not need to be reconstructed on any man's theory. It is expedient for us to think of remodeling our minds and hearts in conformation with the old religion, rather than of remodeling the old religion in conformation with our "advanced" minds and hearts. Let no man think that he has more brains in the matter of Christianity than Christ, the divine Founder thereof. History shows that, wherever human ingenuity pricked the Nazarene's manifest plan, sorrow was the issue.

Professor Wright and those who think with him might draw a salient lesson from Protestantism, born of the fallacy that Catholicism had failed. Led by the recalcitrant spirit of Luther, the faith of the sixteenth century fell over ugly precipices and was shattered into a heap of sects. In this heap was lodged the elements of religious ruin: out of it rose such rockets of free-thought as scepticism, positivism and agnosticism. For, by its bewildering multiplication of petty sects, Protestantism had fairly well demonstrated that God, the simple and irrefragable, was not in it. Thus it cast religion into more or less discredit, and incidentally cleared the stage for the reign of philosophy and David Hume. In time, ennuied with cynicism, and having wandered too far from Wittenburg and Rome to return to either, the world of "enlightenment" fawned upon Comte. Ultimately disgusted with his frigid, naturalistic creed, it placed Herbert Spencer on a pedestal. His agnostic sway, so detrimental to real religion, has extended down to our own day.

Is it not time for men to see their mistake; to appreciate that every modern religion, or substitute for religion, has been a fiasco; to revert with reverence to the Rock of Peter from which they broke anchor in the long ago, breasting the high seas of doubt, error, discontent, and heart-ache? Yet Professor Wright, and kindred souls, would egg the wearied world on to the pursuit of still another empty novelty—the religion of democracy; as though there could be any religion of the masses without religion of the individuals!

But, with their superestimate of the significance of modern progress, they are impatient of things savory of the past. The Christianity of Thomas Aquinas and Christopher Columbus is too slow for an age of steam-engines. If we must be religious, at least let the smart brand of the twentieth century glitter on our beliefs. Such is seemingly the tenor of Mr. Wright's message.

And yet the past, at which our scholars pityingly smirk, possesses treasures which are the despair of the present. Modern art could not add a single curvature that would enhance the perfection of the peerless Venus di Milo, or a touch that would embellish the Sistine Madonna. Old Cheops and Mycerinus, sprawling on Egyptian sands in serene defiance of the tooth of time, make modern science appear almost puny. The immortal voice of Homer and Shakespere ring together in a hearty laugh at the gush which we are pleased to denominate our up-to-date poetry and prose. Certainly in the realm of religion, nothing has ever been fit to compare with Christianity, that is, with Christianity as expounded by Christ, not by Luther, Mrs. Eddy, or Henry W. Wright. The Galilean's doctrine can be improved "no more than a star." Men have tried to revise it and have only succeeded in showing themselves ridiculous. Surely the fact of its age is no argument against its value, but rather an indication of it. A religion that could survive unaltered the shocks of two thousand years of strenuous history, hardly needs to be altered at present by anybody. Human hearts are the same now as they were at the time of the rising of Bethlehem's Star. The faith that fully satisfied our sires of old, fits just as perfectly into the great now. Why our scholars should shriek "On, on!" when "Back, back!" would be so plainly the more sensible cry, the great fault of the day—immoderate pride of progress—answers.

Yet our vaunted progress has led us into the most fearful of wars, spattering the pages of twentieth-century history, thus early, with blood. The very inventions, which only yesterday we pointed to as the triumphs of modern civilization, are to-day rendering slaughter on land, in air, and under water, the most barbarous that has ever awed our planet. With such ill success in mere temporalities, dare we constitute our ludicrously inefficient selves as master of the religious world and set about knocking down what Christ and the piety of centuries put up? Professor Wright does.

Says he confidently: "Modern man secures his own natural existence and well-being not by bargaining for divine protection against natural ills but by gaining mastery over natural forces through his own experimental science, inventive skill and technical proficiency. He does not rely upon divine Providence to protect him from ship-wreck at sea; he makes a compass, constructs a steamship, invents the wireless telegraph." From which the Professor deducts that the old prudential type of religion is far behind our times. Let him cast his gaze across the Atlantic and undeceive himself. Modern man so wondrously capable, according to Mr. Wright, of providing for himself, has strangely created for himself a fairly good inferno. The slimy serpent of sin and excess, which has been slowly coiling about the globe and stifling the lives of nations, originally crept forth from the very principle which the Professor approvingly depicts: self-sufficiency. The powers of self are instruments that eventually kill, unless God is reverently permitted to direct us in their proper use. This is too plain, especially in our own sad day, for parley.

The Professor likewise flips aside the mystical form of religion as archaic, declaring: "With regard, secondly, to the spiritual goods whose acquisition mystical religion pretends to ensure, modern man has learned that these are attained not by individuals who withdraw from worldly pursuits and devote themselves to supernatural concerns, but by those who avail themselves most successfully of the spiritual resources of their fellow-men, as these are developed through personal association and cooperation." Herein a gleaming jewel of truth is certainly caught on the prongs of error. The "modern man" would make a perfect society out of religion; so would, and also has, Christ. But surely the best means of securing the general good is to devote time and attention to the study of the Source of all good. This does not mean that terrestrial concerns are to be quite neglected in the interim. Mystical religion never taught that a man should gluttonously feed his soul on God and let his family starve. If Professor Wright has monasticism particularly in mind, he should recall that monks never constituted more than a meager part of any Christian community. He might reflect also upon the fact, which has always obtained, that

> Enough there are who reap and sow,
> Enough who give their lives to common gain,
> Enough who toil with spade and axe and plane,
> Enough who sail the seas where rude winds blow,
> Enough who plead in courts and physic pain.

Undeniably saints in no way hurt society by being such. Assuredly they gave the greedy world examples of abnegation which it sorely needed. The Professor forgets that real sanctity is heroic unselfishness. The names that find place in the ecclesiastical calendar are those of the men and women who lived, and often died, for others. Nor let a sneer be passed on the contemplative recluse. God only knows how frequently the lily-white prayer, rising from lowly cell, has restrained the divine wrath from pulverizing our iniquitous sphere. In a word, he who loves God, lives and labors, corporeally or spiritually, for the objects of God's love: men.

If Professor Wright would peer more closely into Catholic Christianity, he would see that it has all the merits of the proposed religion of democracy, none of the defects, and far more sublimity than any merely man-made scheme ever possessed or ever shall

EDWARD F. MURPHY, M.A.

Every Woman

IT is woman's privilege to rear to God's glory the generations of human beings who people the earth. He has, therefore, endowed her nature, even should actual motherhood never be her portion, with all the special gifts of heart and mind and soul required for the fulfilment of this function. To natural tenderness, delicacy of sentiment and refinement of perception He has added an almost boundless capability for love and sacrifice. He has bestowed upon her, above all, a strong attraction for religion and things spiritual, which the Church has not failed to acknowledge. These qualities may be considered as normally present, in varying degrees of perfection, where God's designs have not been frustrated by human error, vice or folly. They may be regarded as the dowry of womankind.

Women are not all to be mothers in the natural order. Many die prematurely. Many more are prevented from the realization of this privilege by a thousand different circumstances. Many, in fine, make of it a voluntary sacrifice for a purely supernatural motherhood of souls. They have chosen for their own the Divine Spouse who comes to them crowned with the thorns of suffering and holding in His hands the roses of love.

Whatever woman's destiny and vocation, her nature is still the same. It is dowered with the wondrous qualities that belong to motherhood, but which find their application no less in the daily opportunities of every woman's life. Her nature is not changed, but enriched and perfected by the divine espousal of her soul with God. Worldly ambition, luxury and crime can impoverish and degrade, but not destroy it. Even in a Lady Macbeth it still remains to wreak its dreadful vengeance, though she calls upon the spirits of evil to aid her in stifling within her heart every gracious instinct which God bestows on womankind.

The qualities requisite for motherhood are therefore woman's noblest dower. From the cradle to the grave they must be constantly fostered and developed in the life of every woman. They can be perfected and supernaturalized to an ever higher degree. To preserve them uncontaminated from the spirit of the world, which is always opposed to the spirit of Christ, must be the first object of woman's education and the goal of her personal endeavors. To hide them away idly in a napkin would call for a severe reckoning when God demands an account of woman's stewardship. To squander and misuse them would be to tempt the Almighty. To expose them to the dangers of a godless education would, ordinarily speaking, be nothing short of criminal. It is this which has poisoned life at its very fountain sources, has dried up the virtues of womanhood in their channels, until the nature that was intended to be fair and fruitful, watered by life-giving streams and embowered in beauty like an Eden of God, has too often become hard and sterile as the desert. Given for the loftiest of purposes, the desecrated instincts of motherhood become gifts for worthless creatures, nature is outraged and woman idolizes self to find as the end of her hopes and ambitions only a handful of dust and ashes. Egyptian idolatry was not so gross.

The need of all the motherly virtues in the mothers of the race can not be dwelt upon here. Prayerful preparation is required for so serious an obligation as motherhood. Not pagan eugenics, but godliness makes woman worthy of so high a calling. Her vocation is nothing less than the practice of the sublimest of all the arts, the fashioning of human souls to the likeness of their Saviour. The chisel of Michael Angelo, the brush of Raphael never attempted a work so grand.

But for the woman not engaged in the soul-absorbing duties of motherhood the complete and harmonious development of all motherly qualities is equally necessary, though in different ways. This means no less for her than the perfecting of her own womanly nature. In the constant exercise of these same gifts she will find her own best self-expression, her own happiness. The world has need of such virtue at every turn and every moment, therefore too has God bestowed them upon all women. There are souls to be guided, there are hearts to be consoled, there are wills to be strengthened in good. There are orphans to be mothered, there are children to be instructed, there are sickness and suffering and poverty to be relieved. There is innocence to be guarded and virtue to be rescued, and the fallen must be lifted up, that their feet may be set again upon the path which leads to Life and Truth. In a thousand opportunities of charity, in great things and small, these motherly qualities are needed to comfort and help and save mankind. Extraordinary possibilities are not in question here, but only the daily measure of good that every woman is called upon to do. The unhappy and restless woman is she who has failed to realize her womanly vocation.

Mother instincts are perhaps the deepest and the loftiest in the purely natural order. They are no less important in the spiritual life. It is through woman's union with Christ, her mother-yearning for souls, that men are born anew by the Spirit of Love, that great souls are won for God, that Heaven is peopled with Saints. How many of the marvels of grace and conversion are due under God to woman's solicitude for souls, her prayers and her watchfulness. By her true adherence to the sublime motherly ideal or her rejection of it men are made or unmade for this life and the next to a far greater degree than women seem to have realized.

What attraction has not this sublime vocation of the motherhood of souls exercised over millions of the chosen among their sex who have dedicated their lives entirely to God! Mothers are they, not in the flesh, but in the spirit. Many, indeed, may well be the spiritual children of her who is vowed to Christ, above her that has an earthly spouse:

> A virginal heart is mine; yet, Christ, what mystery!
> Mother of souls am I through my chaste bond with Thee

The promptings of motherhood were never felt more strongly, the instincts of motherhood were never obeyed more truly, the ideals of motherhood were never achieved more perfectly than here. The reward will be in proportion, great exceedingly. JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

Our Young Men.

I

MAY I begin with a few personal words? My excuse for doing so is the fact that I hope to avoid being perfunctory, or didactic, or second-handed, in dealing with a topic not self-chosen, but assigned to me by the editor of AMERICA—namely, young men; the dangers menacing their faith and morals, the extent to which they have yielded to those dangers, and what can be done to help them. Let those who have been specially trained and set aside to teach and preach and whose sacred calling has kept them in close touch with young men in the schools and the confessionals deal with this topic impersonally, judicially, and authoritatively; but I have no such formal right to speak; I am asked to speak only because I happen to be a writer, and it seems to me that if I am to contribute anything worth while to the discussion I must give it straight from experience.

Strange power of the pen! What a singular phenomenon is this, that the ability to put words together in an interesting fashion should be so generally allowed to give the possessor of that ability a right, at any rate the privilege, to set himself up as the instructor or the critic of other people in moral, political, intellectual, and even religious matters! It is precisely because men and women who can write so often write on the wrong side, for the wrong causes, at their own sweet or acrid wills, that the dangers of which I am to speak are cunningly multiplied, yet made at times to seem not dangers at all, but desirable and essentially necessary things. Apparently without any sense of responsibility, they teach and they preach, these self-adoring masters of modern life; and the fact that they teach what is false and preach what is damnable must not blind us to the recognition of their real power of influencing others.

Now, it has been as one of these writers, and among them, that I have passed the last fifteen years of my life, since boyhood. In various large cities, save for a few brief interludes of country life; as a newspaper and magazine writer; always a "radical;" interested and taking part in most of the modern "movements;" a member of a socialistic colony; also of an artistic "colony;" such has been my career. If my "radical" and artistic affiliations isolated me in any marked degree from the current of ordinary, common human life, on the other hand my almost constant activity as a newspaper reporter and correspondent kept me employed in the thick of that current. Then, two years ago, I reentered the Church. Other interests, even art, at once became subordinate to this central interest. And now, if I am to be of any real service to the Church, as a writer, I feel I must frankly go at whatever subject I lay hold of from a personal point of view. I must be a witness, or an advocate, but not a judge.

With this confessional preamble, jumping now to my topic, I must say I think AMERICA does well indeed to direct attention to our young men and their dangers. They tell me that converts are always too enthusiastic, either as pessimists or optimists, in praise or in blame. It may well be so. Just the same I must hazard the statement that my two years experience and observation as a Catholic, together with the results of my other years outside the Church, combine to make me feel that Catholic young men are surrounded by appalling dangers. The need of helping them is tremendous. Their faith and morals are attacked on every side. And I think they have yielded ground to these dangers. Even more than to the obvious and open dangers, they have become infected by that creeping, insidious paralysis of the spiritual life which can best be defined as religious indifferentism.

I am told that the Church in America has of late grown wonderfully in numbers. Good; that's splendid; and may that growth continue as long as time endures, and may the Church wax in prosperity, and progress in mellow peace. But it won't; it can not! In our hearts, in the hearts, I mean, of all who really understand something, at least, of what the Church really is—we know that it won't continue indefinitely to grow in numbers, and influence, and peace. Never has the Church in any land from the beginning until now ever had such a history; nor will it in America. Until time ends and eternity is all in all the Church of Christ must struggle with the spirit of anti-Christ. Hence it follows as a conclusion of the most elementary reasoning that evil will rise up mightily against the American Church; not indeed to prevail; but in that dark hour many households which now seem securely fixed with the Church upon its foundation of rock will be swept away, and the great testing of souls will find many not able to withstand the acids of persecution and peril. In a word, we may expect war against the Church in this country as an absolute certainty. Its evil omens and sultry presages are luridly discernable even now. And when it breaks upon us in all its malign might those not strong in faith and sound in morals based upon religion will fail the Church. Worse still—for the Church itself will not fail—many of those souls may be lost for ever, and with them other souls which might have been saved if the apostate or paralysed souls had been steadfast and vigorous.

What, then, do you ask, are those dangers which face our young men and to which they have yielded in a measure, and which in the future must menace the Church all the more because of the yielding now by our youth?

At bottom, of course, they are the same dangers which have always faced young men, and which will continue to do so: sin; sin caused by the devil, and in multiform aspects brought to the tempting of youth by the devil's conscious and unconscious helpers. The only difference to-day is a difference of method; a change in the instruments and plan of the war, that is all. One of the most cunning and effective of the devil's devices—it must have been suggested to him by his efficiency engineer—is his own self-effacement; his own denial of his personality. For it has become old-fashioned to talk about the devil, save as a literary tag; a sort of short-hand expression. All the more, however, does it become necessary to ignore his polite incognito and to tear off the whole succession of masks in the use of which he has grown so artistically adept. If you tell a man, some night, that murder menaces his household, that murder is abroad in the dark hours he will agree, or disagree, according to his personal philosophy or temperament; but if a murderer breaks into his house he will grab for his gun. Catholics, anyhow, should never lose sight of the objective truth of the devil's real, actual presence on his own black "job," and of the consequent fact that the spirit of evil will utilize each and every method, open, or disguised, to win souls away from God. Therefore, if I leave the more obvious moral and religious dangers alone for the present, and speak of some of the subtler or disguised fashions in which young men are attacked I trust I shall not be accused of intolerance, and of narrowness in my outlook on life.

I speak then as I strongly believe when I say that some of these dangers are as follows: tolerance of non-Catholic institutions to the point of supporting them, or joining them—institutions, I mean, such as non-Catholic schools and colleges, the Y. M. C. A., and all other clubs and fraternities, those apparently innocent of anti-Catholicism as well as those which are condemned by authority; Socialism; the reading of newspapers, magazines, and books; the theater; the saloon; sensualism; religious indifferentism; and the spirit of worldly success. Some of these dangers, of course, can never be entirely avoided. Good and bad are inextricably mingled in the "world," save for those who can retire from it altogether, which only about one in ten thousand, or thereabouts, can do. But against all of them, I hold, Catholic young men must be on guard.

I realize that to speak against the non-Catholic school is to dare the taboo against attacking perhaps the chief fetich of the non-Catholic American. But Catholics place before all other concerns the safety of the soul, and we must realize that godless education cannot help but weaken souls. Certainly, I for one can speak of this. Born a Catholic, confirmed as one, I was sent to a public school instead of the parochial school; only on Sundays was the catechism placed before me; all the rest of the time I was imbibing indifferentism, and then religious doubt, in this atmosphere, as inevitably as a plant draws oxygen or poisonous gases from the air according to its degree of purity. Growing strong in my "liberalism" I went on Sundays to listen to a popular Universalist clergyman; a man of personal magnetism and power as a speaker. What wonder, then, after eagerly reading heaps of irreligious and "radical" literature, that by the age of fifteen or sixteen I was lost to the Faith and to the teachings of my earlier years?

So I think I know something of what I am talking about. I know my own case. I know other cases. I have met and mingled with the sort of young men turned out from the secular schools and universities. I do not say they are horrible monsters of immorality and godlessness; for of course they are not; but they are without religious faith, and lacking that, they lack the greatest good which life could hold for them. Catholic parents who send their children to the non-Catholic schools and universities send them into constant and deadly danger. And thousands upon thousands of Catholic boys and young men are amid those dangers now. What are we going to do about these and the other dangers I have named? Are we to check them or shall they be allowed to work irreparable harm to our young men?

MICHAEL WILLIAMS.

Thoughts about Heredity*

SOME years ago when I was delivering a lecture at the Cathedral Hall of Westminster in the course of the questioning which took place at the termination of the discourse which was on vitalism, I was asked by one who signed his paper, "So and So, Atheist," "What would you say if you saw a duck come out of a hen's egg?" I recognized at once the idea at the back of the question and appreciated the fact that it had been asked by one who, as someone has said, "called himself an advanced free-thinker but was really a very ignorant and vulgar person who was suffering from a surfeit of the ideas of certain people cleverer than himself." But, as a full discussion of the matter would have taken at least as long as the lecture which I had just concluded, my reply was that I would wait to see the duck come out of the hen's egg, since no man had as yet witnessed such an event, before I attempted to explain it. I do not know whether my atheistical questioner was satisfied or not, but I heard no more of him. But, after all, is it not a marvelous thing that a duck never does come out of a hen's egg? If everything happens by chance, as some would have us believe, why is it that a duck does not occasionally emerge from a hen's egg? Surely this is a miraculum, a thing to be wondered at, yet so common that it goes unnoticed, like many other wonderful things which are also matters of common everyday occurrence, such as the spinning of the earth on its own axis and its course round the sun and through the heavens.

If we pursue this question further we shall begin to remember that creatures more nearly related to one another also "breed true." The hen and the duck are both birds, but they are not so nearly allied to one another as the lion and the tiger, both of which are Felidæ or cats. Yet no one ever expects that a tiger will be born of a lioness or vice versa. Further, the pug and the greyhound are both of them dogs: the name canis domesticus applies to both, and one would be distinguished from the other in a scientific list as "Var. (i. e., variety) 'pug'" or "Var. 'greyhound.'" Yet one can imagine the surprise of a breeder if a greyhound was born in his carefully selected and guarded kennel of pugs. In a word, not only species, but varieties do tend to breed true; the child does resemble its parent or parents. No doubt the resemblance is not absolute: there is variation as well as inheritance. Sometimes the variation may be recognized as a feature possessed by a grand-parent or even by some collateral relative such as an uncle or great-uncle; sometimes this may not be the case, though the non-recognition of the likeness does not in any way preclude the possibility that the peculiarity may have been also possessed by some other member of the family. But on the whole the offspring does closely resemble its parents, that is to say not only the species and the variety but the individual

*The first of a series of three articles.

"breeds true." "Look like dey are bleedzed to take atter der pa," as Uncle Remus said when he was explaining how the rabbit comes to have a bobtail. Moreover this resemblance is not merely in the great general features. Apart from monstrosities the children of human beings are human beings; the children of white parents have white skins, those of black progenitors are black. Commonly, though not always by any means, the children of dark-haired parents are themselves dark-haired and so on. But smaller features are also transmitted, and transmitted too for many generations; for example the well-known case of the Hapsburg lip, visible in so many portraits of Spanish monarchs and their near relatives and visible in life to-day. Again there are families in which the inner part of one eye-brow has the hairs growing upwards instead of in the ordinary way, a feature which is handed on from one generation to another. Even more minute features than this have been known to be transmissible and transmitted, such as a tiny pit in the skin on the ear or on the face. In fact there is hardly any feature no matter how small which may not become a hereditary possession.

If in-and-in breeding occur, as it may do amongst human beings in a locality much removed from other places of habitation, it may even happen that what may be looked upon as a variety of the human race may arise, though when it arises it is always easy to wipe it out and restore things to the normal by the introduction of fresh blood, to use the misleading term commonly employed, where the Biblical word "seed" comes much nearer to the facts.

Thus there is a well-authenticated case in France (in Brittany if I remember right) of a six-fingered race which existed for a number of generations in a very isolated place and was restored to five fingeredness when an increase in the populousness of the district permitted a wider selection in the matter of marriages.

And similarly not long ago an account was published of an albino race somewhere in Canada which had acquired a special name.

Perhaps it has been wiped out by this time by wider marriages, though these might be effected with greater difficulty by albinos than by six-fingered persons. At any rate no one can doubt that it might at any time be wiped out by such marriages, though even when apparently wiped out, sporadic cases might be expected to occur, what the breeders call "throws-back," when they see an animal which resembles some ancestor further back in the line of descent than its actual progenitors. Certainly the most remarkable instance of the reliance which we have come to feel respecting this matter of inheritance is that which was afforded by a recent case of disputed paternity, interesting on both sides of the Atlantic since the events in dispute occurred in America and the property and the dispute concerning it were in England.

It was obviously a most difficult and disputable case, but the judge, a shrewd observer, noticed, when the putative father was in the box, a feature in his countenance which seemed closely to resemble what was to be seen in the child which he claimed to be his own. A careful examination of the parents and of the child was made by an eminent sculptor, accustomed to minute observation of small features of variety in those sitting to him as models.

He reported and showed to the court that there were remarkable features in the head of the child which resembled, on the one hand an unusual configuration in the mother—or the woman who claimed to be the mother—and on the other a well-marked feature in her husband. And as a result the father and mother won their case, and were proclaimed the parents of the child because of the resemblance of these features; and, if we think for a moment, we shall see, because also of the reliance which the human race has come to place in the fidelity of inheritance, of its perfect certainty, so to speak, that a duck will not come out of a hen's egg.

BERTRAM C. A. WINDLE, M.D., SC.D., LL.D., F.R.S.

The End of Socialism

IN discussing the end of Socialism do not let us play with words or the words will play with us. What is important is not what the word means, but what we mean. The word Socialist can be used, in France it is used, as meaning anyone who thinks the whole capitalist system incurably bad, and wants some other system of greater economic equality. If that is being a Socialist, my brother is still a Socialist and I am still a Socialist. But if Socialism means giving all the "means of production and distribution" to that group or system, call it what you will, which does control the police and post office, then I do not believe he is a Socialist any more than I am; and I believe that nearly all the ablest Socialists are Socialists no longer. When brothers are in the House of Commons, apparently it is etiquette for them to disagree in politics but agree in finance. My own family relations are of a more old-fashioned sort. I know less if possible, of my brother's finances than of my own; but I think I know his convictions, and I think that on this point there is very little between us.

What strikes me as queerest about this controversy is this: that the new argument for Socialism is exactly the same as the old argument against Socialism. When I was a Socialist it was the whole capitalist game to say: "You can't have Socialism until you've altered human nature." And it was our whole Socialist game to explain to the capitalist with mingled tenderness and truth, that he was a jackass, because the improvement proposed by the Socialist, right or wrong, did not in the least depend on any change in human nature. It depended on an unchangeable fact in human nature which anybody can find out by dealing a pack of cards. If you wish to distribute pennies, or any other form of property, on an equal system, or any kind of system, you most certainly can do it more rapidly and correctly if you do it from one center. That argument still remains, and is still unanswerably true, as far as it goes.

But there is a further argument. I take it that the point we raise in the matter is simply this: that cards do not deal themselves: that wages do not distribute themselves. Some person and persons, a small minority at the best, must at least temporarily hold all the wealth and what is, perhaps, almost more important, all the special information about the wealth. And the plain query is: Can we, knowing what men are, and especially what politicians are, so put our trust in princes, or in any child of man? Our present state is doubtless an exceptionally degraded parody of democracy; but have even the healthiest and most active democracies ever been able to control their Government quite so promptly and delicately as to prevent it abusing a power so instant and overwhelming? Or what is to prevent the politicians cheating us in a hundred hidden ways; deceiving us about what wages they can afford as they do about what taxes we can afford; bamboozling us with the necessity of vast expenses, as they do now about the necessity of vast salaries? What is to prevent the politicians giving us a sham economic equality, exactly as they already give us a sham political equality?

To this perfectly rational question the Socialists hostile to us reply with the old argument of the anti-Socialists: that there must be a change in human nature. They will reply that my brother's "politicians" are conceived on present-day lines; or, as I should say, on human lines. They say that my brother does not see the "politico-economic-psychic development making a bee line." I dare say he does not. I am glad that no such fatality has befallen my family. It must be a horrid sight. But, in somewhat simpler English, the answer evidently means that before we get Socialism we shall somehow get much nicer statesmen to administer Socialism. I respect faith wherever I find it; but I really can not see why the souls of politicians should alone be miraculously saved. Why should I not say that all England be put under martial law, that rapid and efficient system: and then say that soldiers a hundred years hence will not be conceived on present-day lines? I defy anyone to say that he has not known more honest men who have grown old in the army than in Parliament? Why should I not simply say that soldiers will improve as the Socialists say that politicians will improve? Only because there happens to be no earthly reason for saying it of either of the two.

Is it conceivable that these Socialist dupes of "progress" and "evolution" do not see that they are walking into the capitalist's jaws? Can not they see that he has only to answer: "I'm glad there will be a politico-economic-psychic development; please let me know?" When a starry scorn of wealth begins to shine in Mr. Samuel's and Mr. Gluckstein's eyes I shall know that Socialism is coming. When an unworldly wish to waste himself for the poor is seen to be torturing Mr. Austen Chamberlain, I shall give up money myself. Meanwhile, you make a bee line for the factory, at four dollars a week; the hooter's going.

G. K. CHESTERTON.

The Dog or the Baby

SECTION 1142 of the Penal Code of New York makes it a misdemeanor, punishable with imprisonment for several years, to give information subversive of the end of marriage: the procreation of children for the greater glory of God and their own eternal happiness. Although it is no honor to our civilization that such a law is needed, the law is good; as might be surmised, however, it does not meet with entire approval.

It seems there is a society in New York called the "Committee on Birth Control," and under the auspices of this committee a woman who was a teacher before she was suspended for criticising the Board of Education, recently called a meeting of the "Scientistical" to discuss ways and means to put wheels under this bill, and thus open our libraries and bookshops to translations of French, Italian and German pamphlets reeking with paganism. This woman acknowledged that the endeavor of the meeting would be to further the work of one Margaret H. Sanger, editor of the dead and buried Woman Rebel, who was indicted, for sending the Woman Rebel through the mails, by a Government which does not grow faint at the moral aroma of the Menace, that spiritual reading of the submerged or decadent. Several other women quite past the whooping-cough period, were present to boost the "uplift" at this meeting. The uplift has a pious interest in the poor. The prime mover in the present wretched campaign says that as things now are, rich women are not obliged to have children because they can buy the wisdom they require to crack the Ten Commandments, but the poor are less favored.

If such folk were trying to spread this kind of chlorine gas down the wind we might hold our noses and avoid them silently, but it seems Dr. Abraham Jacobi has become careless in his associations and has joined this estimable galaxy whose cult is the lonely cradle. As everyone knows, he used to be a very useful physician. He was imprisoned for high treason as a revolutionist against the Government of Germany in 1851, and he is a revolutionist against the government of God in 1915. He is eighty-five years of age and that fact explains much. His present opinion is practically unknown among genuine physicians. A few years ago the Medical Review of Reviews asked for the judgment of many conspicuous persons concerning euthanasia with a narcotic for the incurable, and while most of these prominent men lost the dignity of ignorance in speech the physicians to a man opposed such murder. A physician's business is to preserve life, not to kill.

The agitators in this conference yearn over the poor so intensely that they will tear themselves loose from real money, not for bread, of course, but for a kind of printed matter which a decent street-sweeper would not lift on his sliding shovel. Beelzebub himself is so overworked in this country just now that his hoofs are sore, and these holy male and female old women, who are willing to fondle any kind of a dog but never a baby, would relieve him of part of his work. The poor have so many superfluous children that the little ones are half-starved; therefore do not see to it that they are fed, but make their mothers victims of a base passion, and there will not be any little ones to feed. What a pecuniary saving for the State. St. Vincent de Paul, save us from the wrath of God!

The most helpless idiot if baptized is as far above a non-existent child as St. Bridget is above a Committee on Birth Control, but even if it were not, what right would that fact give to any man to prevent human life? No one must get married, but if he marries he has to meet the law of God, or God will meet him, no matter how all the short-haired apostles of the "uplift" buzz to the contrary. This morning at Mass I listened to a great churchful of Irish children sending up wave on wave of a litany before the feet of the Mother of Fair Delight, and this flock of the lambs of Christ went to the sanctuary rail in pattering line after line, line after line, and they came down with tiny hands clasped and the light of His Sacred Heart shining through them from within, (God bless you, Pius X, for listening to Him and the hunger of love of Him!) till one could not see the altar-candles for the glory of it; yet these unfortunate gomerils of the "uplift" would send certain pamphlets, which may not be named, to the white-souled mothers of those who have been suffered to come to Him in peace and joy. God save us from harm!

France has eaten this apple of the knowledge of evil, and in the first six months of 1914 when Europe was still at peace the total number of births in that country was 381,398; a decrease of 4,000 on the year 1913. At the same time the deaths increased 20,845. Thus the population of France during the first six months of 1914 decreased 24,816. For the past thirty years the French birth rate has steadily decreased while the death rate has increased. January, 1916 will find France with about 700,000 less people than she had in January, 1914, and the greatest mortality will be in her unmarried young men. No matter what change of heart the war may bring to France any increase in her population can not possibly be expected at least before 1925. On the other hand, in Germany from 1890 to 1915 the birth rate of males has been about two to one for France. The Germans will therefore put under arms for the twenty years to come twice the number of men France can. Will France, then, get her revenge? If she wants to stay on the map as a second-rate power she will have to look for help to a higher warlord than a man of earth. Our Committee on Birth Control would like to turn this nation into another France.

AUSTIN O'MALLEY, M.D.

Euripides in New York

THE shade of Euripides haunted the hills and hollows of old New York during the week just past. On four different occasions audiences that have been estimated to number not less than five thousand each gathered in the stadium of the College of the City of New York to witness Granville Barker render the tragedies of "The Trojan Women" and "Iphigenia in Tauris"; and on one other occasion some hundreds of invited guests made their way up from the Hudson to the College of Mount Saint Vincent and sat down in the checkered shade of the old elms in Lourdes Park to enjoy the presentation by the students of "Iphigenia in Aulis." In all cases the spectators were given a rare treat. Whether or not those who were present at the performances could find it possible to rise often to the heights of Greek tragedy were they given the opportunity frequently, may well be questioned, although one of our representative newspapers had made the suggestion, and in all seriousness, that "The Trojan Women" might successfully be compressed for the variety stage. This much, however, is certain, that the audiences who assisted at the classic drama did listen with interest, and did experience the charm of the old Athenian who was so scoffingly sceptical about the existence of his pagan gods but so intensely alive to the reality of human sorrow.

New York and its vicinity has not been during recent years an entire stranger to the Greek tragedy. At different times it has had the privilege of assisting at the "Ajax," "Antigone," "Oedipus Coloneus," "Alcestis" and "Agamemnon"; but the language being in all these cases Greek, pronounced as a rule according to the ancient manner, though once at least with the iotacism of modern Athens, it is safe to say that anything like real pleasure in the plays was confined to the favored few. It was not so with the last week's presentations. In them English, the pure and undefiled English of Gilbert Murray and Arthur S. Way, was employed to the complete exclusion of the original. This indeed, was conceivably a loss to the professorial caste, but to the laity it proved an immeasurable gain. The beauty and the pathos and the loftiness of sentiment in the poet's lines, pagan though he was, interpreted in the setting for which he wrote them, and iwth a sympathetic expression that would have been impossible in any language but the vernacular, filled those present with deep feeling. There were few bursts of applause. Throughout the spectators sat in silence, relaxing only when the play was done. This was the best tribute to the poet's skill. It was the tribute he would have wished.

There were, of course, marked contrasts between the rendition of the professionals and that of the amateurs. Where finished, experienced players, brought from England for the purpose, were on one stage, and undergraduates on the other, comparison between the actors, although the younger cast did remarkably well, would be useless and hardly fair. The Doric stadium, with its close resemblance to the Dionysiac theater, its facsimile of the ancient stage, its vast auditorium, its circular orchestra, all combined to make the performances at City College the far more accurate copies of the plays as they were given in the shadow of the Acropolis. Grandeur certainly was all on the side of the professionals. To match the imposing group of buildings of which the stadium is only a part, there was nothing but exquisite simplicity at Mount Saint Vincent's, where the stage was set far from the college, amid fine old trees, and backed by slender Corinthian columns.

Nevertheless the sky-line that one saw over the great stage in the stadium, interfered greatly with the illusion Mr. Barker was trying so studiously to create, for it was only the typical and ugly sky line that New Yorkers have grown accustomed to; and no stretch of imagination could transform it into graceful Grecian outlines and the dancing waters of the "wine dark"

Aegean. The rough ground also, the passing vehicles, the clang of bells and the hoot of horns went far to dispel the impression produced by the rising tiers of crowded seats. The silent seclusion of the stage at Mount Saint Vincent's with its background of flickering shadows, bright flowers and long, waving grass, gave a greater sense of naturalness and charm to the less pretentious play. It was far easier to imagine oneself by the sands of Aulis than outside the walls of Troy. This perhaps is the reason why that scene is most likely to live in the memories of those who saw all the plays, in which the frail, impassioned Iphigenia at the Mount looked through a rift in the foliage straight into the rays of the dying sun, and spoke her "Farewell, dear light, farewell."

In all the performances the choruses were a difficulty; Euripides himself found them hard to handle. There was little to suggest what we have been taught to consider the wondrous beauty of the choral dance. Mr. Wilkinson is to be thanked for having embodied in his costumes the latest results of archeological finds, but one is reluctant to believe that the beauty-loving Greeks dressed their actors in the bizarre fashion in which many of the players appeared at City College. The New York stadium, it is true, behaved better than the Yale bowl. And yet in spite of every resolution to stifle unseemly mirth, a titter did run through the audience; if the laugh was checked, it was only because the grim seriousness of the lines prevailed over the ludicrous appearance of King Thoas and his savages. There are Greek vases and Greek vases. Certainly Mr. Wilkinson might have been happier in his choice. More artistic, though it may be not quite so well authenticated, was the harmonious blending of colors that were grouped in ever changing movements in the hollow in the woods above the Hudson. Of course no masks were used, still the finer shades of emotion and the subtler interpretations were often lost in the stadium, where the mere effort to be heard made them well-nigh impossible even for so cultured a voice as that of Edith Matthison. Indeed, many of the audience would have been unable to follow at all, had they not had the text in their hands. In the less ambitious performance this difficulty was not present.

Had the professionals been playing where the amateurs played, had the setting been more natural, the costumes more beautiful, and had more scope been allowed for delicacy of expression, their rendering of Euripides would have been less instructive, less accurate in historical detail, less like what the ancient play actually was; but it would have been, perhaps, more like what the poet himself would have wished it to be. That he broke away from the heroic as far as he dared, no one is likely to deny; his tendency was all toward the romantic. Sophocles therefore or Aeschylus would seem to have been a better choice for the stadium, although the present sympathy with the women of Europe made the plays actually chosen better suited to the times.

Lovers of the classical drama owe a debt of gratitude to Mr. Barker and those who contributed to the success of his efforts. Thousands have been given an opportunity to form a very clear idea of the old Dionysiac plays. The Sisters of Charity also are to be congratulated. The faculty of Mount Saint Vincent's, by its happy selection and by its poetic and romantic presentation of "Iphigenia in Aulis" has shown Euripides at his best, replete with delicate beauty and subtle human charm. And both alike are to be thanked for the lessons they have given in moral standards to the theater-going public. The high moral tone of the Greek tragedies written as they were fully four centuries before Christ and for a supposedly corrupt people, must have appeared to every one to be in striking contrast to the extremely low level that is said to satisfy and even to be demanded by our present enlightened patrons of the stage. Ancient pagans, it would seem, had higher ideals than many of our so-called modern Christians.

J. HARDING FISHER, S.J.

COMMUNICATIONS

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

Vaudeville

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I read with some surprise the letter by Mr. Fitzpatrick on vaudeville. The gentleman says he is an actor and has been for nine years. Well, we can not expect him to look at plays or to judge of them as the audience does. It is almost impossible for an actor to know the effect of plays on people. The judge of this is the spectator who himself is affected and who is able to move about amongst other spectators and discuss the matter impartially. We may take it for granted that most Catholic parents have made it their highest aim and first duty to teach their children all the virtues that a good man or woman should have; but most present vaudeville exhibitions tend to uproot and destroy all the parents have accomplished. If, on the other hand, both children and adults could see reverence, modesty, etc., illustrated on the stage by good actors, with beautiful settings, the effect would be all to the good. As it is now, however, scanty attire and all that are actually doing harm. If women make vaudeville, as your correspondent claims, then surely women have a mission here and now.

Louisville. E. BUSCHMEYER.

Has Germany an Established Religion?

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In AMERICA of April 10 Mr. Thomas F. Woodlock makes the statement that Germany is a country "in which one form of religion is by law established." I do not know where Mr. Woodlock got this information, but surely not from a perusal of the Constitution of the German Empire. Perhaps the fashion, so common especially in France and America, of speaking of "Protestant Germany" is the source of his mistake. As a matter of fact there is no established religion in the German Empire. The Empire is neither Protestant nor Catholic. In proof of this it is sufficient to point to the fact that there is no such office in Germany as an Imperial Minister of Worship.

But perhaps Mr. Woodlock identifies Germany with Prussia, and merely wanted to say that in Prussia there is "one form of religion established by law." In this case also his statement is wide of the mark. In Prussia there are two officially recognized and privileged religious bodies, the Evangelical (including the Lutheran and Calvinist) and the Catholic Church; furthermore, the so-called licensed sects, such as the Herrenhuter and the Bohemian Brethren, and the tolerated sects, such as the Mennonites. Among the non-Christian religious bodies the Jews enjoy special protection and privileges. Prussia can not, therefore, be called either a Protestant or a Catholic State, but a paritätischer Staat, that is, a State in which the officially recognized religions enjoy equal rights.

In this connection it may interest the readers of AMERICA to know how the public-school system of Prussia safeguards the rights of the comparatively small Jewish population in the matter of religious training. The Jews have a right to erect separate schools for the education of their children, and wherever they make use of this right, they are exempt from the ordinary school-tax. The Jewish schools are of two kinds: those erected by the Jewish educational societies, and those erected by, and attached to, the synagogues. In 1903 there were one hundred and three of the former and one hundred and ten of the latter in Prussia. The civil communities are not obliged to build and maintain public schools for Jewish children, but they are free to do so, and in fact often do so. Thus in 1903 no less than twenty-eight Jewish schools were voluntarily maintained by the respective municipalities. Neither are the civil communities obliged to procure religious instruction for the Jewish children frequenting the national schools, but where twelve Jewish children are regularly in attendance, and there is no Jewish teacher on the school staff, the Synagogue is free to appoint a teacher of religion, and if it does so the community must pay part of the expenses incurred, "because," as the Minister of Education declared in the House of Peers, when this question was under discussion, "it is a matter of great importance to the State that Jewish children do not grow up without religious instruction." In 1908 the State itself appropriated 40,000 marks for this purpose. Jewish teachers are employed in Christian schools only exceptionally, either as teachers of their own religion, or of purely technical subjects, such as drawing, gymnastics, etc. (Antoni, Die Preussische Volksschulgesetzgebung I, p. 122. 9.) Would it be asking too much, say of the State of New York, to do for its very large percentage of Catholic citizens what Prussia does for the Jews living within its borders?

Knechtsteden. GEORGE METLAKE.

A Catholic Correspondence School

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In AMERICA for May 22, a correspondent urges "the preparation and introduction of a sound collegiate course of studies to be given by correspondence." I should like to second heartily this suggestion. Many boys and girls leave school at an early age either through force of circumstances or lack of appreciation. Later on they keenly realize the need of education, and being aware of their deficiencies would like to acquire more knowledge and culture. There are numberless young men and women who would hail with delight the starting of a Catholic correspondence school.

Baltimore. LEO D. WARD.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Please let "W. J. B." know that the editors of the "Catholic Encyclopedia" have still in mind the establishment of a Correspondence School, and that they propose to start one just as soon as more favorable times permit, let us hope before 1916.

New York. CONDÉ B. PALLEN.

Prohibition

To the Editor of AMERICA:

If any question monopolizes the attention of our day, it is the problem revolving about the liquor traffic. The question has from time immemorial baffled the civilizations of all nations. And even in this enlightened age of ours it has nonplused the minds of our great social reformers and moral leaders. It has been the question mark of ages, the enigma of time. Nearly all other countries exhibit the same phenomena as we do. This problem remains in spite of centuries of legislative effort, a tacit testimony which reinforces the statement that physical remedies and external coercion will not cure moral disorders, however much they may lessen the incidence of temptation. Hence moral suasion and religion which alone strengthen the will, are the only adequate and safe remedy. Still we find a large number of social reformers offering panaceas, but all in vain. One of these so-called reforms is comprehended under the policy of prohibition which attempts the solution of the problem by preventing the manufacture, sale and use of liquor. All who have investigated the drink problem fully realize the gravity of its nature and unhesitatingly admit the prevalent abuses and also the urgent need of reform, but the notion that prohibition is the solution of the problem is not seconded by the majority. Still we find many well-meaning people among prohibitionists, who have been lured into the meshes of this charlatanism by the fair promises of a Utopia. Many of these people would not adhere to strict prohibition if they knew what it stands for. That "little thinking is done to-day" is no "saw" at all. Its truth is manifested in all walks of life and especially in our legislation, where love of extremes seems to be a chief characteristic. People to-day do not think. They allow themselves to be duped by any nostrum that gains any prominence. It is not my purpose to unmask the many errors of this so-called reform movement, but only to review some wild assertions and distorted views which seem to have gained much undeserved vogue of late. That the prohibitionist is an extremist is inevitable; for, he condemns wine as a malum per se. But is not every atom of wine contained in the grape? And is not the grape a creature of God? "Wine was created in the beginning to make men jovial." St. Chrysostom and other Fathers of the Church called wine "a gift of God." But the prohibitionist maintains that it is concocted by human depravity inspired by the devil.

This proves that the prohibitionist is an extremist. But what is the aim of prohibition? To suppress the drink vice. Did you ever hear of man suppressing vice? That is something divine and cannot be usurped by man. Yet this is the very aim of prohibition. The prohibitionists would correct the liquor evil by destroying liquor itself. Did you ever hear of a reform movement that destroys the thing in question? It sounds like socialism, attempting to reform society by destroying it. Again many who call themselves prohibitionists are only restrictionists. For instance, the Catholic prohibitionist is not a strict prohibitionist, but only a restrictionist. When he preaches prohibition he means restriction. The Hobson Resolution is not prohibition, because it allows the "manufacture, sale, importation and transportation of liquors for sacramental, medicinal and pharmaceutical purposes." Kansas is not a prohibition State because it exempts "medicinal and scientific purposes." Maine is far less a prohibition State because it permits the "manufacture and sale of hard cider." The radical prohibitionist would brush away all these exemptions. But why say that the two so-called banner prohibition States, Maine and Kansas are not prohibition? Mr. Cyrus W. Davis, Secretary of State of Maine, and Hon. Royal E. Cabell, in their pamphlet, "The Two Banner Prohibition States," prove very conclusively that neither Maine nor Kansas are prohibition States. Mr. Davis says, "Maine has never been or never will be a prohibition State until public opinion precedes legal enactment. Maine is a temperance State," while in Kansas, in which the sale of liquor is prohibited for all purposes excepting the aforesaid, there were registered for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, 733 persons qualified under the Federal Laws to retail liquors; while in the license State of Arkansas, only 873 qualified under the Federal Laws. Now, let us see what prohibition has done for Kansas, in the way of social betterment. If prohibition prevents suicide, why is the suicide rate in Kansas higher than in twenty-one States in which liquor is legally sold? If prohibition prevents insanity why is the rate of insanity in Kansas higher than in sixteen States in which liquor is lawfully sold, and why should it cost nearly one million dollars annually to care for the insane, etc? If prohibition prevents pauperism why is the pauper rate in Kansas higher than the pauper rate in ten States where liquor is lawfully sold? Don't talk about prohibition blessings in Kansas. Among the States that have had quasi-prohibition we find that Vermont, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New Hampshire, Michigan, Iowa, Illinois, Nebraska, Pennsylvania and South Dakota have abandoned prohibition for license. This goes to show that prohibition has had a rather disastrous experiment where it has reposed on the statute books.

The solution of the drink problem is still in its experimental stage and will probably continue so indefinitely on account of the conflicting theories and psychological differences in our heterogeneous population. For the present let us stay off this prohibition wave and adopt strict external regulation, scientific and religious education and above all, total abstinence on the part of our moral leaders. Would that humanity were one vast total abstinence society of voluntary profession, not by the tyranny of law! Until these means have accomplished personal temperance on the part of our people, prohibition can not be enforced; when they have accomplished it, prohibition will be unnecessary.

St. Francis, Wis. J. J. ROCHE.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It is with a good deal of surprise that I have read the communications in AMERICA which have taken a decidedly anti-prohibition stand; but I attribute the attitude of the writers to the fact that they have not been brought into actual contact with the misery that results from the liquor traffic. They have come from good families and have lived in good homes, and have had good, honest, sober, devoted fathers. Such men are not fitted by actual experience to sympathize with those whose homes have been cursed by drunkenness. I should like to see an article written straight from the heart of one of those many wives, whose happiness has been wrecked, whose children's prospects have been blasted, and whose homes, which should be the cradle and the sanctuary of all that is holy, have been turned into places of torment and have been the unwilling witnesses of many outrages against God's law. They and they alone know how much prohibition is needed. What an indictment against strong drink would the records of our prisons, asylums and poor-houses bring, if they were but known. Nationwide prohibition is a crying need. Catholics should not oppose, but support the movement.

Rhinelander, Wis. M. STAPLETON.

[This controversy is closed.—Editor AMERICA.]

Is Dante Read?

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Dr. Walsh's interesting essay on Dante in your issue of May 22, leaves on the reader's mind two impressions against which I would make a humble remonstrance. I think it is not beyond doubt that Dante is so very little read in any land, as it would appear from the article under consideration. This may be true of America and perhaps of England. As to Germany, it would seem that translating and writing commentaries on Dante afford an unlimited opportunity to Teutonic industry and perseverance, and it is to be supposed that so many books would not be written on a subject in which the public was not interested. But whatever be the case in America, in England and in Germany, I know of two countries where Dante is popular in the best sense of the word. Modern French literature is interspersed with Dantesque allusions and quotations; it is not seldom that excellent as well as popular essays on Dante are to be seen in French reviews and magazines. Those who have read "Du Diable à Dieu" know that Adolphe Retté, the talented poet who is now a Benedictine monk, was led to the Catholic Church by the study of Dante's poem. Indeed, I think there is hardly to be found in France a man or woman of good education who has not read and enjoyed "The Divine Comedy."

As regards Italy, it would seem to be a clear fact that Dante is the best-known and most read poet. But since Dr. Walsh makes no exception when calling attention to the fewness of Dante's readers, it may be well to point out that every Italian youth who has gone through what we would call a college course must have stood the brunt of an examination in the whole of "The Divine Comedy;" that selections from the poem are studied and committed to memory even in the preparatory schools; and that, while the writings and the conversation of educated people in the English-speaking world are tessellated with phrases and sayings of Shakespere, of Walter Scott, of Thackeray and Dickens, the writings and the speech of cultured Italians invariably reveal the predominant influence of the Florentine poet, who seems to have molded the language once for all.

Nor do I think it altogether exact that Dante can be enjoyed only by the critical scholar. Surely there is a certain amount of difficulty to be overcome, whether in the original or in the English translations. But if a man's brains have not been atrophied by novels and newspapers, and if at the beginning he puts aside lengthy commentaries, he should be able to read with interest and pleasure at least the Inferno and the Purgatorio. If Dante could rise from his grave at Ravenna and rewrite his "Comedy," he would, I am inclined to think, put in the nether hell more than one of his learned commentators, who to make him logical have rendered him tedious, and for the sake of explaining some obscure points have made him altogether unintelligible. The trouble with us is that we are either too frivolous to read anything but the sensational and the commonplace or too learned to derive esthetic enjoyment from literary masterpieces. In conclusion, while agreeing with Dr. Walsh on Dante's incomparable merits, I would not discourage prospective readers by telling them or implying that "The Divine Comedy" is studied only by the élite of scholars, nor would I deter them with the heavy luggage of learning and patience they should load themselves with before setting upon a Dantesque journey through the realms of the undiscovered country beyond the grave. A fair inquiry would perhaps show that Dante is the most popular of the world's great poets and that the difficulties in understanding at least the obvious allegory of the poem, especially if the reader be a Catholic, are more imaginary than real.

Florissant, Mo. JAPHET ST. JOLLAIN.

The Veto in Papal Elections

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The following passage is taken from an editorial in the Toronto Globe of May 26, entitled "The Italian Nation and the Papacy": "Austria is a Roman Catholic kingdom, as Prussia is a Protestant one, and Austria's consent has to be procured before any one of the cardinals in the Conclave may be declared elected to the papal chair." Is this statement correct? An answer will be appreciated.

Hamilton, Canada. H. O. H.

[The statement is incorrect. What is referred to is the so-called right of exclusion which Catholic Governments have at times exercised in the Conclaves held for the election of the Popes. It consisted in a formal declaration made, on behalf of a Catholic Government by a cardinal to the effect that a certain candidate for the papacy was a persona non grata to the said Government. This veto, as it was called, was presented either in writing or orally only when the balloting pointed very strongly toward the election of the cardinal against whom the protest was entered. It was reserved to the last moment, although made according to instructions received before the Conclave began; it was not recognized if made after the election was complete, nor could it be exercised by the same Government in the same Conclave more than once. The practice was not recognized as a right, nor even as a legitimate custom, but for one reason or other was tolerated. Austria, it will be remembered, in the Conclave of 1903 entered objection to the election of Cardinal Rampolla. Pope Pius X, in the year following his election, absolutely did away with the "right of exclusion" in the Constitution "Commissum Nobis," and forbade any cardinal, under pain of excommunication latæ sententiæ, "to receive, even under the form of a simple desire, the office of proposing the veto." Moreover, by the new form of oath the electors of the Pope bind themselves as follows: "We shall never in any way accept, under any pretext, from any civil power whatever, the office of proposing a veto of exclusion, even under the form of a simple desire . . . and we shall never lend favor to any intervention or intercession, or any other method whatever, by which the lay powers of any grade or order may wish to interfere in the election of a pontiff."—Editor AMERICA.]

Masses or Flowers for Funerals

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I was very much interested in a communication in your issue of May 29, signed by "A Layman," in regard to the pagan custom of a display of flowers at funerals. It seemed strange to me that a custom so prevalent in our city should be so little known in other places where there is a large Catholic population. He speaks of the offering of Masses to be said for the deceased. In our city this has been the custom for some years, and now the "Spiritual Bouquet," as we call it, takes the place almost entirely of flowers at Catholic funerals. I am enclosing a few descriptions of funerals and a sample of the card in use in this city. I would be grateful if these were forwarded to "Layman" so that he could see that this beautiful sentiment is carried out to a great extent here.

As a word of advice to "Layman" let me exhort him to continue talking of this idea, every place he goes, and every opportunity he gets, and some good must result. Customs take a long time to form, and, of course, a long time to get away from. We have almost succeeded in getting away entirely from the flower idea.

Lawrence, Mass. A READER.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It gave me pleasure to read the communication signed "A Layman," from San Francisco, on "Wasted Money," in your issue of May 29th. In justice, however, to a holy nun who resides in a Convent of Mercy, Killarney, Ireland, I think it should be known that it was she who first suggested that the pagan custom of using flowers at funerals should be discouraged. This estimable lady is the author of a series of tracts published under the title of "Spiritual Sunbeams," signed S. M. B. Her name is Sister M. Benedict McSwiney. About two years ago Sister Benedict issued a pamphlet entitled "Masses instead of Flowers." In it she suggested that, instead of sending floral emblems to a funeral, friends should send cards stating that the donors had arranged for a series of Masses for the deceased. In the pamphlet she calls attention to the fact that the using of flowers is a pagan custom and refers to the story of the Chinaman who, when chided for burying food with the corpse, on the ground that the dead person could not eat the dainties, replied that neither could the Christian corpse smell the roses placed on the casket. There is a growing sentiment against the use of flowers at funerals and it is said that there are many churches in the United States which do not permit floral emblems to be brought even to the church door.

Sister Benedict advances many arguments against the use of flowers at funerals, but she lays special insistence on the waste of money involved and also on the useless debts that are often incurred, and sometimes never paid, through no higher motive than a vain desire of display. In my own experience I have met deplorable instances of waste of money on funeral floral emblems. Some years ago a prominent man died and it was estimated that the floral offerings at his funeral cost between twelve and fifteen hundred dollars. Within a short time after the man's burial his widow was obliged to appeal to charity in order to save herself from want. Another case: A prominent city official was given an elaborate funeral and the floral offerings at his obsequies were supposed to have cost almost two thousand dollars. The particular official's estate did not yield enough to pay his debts, and his widow has ever since been living on charity.

Florists, doubtless, would be opposed to any change in floral customs at funerals because of the loss of trade. Their complaint might be met by a more liberal and general donation of flowers to our friends during life. So far as I am concerned, I prefer my friends to give me their roses while I live and can enjoy them. My principal object, however, in sending this communication is not so much to protest against the use of flowers at funerals, but rather to give credit to Sister Benedict, to whom credit is due. In her convent home in the mountains of Killarney she is laboring incessantly for the uplift of humanity, and it is a great satisfaction to note that the seed she has sowed so well has been planted in fertile soil and is producing fruit.

Atlantic City. JOSEPH A. MCNAMEE.

Notes on Landmarks

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A few words in reference to Michael Williams' "Landmarks of San Francisco," in the AMERICA of May 22, may not be out of place. Father Langlois was never a member of the Society of Jesus, and it is indeed news to those who knew him well that he ever even thought of placing the city under the tutelary care of the great Jesuit Missionary, St. Francis Xavier. He was pastor of St. Francis Assisi's on Valley Street in its early days and the distinction between it and St. Francis' of Mission Dolores, was that it was dedicated to honor the Stigmata of the Holy One of Assisi.

St. Mary's Cathedral was built by the Rev. Hugh P. Gallagher, who was presented with a very costly gold watch by the grateful parishioners, when he returned from Europe, on December 8, 1854, bringing with him from Ireland the Sisters of Mercy and the Presentation Sisters, with much church goods which he had collected in Europe, whither he had been sent for that purpose by Archbishop Alemany. He also built the Magdalen Asylum, now St. Catharine's home, a very old landmark. The origin of Golden Gate Park is to be traced solely to him. Laboring men were clamoring for work and threatening the then Mayor McCoppin, when Father Gallagher went to the legislature, in session at the time in Sacramento, and had an appropriation bill passed for the establishing of the park, thus giving thousands of men abundance of work. Yet nowhere do we hear that he ever received any credit for what is now one of the grandest parks in the world. It was his pride to take every stranger coming to the city through it, and well indeed might he feel proud of the Sand Hills, transformed as they were into vistas of gorgeous vegetation, replete with all manner of exotic plants and flowers. He was among the greatest upbuilders of California in the early pioneer days, as churches in Yreka, Sacramento, Stockton, San Francisco testify.

Old St. Patrick's was not situated where the Palace Hotel now stands, but rather on the site of the old Grand. The Sisters of Charity had received the ground, where the Palace Hotel stands from John Sullivan, where they conducted an orphan asylum and school for girls. Later they sold it and purchased the site of their present magnificent asylum in Visitation Valley. They also bought ground for a girls' school in Mission Street, which they conducted up to the time of the catastrophe of 1906.

When Father Grey wished to get rid of the old frame church Rev. P. J. Cummins, the present Chancellor, took the pews for his church in Sansalito, while the building was moved out near the Park, on Eddy Street above Franklin. It was not cut in two as much larger buildings had been moved long before. For a time it was St. John's Church, under Fathers Andrew Cullen and P. Brady. Afterward it was moved still further out on Eddy Street, where it did duty as Holy Cross Parish Church, until Rev. J. F. McGinty built the present stately and gorgeous edifice, and converted the old church into his present wonderful Sunday School. It looks better and neater now, than it did when it was doing yeoman's duty in the very heart of old San Francisco.

Los Angeles. H. P. GALLAGHER.

"Mrs. Nickleby and the Crozer Professor"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The "Mrs. Nickleby and the Crozer Professor" article in which Henry C. Vedder is taken to task by John Wiltbye tempts me to inquire if this kind of apologetics has not done immeasurable harm to the cause it essayed to champion. Understand me well: I have no patience with the brand of calumny with which certain foes of Catholicism assail the Church. The fashion of holding up our Latin brothers as despicable types of Christianity should receive nothing but condemnation from any loyal member of the Catholic communion. It has been a favorite pastime of the critics of our Faith to draw a flattering distinction between the American form and all other species of Catholicism. We should be traitors to ourselves if we acquiesced in the adulation which seeks to disarm us in order to make us heedless of the attacks turned against our Catholic kin in other sections of the world. But while sympathetic sentiments may rush us to the defense of any lowly brother who may be wantonly assailed, it may be questioned, if we are not doing much damage to the whole Catholic cause by refusing to admit certain weaknesses which may tell against parts of the body Catholic, though the substance of the faith is in no way involved by the recognition of these defects and abuses.

The article which prompts this query was inspired by the charge that someone was selling indulgences in South America. When proof of the accusation was not forthcoming the original accuser was in turn accused of reprehensible conduct. Now it may be necessary to repel each of these calumnious charges which give the impression that abuses are tolerated and idolatrous practices, encouraged for mercenary purposes. But in the eagerness to refute every such accusation may it not be that we are actually lending aid to practices that can not be defended? The writer remembers returning from a trip where he was witness to certain religious observances which, to express it mildly, were bordering on the bizarre. Some months later the identical ceremony at which he had assisted was ridiculed in a non-Catholic paper. Whereupon one of the most influential Catholic weeklies in this country denied emphatically that any such scene could have been staged in the Catholic world. The writer wrote to the editor to suggest that the denial was somewhat sweeping and that as a matter of fact the non-Catholic had rather the best of the argument since what was written could be proved true. The editor answered that on principle all these things had to be denied, since the filthy charges brought up from the southern countries by the agents of non-Catholic mission bodies were three-quarters false, and it was safe always to enter a denial. But in this single instance the exception came along to bring confusion to the refutation that was not grounded upon fact. From this single case would it be illogical to conclude that the universal policy of denial is not the best defense of the Church? The American mind has been trained to deal fairly with the irrelevant, and most of our fellow-citizens are quite ready to see the distinction between what is accidental and what is essential in matters of faith. But when one of these men returns from a trip during which he could not be blind to laxity of morals and irregularity in Church observance on the part of those who professedly are Catholic, and then reads editorials in Catholic papers denying what he has seen, what effect is produced in him and in all whom he can influence? This is not a plea for indiscriminate admission of every accusation of which we are made the victims, but it is an inquiry as to whether a little honest candor would not at times be helpful.

Another harm resulting from the refusal to stand up under rightful criticism is the perpetuation in the Church of questionable practices that sometimes undermine true faith. In the discussion of the Italian question it was not lost upon some of your contributors that the "circus and bread" features had possibly assisted in creating a type of Catholicism that did not ring true. Of course we are not selling indulgences either in South or North America, but there are devotions cultivated in many churches wherein one must needs be a clever theologian to discover the fine distinction which passes between what is tolerated merely and what should be termed intolerable. Unfortunately our critics have not had the requisite theological training. Some day in their wanderings they may keep far enough away from Mexico and Latin countries generally to stumble into one of our churches nearer home. Some critic may buy a vial of the oil which thrifty pastors sell to "do the impossible." Then we shall be put to the necessity of showing the difference between a single clergyman's mercenary motive and the Church's doctrine concerning relics. Meanwhile would it not be just as well for every sincere bishop and priest in the United States to run the risk of denouncing what we all know is graft, pure and simple, and such pitiable deceit which sacrifices true faith in the interest of extorting funds from simple credulity.

Hartford. RELEGATUS.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I thank you for your courtesy in sending me a copy of the letter of "Relegatus." It is plain that he has completely missed the point of my argument. "The article which prompts this query," he writes, "was inspired by the charge that someone was selling indulgences in South America." It was not. It was "inspired" by Mr. Vedder's charge that the Catholic Church was selling indulgences. This is quite another matter.

> "The impression is general among Protestants," writes Mr. Vedder, "that since the Reformation, the Roman Church has done away with the sale of indulgences. That such is not the case, but that she has in modern times . . . not only preserved this abuse . . .

and with the indictment thus stated, Mr. Vedder went on to prove his case by quoting an advertisement from a South American newspaper.

"In the present instance," I said in comment, "Mr. Vedder's charge is, briefly, that the Roman Church sells indulgences. His proof is, briefly, that some unnamed person once said so in an advertisement in a Brazilian newspaper which can not be found." I also pointed out that an indictment of this kind was not justified by showing that certain individuals had offered to sell indulgences. "It is still incumbent upon the learned Professor to show that this proceeding was authorized, not by a private individual, no matter of what ecclesiastical rank, but by the Church herself. The charge, be it remembered, is preferred against the Church, and Mr. Vedder must be aware that no association can be held responsible for the private acts of unauthorized individuals."

Like the Dictionary, "Relegatus" frequently changes the subject, and ends his criticism with a sad story of the "harm resulting from the refusal to stand up under rightful criticism." I agree with him, but do not see the relevance to the present subject.

New York. JOHN WILTBYE.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, JUNE 12, 1915

Entered as second-class matter, April 15, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Contributions to the Mexican fund may be sent direct to AMERICA.

Magna Charta's Seventh Centenary

ON Tuesday next will be celebrated the anniversary of an event that though long ante-dating the American Republic, yet has had far-reaching and profoundly beneficial effects upon its destiny. It is the seventh centenary of the signing of the Magna Charta, an event from which constitutional lawyers are wont to date the birth of English and American institutions of liberty. Yet there is danger that in the stress and turmoil of the European conflict the importance of that achievement of our far-away Catholic congeners of the Middle Ages may not be fully realized.

It was Catholic fellow-men of ours who laid broad and deep the foundation of the liberty that is our boast to-day, and which so many of our fellow-citizens think imperiled because, forsooth, the Church of Cardinal Langton and the English barons is acquiring an ever stronger foothold in our land!

June 15, 1215, has ever been regarded as the birthday of English liberty, and of that English Constitution which directly or indirectly is the model of every free government to-day. It can not be said, however, that Magna Charta was the first or most perfect enunciation of the principles of liberty in England, or that other nations of Catholic medieval Europe had no free institutions of their own. Far from it. In all the lands of the Europe of the Middle Ages under the benign ægis of the Church of God, not only justice and order, but freedom and representative government were becoming the order of the day in the thirteenth century. While in England, Magna Charta was, it must be remembered, but an incomplete restatement of rights and customs that had been guaranteed more than a century before by Henry I, and which dated back to Edward the Confessor, in whose time they represented the already prevailing usages of centuries, and marked a starting point for still further developments and increments of freedom.

In continental Europe, where the principles of representative government prevailed, and the Three Estates existed, the renaissance of the Roman Civil Law, to speak of no other influences, strangled the new found freedom, while in England the signing of Magna Charta, imperfect as that instrument was, so synthesized to the popular mind the old struggle for liberty between people and Church and orderly government on the one hand, and lawless tyranny on the other, that that transaction stands out in the popular imagination as the greatest achievement of English medieval liberty, the inspiration for the attainment of the precious liberties yet to come, and so enduring an act that neither the tyranny of the Tudors nor the turmoil of the Reformation could do more than but temporarily throw it into abeyance. For whatever liberties were gained and affirmed under the Commonwealth in the Revolution of 1688, were but the medieval liberties regained or amplified to meet the changing times. As Dr. Guilday shows in his excellent paper on "Magna Charta's Centenary," in the current Catholic Mind, trial by jury, taxation by the representatives of those taxed were not formally among the rights secured by Magna Charta. Grateful posterity has attributed all the gains of later patriots to those who made the spectacular stand for liberty in 1215.

It is not always the formal content of a document, however, or the actually verifiable result of an achievement that establishes its relative importance in history: it is the effect for good such a document or event has had on the imagination of the people. William Tell and William Wallace, for all their legendary character, have had the profoundest influence upon the sturdy independence of Swiss and Scot. So is it with Magna Charta, though that document never really secured many of the blessings it has been credited with, though its first and foremost enactment that " the English Church shall be free and shall hold its rights entire and its liberties unimpaired," was abolished by Henry VIII and Elizabeth, still the Great Charter deservedly holds a high place in the hearts of patriots. It has been for centuries the inspiration and the rallying cry of all who have toiled and fought for liberty and self-government. Be it remembered, finally, that it was a Catholic prelate, backed by the Catholic nobility of a Catholic people, who won for us Magna Charta.

The One Impediment

"SWAPPING wives and husbands," said Justice Frederick E. Crane, from the bench of the Supreme Court, in Brooklyn, "has become as common as swapping horses. Marriage is the cheapest thing we have under our law. Marry one day and come back the next for a divorce. If we want polygamy, why don't we come out and establish it openly?"

Let the Honorable Justice possess his soul in patience. It may be that we are nearer than he thinks to the day of legalized polygamy. Why not? By courtesy of loose law, loosely administered, polygamy is largely practised, and that outside of Utah, both in its simultaneous and successive phases. In each form, it has vigorous defenders who by courtesy of the press, and occasionally by courtesy of a pulpit misnamed Christian, preach the ancient and ever-welcome gospel of do as you please.

There was a time, even in this country when men would have declared the present liberality of the divorce laws an impossibility in a civilized community. But we have Reno and, for that matter, we have New York, where a blatant band is seeking to legalize perversion, and we still hold ourselves civilized. Give us only a little time, and the men and women who teach that self-control is weakness, and that the passing fancy of a moment justifies the assumption of a new mate, will write this code of "human liberty" into our standard of public morality.

They will find but one impediment blocking the consummation of their plans, and that impediment is the Catholic Church. Whatever else changes and passes into oblivion, she alone remains unchanging and unchangeable in her divine mission to save man, made a little less than the angels, from the deeds that make him lower than the brute.

Cheap and Precious

HUMAN life is too cheap. But pseudo-philosophy is cheaper still, as instance the following excerpt from an editorial in the Saturday Evening Post, issue of May 29:

> The world is already too populous. Life is too cheap. When ten million men are striving to kill one another, denouncing small families is the most fatuous mental exercise of which we can think. Nowhere, from California around to Japan, is life so conditioned that a man with a proper sense of responsibility would voluntarily place a child therein unless he could give it some advantage. We do not need more people in the world, but a more intelligent and a kindly world to live in for the people already here.
>
> The root of the anti-race suicide propaganda is in the old tribal conception of patriotism, which holds that a given people is inherently much superior to all other peoples.

The moral responsibility resting upon a publication speaking to two million people should restrain such utterances. The editorial seems to assume that, here and there, men, with a proper sense of responsibility, will involuntarily, by chance, unfortunate mishap, and strange coincidence, place children in the world without giving them "some advantage." Even in the most scientific age, such things do happen, and no moral guilt should attach to those who have thus valiantly tried and failed. But for sensible men voluntarily to produce such a condition is beyond comprehension. Such the trend of the editorial.

This leads to the query, what is "some advantage?" Does the editor mean, wealth for the coming boy or girl? If so, Abraham Lincoln would never have been born. Does he mean education? But education can not be devised or even passed in a life time by deed of conveyance. Does he mean breeding, in a society sense, synonymous to refinement? But culture of that sort did not cut the forests of the middle west, span the reaches of the plains, carve granite from the Rockies' slope, or find the gold grains in the rivers' sands. Does he mean health? If so, who has the health to give his boy; a tortured writer scribbling over some dry desk, or Sylvest' or Fritz, or Papadopolous, there in the gang; the sylph-like lady on her scented couch, or the servant at her tub?

What does he mean? He means a material advantage, and forgets that material advantages conferred often mean destruction to the recipient. He forgets the human soul, and ignores the primary conception that the individual grows through misfortune, battle, strife and hunger. He demands a more intelligent and kindly world for the people already here, and presupposes that intelligence and kindliness can be built on selfishness.

"Suffer little children to come unto me," said a Philosopher, who has brought more sunshine, intelligence, kindliness, charity and love into this life than all the wealth of the Indies and the knowledge of the East and West combined.

The root of the anti-race suicide propaganda is not in any old tribal conception of patriotism. It reposes in the sanctuary of a woman's heart, it girds the loins of a manly man. By it homes have been built, cities established, and governments ordained. Through it, work and care have taken on new dignity, and with it men have gladly sacrificed their fleeting years. For life is cheap, but a human soul is precious.

"Soyons Distingués"

DE RAVIGNAN, the famous preacher, was a lawyer of considerable prominence before his entrance into the Society of Jesus, much sought after in Parisian society on account of his winning personality. It is said that when accompanying his brother to some salon, he would exclaim, Allons, mon cher, soyons distingués! This was his challenge to the vulgarity prevalent in the Paris of his day; the talisman that kept him even as a man of the world unsoiled by the sordidness about him.

Soyons distingués! What need there is in our America of a similar rallying-cry. Worldlings are shrieking Soyons vulgaires! Vulgarity is everywhere; its gospel is being preached from the housetops. Literature is full of it; incarnate, it stalks upon the stage; it walks arm in arm with erstwhile respectability—a boon companion. It has its law and its prophets: its law is the dictum, "we must know things as they are"; its roll of prophets begins with the hectic litterateurs whose names are a stench in the nostrils of decent folk, and ends with those pseudo-scientists, the eugenists whom all the world loves to honor. Innumerable are the disciples of vulgarity in these years of grace; few are they who frown upon this Circe.

Indeed, there is much truth in the remark of an ecclesiastic that America is reverting to paganism. Not to the paganism of the Golden Age, but to the vulgar paganism of the decadence, with its glorification of sense, its open flaunting of public decency. A Roman of the later Empire would be very much at home in modern America. The dress of the women, the dances imported from the underworld, the books read in milady's boudoir, the topics taught unblushingly in our schools—all these would be to him strongly reminiscent of Roman society at its worst.

How stem this wave of pagan vulgarism? But two bulwarks are as yet untaken, the Christian home and the Christian school. There lies our palladium, there our hope of ultimate victory. And if the school fails, the home, too, will pass under the captive yoke. All our energies must be concentrated on the school, all our strategic movements must begin there. What are we doing about it? Of the vast army of young men and young women who pass out from our Catholic colleges and academies yearly, how many remain uncontaminated by this vogue for vulgarity? And for how long? Do they set their faces resolutely against its enticements? Or, through fear of ridicule, do they succumb, exclaiming weakly, "These things are not sinful. After all we are not Puritans; in Rome we must do as the Romans do. We will taste and see!"

The pity of it all. If our convent girls and college boys would only go forth bravely, shouting valiantly the battle cry, Soyons distingués! Let us be distinguished, marked off from the common herd by the stamp of true Catholic nobility, what power for good they could exert. True modern Galahads and Elaines were these.

A Mayor and the Stage

ACCORDING to the revised and current edition of the Constitution of the United States, every man is free to say what he likes. This is known as freedom of speech. Any attempt to prevent him from putting his unconsidered statements into print, rocks our unstable Government to its foundation. This guarantee is described as the liberty to print, or the freedom of the press. Of late years, any move to come between a man and his fifth bottle, has been held equivalent to the infliction of a deep dent in the sacred palladium of our hard-won freedom. This is personal liberty. A fearsome thing is personal liberty, a right justifying any excess from race-suicide to the social evil and a corrupt stage.

The corrupt stage is at present engaging the attention of the mayor of Boston. This unenlightened person is possessed of but one idea, and that idea is plainly destructive of the whole fabric of our liberties, especially of our personal liberty to stage and publicly gloat over nastiness. The benighted mayor is endeavoring to undermine the following inalienable rights of the stage:

> Suggestive jokes and songs; muscle and Apache dances; wearing of costumes simply to display the female figure; portrayal of moral perverts and sex degenerates; mingling of female performers with the audience; portrayal of "dope fiends"; all words, actions, and situations savoring of immorality.

Jealous lovers of personal liberty will rest easy on learning that "prominent stage men" have "entered a strong protest." These Sir Galahads complain that the mayor wishes to enforce "the most drastic rules ever laid down." They are right. "Drastic" is a well-chosen term, and if the mayor wins his "unholy" fight, there is little doubt that all infractions will be followed by a "drastic" jail sentence. Socially considered, the mayor may be an enemy of "personal liberty," but he has intelligence enough to know that a drop of cologne will not deodorize a sewer.

"Westward Ho!"

AT present the call of California can be heard. As in '49, so again this summer thousands will hurry across the plains, breathe the pure air of the Rockies, and descend upon Eldorado with expectant hearts. The ingenuity of man, through mechanical device, artistic design, and architectural splendor, will amply reward their palpitating haste, while the gentle wash of the western sea upon the golden shore, will tease their imagination.

But to the Catholic sojourner, the trip may mean more than this. Under the shade of the eucalyptus, he will hear the story of the missions told. How the Franciscan Fathers in 1535 first disembarked at Santa Cruz Bay; how the Jesuits came in 1683 at the solicitation of the Spanish Crown to undertake the settlement of the country; how they labored until 1768 and were then expelled by Government decree; how the Franciscans took up their unfinished task, and carried it along until 1834. Under the beneficent endeavors of these Pilgrim Fathers of the farthest West, Christianity was implanted, civilization progressed, peace and harmony prevailed. The very word "Padre" connotes a mystic, hallowed, lingering idea of charm and rest, till one can close his eyes and hear the silver cadence of the mission bell.

Thus was the Cross implanted ere the gold rush came and Brete Hart wrote his "Luck of Roaring Camp." The California missions, "drawing cards" for tourists in this utilitarian age, are living refutations of the statement that the Catholic Church has been and always will be an institution of stagnation and retrogression. Down the St. Lawrence, up the Mississippi, around the Great Lakes and across the desert of cactus and sand, Catholic men of faith blazed the way.

America owes much to the Catholic missions. And now, the missions need America. Cut off by devastating war from their ordinary means of sustenance and support, in piteous appeal, they reach arms from all parts of the world toward Columbia for assistance. It is absolutely necessary, at this time, that the laity of America contribute generously, if the outposts of the Faith are not to be lost.

The truth is, the people of this country have been provincial. Busy building up their own land, they have had little opportunity and less inclination to gaze beyond the frontiers. But surely the time has now arrived for a broader outlook. The first step toward the new horizon can most fittingly be taken by viewing the examples of what mission work has accomplished in the past. The United States is a world power. That position has been thrust upon her, whether she desires it or not. Will the Catholics of the nation let it be said that they alone shirked their new responsibilities?

The "Ave Maria's" Fiftieth Year

OWING to the success with which the Ave Maria imitates the lowliness of the incomparable Maiden whose glory it has promoted so zealously, the fact that our bright contemporary quietly observed last month its Golden Jubilee, escaped the notice of many of the magazine's friends and well-wishers. The Ave Maria was founded in Our Lady's month, 1865, by Very Rev. Edward Sorin, Superior General of the Congregation of the Holy Cross, as a periodical "devoted to the honor of the Blessed Virgin." He felt that in a country that had been discovered by a great servant of Mary, of which the high feast is her Immaculate Conception, there should be published a magazine that would make her more widely known and more tenderly loved. This noble purpose has been fully realized, for without missing a single issue the Ave Maria has appeared each week for fifty years and has been contantly winning during that period new friends and readers. To Father Hudson, the venerable editor of the Ave Maria, and to all who have helped to make that magazine so eloquent a herald of Our Lady's virtues, AMERICA sends cordial congratulations.

The Difficulties of Aliens

IT is unfortunate that there exists in the United States so widespread a lack of information on the difficulties of aliens. The consequence has been that many immigrants who might long since have become devoted and enthusiastic citizens, have failed to take out their naturalization papers and are still debarred from that fuller participation in the blessings of freedom which should be the portion of all those who live under the American flag, at least in so far as they desire it. Most of those who seek our shores, come in the hope and anticipation of transferring their allegiance to the land of their adoption, only a small minority have made up their minds to exploit our country for purposes of gain and then go back to their old homes. And yet the process of naturalization involves such inconvenience and in many cases such expense, and is so hampered by lack of officials to further it, that at present there are among us no fewer than four million men who are not naturalized. Many of these could satisfy the tests, a large number of them are anxious to do so. For as aliens they suffer many disabilities. To instance only a few, they are restricted in the purchase, inheritance and disposal by will of real estate, they are excluded from many employments, from the benefit of social service and workmen's compensation and widow's pension laws.

There are, however, hopeful signs that a better understanding of their needs is a thing of the not distant future. A quarterly, entitled the Immigrants in America Review has just been started by the Committee for Immigrants in America, which announces itself as "a modest attempt to vitalize American public opinion into the adoption of a national policy with reference to admitted aliens." Nor has the committee restricted its literary efforts to the single task of getting out this magazine, it also publishes a number of books all bearing on different phases of the immigration problem. A nation-wide propaganda is also being pushed forward for the purpose of making the Fourth of July an Americanization Day, on which there will be public demonstrations of welcome to aliens who have become citizens during the year. The movement has been taken up in many cities. Very serious efforts are being made to secure greater privileges for aliens during the period that precedes their final admission to citizenship. In particular better facilities for their education, simplification and coordination of laws concerning their legal status, amendment and enactment of laws relating to naturalization, greater opportunity for getting employment—these are some of the measures for which the committee is working. Our country has been wasting its opportunities. It is now alive to the necessity of doing away with Italian, Jewish, Slav and similar movements, and has embarked on a national movement for the Americanization of the aliens of all countries into one nation and one people. The movement deserves all success.

LITERATURE

"American Thought"

PROFESSOR WOODBRIDGE RILEY'S "American Thought" (Holt) is not merely an exposition and history of the different thought-fashions that have come and gone in the course of American history; it is a criticism, and implicitly at least, a philosophy as well. It is this intermingling of the author's personal views and interpretations with the objective narrative that makes the reading of the book all the more instructive and interesting. Of some of these views and interpretations we wish to offer a few criticisms.

The epithet "American" in the title, "American Thought," would perhaps at first sight lead the reader to expect some recognition of Scholastic Philosophy, which thousands of Americans, both lay and clerical have accepted as the most rational interpretation of human experience and reality. Yet that philosophy is studiously ignored, if we except a few incidental references, which reveal, on the part of the author, a regrettable misunderstanding of its teaching. In describing, for instance, the Scholastic conception of "substance," the author makes use of the following expressions which every Scholastic would repudiate: "In place of the Scholastic notion of occult substance," "an inconceivable substratum of sensible phenomena"; "it was only the unintelligible Scholastic notion of matter he (Johnson) disputed, and not anything either sensible, imaginable, intelligible," and then adds piquancy to his misconception by such tea-cup banter as "Jesuitical generalization."

This elimination of Scholasticism can not be accounted for, because it is an alien importation. So was Puritanism, so was the Irish Idealism of Berkley, French and English Deism, the Materialism of Pennsylvania Quakerism and the Irish, or to be conventional, the Scotch-Irish Realism of the Princeton school. Yet all these systems are in the author's estimation "American." Why not Scholasticism? Or is it because the author assumes that Scholastic philosophers are not American or they do not think?

While "American" is rigidly exclusive, "Thought" is generously inclusive. To the modern mind philosophy becomes mere "thought." It is more fascinated by the novelty and exhilaration of the chase than by the running down of the quarry. Yet to the unsophisticated lovers of wisdom, the outcome of thought is static as well as dynamic. Sir John Herschel said: "The grand character of truth is its capability of enduring the test of universal experience, and coming unchanged out of every possible form of fair discussion."

The grand character of American thought is perpetual changeableness, incapacity to endure. Each system is born only to die, to be again followed by a contradictory system equally short-lived. Judged even by the pragmatic standard of William James, American thought-systems did not seem "to work." For all these systems, appropriate epitaphs may be easily culled from the author's book. "Puritanism," in the words of Joseph Allen, formerly professor of History at Harvard, "has had its day; intellectually Calvinism is dead." "Deism," Professor Riley tells us, "failed to satisfy the cravings of emotional excitement." "Transcendentalism," which Emerson hopefully called "a perfect religion," the author gracefully confesses "has come and gone like autumnal foliage." "Absolute Idealism," writes the Professor, "with its cloud-capped pinnacles has likewise faded away. In its stead has arisen prosaic Pragmatism, which makes truth that which succeeds."

This practical standard of truth is, of course, as old as the world, and as familiar as the principle, "the tree is known by its fruit." But it is neither universal nor ultimate. Even should a "watchful waiting" eventually reveal the ripened consequences of some doubtful system or situation, what criterion, we may ask, is to decide whether these consequences are really a success? The pragmatic test can not answer. Men will differ on just what constitutes success. It can not be a measure of itself. But waiving the intrinsic limitations of Pragmatism, its dirge, in the opinion of Professor Riley, has already been sung. "It is out of the atmosphere of the actual (Pragmatism) that the new plant (New Realism) has sprung." It is difficult to understand the appropriateness of the words "plant," and "sprung," to express what is really not an intrinsic development at all, but rather a reactionary denial of American Pragmatism by the New Realism. But of course the evolutionary principle must be strained to assign a legitimate parentage to each new system.

One of the fundamental assumptions of Pragmatism is that "reality is changed by the very act of our knowing it." This the New Realism flatly contradicts. The author says: "The richness of reality, direct awareness of the world—these are the prime marks of the new philosophy." "It believes in a world independent of the knowing of it." "To them (New Realists), the world is no eject of the subject, no piece of human imagery, but its texture is made up of other stuff than mere thought." The truth is that the New Realism is the legitimate though belated offspring of the Aristotelian and Scholastic theory of knowledge. Even Professor Riley, though somewhat reluctantly, writes this certificate of its birth. "Such is the radical realism, a system hardly held before, save by Aristotle and the Materialists."

New Realism, at least in its main contention, if not in the minor details of its teaching, is in complete accord with Scholasticism. If space permitted, it may even be shown that a better understanding of the Scholastic theory of truth, on the part of the New Realists, combined with a closer analysis of the implications involved in the principles of the New Realism would harmonize the outlying differences between the two rival systems. It is this approach of the "Old," and the "New" Realism that is in our day the most hopeful sign for the future of philosophy.

From a study of the many ephemeral systems set forth in "American Thought" may we not justly conclude that no one-man philosophy, nor any strictly national philosophy can be an adequate interpretation of the things that are? A philosophy to endure must have the power of universal appeal, must be international. There is only one philosophy which measures up to this standard. It does so because it has never ignored the most stupendous fact of human history, Divine Revelation. That philosophy is Scholasticism.

MICHAEL J. MAHONY, S.J.

REVIEWS

The Catholic's Ready Answer. A Popular Vindication of Christian Beliefs and Practices Against the Attacks of Modern Criticism. By Rev. M. P. HILL, S. J. New York: Benziger Brothers. $2.00.

Some years ago Father F. X. Brors, a Jesuit of the Province of Germany, published a polemical work, entitled "Modernes A B C," which was admirably adapted to meet the controversial needs of his countrymen, for the book furnished readers with apt replies to the objections urged against revealed religion and the teachings of the Church. This work Father Hill undertook to translate, but soon found that before it would meet the requirements of English-speaking Catholics of to-day many changes and additions would have to be made. On certain subjects, for example, longer, fuller articles than the German work contained were deemed necessary, while such topics as Christian Science, Pragmatism, Theosophy, etc., Father Brors had not treated at all. The result was that "Modernes A B C" became, under Father Hill's careful hand, a practically new book, for "The Catholic's Ready Answer" is not merely a controversial work but "endeavors to inculcate right notions of individual duty, especially as bearing on situations in which conscientious persons often find themselves in the very complex life of the present age."

In nearly five hundred closely-printed pages are arranged, in alphabetical order, more than a hundred objections, ranging from "Agnosticism" to "The Virgin Mary," that are urged against Christianity and Catholicism. The unbeliever's position is first briefly stated and then follows a well-written and soundly-reasoned refutation. For instance, the old sophism "It matters little what you believe, provided your life is good" is exposed, Haeckel is discredited, the impracticability of Socialism is proved, and there are admirable chapters on the "Christian Ideal of Education," "Mixed Marriages," "Miracles," "Christ's Divinity" and "The Church." Father Hill is to be congratulated warmly on having written a book that will be of great value to teachers, catechists, instructors of converts and even to "the general reader," for the author furnishes them with "answers" no less "ready" than convincing to many of the attacks made to-day against the Christian Revelation and Catholic morality. When a second edition of the work is called for, the publishers ought to give it a more sober-hued cover and better paper. W. D.

The Life of Cervantes. By ROBINSON SMITH. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $1.00.

Just three hundred years ago Don Miguel de Cervantes y Saavedra, winning a race with "the great thirst" of dropsy that he saw driving death to drink up his life, put the last touch to "the best novel in the world beyond all comparison." Within a few months, April 23, 1616, eleven days after Shakespere's departure, having received Extreme Unction and finished his final dedication "with one foot in the stirrup and in the anguish of death," Fra Miguel, Tertiary of St. Francis, piously committed his soul to God. In character as in genius he belongs to the first order of greatness. Though from the dawn of manhood to an old age of penury and pain he had endured battle-wounds, slavery, imprisonment, poverty and obloquy, he never lost his faith in God or love of his kind, and he left a legacy of gentle laughter and kindly wisdom that still enriches the world. He prized more the hand that was mangled fighting for God and king at Lepanto to the hand that wrote "Don Quixote," and the wounds of Turkish bullets on his breast to the glories of authorship. His five years' slavery in Algiers, during which he repeatedly suffered torture and the lash for his unwearied attempts to free his fellow-captives and fortify them by his hymns to "Our Lord and His Blessed Mother and the Holy Sacrament," and his thirty-six years' slavery thereafter to toil and want and debt, during which he wrote the most joyous of books and was loyal to every duty of life, show him great of soul as well as of genius, and if they do not quite verify his statement that his works contain "no word obscene nor thought less than Catholic," they do show that there was "no mean streak in him, no running fault, no deplorable side to his nature." In 120 pages Mr. Smith sums up the true facts of Cervantes' life, clears away the obscurities surrounding author and work, and refutes the one charge, of an illicit connection, which the "Encyclopedia Britannica" still permits to stain his character if not its pages. This "Life" is rather a pendant to the author's excellent translation of "Don Quixote" than an adequate biography. His fine judgment and ripe knowledge of Cervantean literature should make the complete story of Cervantes from the same pen most desirable for the tercentenary year of 1616.

M. K.

Collected Essays. By RUDOLF EUCKEN. Edited and Translated by MEYRICK BOOTH, B.Sc., Ph.D. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $4.00.

This volume offers illuminating reading both for the truth and error it contains. There are nineteen essays in the collection, and most of them deal in a more or less intimate way with religion and morality. The author appreciates the great problems of the day, evaluates them to a nicety, discusses them in a sprightly enough manner, but in every instance offers a worthless solution. He himself is an unconscious victim of the Zeitgeist. Aware of the need of authority in the State, he yet rejects it in religion and, under the spell of Kant and Schleirmacher, falls back on a species of subjectivism by which the spirit of man is to obtain its highest expression. It is the old story of the loss of vivid faith in an imminent yet transcendant, personal God who revealed truth and put upon man the obligation of believing it. Dr. Eucken's system, or lack of system, would but perpetuate conditions under which morality is obliged to justify itself to man: not vice versa. For, after all, if subjectivism be our standard, religion will rise very little above man's needs and whims, which more often than not depend on environment. Thus will the presumption of socialists and others of like heart be justified. True, the author, as if scenting the difficulty from afar, strives to evade it by this apotheosis of Luther: "But in these struggles and cares his life is so entirely concentrated upon his own inner existence and so fully occupied with himself that it acquires a safe superiority to all social environment and becomes inaccessible to any considerations of mere expediency." In view of Luther's "Table Talk" and Grisar's researches, these are remarkable words, and if Eucken's philosophy of life is to stand or fall with Luther, then it falls and is smashed to pieces in the falling. But be this as it may, Dr. Eucken's thought leads nowhere, save perhaps to unreasonable individualism and its accompanying vices. However, the author makes the most of his ideas and has produced an interesting if impracticable book.

R. H. T.

Panama and Other Poems. By STEPHEN PHILLIPS. New York: John Lane Company. $1.25.

A garland of verse woven by Mr. Stephen Phillips should be something of an event in the literary world. The past achievements of the poet justify the highest expectations. In his dramas, in spite of evident shortcomings, and although the characters speak and act, not as they would in real life, but as Mr. Phillips bids them say and do, there is a beauty of diction, a wealth of imagination, a control of the deepest and mellowest stops of English song which recall the verse of Webster and Marlowe. "Panama and Other Poems," however, will disappoint the reader. Lesser writers might claim them with some degree of satisfaction. There is, of course, the finely-chiseled line, the rich imagery and deft workmanship which are the author's characteristic gift. But from "Panama" to "The Quest of Haidee," the poems, with rare exceptions, have one great defect. They lack inspiration. Now and then the poet trembles on the dizzy verge of it. We feel the flutter of venturing wings, but the bird never soars and, dazed and trembling, returns to earth again.

To a poet, fully alive to titanic achievement, "Panama" might have been no lifeless argument. But power and mass are absent from our poet's lines. Neither the marvelous engineering skill, nor the world-wide consequences of the undertaking are firmly and sharply visualized. And to record the herculean struggle of man and science against the brawling opposition of Chagres and the grim reluctances of Culebra Cut no metrical instrument could be so inadequate as the prim couplet of Pope. Nor does the war poetry of Mr. Phillips rise to a high level of excellence. Catholic readers will detect a false note in "The Passing of Julian" and "Jesus and Joan.

J. C. R.

The Man Behind the Bars. By WINIFRED LOUISE TAYLOR. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50.

There is much talk at present, some of it maudlin, much of it eminently sane, on the reform of judicial procedure in criminal cases. Many of the ladies and gentlemen who take a curious delight in harrying the feelings of the public by tearful recitals of the woes of the imprisoned burglar and gunman will probably give over their activities with the advent of the next sociological fad. Earnest students of law and penology, in time, no doubt, will bring about the desirable and needed reforms. In the interval, the public at large may examine its conscience on the treatment usually meted out to the ex-convict. The permanent reform of some of these men is almost hopeless. Their habits of thought and life unfit them for a place in civilized society. Despite all preventive measures, these human wrecks will, in all probability, be always with us, and what to do with them is one of the questions which the new penology will be asked to solve. Others, beyond doubt, will readily and gratefully respond to a modicum of fair treatment. It is with the purpose of stimulating the public conscience that this volume has been published. Miss Taylor argues well for the necessity of a reform of our methods of dealing with criminals, "from the police court to the penitentiary," and for a more humane treatment of the ex-convict who is striving to reconstruct his broken life. When the spirit of Christ has penetrated our lives more deeply our eyes will discern and our hearts call forth the good that still exists in the hearts of men and women who have sinned. But it is not easy for us, who ourselves are sinners, to forgive utterly and, while hating the sin, love the sinner. Only God, it seems, can do this. P. L. B.

The Friar Preacher, Yesterday and To-day. Translated from the French of Père Jacquin, O.P., by Father HUGH POPE, O.P. New York: Benziger Brothers. $0.75.

To attempt to give an adequate idea of the origin and spirit of the great Order of St. Dominic in 152 24mo pages is a difficult task, and though the author has written an interesting book, one feels, after perusing it, that the work should have been three times larger. Then it would have been possible to carry further the historical sketch which terminates with the definite shaping of the Order under Humbert de Romanis, the fifth general. There is no more glorious page in medieval history than that written by the Sons of St. Dominic, but in English we have as yet no worthy account of their achievements. The Franciscans, owing to the vogue of the "Franciscan cult" among non-Catholic scholars, are coming slowly into their own, but the Dominicans have not had so sympathetic a hearing. Though this book is not a controversial one, nor intended for the general or non-Catholic reader, as it is addressed rather to Catholic young men who feel stirring within them the beginnings of a religious vocation, nevertheless professors and publicists of to-day, to whom the word Dominican suggests nothing but the thumbscrew and the stake, would perhaps receive some enlightenment from this little work of Père Jacquin's. J. F. X. M.

Famous Days and Deeds in Holland and Belgium. By CHARLES MORRIS. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Co. $1.25.

The present world war has created an appetite for knowledge of the various countries engaged in the contest; and many are the cooks and many are the caterers ready to answer the hungry calls. Because of the rush of customers it is to be feared that much will be wanting both in the cooking and the serving. Charles Morris, a prolific writer for many years, is in the market with a book on the Netherlands, a point of interest at the present. The book has all the marks of hasty composition or compilation. It shows no signs of original study, it repeats blunders and inaccuracies of fifty years ago, and has not profited by the serious studies of more recent times. True, it does not pretend to be a history; it is rather a moving picture, and were it less one-sided and partisan, it would be a very interesting picture show. For one's sympathy will naturally be with the little people in their heroic struggle for home rule, as they ever will be with the victims of absolutism if not tyranny. Yet we must not call that white in the oppressed which we, with much vehemence, pronounced black in the oppressor. In such a contest as that between Holland and Spain, William the Silent and Philip II, everything is not white on one side and black on the other. In characterizing persons and actions care must be taken that the epithets in one sentence are not contradicted in the next. Real history demands more careful treatment and moving pictures should receive it, too. As an instance of the carelessness of the writer it is startling to find the famous dictum about the "scrap of paper" put into the mouth of the German Emperor. Perhaps the book was intended to sell, not to educate. P. J. D.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

On June 15, just seven hundred years ago, the English barons, led by Cardinal Langton, Archbishop of Canterbury, forced John Lackland to sign the Great Charter. In the current Catholic Mind Dr. Guilday, of the Catholic University, reviews the events leading up to that important concession, examines the document itself and explains the attitude taken by Innocent III toward the transaction. This excellent article should be of keen interest to AMERICA's readers. In "Catholics' 'Divided Allegiance'" Father Fisher then proves that those who find difficulty in reconciling a Catholic's loyalty to his Church with that due his country "are practising and professing a similar double allegiance every day of their lives." Father Patrick H. Casey's earnest exhortation to "Use the Catholic Press" is the last paper in the number.

The spring number of Pax, the Caldey Benedictines' quarterly, appears in a new form. The artistic cover of olive, yellow and black bears on a tree which is rooted in Amor Dei, the names of the sainted abbots of Caldey, and improvements have been made in the type, paper and size of the magazine. Dom Aelred reports that the war is seriously menacing the temporal welfare of the monastery, and he appeals for more subscribers to Pax and for accessions to the ranks of the Caldey Helpers. In the contents of this number of the quarterly there is an interesting account of the earthquake in Italy, a description of the new foundations at Edermine, in Wexford, Ireland, where the refugee monks of Maredsous have found a home, a sketch of Dewi Sant, or St. David, the patron of Wales; a study of the artistic beauties of Monte Cassino, and several valuable ascetical papers. That picture of the Caldey refectory will surely foster vocations!

"Born a Catholic, a Republican of firm persuasion, a Freemason of wide repute, creeds and opinions have never succeeded in making him give or receive favors," says Alexander Kohn, B.A., the author of a brief "Life of General Joffre" (Stokes, $0.50). None of the anecdotes that are being told to illustrate the practical character of Joffre's Catholicism appears in this book. "So little is known, indeed, about the General that his biographer has found it hard to fill out 114 pages. The leader of the French army is portrayed as a grim, silent, tireless man whose specialty is trenches and whose passion is discipline. His career in the Orient and in Africa is reviewed, his success in keeping out of the Dreyfus affair noted, the chief credit for the three years' law of conscription is said to be his, and tributes are paid to the General's modest, simple character. This seems to be the only life of Joffre that has appeared in English.

Whoso takes up "Fits and Starts," by Rev. T. A. Fitzgerald, O.F.M. (St. Louis, Herder, $1.00), will read it through, be he even a reviewer, and not in fits and starts. Its eighteen short stories are an instalment of the inimitable contributions that have given Gill's Catholic Bulletin of Dublin the wide popularity it deserves. Five treat of Australia and its "aboriginalities," one of a "Yankee live wire's" whimsicalities, and the rest of Ireland's own comicalities; but whatever the scene or subject, the humor of Ireland runs through them all, flavored with a rollicking quality of good-natured satire that the author has patented. He is not in search of a moral, but his close observation of rich and poor, always with a humorous eye, never fails to find good among the absurdities and sordid things of life. There is pathos, too, as in "One Lily More," and, in fact, such an admirable mixture of laughter and tears as is only paralleled in the "Homespun Yarns" of the same narrator. Father Fitzgerald is a "charackther" in Irish literature.

Father Bernard Vaughan in an address he delivered not long ago at the solemn opening of the Robert Hugh Benson Memorial Church, Buntingford, England, said of the lamented author:

> His life was short; but what a psalm!—not the Miserere, but "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and never forget all He has done for thee." That was his psalm of life, and this is what you and I want—not to be pessimists, but to have the optimism of Robert Hugh Benson: to go about laden with the burden of sunshine and tell people to lift up their blinds and open their windows and let the light and warmth of God's sun into their homes and into their lives.

All who knew Mgr. Benson pay similar tributes to his cheerful, sunny disposition. Unkindness he could not understand and he shortened his life by answering himself at great length the numberless appeals for spiritual help that the mail brought him.

Mr. G. K. Chesterton says, in the prefatory note of "The Wild Knight" (Dutton, $1.25): "I leave these verses as they stand, although they contain innumerable examples of what I now see to be errors of literature . . ." "Nobody," he adds, "need read the book." Notwithstanding this humble warning, there are poems in the book for which the author need make no apology. "The Song of the Children" mingles the simplicity of childhood with the wisdom of years. A gimpse of the beautiful simplicity of "A Christmas Carol" may be had from its last stanza:

> The Christ-child stood at Mary's knee
> His hair was like a crown,
> And all the flowers looked up at Him,
> And all the stars looked down.

All the selections in "The Wild Knight" will doubtless be found in the volume of "G. K. C.'s" complete poems lately published in England.——"A Florentine Cycle and Other Poems" (Putnam, $1.25) by Gertrude Huntington McGiffert contains many rich descriptions of Italian scenery, though the images are a little confusing at times. The verses under the heading "The Homestead" are full of appeals to the affections, while "The Doorstep" and "The Hearth" might be read with profit by many of our modern travelers. There are too many verses packed into the volume.

Mr. A. Hilliard Atteridge's "The German Army in War" (McBride, $0.50) is a very thorough account, in untechnical language, of the German military system, its war methods and organization from the days that followed the battle of Jena to the present time. Mr. Atteridge's purpose is to show Englishmen that their own army is trying conclusions with a very formidable fighting machine, and he warns them that to underrate such an opponent means disaster. From the evidence of the English troops at the front, it is clear that the German Army system has been able to produce great bodies of trained troops, who will face death unflinchingly in the teeth of overwhelming odds. While fully recognizing many admirable points in the German system, the author is not inclined to prefer universal service to the British scheme of enlistment. In treating the German interpretation of the law of war, he states simply the method of procedure followed by German commanders in the field. Mr. Atteridge handles his subject from the viewpoint of the writer of military history, fairly and critically.

EDUCATION

University Extension Work in Massachusetts

MASSACHUSETTS has entered formally into university extension work. Recently Governor David I. Walsh signed House Bill 2175, which provides for a department of university extension to be established in the State board of education. An appropriation of $25,000 is provided for this work in the year 1915. The progress of the measure through its preliminary stages has been interesting and by no means free from difficulties. In his inaugural address of last January, the Governor earnestly recommended enactment of legislation providing correspondence education for the "masses," who heretofore have received little or no share in the direct benefit of the enormous sums annually appropriated by the State for educational work.

PRELIMINARY WORK

A few months subsequent to his inaugural message, the Governor appointed an advisory committee to look into the details of this work. The committee was composed of Reverend Charles W. Lyons, S.J., President of Boston College; President Bumpus of Tufts College; Dr. Snedden, State Commissioner of Education; President Filene, of the Filene Corporation and Professor Ropes, of Harvard.

The committee reported a bill, by the provisions of which the university extension work was to be carried on by the State Board of Education. The bill was revised, and in changed form appeared as House Bill 2164, calling for a Commission on University Extension. The personnel of the commission was to include seven members, five of whom were appointed directly by the Governor, and one chosen by the Governor from the membership of the Board of Education. The Commissioner of Education was designated as the seventh member.

The "commission" measure was reported by the Committee on Education to the Ways and Means Committee which recommended to the House that the bill be "referred to the next general court." The report of the committee was negatived by a vote of 88 to 55, and a substitute measure (House Bill 2175) was introduced. This measure, which placed the work under the control of the Board of Education, was passed by the House after heated debate, by a vote of 137 to 85. In the Senate the measure met with opposition, but was passed after the appropriation of $50,000 for 1915 was reduced to $25,000.

ATTITUDE OF THE STATE BOARD

The success of the work now rests with the State Board of Education, and is by no means assured. The Board has been hostile to the work now placed in its control, and has adopted a reversal of attitude only when forced to do so. The record of the Board for the past six years, the period of reorganized activity, does not point to any notable progress in normal school development over which the board has had control since 1870. The Normal Schools of Massachusetts, ten in number, are sadly in need of readjustment and reorganization. Since the creation of the office of Commissioner of Education in 1909, the normal schools have been at a standstill academically, and this despite the fact that in 1914 over $850,000 was appropriated for maintenance and administration. Although authorized by law to supervise educational work aided wholly or in part by State appropriations, the Board has responded but indifferently to its duties in this regard, giving practically no attention to three of the Massachusetts textile schools for which in 1914 approximately $70,000 was appropriated.

Controlling and supervising for educational purposes amounts aggregating in 1914 $2,000,000, the Board has become one of the most expensive arms of the commonwealth. Save in the case of Jeremiah Burke, newly appointed member, and Assistant Superintendent of the Boston Public Schools, the membership of the Board is collegiate in its attitude and point of view. How far such Board will come to earth, to recognize and provide for the needs of the common people, is a matter about which no prophecy can be attempted at this time.

POSSIBLE RESULTS

At present over 90,000 residents of Massachusetts are enrolled in a single Correspondence School conducted in Pennsylvania. It is safe to predict that of this total a large percentage will enroll in the State school should the venture prove a success. It is high time for the State educational officials to forego the field of pure academic theory, and get down to a workable level where the greatest good can be accomplished for the greatest number. With the financial support of the Commonwealth behind it, and an office equipment that costs annually over $58,000, the Board should have no excuse for failure to make a success out of the university extension project. Even its most ardent supporters can not claim achievement for the board in reference to the development of the State Normal Schools. Let us hope better things for it, and for the great mass of people who ought to be, and who will be, benefited by a proper administration of the university extension department. LESTER B. DONAHUE, PH.D.

SOCIOLOGY

Convent Inspection

A SECOND GRIM FAIRY TALE

THE Committee of Five halted hesitatingly before the private office of State Senator McCaffery.

"I don't like his name," ventured the Reverend Darksome Bigot; "it sounds Irish."

"And the poor priest-ridden Irish are all Romans," added Miss Prunella Prejudice, enigmatically.

"It must be faced to the bitter end," said brave Colonel Backwoods. "Onward, champions of righteousness and American liberty against Rome! Onward to the charge!"

THE INDICTMENT

Senator McCaffery met the charge with serene countenance, and graciously waved the quintette to seats within range of the battery of his smiles.

"What can I do for you to-day?" he said, with the air of grandfather patting little Freddie on his golden locks.

"We have here," began the Reverend Bigot, "a bill for the inspection of convents and other institutions of the Romish Church, and we crave your support."

Senator McCaffery's jaw shot forward a full inch, and the window barometer suddenly registered calm changing to storm. But Senator McCaffery had inherited a sense of humor from his priest-ridden ancestors, and so his jaw grew less hard, even if the barometer remained unchanged.

"For years," continued the reverend gentleman, "these institutions have grown up in our midst unchecked. But noble hearted Americans alive to our somnolent carelessness have cried: Who knows what heinous crimes may be perpetrated behind high convent walls?"

"Yes," bolted Miss Prejudice with triumphant logic, "if they are right before Heaven, why do they not let us go in and out as we choose?"

"Ah, why?" echoed Mr. Igno Ramus and Miss Very Prude.

"So we wish this law passed authorizing State officials——"

"Women especially——"

"To inspect at their discretion these mysterious abodes of shadows and somber-robed women. They must be allowed to study conditions, right abuses, free the imprisoned, and permeate all with the wholesome atmosphere of American freedom."

HOW TO PROVE IT

"Gentlemen and Ladies," began Senator McCaffery; "your bill is most interesting. Before I would recommend your presenting it to the Senate, you must gain for it the solid backing of definite facts. These it is your duty to acquire by a systematic course of—snooping."

"Snooping?" Miss Prejudice's eyes gleamed with a new light.

"Yes, let snooping be your occupation for some days. Disguise yourselves. I doubt much that convents would receive any of you were you to show yourselves in your true likeness. But disguised, you can visit these convents; spy out abuses; learn all their dark secrets; and then return with your facts to carry your bill triumphantly through the Legislature. May I suggest some fit disguises?"

Senator McCaffery turned his blue eyes toward the ceiling. He was thinking of his daughter as she knelt in consecration before the altar not three years back. His voice was gentle when he began.

ORPHANAGE AND HOSPITAL

"Miss Prude, for you I should suggest the disguise of helpless, innocent babyhood. Pass yourself off as an infant deserted by a drunken father and a wolfish mother. Lie in a basket of straw with nothing but rags for covering, at the door of a Catholic orphanage, and when the Sister hearing your plaintive cries opens the door, stretch forth bare, trembling arms in piteous supplication. Deceived by your disguise, she will pick you up and lay you against her heart throbbing with a wondrous pity, and bear you to a cot about which hover others in dress and gentleness like to herself. Now is your chance; snoop to your heart's content. For when you note the hundred and more cribs each with its tiny bundle of helpless humanity, and hear the crooning voice of these mothers by proxy and observe the depth and the breadth of human love when transmuted by the divine touch, you will know that you are in a convent-orphanage.

"For you, Mr. Igno Ramus, I suggest this expedient. Garb yourself as a penniless wanderer, and as you cross a busy thoroughfare, cast yourself headlong before an oncoming street car. Safe in your disguise as a homeless, helpless mass of bleeding flesh and broken bone, they will carry you to a Catholic hospital, where real Sisters live and work. Your first conscious gaze will rest upon a Catholic Sister; you will feel her calm, cool hand touching your splitting brow; her gentle voice will soothe your throbbing nerves, and from your bed in the midst of this convent-hospital, you may learn all the grim secrets of the Catholic sisterhoods. Snoop till you have grown tired with snooping.

REFUGE AND REFORMATORY

"Miss Prejudice, your disguise will require heroic courage; but I know your readiness to handle any sort of mud or mire if you can do so in the name of Anti-Romanism. Disguise yourself as a poor, broken woman, whose past is a livid blot and whose future is a dismal blank, whose soul and body are deadened with the weight of man's inhumanity and woman's criminal weakness. Write across your ashen brow the lines of shame and despair, so deep that men and women shrink from you as they pass you in the street. Then throw yourself at the steps of a Catholic refuge, and out of the depths of your misery, lift seared eyes to the Sister who answers your knock. When she takes you in her arms and for the first time you hear of the Saviour who loved even Magdalen, when you learn that there is hope even for the most pitiable of God's creatures, you will know that you are in a convent of the Good Shepherd. Then may you safely snoop.

"Your disguise, Mr. Darksome Bigot, will not afford you great difficulty. Ignorance is its first requisite; wilful wickedness, its second. Pretend that you are a lad of twelve who never knew the love of a mother nor the cherishing care of a father. Plunge your soul deep in the corruption of the alleys; train your hands to deftness of theft, your brain to quickness for crime. Weaken your body with the fumes of rotten tobacco and with vile food. Learn to fly furtively from the approaching policeman. Then when the hand of the law falls heavily on your shoulder, they will send you to a Catholic reformatory where Catholic Sisters will teach you for the first time what it means to look into the eyes of spotless womanhood, where your hands will change their criminal deftness for the cleverness of the skilled artisan, where the curse will give place to the prayer and warped boyhood will develop into upright manhood. There in that reformatory you may study conditions uninterrupted and suspected by no one. Snoop, while there's time for snooping.

THE QUIET HAVEN

"Colonel Backwoods, your disguise shall be that of a greybeard, who like an humble Lear, has felt the serpent's tooth of filial ingratitude. Clad in the garb of poverty, with a hopeless, hunted look in your eye and a quaver in your voice, dragging leaden feet from the homes of faithless friends, you will seek out a Catholic Old People's Home. If your disguise is complete and neglect and wretchedness are writ large on your face, a Sister will lead you by the hand; a Sister will clothe and feed your quaking form; a Sister will draw your soul upward from the present wretchedness to the glory promised to Christ's poor. In one so near the grave, they will suspect nothing; and in the midst of this blind and unsuspecting charity, snoop 'till you can snoop no longer.

"And when you have thus gathered from first hand the horrible secret of these "nunneries," and confirmed absolutely the vaporings of anti-Romanist writers, triumphantly return to offer your bill to the State Legislature. Can such skilful snooping fail of its due reward?'

Senator McCaffery lowered his blue eyes from the ceiling and gazed in surprise at five empty chairs. The Committee for the Inspection of Romish Convents had fled in search of a senator who was neither Irish nor blessed with a Catholic sense of humor.

DANIEL A. LORD, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

That intemperate organ of retrogression, the New York Sun, which has not hesitated on occasion to express its mind on certain wild phases of modern sociology and education, is again on the war-path. This time the hatchet is raised against "academic freedom," an idol scarcely second in sanctity, to personal liberty. In ordinary life, complains the Sun, when a man indulges a propensity to inflict upon an unoffending world mere drivelling bosh as matters of serious moment, he is likely after a time "to find his usefulness ended or curtailed in the connection which has been providing him with wages, salary or income." Not so, however, the college professor. An output of imbecile professorial opinion, especially if it finds its way to the Sunday supplements, has come to be "the most valid of titles to a permanent place on a faculty pay-roll," for any who dare to suggest that the said professor is "too big a fool to be allowed to hold his job" would be overwhelmed with the dreadful opprobrium rightly merited by all enemies of academic freedom. "There is no apparent security of employment for a proved ass except in a college or university chair. Once he has given proof, such proof of his quality, he has all but made his living sure for life." The Sun suggests that the exercise of the intellect should be restricted to persons duly certified by a Federal Thought Commission, as being possessors of an intellect. "There ought to be a law about it in a land which believes sincerely in the virtue of law-making to correct any evil."

Much of the popularity of "Billy" Sunday, even with those who accept neither his methods nor his doctrines is due to the fact that Mr. Sunday is not afraid to express an opinion. Instead of taking his doctrine from his congregation, he preaches what he believes to be the truth, regardless of whether or not it meets the approval of the congregation. Herein he differs from many an occupant of a Protestant pulpit who carefully plans his discourses with an eye to the susceptibility of his hearers. At the recent General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, Dr. F. L. Patton, formerly president of the Princeton Theological Seminary, described this tendency as "the drift toward secularizing Christianity. Here is a recipe for a preacher of such theology: Take a few tablets of doctrine and a gallon of rose water. Put a little of the solution into an atomizer, and then let the minister spray the congregation while he prates about the sweetness of Christianity and the fragrance of benevolence." The decay of faith shows itself nowhere more strongly than in the modern pulpit. When faith is dead there is little left for the clergyman's discourses beyond hoary platitudes on "the sweetness of Christianity and the fragrance of benevolence," unless, as is often the case, he substitutes the Gospel of Sociology for the outworn Gospel of Christianity.

The far-reaching evils inherent in the improper employment of children in mines, quarries, mercantile and manufacturing establishments can not be eradicated by a gently-spoken message of sweetness and light. So long as men can find it profitable to exploit children in unhealthy and unholy environments, they can be moved from this policy only by a process of rigidly enforced law, ending, if found necessary, in the penitentiary. Yet law accomplishes very little unless reenforced by a correct public opinion; and it is encouraging to note that the National Child Labor Committee which has done much to further the passage of suitable laws in many States, recognizes the limited usefulness of statute legislation. "While we struggle for laws that are essential to the structure of progress," said Mr. E. N. Clopper at the San Francisco Child Labor Convention, "at the same time we recognize the limitations of this legislative method. We must emphasize the coördinate duties of home, school, religion and government." No doubt, any steps toward the removal of child-labor may occasion temporary distress in the community where it has long existed. This fact has been cited by many an employer, to show the awful effects of laws which prevent ten-year-old children from working all night in a glass factory, or twelve hours a day in a cotton mill. "Temporary distress," however, can hardly excuse the continuance of conditions which tend to perpetuate physical and moral evil in thousands of children.

By giving boys and girls a training which will make them useful members of the community, the parochial schools make their most valuable contribution to the general welfare of society. That they succeed in this task is fairly well recognized, but that the system relieves the State of heavy financial burdens is not, perhaps, equally well understood by the New York reformers who are proposing to tax them out of existence. Speaking before the Committee on Taxation of the Constitutional Convention, Mr. William D. Guthrie quoted figures which indicate the saving to the State made possible by the parochial schools. In New York City alone, the parishes care for 130,000 children for whom the State would otherwise be obliged to make provision. This would involve an initial expenditure of nearly thirty million dollars for sites and buildings, and an annual per capita expenditure of forty dollars for the lower grades and one hundred dollars for the high schools. In spite of this, it is proposed to tax all property in excess of one hundred thousand dollars, held by the parochial schools.

> The public service now rendered by the parochial schools, said Mr. Guthrie, in consideration of which they are allowed an annual tax-exemption of $540,000, would directly involve, if abandoned, an increased annual charge or tax of fully $7,550,000. This one item of saving in the city budget is not only fourteen times the annual exemption of schools from taxation, but is fully three times the aggregate of all tax exemption allowed for Catholic churches, hospitals, asylums, homes and schools.

Putting the matter on the lowest basis it would be financially unwise to put a prohibitive tax on the parochial schools. Even with their help the New York authorities can not provide suitable facilities for the children. Were the Catholic schools to be crippled or suppressed, additional financial burdens would be thrown upon a community which at present claims to be overburdened.

At the recent election in Chicago, utterly irrelevant questions of nationality and religion were brought to the front, to add an element of excitement to a process never notably calm and unimpassioned in that city. What influence they may have exerted is known, if at all, only to those who are acquainted with all the forces engaged in the contest. Shortly after the election, however, the Mayor received the following communication from the Chicago Church Federation Council:

> As you know, the United Protestant Churches put forth every possible effort at the recent elections in your behalf; our representatives stood at the door of every Protestant church in the city on Sunday, and distributed a letter signed by Harry Wheeler, George Dixon, Marquis Eaton and other prominent citizens. I am sure, therefore, that the wishes of the church people will receive consideration at your hands.

After this weighty preamble, the Association begs the Mayor to use every effort to defeat a bill pending in the Legislature, which would legalize prize-fighting. There can be no doubt that in thus addressing the Mayor, these Protestant clergymen were acting upon their legal rights, and that the picture of the Council's agents standing at the door of every Protestant church in the city to urge the election of their favorite candidate, will cause tears of joy to spring to the eyes of the uplifter. But one wonders what the action of the Protestant clergymen would have been, had the representatives of the Catholic societies of Chicago stood at the door of every Catholic church in Chicago, to present the claims of their candidates, and had they afterward reminded the Mayor of the excellent work they had accomplished in his behalf. The wild cries of the Protestant clergy-leagues, that the Church must take no part in politics would be more convincing, did these associations make their conduct conform more nearly with the creed which they so loudly proclaim.

The Board of Education in a little Long Island town recently chose the local Methodist church as the place of the High School graduation exercises. A Catholic member of the class protested, but the Board held that no interference with its rights could be tolerated. Thereupon the other graduates yielded, says a New York paper, to the Board's arrangement. This is an instance either of short-sightedness or of petty persecution of annual occurrence in thousands of small cities throughout the country. Year by year there is a protest from Catholics, who do not care to have their children compelled to attend a Protestant church and to listen to an address which, quite likely, will deal with the iniquities of the Catholic Church; and year by year, the cry of "Catholic bigotry" is raised by persons of ingrowing minds who can not see that their own intolerance is the cause of the difficulty. It is plain that were the proposal made to hold the school exercises under Catholic auspices, the frantic brays of this crowd would fracture the welkin. Let us have a little consistency. Long ago it was decided that religious influences in the public schools would shatter our noble Constitution into innumerable fragments. Theoretically we are still committed to that position. We have made our bed and we must lie upon it. Until the day of sanity returns, in which parents will be allowed to give their children an education of heart as well as of mind, without being fined for it, let us not raise a menacing hand against our venerable and tottering liberties, by holding public school exercises under auspices of the Methodist Church.

The body of Father Maturin who went down with the Lusitania was reclaimed and brought to London where a requiem Mass was celebrated for him in Westminster Cathedral on May 24. At Oxford too, where the lamented priest was formerly chaplain to the Catholic undergraduates a requiem Mass was sung on May 17 and the Abbot of Buckfast preached from the text, "Lord, if it be Thou, bid me come to Thee upon the waters, and He said: come." The Abbot said:

> The mind of Father Maturin had all the elements for a great catastrophe; there was in him the scornful independence of the Irish mind, the white-heat animosity of the French Huguenot, the deep-seated prejudices of the English mind, yet his mental struggles ended in the possession of the fullness of peace. That he had struggled hard and long was evident, that he had worked out for himself the wonderful lessons contained in the Eight Beatitudes was manifest from his glowing power of communicating the truth he possessed; but his struggle had not been with the powers of darkness; like the patriarch of old, he had struggled with God Himself, and had not left the struggle until God gave His blessing at the approach of daylight. . . . For Father Maturin Catholicism was not merely a haven of peace; he loved it not so much for its security, but it was essentially to him a fullness of life, his whole character was life, his speech was life, his whole conception of Christianity was life, and he became a Catholic because he wanted a fullness of life. The permanent, unchanging things of Catholicism were merely conditions of life.

Survivors of the Lusitania disaster report that the lamented priest was last seen giving conditional absolution to the drowning.

By the death of the Reverend Timothy J. Brosnahan, S.J., which occurred in Washington, on June 4, the cause of Catholic education has suffered a severe loss. Born in Alexandria, Va., in 1856, he entered the Society of Jesus in 1872, and after the usual course of studies was ordained priest in 1887. Father Brosnahan's career was marked by devotion to the education of youth. With the exception of six years, 1892-1898, spent as president of Boston College, his life was given to the classroom. Boston, Georgetown, Woodstock and Baltimore were witnesses of his unflagging zeal in this holy cause. A brilliant thinker himself, he strove to develop in all his pupils habits of clear, systematic thought. His success in this is attested by many who came under his influence. Despite the labors of the classroom, Father Brosnahan found time to write. He was a frequent contributor to the Messenger, the American Catholic Quarterly and Donahoe's Magazine; he published a text book on ethics and at the time of his death was engaged in writing another volume on the same subject. Some years ago when Dr. Eliot saw fit to attack the Jesuit system of education, Father Brosnahan replied in a pamphlet, "President Eliot and Jesuit Colleges," which for brilliancy of style and cogency of argument deserves the highest rank among controversial literature. The dead priest leaves behind him many friends who will remember him with admiration for his simplicity of character and splendid gifts of intellect.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XIII, No. 10
WHOLE No. 323

JUNE 19, 1915

PRICE 10 CENTS
$3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE

The War: Bulletin, June 8, p. m.-June 15, a. m.—Poland, Galicia and Bukowina—Italian Success—Mr. Bryan's Resignation—The Third Note to Germany. Belgium: Answer to "The White Book." France: Munition Workers. Germany: Expansion of the German Empire. Great Britain: The Munitions Bill—Recruiting. Ireland: Discontent with the Government. Mexico: Carranza's Proclamation—Villa's Note. 241-244

TOPICS OF INTEREST

Athletics and Scholarship—Thoughts on Heredity—Christ and Woman—Our Young Men, II—The Louisiana Leper Home.....245-251

COMMUNICATIONS

A Riddle—A "Modern Friar" and Prior M'Nabb—"The New Theater"—Flowers and Funerals—Schools in the Philippines—"As to Shakespere's Heroines" 251-253

EDITORIALS

Lying Witness—Our Lost Boys—Taxing Education and Charity—The Last Stand—Theaters Old and New—I Know Just How You Feel. 254-257

LITERATURE

The Catholic Bookshelf: The Works of Father Maturin.

REVIEWS: The Christ of the Men of Art—America's Greatest Problem: The Negro—The Education of the Negro Prior to 1861—The Negro—Pragmatism and the Problem of the Idea—Poems of Émile Verhaeren—The Curse of Adam.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: The June Month—"Five Fronts"—"My Life Out of Prison"—"The Red Spy"—"Mütterlichkeit"—"Die Monroedoktrin"—"Ægypten"—"The Tourists' Maritime Provinces"—"America to Japan"—"Consignes de Guerre"—"Monumenta Historica Societatis Jesu."

BOOKS RECEIVED 257-261

EDUCATION

In the Matter of Spelling.....261, 262

SOCIOLOGY

The Fatal Fondness for Food.....262-264

NOTE AND COMMENT

The Jesuit of Fiction—Parents' Obligations—The Ebro Observatory at Tortosa—News that is Fit to Print—Death of Rev. John E. Copus, S.J. 264

CHRONICLE

The War.—The deadlock in the west continues without modification. In spite of numerous engagements at many points of the line, the only change that has been announced is the final occupation of Neuville by the French. For weeks this has been the scene of bitter hand-to-hand fighting, and for some time both the Allies and the Germans have been in the town. The Germans have at last been obliged to retire and the place is now entirely in the possession of the Allies. Its capture, however, has had no appreciable influence on the general situation.

Bulletin, June 8, p. m.-June 15, a. m.

In the Shavli district the situation is unchanged, although further south on the Dubyssa the Russians have forced the Germans to retire. At other points in Poland there has been renewed German activity, especially north of Przasnysz and on the Rawka. In Galicia, the Austro-German drive towards Lemberg, after having been arrested along the river San, has been resumed on a front that stretches forty-three miles from Cyerniawa to Sieniawa, which has again been taken from the Russians. West of Mosciska, however, the Germans are encountering vigorous resistance. The Austrians also seem to have suffered considerably, but their movement from the south has been generally successful. They are fighting north of the Dniester at Mikolaiow; have captured, evacuated and recaptured Zurawno; and although they were forced to retire south of the Dniester at Bukaszowice, are still fighting at Halicz. Further to the southeast the Austrians have taken Stanislau and advanced from Nadworna to the vicinity of Ottynia. Before Kolomea their offensive has been checked, but in Bukowina it has driven the Russians beyond the river Pruth, and raided Bessarabia.

Poland, Galicia and Buckowina

In the Trentino the Italians have pushed forward a short distance at a number of points, but have accomplished nothing of importance. Along the Isonzo, however, they have had more success. Gradisca and Monfalcone are both in their hands. Neither of these places possessed great military strength, but are important strategically. Their fall will facilitate the Italian advance on Triest.

Italian Success

When the last meeting of the Cabinet was called to discuss the final form of the third note to Germany, Mr. Bryan was found to be absent. On being summoned by the President, he read the document, but declared that he could not in conscience assume responsibility for it by affixing to it his signature. Accordingly he tendered to the President his resignation, which was duly accepted, and followed by the temporary appointment of Mr. Lansing to the office of Secretary of State. The American press has been practically unanimous in expressing astonishment at what it calls Mr. Bryan's inconsistency, his peace policy not having prevented him from signing two former notes, which were identical in purpose and much less pacific in tone. Much regret has been expressed at the fact that the action of Mr. Bryan has further increased the difficulties of the President in his efforts to maintain honorable friendly relations with Germany, as it is thought that Germany may give to the late Secretary of State's resignation exaggerated importance.

Mr. Bryan's Resignation

The official reply made by the United States to the German note of May 28, was sent to Berlin on June 8, and published in the American newspapers on June 11. Its tone is admirable for courtesy, for absence of bluster or menace, and for dignified friendliness. Nevertheless it is unmistakable in clearness, and uncompromising in firmness. Expressing gratification over the attitude taken by the Imperial Government with regard to the Cushing and the Gulflight, and in particular over its "full recognition . . . of the principle of the freedom of all parts of the open sea to neutral ships," the American note reiterates our former pronouncements with regard to the issues raised by the loss of American lives involved in the sinking of the Falaba and the Lusitania:

The Third Note to Germany

> With regard to the sinking of the steamer Falaba, by which an American citizen lost his life, the Government of the United States is surprised to find the Imperial German Government contending that an effort on the part of a merchantman to escape capture and secure assistance alters the obligation of the officer seeking to make the capture in respect of the safety of the lives of those on board the merchantman, although the vessel had ceased her attempt to escape when torpedoed. These are not new circumstances. They have been in the minds of statesmen and of international jurists throughout the development of naval warfare, and the Government of the United States does not understand that they have ever been held to alter the principles of humanity upon which it has insisted. Nothing but actual forcible resistance or continued efforts to escape by flight when ordered to stop for the purpose of visit on the part of the merchantman has ever been held to forfeit the lives of her passengers or crew.

Taking up the contention, contained in the German note that "the Lusitania was undoubtedly equipped with masked guns, supplied with trained gunners and special ammunition, transporting troops from Canada, carrying a cargo not permitted under the laws of the United States to a vessel also carrying passengers, and serving, in virtual effect, as an auxiliary to the naval forces of Great Britain," the note makes the following answer:

> It was its [the United States] duty to see to it that the Lusitania was not armed for offensive action, that she was not serving as a transport; that she did not carry a cargo prohibited by the statutes of the United States, and that, if in fact she was a naval vessel of Great Britain, she should not receive clearance as a merchantman; and it performed that duty and enforced its statutes with scrupulous vigilance through its regularly constituted officials. It is able therefore to assure the Imperial German Government that it has been misinformed.

At the same time the United States professes itself willing to consider any convincing evidence that the German Government may have in its possession to prove that the officials of the United States did not perform their duties with thoroughness.

Having thus shifted the question and put upon the German Government the necessity of proving serious neglect on the part of American officials, the note declines the proposed discussion of two points raised by the German note. Whether or not the Lusitania carried contraband of war, and whether or not it exploded when struck by the torpedo, the United States regards as irrelevant. These contentions she sets aside as not affecting "the question of the legality of the methods used by the Germans in sinking the vessel"; and again calls the attention of the German Government to the broader issues involved in the incident:

> But the sinking of passenger ships involves principles of humanity which throw into the background any special circumstances of detail that may be thought to affect the cases, principles which lift it, as the Imperial German Government will no doubt be quick to recognize and acknowledge, out of the class of ordinary subjects of diplomatic discussion or of international controversy. Whatever be the other facts regarding the Lusitania, the principal fact is that a great steamer, primarily and chiefly a conveyance for passengers, and carrying more than a thousand souls who had no part or lot in the conduct of the war, was torpedoed and sunk without so much as a challenge or warning, and that men, women and children were sent to their death in circumstances unparalleled in modern warfare. The fact that more than one hundred American citizens were among those who perished made it the duty of the Government of the United States to speak of these things, and once more, with solemn emphasis, to call the attention of the Imperial German Government to the grave responsibilities which the Government of the United States conceives that it has incurred in this tragical occurrence, and to the indisputable principle upon which that responsibility rests. The Government of the United States is contending for something much greater than mere rights of property or privileges of commerce. It is contending for nothing less high and sacred than the rights of humanity, which every Government honors itself in respecting and which no Government is justified in resigning on behalf of those under its care and authority.

The final judgment of the United States with regard to the sinking of the Lusitania is thus stated: "Only her actual resistance to capture or refusal to stop when ordered to do so for the purpose of visit could have afforded the commander of the submarine any justification for so much as putting the lives of those on board the ship in jeopardy." After assuring Germany that the Government of the United States would consider it a privilege to serve the world by helping towards a mitigation of the present horrors, she has expressed herself as waiting a formal invitation from the Imperial Government to use her good offices. In the meantime while carefully abstaining from any discussion of the provocation and justification which the German commanders may have believed themselves to have for their past actions, the note says flatly, that "the Government of the United States confidently looks to see the justice and humanity of the German Government vindicated in all cases where Americans have been wronged or their rights invaded." Then follows the most important paragraph in the communication:

> The Government of the United States therefore very earnestly and very solemnly renews the representations of its note transmitted to the Imperial German Government on the 15th of May and relies in these representations on the principles of humanity, the universally recognized understanding of international law and the ancient friendship of the German nation.

Reiterating its refusal to admit that the proclamation of a war zone may operate in any way "an abbreviation of the rights either of American shipmasters or American citizens bound on lawful errands," and taking for granted that Germany questions neither these rights nor "the established principle that the lives of non-combatants can not lawfully be put in jeopardy by the capture or destruction of a non-resisting merchantman," the document closes with the words:

> The Government of the United States therefore deems it reasonable to expect that the Imperial German Government will adopt the measures necessary to put these principles into practice in respect of the safeguarding of American lives and American ships, and asks for assurances that this will be done.

Owing to Mr. Bryan's resignation, the note bears the signature of Robert Lansing, Secretary of State ad interim.

Belgium.—Taking occasion from the publication in American newspapers of extracts from the German "White Book," the Belgian legation at Washington has issued a document which summarizes the German accusations, and then cites facts in refutation:

Answer to "The White Book"

> The German Government accuses the Belgian civilian population of having risen en masse and taken arms against the invaders, and of having organized corps of francs-tireurs. The German Government also claims, in this document, that the Belgian Government gave free rein to the passions of the population, and alleges that Belgium's accusations against the German army were invented to hide her own crimes.

The Belgian legation declares these accusations to be false, and asserts that they are mere statements for which the German Government has brought forward no proof. It insists, moreover, that they are in direct contradiction to "facts duly proved and established":

> At the beginning of the war, the Belgian Government issued the following proclamation, the text of which was reproduced among the documents published by the Belgian Commission of Inquiry:
>
> 1. A circular of Mr. Berryer, Minister of the Interior, addressed under date of August 4, 1914, simultaneously to 2,700 communes of Belgium, by telegraph, reminding the population that acts of hostility against the invader were reserved exclusively to the army, the Civil Guard, and corps of Volunteers regularly organized. Portions of this circular are borrowed textually from the Hague Convention, such, for example, as the portion concerning the population of a territory spontaneously taking up arms on the approach of invaders, which faithfully reproduces article 2 of the Regulations annexed to The Hague Convention.
>
> 2. A notice from the same Minister inserted daily in the newspapers and publicly posted in the larger part, if not in all, of the communes of the country in the early part of August. This notice advised the civilian population to "abstain carefully from any act of hostility against the foreign troops," and characterized as both "criminal" and "imprudent" "any act of violence committed by a single civilian."
>
> In the majority of communes, the local authorities repeated this official warning in the form of notices or communal orders duly posted on the walls and other public places. Similar notices were still posted upon the walls of unfortunate cities at the moment of their destruction and were pointed out to the German officers.

With regard to francs-tireurs the legation asserts that "No organized francs-tireurs war existed in Belgium. No evidence has been brought to support this allegation, and the allegation is denied by the various Commissions of Inquiry."

On the question of the alleged participation of the Belgian clergy in hostile acts against the Germans, the Belgian legation appeals to the results of inquiries reached by the German Bureau "Pax." As for the treatment of priests by the Germans, it refers to the Pastoral Letter of Cardinal Mercier, to information concerning the death of forty-nine priests and religious, and to the condition of the bodies, some of which have been exhumed, examined, and found to be abominably mutilated. Touching the cruelties committed against German soldiers by the Belgians the document says:

> All the statements of the "White Book" concerning alleged cruelties committed by Belgians against the German soldiers are in striking contradiction to the depositions gathered by the two Commissions of Inquiry, the Commission presided over by Viscount Bryce, and the Belgian Commission. Moreover, the "White Book" does not produce any proofs to support its statements.

The document closes with a parallel which sets forth Belgium's and Germany's conduct in the war, and ends with the following statement: "Between these two collections of evidence, the Universe will judge, if it has not already done so."

France.—France, like Great Britain, is experiencing some difficulty in securing skilled workers for the manufacture of munitions. During the last few months, it was stated in debate in the Chamber of Deputies, the Government, absorbed with the problem of strengthening the forces engaged at the front, withdrew many experienced workers from the factories, leaving their places to be filled by apprentices, and in many cases by women. When the weakness of this policy was realized, a further blunder was committed, by recalling untrained men from the ranks, leaving the expert workmen with the army. In reply, M. Millerand, Minister of War, admitted that the plans of the Government had not met the success hoped for, but added that the abuses which had been overlooked in a time of stress were gradually being eliminated. More than six hundred and fifty thousand men are now employed by the munition branch of the army service.

Munition Workers

Germany.—An extension of the German Empire beyond its present frontiers, to guard against future attack, was predicted, according to an Amsterdam despatch, in a speech made at Munich by King Ludwig of Bavaria. The King's speech is interpreted as meaning that Germany intends to retain Antwerp and the northern part, at least, of Belgium, and is the first noteworthy statement given by any German ruler, foreshadowing the possible intentions of Germany regarding territorial expansion. "Ten months have elapsed," said the King, "during which much precious blood has been shed, but it has not been shed in vain. The fruits of the war will be the strengthening of the empire, with extension beyond the old frontiers as far as is necessary to secure it against future attack." No official importance can be attached to the King's remarks. The Vorwärts, the Berlin Socialist organ, says that since discussion in the press of the aims of the war is forbidden, "we must content ourselves with the declaration that the speech is diametrically opposed to the war aims of German social democracy."

Expansion of the German Empire

Great Britain.—Despite strong opposition from labor leaders, the Munitions Bill has passed the House of Commons. "It is very difficult to eradicate suspicion," commented the London Chronicle, "and some members thought that the bill was a subtle attempt to apply compulsion to the working classes in this country." "The Government," said Mr. J. H. Thomas, a Labor member, in the course of debate, "will never get what it wants by pointing a pistol at the head of labor. Let the Government say what it wants, and the labor leaders and the workers will quickly rectify any mistakes that may have been made." If any relaxation of the trade union rules was to be asked, he thought that the Government should guarantee the resumption of these rules at the close of the war. John Dillon saw in the bill an attempt to establish a dictator. "We must take care that the war does not result in the introduction of Prussianism into this country." In his Bristol speech on June 12, Mr. Lloyd George said that the Field Marshal had authorized the return of skilled workers from the front, to be employed in the manufacture of munitions.

The Munitions Bill

The Premier has announced that the response to Kitchener's appeal for three hundred thousand recruits has been satisfactory. He also reported in Parliament, that the total number of men for the army and navy thus far authorized was three million two hundred thousand. To set at rest the uneasy rumors that large forces had been mobilized secretly and that this policy would continue, the Premier said that this number would not be exceeded without authorization from Parliament. Great Britain's losses in men are 50,342 killed, 153,980 wounded, and 53,747 missing. These figures include the period from August of last year to May 31.

Recruiting

Ireland.—The dissatisfaction caused by the appointment of Sir Edward Carson, the organizer of revolt in Ulster against an Act of Parliament, to the Attorney-Generalship of England has been intensified by the offer of the Lord High Chancellorship of Ireland to Right Hon. James Campbell, his ablest lieutenant. As the Chancellor makes the nominations to all judicial and magisterical offices, and already the administration is in the hands of the very arbitrary Sir Matthew Nathan, who is acceptable only to the Ulsterites, Mr. Campbell's appointment would give the whole Government of Ireland to the bitterest enemies of Home Rule. Mr. Redmond's opposition induced Mr. Asquith to continue the present incumbent, Ignatius O'Brien, in the Lord Chancellorship, but his subsequent announcement of the appointment of Hon. John Gordon, another conspicuous Carsonite, to the Attorney-Generalship of Ireland, is equally unsatisfactory. Thus the Attorney-Generals of England and Ireland, the officials responsible for the execution of law, would be men who until last July were preaching and organizing armed resistance to the law.

Discontent with the Government

Mexico.—On June 12 the rival Mexican leaders sent their answers to President Wilson's demand that prompt and united action be taken for "the relief and redemption" of Mexico. Carranza's response is in the form of a proclamation to the Mexican people. Its chief points are these:

Carranza's Proclamation

> Contention that the United States should recognize the Constitutionalists. Declaration that the Carranzistas control all seaports but one and have authority established over twenty of the twenty-seven Mexican States and nine-tenths of the population. Assertion that the Mexican National Congress will call an election for President and that the "first chief" will deliver over executive authority to the President so chosen. "Notwithstanding that one of my first actions was to send a note to the State Department, one of the greatest difficulties has been a lack of mutual understanding with the countries of the world, including the United States," Carranza states, complaining of the non-recognition policy of this nation. He said events were now shaping themselves so that closer relations were probable. "The Constitutionalist Government is now in actual possession of sovereignty," is another assertion. "I think the time has come to call attention to the opposing factions of the futility of their action," Carranza adds. "I exhort these factions to submit to Constitutionalist government." In settling the land question, Carranza says confiscation of the "cientificos" land will not be resorted to, the plan being to distribute Government land not already parceled out and to purchase other land. Extension of public education is also promised.

Carranza's claims, however, appear to be exaggerated for Villa still controls a large portion of central and northern Mexico; there are other chiefs who rule like tyrants over certain sections, and the Villa and Carranza armies are still at a deadlock.

Villa, in his answer to the President's demand, maintains that the American Government has "no right to take any part in the settlement of our internal affairs," lays on Carranza the responsibility for Mexico's present condition, but denies that the country is as wretched as has been represented. Villa's assertions regarding the happiness of Mexico, however, are scarcely borne out by the latest reports from that country. The American Red Cross has as yet been unable to send supplies to the interior, where the population is starving. Hundreds of people, many of them children, are said to be dying of hunger in Mexico City.

Villa's Note

TOPICS OF INTEREST

Athletics and Scholarship

PHYSICIANS declare that athletics are not good for health; prominent educators who have investigated their relation to morals, are quite ready to admit that their enduring effect on character, is rather dubious. There is left, however, the question of their effect on scholarship. There is no doubt that athletics take up so much time that they hamper the acquisition of information, but then information is not education; the important element in education is development of mind. It is urged that the training required for many of the sports is actually a fine sharpening of faculties and an education in itself.

This is just another of the assumptions with regard to the effect of athletics which needs to be tested by actual observation. Dr. H. D'Arcy Power, of San Francisco, once wrote an article on "The Effect of Competitive Athletics on Scholarship," that is interesting reading. It appeared in the California State Journal of Medicine for October, 1913. Dr. Power was a member of the committee appointed by the State Medical Society of California to investigate the effects of athletic training in the high schools and universities. As his colleagues on the committee were devoting themselves to a consideration of ultimate physical effects he thought it might be a useful division of labor if he concentrated on a study of the mental side of the question. Through a post card questionnaire to which a large number of replies were obtained, he secured a significant series of opinions with regard to the effect of athletics on intellectual effort.

An analysis of the replies to the questions shows that sixty per cent. of all the teachers to whom they were sent, expressed the belief that the athlete is naturally disinclined to study. High school instructors place the number of athletes who are not inclined to study as high as seventy-five per cent. The second inquiry as to the falling off in scholarship is answered by an equal proportion of high school and university professors, and seventy-five per cent. of each group are agreed from direct observation that men in training are distinctly lower in class work. Some of Dr. Power's correspondents are quite explicit on this point. The surprise is that twenty-five per cent. of the answers should be to the effect that there was no such falling off. Some of us would be quite sure that the men who sent in that answer were very largely prejudiced for some reason in favor of athletics.

The answers to the other questions are still more striking. Ninety-four per cent. state that concentration on mental work is weakened and some think that it is quite destroyed by athletics; eighty-six per cent. note that there is a weakening of memory; eighty-three per cent. that there is weakening of will power; seventy-eight per cent. feel that there is a distinct loss of power to reason, apparently as the result of distraction and failure to occupy the mind properly with serious concerns.

I need scarcely say that the power of concentration of mind is the most important product of education. Education has been defined as the ability to apply the mind to a subject that one does not like for two hours continuously and thus make something out of the subject. This represents mental control, the most important result of education. It has long been recognized that the distractions of competitive athletics are particularly hard on concentration. Athletic authorities themselves acknowledge this by supplying special coaches for athletes and by holding "quizzes" and other forms of adventitious aid. Now, if there is anything in the world that impairs the value of education it is the helping of candidates over examination fences by such methods. Not infrequently the special tutors and coaches know the peculiarities of professors well and teach these students to answer, as far as possible, according to the mind of the professor, following his crotchets and responding to his vanities so that the marks may be better. Moreover, at smaller colleges particularly, professors who know that men have given time to "supporting the honor of the house," working for the college team, and so on, are almost involuntarily led, if they have any interest in athletics, to be easy on such men. In spite of these favoring factors seventy-five per cent. of the men fall in scholarship, though universities were established for scholarship and high schools are supposed to lead up to it, and nearly nineteen out of every twenty of those engaged in competitive athletics are noted as losing in power of concentration of mind!

More interesting still is the declaration that eighty-three per cent. of athletic students show weakening of will power. In the last article I discussed the question of athletics and character and made certain allowances as to the value of athletics in this regard, which manifestly a great many teachers of much wider and more recent experience than mine would not concede. Just how this loss of weakening of will power is determined I do not know. It is evidently with regard to studies and serious occupations. In the course of a series of conversations with teachers here in New York City during the past three months I have had many confirmations of it. They find that athletes lack self-control, have a tendency to become bullies, get to be rather foolishly vain and conceited, and above all have very little power to settle down to serious work. A paragraph from Dr. D'Arcy Power's article sums up the fact that not only do competitive athletics have the unfortunate effect of impairing mental control, but also that the students selected for athletic teams are just those who already lack more than others concentration of mind. The students who have certain mental abilities in a high degree may not be those seriously injured by athletics, but the athletes are just the ones who need a different training from that which is given them in connection with competitive sports. Dr. Power says:

> Admitting that physical training is desirable though not indispensable, is competitive athletics a proper form of such training? The first point to be observed is that competitive teams are recruited from a small part of the student body. Let us ask what part? From the poorly developed, who need and would be benefited by exercise or training? We opine not. Such material does not provide the sinews of war. Do they represent the sensory type of mind, with its tendency to excessive introspection, suspended judgment, and slowness to act; whose possessors, even when muscular, would be benefited by the training of the campus? Again we opine not. The man who takes to competitive athletics as a duck to water is the individual of motor type, whose energies constantly bubble into muscular action, who naturally acts on the spur of the moment. He is of the fluid attention, who never learns to study. To such men competitive athletics is as easy as mental work is hard. But they not only do not need training along these lines, but all such training tends to further fix their unfortunate natural tendencies. The athlete must act, not think; so the greater the perfection of their technique the more automatic the working of their minds. Competitive athletics train the wrong man, physically and mentally. The view here propounded that the man who goes in for exercise is by nature averse to study is not only based on the psychological principles set forth, but is supported by the observation of the majority of teachers.

The conclusion thus reached would surely be echoed by all those who are deeply interested in the subject and have been observing conditions in our schools. Under the competitive athletic system those who need exercise the most and who would be benefited by it, whose mental capacity would probably be increased by a healthy interest in sports and games, whose senses would be trained to acuteness, whose muscles would be taught to respond to their wills, with speciál reflex action on their wills for good, take no active part. Those on the contrary who need that mode of training the least are entirely absorbed by it. Many of the character faults due to the preponderance of the physical element in these boys are thus emphasized and the place of the intellectual life is minimized. Teachers everywhere will confirm this and while there are exceptions by which bright students are also clever athletes, these are so rare as to constitute literally the exception that proves the rule to the contrary, and besides "for the honor of the house" and "the sake of the team" these young men are asked to make sacrifices of time and scholarship during the precious formative years.

JAMES J. WALSH, M.D., PH.D.

Thoughts on Heredity*

IN the last article we saw that inheritance was a fact recognized by everybody and that the only reason why we refuse to wonder at it is because like other wonderful yet everyday facts, such as the growth of a great tree from a tiny seed, it is so everyday that we have ceased to wonder at it. It is there: we know that. But have we any kind of idea how it comes about? The duck does not, as a matter of common experience, come out of a hen's egg. Why does it come out of a duck's egg? Why doesn't it come out, if only rarely, from a hen's egg? In other words do we know what it is that explains inheritance or how it is that there is such a thing as inheritance? Well candor obliges me to say that we do not. In spite of all the work which has been expended upon this question we are totally ignorant of the mechanism of heredity. Nevertheless it will be instructive to glance at the theories which have been put forward to explain this matter.

All living things spring from a small germ, and in the vast majority of cases this germ is the product in part of the male and in part of the female parent. It is, therefore, natural that we should in the first place turn our attention to this germ and ask ourselves whether there is anything in its construction which will give us the key of the mystery. There is not, at least there is nothing definite as shown by our most powerful microscopes. To be sure there is a remarkable substance, called chromatin because of its capacity for taking up certain dyes, which evidently plays some profoundly important part in the processes of development. We may suspect that this is the thing which carries the physical characteristics from one generation to another, but we can not prove it and though some authorities think that it is, others deny the fact. Even if it be it can hardly be supposed that microscopic research will ever be able to establish the fact and that for reasons which must now be explained.

Let us suppose that we visit a vast botanic garden and in the seed-time of each of the plants therein contained, select from each plant a single ripe seed. It is clear that, if we take home that collection of seeds, we shall have in them a miniature picture of the garden from which they were culled, or at least we shall be in possession of the potentiality of such a garden, for, if we sow these seeds and have the good fortune to see them all develop, take root and grow, we shall actually possess a replica of the garden from which they came. Not exactly, it may be urged, for the distribution or arrangement of the seeds must have been carefully looked to, if the gardens are to resemble each other, otherwise than in the mere possession of identical plants. I admit the truth of this but can not here discuss it since it would take me too far from the main argument. At any rate we should have the same things in both gardens.

On this analogy, many have suggested that every organ in the body, we must go further and say every marked feature in every organ in the body, is represented in the germ by a seed which can grow, under favorable circumstances, into just such another organ or feature of an organ. This was the theory put forward by Darwin under the name of "pangenesis" and by others under other titles with which it is unnecessary to burden these pages. All these theories have been summed together under the name "micromeristic" that is small-fragmented;

---

* The second of a series of three articles.

since they all postulate the existence in the germ of innumerable small fragments—seeds—which are capable of growing into complete plants or organs under favorable circumstances. Again this, even if true, does not by any means exhaust the matter, for it does not explain why the seed of the eye implants itself and grows in the right place in the head instead of making a home for itself, let us say, in the sole of the foot. But again we must pass over that matter.

There is nothing inherently impossible in this theory, indeed, if we allow that the transmission of inheritable characteristics is purely material, and it may be, there is hardly any other conceivable way in which it can occur. It is true that the seeds must be almost innumerable, but the germ, though small, is capable of accommodating an almost innumerable number of independent factors, if the prevalent views as to the constitution of matter are to be believed. And, as it is quite inconceivable that we can ever have microscopes which could detect such minute objects as the ultimate bricks of which the atom, not to speak of the atoms themselves, which compose the germ, consist, it is impossible that we should be able to say that the seed-theory is untrue. Even if we could see these ultimate constituents it is in the last degree unlikely that they would have any resemblance to the things which are, on the theory, to grow from them, any more than the acorn resembles the oak which is to spring from it.

But observe! the germ on this view must contain not only seeds from the immediate parents but from many, perhaps, all, of the older generations of the family, otherwise how are we to account for the appearance of ancestral peculiarities which the father and mother do not show? Moreover, since very minute things, like the inner angle of the eyebrow may independently vary, there must be an enormous number of seeds apart altogether from the considerations alluded to in the last paragraph. And many authorities who have closely considered the question have come to the conclusion that the complexities introduced would be so great that it is impossible to believe in any micromeristic theory.

Then, of course, we must look out for some other explanation and some have suggested that it is to be found in memory, the memory of the germ of what it was, once part of and the anticipation of what it may once more be. This again is an explanation not susceptible of proof along the lines of a chemical experiment but not necessarily, therefore, untrue. Of course there are two ideas as to memory. If we are pure materialists and imagine every memory in our possession as something stamped, in some wholly incomprehensible manner, on some cell of our brain and looked at there, by some wholly inconceivable agency, when we sit down to think of past days, then we must look on the germ, under the "enemic" or memory theory as consisting of fragments each of them impressed with the "memory" of some particular organ or feature of the body and 'Lo! we find ourselves back again in micromerism. If we are to take a non-materialistic view of memory we are plunged into a metaphysical discussion which can not here be pursued. A third explanation, which by the way explains nothing is that the whole matter is one of "arrangement." This is the view put forward in the last Presidential Address to the British Association and something more must be said about it in the last of these papers.

BERTRAM C. A. WINDLE, M.D., SC.D., LL.D., F.R.S.

Christ and Woman

MODERN literature abounds in references to Christ's attitude towards woman. In view of the false impressions frequently created it is important to understand aright the Scripture lesson upon this point. They regard both the equality of the sexes and the distinction between them in God's spiritual kingdom upon earth.

The first and most obvious fact to be gathered from the Gospel records is the total absence of discrimination between man and woman on the part of Christ wherever there is question of the "one thing necessary." For both the same commandments are given and the same law of love; upon both are conferred the same general means of sanctification and spiritual perfection; both are encouraged by the same promise of reward and deterred from evil by the same threat of everlasting punishment. Together they are to be, at the resurrection of their glorified bodies, "as the angels of God in heaven." For like to those pure spirits they shall then "neither marry nor be married." They who are "accounted worthy of that world" are henceforth, in the words of Our Divine Lord, "equal to the angels, and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection." (Luke xx, 36) Surely a glorious consummation of woman's highest hope as of man's supreme ambition.

If to both, therefore, is pointed out the same sublime height of perfection as the goal of all their endeavors, both must likewise observe the same essential condition that they may attain to it: "Unless you be converted and become as little children, you shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven." The quarrel for mere worldly preeminence, which has extended even to the mutual relations between the sexes, can have no place among the true children of God. "Whosoever will be the first among you shall be the servant of all," is the law of Christ's kingdom. "For the Son of man also is not come to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give His life a redemption for many." There is only one royal road for all and that is the road of the Cross.

Yet a distinction is made by Our Lord between the sexes, and is most strictly observed by Him in His spiritual kingdom upon earth, where there is question of the outward ministry. He best knew the nature of man and woman, for in love God had made them both. In studying, therefore, His divine dealings with woman it is well that we hold ourselves aloof from the clamor and passion of the modern world and reverently take our place, in the silence of Bethany, at the feet of Christ.

Throughout the mortal life of Our Saviour woman's place was close indeed to His Sacred Person and closer still to His Divine Heart. Her service was first and foremost that of motherhood. The fact that the Eternal Word chose to be born of a woman, to be tabernacled within her breast and cradled upon her heart, has given to woman a sacredness and exaltation of which nothing can ever deprive her. Her service in the second place was one of intercession. Who can tell how greatly the faith and love of those two noble types of womanhood, the sisters of Lazarus, moved Christ to call back their brother from the dead! At Mary's word of salutation to Elizabeth, the infant Baptist was sanctified and at her prayerful suggestion the first public miracle was worked by Christ in Cana of Galilee. Woman's service, in the third place, consisted in ministering to Him, as the Gospels relate.

Whatever form, therefore, woman's service assumed, it was always, without exception, of a private or domestic, never of a public official nature. At no time was woman chosen by Christ for the outward ministry, for the preaching of the Gospel and the dispensing of the Sacraments. She was not numbered among the Apostles nor commissioned with the disciples. Christ's lambs and sheep were not entrusted to her and the government of His Church was not placed upon her shoulders. The distinction here could not have been drawn more definitely.

If these dispensations of divine love and wisdom are unintelligible to modern worldlings, they offer no difficulties to those who like Christ are meek and humble of heart. "I confess to thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them to little ones. Yea, Father; for so hath it seemed good in thy sight." The things of the spirit can never be understood by the children of the world. The salve of humility has never been laid upon their eyes that they might see.

To the faithful soul God's ineffably holy will is reason sufficient for all that He may do. But does exclusion from the public functions of the spiritual ministries of Christ's kingdom necessarily imply a lesser love for woman on His part? Which of the Apostles could be compared with the immaculate Mother of God? Yet the power of forgiving sins and the mission of preaching the word was never given to her. She who loved and reared and nourished the Divine Victim for the world's redemption, was never to offer Him up in the sacrifice of the Mass.

Difference of function between man and woman can not, therefore, be accepted as the final standard of excellence. Our only true worth is the rank we occupy in the registry of God's nobility. Degrees of grace and not of office determine our nearness to His Throne.

Woman's place was in the affections of Christ and not in His award of public functions. Of the greatness and tenderness of His divine love for woman the Gospels offer abundant evidence. The final test of this love, the laying down of His life, was given alike to both the sexes. How delightful, too, Our Lord's divine conversation with Martha and Mary in the home of Bethany, how tender His love for the mothers with their children, how inexpressible the gentleness of heart with which He shielded the penitent woman and instructed the Samaritan at Jacob's well. It was He who gave to woman the exalted position she occupies in the Catholic home, by exalting the marriage contract to a sacrament, making man and woman one in Him. The depth of Christ's love for woman can in some way, be estimated by the generosity and devotion it awakened in her and the marvel of her fidelity to Him. When the Cross was raised on Golgotha the world was witness to the faithfulness of woman. "And here," reads the sacred text, "were many women afar off, who had followed Jesus from Galilee, ministering unto Him." The hooting of the rabble, the fierceness of the executioners, the hatred of the Jews could not intimidate them. And when the body of Jesus was at last laid into the tomb, and Joseph of Arimathea had rolled the great stone to the door and departed, "there was there Mary Magdalen and the other Mary sitting over against the sepulchre." So again, early in the morning, the first day of the week, whom do we find upon the road to the garden, bearing sweet-scented spices for the anointing of their Lord, but the holy women? In the darkness of the early hours Mary Magdalen had anticipated even them, and great was her reward. What worlds of tenderness and love in those two words alone: "Mary," "Rabboni." This very fidelity of woman, to which the centuries were likewise to bear witness, is itself an evidence of God's affection for her. It reveals to us above all the strong chords of love with which the Heart of Jesus had bound her to itself. For her were reserved His first visits of consolation after His glorious resurrection.

Woman's place, therefore, must still be near to Christ's Divine Person, ministering to Him or His members, bringing to Him her little ones fashioned to His likeness, mothering all mankind in its needs and in its sorrows, pouring out in lavishness upon the Master's head and feet her ointment of all preciousness, filling the wide spaces of the Church with the sweetness of her sacrifice, winning for Him the hearts of men by the power of her intercession and inspiring them by her words and her example, abiding in fidelity beneath the outstretched arms upon the Cross, and ever receiving in fullness, the first divine consolations of His love. Her home will then be with Christ, where the humblest are the highest. Such, in part at least, is woman's sublime vocation in the Church of God. It is impossible to measure how far her influence may reach; it will be deep as life and will continue.

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

Our Young Men

II

I SAID in my first paper that having written so much concerning the dangers which menace young men's faith and morals, I had not left myself space to propose a remedy, and must leave that to a second paper.

I placed newspapers high up on my list of dangerous things; newspapers, magazines, and books. Of course, I mean secular newspapers; secular magazines, and non-Catholic books. On Sunday mornings I watch Catholics leaving the church and buying newspapers as they come down the steps. Those who do not buy thus usually have had them delivered already at their homes. At home, father will devote himself to the news and the sporting pages; daughter will secure the magazine, and "society" and theatrical sections; brother—well, big brother will have his own paper all to himself, and little brother will fight with little sister over the comic pages. Mother? She probably will have to attend to the preparation of dinner. And in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred the paper will be vividly "yellow." It will reek with the rank fumes of sin and filth. It will either bristle with hostility to religion; or, what is worse, it will be steeped in the seductive spirit of religious indifferentism.

Seductive? Yes; for by nature we human beings shrink from strain and effort, especially at those times when we wish to relax. Sunday, for most of us, seems to be a day of relaxation, the relaxation of body and mind, instead of a day for the bracing of the spirit against the inevitable slackening produced by the week of life and work in the world that has gone before. Indifferentism to religious considerations; or the spirit of equal tolerance of religion and anti-religion, such as the big Sunday newspapers in my city showed recently when on one page of its highly-colored magazine it printed a picture of Our Lord rising from the tomb, and on the reverse page a picture of slimly dressed ladies with peek-a-boo parasols—this deadly danger of religious indifferentism is fertile in devising many comfortable, amusing, entertaining ways of leading the mind and the soul far off from that constant attention to danger which is absolutely requisite in this world of many dangers.

Is this a distressingly difficult doctrine—to affirm what we all say we believe, namely, that we do live amid dangers, and thet we do require to be ever watchful? Well, it certainly does seem too difficult for a vast number of young men. They prefer to pass it by and to yield a soft, weak consent to the world's sensual, distracting, and irreligious allurements and suggestions, which fill the pages of the secular press. Yet I think that no serious Catholic can doubt that most of the reading matter of the day is nothing but a drug for souls; an insidious narcotic at best, and often a virulent poison; and I must say that my personal opinion is that Catholics of the younger generation, with few exceptions, appear to be as much addicted to its debilitating and perilous use as most other young people.

What applies to the press is true also of the theaters, of the cabarets, the dancing halls, and the saloon; all these are freely frequented by Catholic young men, and generally they are nothing but nets set for their souls, baited or disguised with the enticements of sensual pleasures, usually of a grossly immoral kind. Do I sound like some dour Puritan? I hope not; but come now, is the case not so? Heaven forbid I should say anything to condemn or dampen gay spirits and true joy in life! Catholicism, as I understand it, leads to anything but that. I do not want to see young men all "dismal Jemmys," and our girls all "solemn Sarahs," arrayed in dun, or dusty black, and creeping through life like mutes at a funeral. But just the same, as one who has lived much in the world as it is, I do not propose to shut my eyes to the staring fact that most of the amusements, pastimes, pleasures, and recreations of the day in which Catholic young men mingle with non-Catholics are dangerous to their faith and their morals.

And as for such societies as the Y. M. C. A., and all other organizations formed by others than Catholics, and conducted by others than practical Catholics, I have the same uncompromising objection. A Catholic defender of the Y. M. C. A., in a recent number of AMERICA, has the ineffable boldness to say: "The Y. M. C. A., recognizing that high morality can best be attained by means of physical training . . . has attained a world-wide success." Imagine such a statement coming from one who says he is a Catholic! Does it not show to what an extent the modern poison of Protestant and atheistical rationalism has seeped into the thought of young men? For if it is true that high morality can best be attained by physical means, such as gymnasiums, running tracks, boxing gloves, swimming tanks, etc., then Catholicism is obviously wrong, and the sooner its churches are turned over to the Y. M. C. A. to be converted into gymnasiums, or to the Socialists and sociologists, to be transformed into "social service centers," and debating halls, and so forth, the better for Society. This idea that morality is a matter of physical, material factors, and is not fundamentally based upon supernatural reasons, has a strong and tremendously extended grip upon the thought of the world. The dangers which it produces confront our young men at every moment of their lives, at every turning of their ways. This idea is the spirit of socialism. It also inspires the destructive activities of these volatile, obsessed men and women—especially women—who have become inoculated with the sickening virus of sexual curiosities and fascinations disguised as "racial duties," "social service," etc., and who run about gabbling of "sex hygiene" and "eugenics," messing up the magazines and newspapers, making the public schools worse than ever, and, unfortunately, impressing a number of people who ought to know better since they claim to be Catholics.

Linked with this idea goes another—the idea of worldly success. The first idea proclaims that its mission is to turn this world into Utopia; free it from poverty, sickness, labor, sorrow, and at long last, probably, even death—though some of the high priests of this humanism chant ecstatic strophes about "the beautiful necessity of death: twin brother of life." It seeks to make young men believe that men, of their own power, by their own will, through "brotherhood"—a brotherhood sans the Fatherhood of God, what a monstrous thing!—and by means of art and culture and science and cooperation, and God only knows what else, can shape this world to their own idolatrous images of comfort and ease and pleasure. The blood-and-fire fumes drifting this way from blasted Europe should be answer enough to that frightful fallacy. The second idea very cunningly tells young men that the best way to help on the coming of Utopia, or the best thing anyhow, and never mind Utopia, is first of all to feather one's own nest thoroughly, to grab one's own personal share, or a little bit more (it will come in handy) of goods, and wealth, and pleasure, and success, and position in life—not in eternal life, but in this transitory, passing life. And how they go to it! Catholic young men are well up in that mad race. They may remind themselves for the space of one Mass on Sundays, and an annual or semi-annual turning aside to the Sacraments, that there is another life, and another world, and another success, and by just that much, "handicap" themselves in the race; but they soon put on extra steam and spurt to make up, apparently, for the lost time and the distracted energy. What shall we do to help them? We must all work hard for the fostering of the supernatural reasons for faith and morals in our young men. Our societies and clubs and organizations of all sorts are good: I have nothing but praise for them; but they are not enough. Protestant and non-religious bodies and individuals can nearly always do better than we can do in such societies, simply because they are experts in material and physical matters, and we are not, and, let us pray, never will be, except as we work in such ways from the inside to the outside, from the spirit to the form. The most practical and efficient organizers and workers that the world has ever seen: the founders of our great religious Orders—which are the true type of really effective "social service"—were first of all great mystics, living in constant, daily, hourly, continual consciousness of the supernatural world. Truly, I believe, that what young men need to help them to-day is not a further organization of clubs and sodalities and societies, and so forth. Those we have are excellent, and are to be encouraged; but the chief need seems to me for our clergy not to give one step of their strongest position away, but to advance still more and more their own knowledge that what our young men need is a fuller, much fuller measure of sacramental life; an extension of reliance upon prayer and daily, habitual employment of its power; a cultivation of an ampler acquaintance with our saints and holy souls, and a following of their example. I should like to see missions to young men multiply everywhere. I should like to see retreat houses opened for their use in every city and town. I should like to see the supernatural religious side of Catholic life insisted upon day in and day out, so that the only real protection against evil, the only adequate help to faith and morals, namely, the awakened and powerful conscience, will guide and guard our young. May the day come when in some gild of St. Joseph—the greatest saint of the hidden life of prayer, and the saint of work and service, too—a gild extending to every parish in our land, young men will be taught how to live a life of prayer in the world of work and duty, so that the spirit of prayer may be active in all the sodalities and societies, fertilizing and nourishing them all.

MICHAEL WILLIAMS.

The Louisiana Leper Home

TWENTY years ago, the subconscious poison of leprosy made itself apparent on the surface of Louisiana society, with the alarming shock that a long unrecognized evil causes. While the greater number of cases brought to notice were of the poorer classes, wealth had its victims too. Awakened at last to the menace of the disease, the State of Louisiana purchased the present location of the segregation camp, at Indian Village, Iberville Parish, and took active measures to stamp out the plague. Four miles from a railroad, in the woods, on the banks of a turgid, sluggish river, the camp's isolation is complete. The main building selected for the resident corps of nurses was an old colonial mansion which had once been the scene of gay revelries.

The State interned as many lepers as it could seize, and placed nurses and doctors of its own selection there, but they revolted. The duties were too loathsome, the isolation too insupportable. Even science demands what it calls "suitable accommodations" for its researches. Furthermore, the "graft" of politicians, which seems inseparable from State appropriations, was working havoc with the funds. After a year's experimentation, it became manifest that the enterprise could not be thus carried on. Yet the free roaming of lepers throughout the State was not to be thought of. The officials were downcast and perplexed; until some one bethought him of the Sisters of Charity at Emmitsburg, Md. In answer to their appeal the Superior replied that the case was so extreme that she would prefer to call for voluntary service. She did so with the result that every Sister of Charity in the United States, numbering approximately 1,500, volunteered to go.

They were accordingly established to the number required, in the one-time house of mirth, which was then in the ruins of abandonment. The ground floor was converted into stables, a combination of hostelry, hen-house and cow-barn, to which inevitably the kitchen was attached. The cackling and lowing mounted to the Sisters' dormitory above. The walls oozed moisture; the roof admitted torrents of rain; the plastering showed the bare ribs of architectural decay. As if this were not enough to test the courage of the Sisters, there soon came a visitation of Providence in the shape of a tornado. The roofs of the cottages which had been reared for the lepers were torn off, the barns were blown to the ground and the frightened animals joined in the general lamentation.

The Governor and his officials were notified of the calamity, and the Sisters were instructed by their Superior to attempt no renovation before the official inspection was made, hoping that some recognition of their deplorable condition would follow, and an improvement succeed. The State sent workmen, who repaired the leper cottages, but left the Sisters' house untouched. Whereupon that valiant woman, the Superior, took boat, and presented herself to the Governor, who was at the time in New Orleans. So the state of affairs was reported to the Legislature. and an appropriation was made which enabled the Sisters to build new barns and to repair their house and the cottages of the lepers. The resident nursing Sisters now have an airy dwelling, with wide, high corridors, and stairways protected by old-time balustrades. A pretty little domestic chapel is located just above the main entrance.

Between the Sisters' house and the women's cottages, near the road and the levee, is the bungalow of the resident chaplain. It is surrounded by a fence enclosing flower gardens and little walks. The chaplain's only companions are his books, two bird dogs, his guns and the lepers by the sullen river. Before the lepers' cottages is a raised and railed boardwalk, and the dwellings of the men and women are separated by a high wooden fence. The entire camp is surrounded by ordinary fences, such as enclose any farm, but at the front, and in the rear, you may perceive what you might mistake for the judge's stand of a racecourse. There is stationed a man with a gun. Between the men's cottages and the women's cottages stands a quaint little Spanish-roofed, pebble-dashed chapel, where Our Lord dwells to-day among the lepers even more perpetually than when they came to Him of old.

In 1888 there were twenty-three patients. To-day there are 104. Sixty-two per cent. of them are males, eighteen per cent. negroes. The cottages are spotlessly clean, and kept in order by the patients who are able to work. Corridors, porches and grounds are cared for in turn by the lepers. They like to keep employed. Each has his own towels, soap, linen, etc. The men, as a rule, are recalcitrant and ungrateful; the women, more tractable, if not more appreciative. When this is remarked by the visitor, the Sisters smile and say: "What would you have? Only one returned to give thanks to Our Lord. 'Where are the nine?'" Here and there, saintly qualities of charity and abnegation develop. One young girl is regarded as a "Little Flower." She is sweet-faced, not yet much ravaged by the leprosy, speaks French charmingly and English with a halt. She hopes to be discharged "pretty soon," and can not conceive how she had ever contracted the scourge. Not two per cent., however, in twenty years have been discharged as cured, yet all speak of "getting well" and "going home soon."

On the top of the laundry of the camp, the Sisters conduct a little school for the children, about ten boys, ranging from seven to ten, and a few little girls, boys and girls being taught at different hours.

The Sisters, with sterilized gloves, spread ointment on lint and bandage the lepers. Every day they do this, cleansing the sores, tying up the wounds, cutting off the powdered bones. Not one Sister has contracted the disease in their nineteen years of service. The surgeon and the physician of the camp come from the city at stated intervals during the month, when they are called for major operations or complicated cases. The patients also receive daily internal treatment. The ordinary remedy used is Chaulmoogra oil, given in capsules or hypodermically injected. Hot baths administered daily keep the flesh clean and pliable, reducing the pain. Fever sets in at intervals, when the patient is put to bed and scientifically treated.

The gaiety, sympathy and good cheer of the Sisters in attendance are not assumed, but a genuine trait of supernatural origin. It is the marvelous gift of a relative reward, which anticipates Heaven. One of these Sisters, little more than a girl, of Boston parentage, appeared particularly happy as she bent over the loathsome blackness of a negro patient. "Surely," says the Mission priest, "these Sisters do not die. They simply lay down the forceps and bandages, draw off their rubber gloves, grasp the Crucifix, and await the call, "Come, well done!'"

Although not one Sister has contracted leprosy, they suffer much from malaria, prevalent on the low plain below the water level. During the most unfavorable months capsules of quinine are a part of the menu in the refectory. An altar association, with headquarters in New Orleans, maintains the chapel, one dollar a year being the membership fee. Twice a month the chaplain offers Mass for the members and once a month the Stations of the Cross are made for the same intention. Once a day the patients gather there to recite the Rosary for living and dead members.

The six Sisters in charge of the lepers are paid $100 a year each by the State, or an average of twenty-eight and one-half cents a day. Secular nurses could not be secured and retained at any price. The annual appropriation from the State is about $31,000. To this $40,000 has been recently added for repairs, heat, light and water requirements. Governor Hall is the only Governor who has ever visited the camp, needless fear of infection tending to keep visitors away. Governor Hall described his visit with enthusiasm, and is quoted by a New Orleans newspaper as saying:

> The Leper Home deserves all and more than we will ever do for it. If there was only some way of getting the people to go there and witness for themselves the self-denial and sacrifice of the Sisters who have gone there to devote the remainder of their lives in nursing the afflicted, conditions at the Home would be very different. . . . I am going to do all within my power to see that the State gives more of its public funds to help in a small degree to add to their comfort while living. If they can give up their lives, it does seem to me that we, the people of this State, should give more freely of our money for their comfort.

Until a year ago, no Protestant clergyman ever visited his charges there. Now a minister preaches there once a month and a small Protestant chapel is being erected at a cost of about $800.

E. S. CHESTER.

COMMUNICATIONS

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

A Riddle

To the Editor of AMERICA:

AMERICA is making it plain that it is no longer safe, for even eminent men, to invent or to expand papal documents, to cast slurs at Jesuits, or to throw mud at promising marks such, for example, as the Brazilian Church. When statesmen like Mr. John Lind, litterateurs like Mr. William Dean Howells, churchmen like Mr. Bovard, and historians like Mr. Vedder, are not to have free range for their fancy, where in the name of the laughter of the gods, are we to look hereafter for gems of historical untruth? Must we henceforth content ourselves with the dismal imitations displayed by the Menace? Heaven forfend!

The serious thing, however, is not that a perennial source of mirth is blocked, nor that certain superior persons have written that which they do not attempt to make good, but that the estate of gentlemen seems to have fallen so low in high places that men may, seemingly without discredit, withhold their tongues and their pens from apology or defense, when publicly accused of publishing untrue statements. Have we come to the pass when a man may retain his full stature and station as an exemplary citizen and as a light to the youth of the country, while comfortably resting under the imputation that he has attributed to his neighbor, disgraceful teaching which in reality was never uttered? Can such men continue, without explanation or apology, to frequent exclusive clubs, to move in cultivated society, to contribute to high-class magazines, to occupy pulpits before stunning congregations, while mere cheating at baccarat threw England into a ferment and shook many fine names into the dust bins?

If this may be done, since it is done, what is honor? And why should training in honor be made a nuisance to youth, and a fetish to age. What conceivable hurt can the lack of it be to the youth who contemplates the harmless result? It seems the high may indulge in lapses from it without damage; perhaps the low do not count; so what is the use of the thing anyhow? After all is Falstaff's code right? Indeed, "Can honour set to a leg?"

Do not think my words written in lightness. I want information. What is the correct procedure in smack, up-to-date etiquette (not to say morals), when a gentleman has made a misstatement, whether through lack of information or inadvertence, either of which was probably the case in the instances treated of by AMERICA? It goes without saying that if misstatements are made with knowledge, gentlemanliness is automatically lost. In such cases is silence, or eternity as you well name it after Carlyle, permissible from the standpoint of morals or from that of a gentleman? I can not think it is. But a luminous example to the contrary is set before me by four distinguished fellow-citizens, and I confess to indecision, considering the standing of the names involved, between instinctive principle and evident example. How can these men fail to speak, and speak plainly, not mincingly as two of them did, and retain their self-respect or the respect of others? Will some casuist riddle me this riddle?

Flagstaff, Ariz. M. J. RIORDAN.

A "Modern Friar" and Prior M'Nabb

To the Editor of AMERICA:

That letter of "Modern Friar" is an astounding document. The writer has not caught Prior M'Nabb's spirit: there's the difficulty. It is a long time since the asceticism and intellectualism of the Middle Ages were written down so simply and appealingly. "Modern Friar" should make a meditation, lash himself during the space of a Miserere, sing the Salve Regina and then reread the Prior's article. The meditation, the penance, the chant would remove him from this age of apartments and waistcoats "marked down" and automobiles, and give him a vision of a garden of simplicity, with the atmosphere of the Middle Ages: the rereading would do the rest.

New York. A MEDIEVAL MONK.

"The New Theater"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The "New Theater" movement appears to have again proved a failure. The first step toward the revival of the enterprise was an invitation extended to Granville Barker, the English producer, to present a trial season of repertory in New York. With a cautiousness begot of their former costly experiment, the founders wished to determine beforehand with what degree of popular support their project was likely to meet under the direction of Mr. Barker. The first step, no matter how gratifying the result may have been to the sponsors of the movement, proved to be a step in the wrong direction. Financially a success, in the larger interests of the drama the season was a discouraging failure.

Of the four plays presented, two, "The Man Who Married a Dumb Wife" and "A Midsummer Night's Dream" did credit to the taste and craftsmanship of the producer. Yet both, from the standpoint of popularity, were comparative failures. "A Midsummer Night's Dream," soon after its first presentation, was relegated to Saturday matinee audiences of school-children. Where legitimate drama failed, however, vulgarity and immorality triumphed. It is needless here to analyze at length the other two plays, both from the pen of Bernard Shaw. An atheist's banal ridicule not only of Christianity, but of all religion, "Androcles and the Lion," should never have been tolerated in a Christian community. The depravity of Daudebat in "The Doctor's Dilemma" would have made a self-respecting pagan blush. Neither play, in the opinion of the reviewers, was conspicuous for artistic workmanship; neither presented exceptional opportunities to the producer. There were many other plays at Mr. Barker's command which would have much more happily exemplified his peculiar methods of production.

Why did he produce them? A fund approximating forty thousand dollars rendered him independent of the box office. Did he wish to give a practical demonstration of his oft-vaunted devotion to Shaw? A non-commercial theater is worthy of serious attention only on the condition that its ideal is more elevated than that of the commercial theater. Mr. Barker's artistic impulse may be higher, but his standards in the selection of plays are by no means more elevated than are those of the average showman. If Mr. Barker is made director of the New Theater and permitted to follow the policy outlined during his late season, another show house will have been added to the already lengthy list of Broadway, but the great New Theater, founded upon the cornerstone of art and morality, will be as vague a dream as ever.

New York. THOMAS LANGTON.

Flowers and Funerals

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A communication from the pen of "A Layman" in AMERICA of May 29, is entitled "Wasted Money." This good Catholic gentleman and some of his professional friends "discussed with much pleasure several topics of interest to Catholics, one of which was the extravagant and, from a Catholic standpoint, useless expenditure of money for floral tributes at funerals."

This custom, if I may judge by what seems the spirit, if not the strict letter, of his communication, "A Layman" would replace by the very good and pious practice of having Masses offered for the dead person's soul. "A Layman" and his friends seem to have overlooked an important consideration in their calculations. Evidently "A Layman" is not in the floral business, either as grower or as dealer. From the "florist's standpoint," floral tributes at funerals are not a "useless expenditure" of money.

Floral offerings at funerals are a "pagan custom"? I have heard of persons who wanted to suppress tears as being unchristian, forgetting, I suppose, that "Jesus wept" at the tomb of Lazarus, and that His Apostle bids us "weep with them that weep." The members of the Gentlemen's Sodality of St. Ignatius' Church, San Francisco, never suspected that they were indulging in a "simply pagan custom" when they contributed an expensive floral piece on the occasion referred to by "A Layman." And they have no reason to be troubled over it. I do not know at this moment whether pagans were in the habit of sending flowers to homes on the occasion of a bereavement; but, if they were, what of it? Not everything that pagans have done is a "pagan custom," by any means. Pagans, like Cornelius mentioned in the Acts, prayed and gave alms. These were not pagan customs. They are human customs, prompted by such naturally good sentiments, when they are not prompted by God's actual grace as may be in the human heart, even after the fall of man. Now, Catholics are human—at least before a retreat by the Jesuit Fathers!—and they too have sentiments toward the dead and toward the stricken relatives of the dead, sentiments whose expression is about as natural as to speak or to breathe, and flowers, by their very nature, voice the feelings of the heart as eloquently as words, and, ordinarily, they cost more.

To the inspired writer the memory of the illustrious dead was as the beauty and fragrance of flowers: "Simon the high priest . . . shone in his days. . . . as the flower of roses in the days of the spring, and as the lilies that are on the brink of the water" (Eccl. 1: 1, 6, 8). Flowers—yes, a whole roomful of them—around the bier of the dead help to relieve the desolation and temper the bitterness of death, as they know into whose houses death has come and whose generous-hearted friends have attested their sympathy by floral tributes. Friends who will send flowers may be depended on to be generous enough, if they are of the household of the Faith, to remember also the departed soul. Those who bring floral offerings for the Altar usually make offerings for Masses also!

Here I am reminded of the course recommended to the Pharisees, when Our Lord said to them: "These things you ought to have done, and not to have left those undone" (Matt. xxiii, 23). Applied to the present case they would mean: "Send a floral offering to assuage a little the grief of the living, and do not fail to have a Mass offered, and to say your rosary, for the soul of their dead." And the one act no less than the other, a Christian can supernaturalize. The cost of a floral piece, borne by the donor, is trivial compared with the cost of a casket, compared with the "high cost of dying," and the high cost of sickness, and the high cost of birth, which fall heavily upon so many poor families. A discussion of these "high costs" would be, I think, more fruitful than a discussion of the present subject; and, if I may say so, more worthy of the brilliant pages of AMERICA.

San Francisco. A PRIEST.

Schools in the Philippines

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In a recent number of AMERICA the Reverend Poinvels, of Cantilan, Province of Surigao, Philippine Islands, makes certain statements concerning the public school system of that country which I, as former acting division superintendent of schools for Surigao and Agusan Provinces, can not let pass without challenge. He laments the fact that the public schools of the Philippines have passed into the hands of "our adversaries," who are "destroyers of religion"; and intimates that public school teachers are greater enemies of the Church than Protestant ministers. I have always thought, and still think, that the attitude adopted in this matter by the missionary congregation from Holland, of which Father Poinvels is a member, is due in great part to the fact that their European training and experience have incapacitated them from distinguishing between the reported active hostility of such "Liberal" governments as France, Portugal, or Mexico, and the benevolent neutrality of our own Government.

Surely the Reverend Father does not class the Director of Education of the Philippine Islands as an "adversary" of the Church when that official, in a general circular, prohibits all teachers, both American and Filipino, in "this Catholic country" from words or acts directed against the Church either directly or indirectly. Did an "adversary" plan the school code of the Philippines, which provides that, upon petition of a certain portion of the inhabitants of the district, parish priests may visit public schools therein three times a week to instruct the pupils in the doctrines of the Church? I have actual knowledge of the fact that the higher officials of this terribly hostile Bureau of Education usually consult, unofficially, of course, with the bishop before assigning a Catholic American teacher to his post. Is this evidence of a sinister design against the Church? It would be safe to say that over ninety per cent. of the Filipino teachers, who come more in contact with the pupils, and an unusually large number of the American supervisors and inspectors, are practical Catholics. If the Bureau of Education wishes to destroy the Church why give so many positions to Catholics?

The last Spanish Archbishop of Manila said to his flock as they watched the proud banner of Castile flutter down from the ramparts of old Fort Santiago and heard the guns of Dewey's fleet thunder out a salute to the glorious Stars and Stripes streaming boldly out over the ancient city: "The time has come to put old wine in new bottles." I commend this saying to Father Poinvels. Among the "new bottles" I might mention the Jesuit Fathers of Manila, who on various occasions have turned their splendid observatory into a temporary dormitory for male Filipino government teachers in attendance upon the summer normal school. It is only reasonable to suppose that the good Fathers improved the opportunity to sow seeds of truth in the minds of these young men, who went forth to all parts of the Philippines to help in the good work of raising a nation from ignorance. I can not let pass this opportunity to cite the example of my good friend and former pastor, Father Juan Aballe, of Ginatilan, Province of Cebu. This really superior man, although of the "inferior" Filipino race, is keen enough to see the evil consequences to religion of appearing to the Filipino public as an enemy of national progress as represented by the American schools. With remarkable tact and sympathy he has created a true "Catholic atmosphere" in the public schools of Ginatilan, and has not done violence, either to the letter or spirit of the school code, in the process. Ginatilan is known throughout Cebu as an excellent school town and at the same time as one of the staunchest Catholic towns in the Islands. If a Filipino priest can bring all this about, there is no reason why the same result can not be achieved by Europeans.

There is pessimism in certain quarters as to the outlook in the Surigao province. From actual knowledge of the situation I too am pessimistic as to the future of the Church in that part of the Islands unless one of two remedies be tried: either the gentler methods will have to be adopted or "the old wine will have to be put into new bottles."

Ottumwa, Iowa. A. J. MITCHELL.

"As to Shakespere's Heroines"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In comparison with the article in AMERICA of June 5, entitled "As to Shakespere's Heroines," it may be stimulating to note the following from Canon Sheehan:

> Even the women of Shakespere strike us, notwithstanding all that has been written to the contrary, as wanting at least in those graces and sweetnesses that we are wont to associate with the female character. We make all allowance for the freedom of the age, its licentiousness, its bald, coarse language; and yet we venture to think that the women who were contemporaries of Shakespere in other lands were of a loftier and purer type than he has painted, and that he has done some injustice to the ladies of Venice and Verona when attributing to them certain grossèries of manner and speech that we think were hardly tolerated at that time beyond the coast of Albion. ("Parerga," page 126.)

Now, this is in distinct disagreement with Miss Gilmore's conception of the sweetness and delicacy of Shakespere's portrayal of women. Amusing and interesting as Shakespere's women may be, still, with exceedingly rare exceptions they fall far short of our ideals of what is noblest and best in womanhood. Too often they are lacking in due reserve. Their strength borders too closely on boldness, and their virtues are at best purely natural and earthy. Even the heroines Miss Gilmore holds up for our admiration, Ophelia, Portia and Rosalind, are not free from occasional coarseness of language. I think that a detailed examination of all the plays will signally fail to bear out the assertion that "nearly every play contains a heroine so good as to be a symbol of all that is best in human nature, so charming as to be a type of what is most attractive in womanhood."

Poughkeepsie, N. Y. B. A. L.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, JUNE 19, 1915

Entered as second-class matter, April 15. 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN;
Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Contributions for the Mexican fund may be sent direct to AMERICA.

Lying Witness

IN the eleventh month of the war it is an old story. Acrid smoke hangs over the marred field where men lie dying. They know that it is sweet to die for their country; but sweeter, as the old phrase has it, to "die in the kiss of God." Glazed eyes grow bright as the weary priest of God approaches. Hearts that soon will be stilled, beat faster in the moment when the Eucharistic Prince of Peace, through the ministry of His earthly messenger, comes to wipe away all tears, to soothe all sorrows, forever. And as the messenger of healing passes on in his mission of mercy, his place is taken by a gentle Sister, a daughter of the King, the sweetness of whose pure womanhood, illumined by love that is divine, will point the way to her Father's house.

On the edge of the field skulks one who will never be found where men gather, for he lacks the elemental courage needed even by a camp-follower. Made by God, let him pass for a man; in his habits, he is an unclean bird, awaiting the dissolution of the unburied dead. His is no mission countenanced by decency. Soon he will cablegram to New York, a story of nuns who gouge out the eyes of the wounded; of assassin-priests who lie in ambush for detached enemies; of monks and friars who under the cloak of a spiritual ministry, murder the dying in the camp-hospitals. Presently, the united protest of friend and foe, of Catholic and non-Catholic, is heard; perhaps published; but too late. The charge has been made. Just so much has been added to prejudice; to hatred of the Catholic Church and her ministers. Refutation is useless. Those who believe, and they are many, are incapable of grasping a refutation, even if they are willing to listen to it. This is precisely the effect intended and obtained.

Hitherto French, Belgian, German, and in our own country, Mexican priests and nuns have borne the brunt of this attack; now it is the turn of the Italian Dominicans. "Treacherous papers," it is said, were found in one of their convents, while the friars themselves are pictured as experts in the art of heliographing the enemy, by night, it would seem, as well as by day. "Throw mud; some of it is sure to stick." Picture the Church as the enemy of Christ; her children as false to God and to every human obligation. "We have found this man perverting the people and forbidding to pay tribute to Cæsar." In every army in Europe, priests and nuns are bearing more than their share of the heat and burden of the day; yet from the very outset, the vile work of this slanderous press-agent has been exploited by a certain section of the American press.

Who is financing this press-agent? What power forces these American newspapers to publish his lying witness?

Our Lost Boys

GOD be thanked, the parochial schools grow stronger day by day. Catholic activity shows itself in the erection of hospitals, refuges, orphanages, and stately churches, tabernacles of the living God. For every form of human weakness, physical or moral, we have devised a ready remedy. One class only have we neglected. What are we doing for the boys and girls who have left our schools? They are not sick, they are not paupers, technically at least they are not orphans, and as yet they are not notorious sinners. Therefore they engage the activity of no organized force among us. But many of them need help, need it badly. No longer children, yet lacking the maturity of adults, they need direction in their reading, in their work, above all, in their quest for amusement. Opportunity in abundance is offered by non-Catholic and by anti-Catholic societies, and is accepted by many, while others prefer the easy way of the street. Meanwhile, as a body, we Catholics are doing practically nothing to retain the Church's relaxing hold upon these growing boys and girls, the fathers and mothers of the coming generation. Our negligence is little short of scandalous.

No blame is here intended, or assigned. We Catholics have had a work to do in this country, a more important work, to fix the stability of the Church in America, by laying deep the foundation of the parish church and the parish school. That work has been done, nobly, heroically. It is now time to extend our activities. The sooner we realize that thousands of Catholic boys and girls are daily and nightly learning the ways of perdition on the streets and in places of public amusement, the sooner shall we be jarred into some corresponding realization of our plain duty to these young people, now wandering like sheep without a shepherd.

In New York City, the Ozanam Society, still in its infancy, is doing admirable work in establishing club houses for boys which give all the advantages held out by the non-Catholic social agencies. When this Society has become a national institution, with centers in every community, we shall have begun to fulfil our duty to our young men. An institution of this nature yields in importance only to the parish church and the parish school. Empty schoolhouses and churches sparsely-filled are the exception with us, but both may soon become common, if we are content to maintain our attitude of indifference while our young people drift away from us. The Ozanam Society has shown what earnest workers can do when wisely organized. Similar societies, established under ecclesiastical jurisdiction and lay management, would, if firmly united under a national charter, be a powerful factor in saving the next generation for God.

We have had enough theorizing. It is now time to act. AMERICA pledges all its support to the man or group of men, who will take the initiative in founding a national society to accomplish for the youth of the whole country, what the Ozanam Society is doing for the boys of New York.

Taxing Education and Charity

"AN Analysis of the Report of the State Board of Tax Commissioners" presented by Mr. William D. Guthrie before the Committee on Taxation of the New York Constitutional Convention, is a document of remarkable interest and unusual value. The Analysis contains no appeal to the emotions. Its plea for the exemption from taxation of churches, schools, hospitals, orphanages, and cemeteries, is based upon an impartial consideration of undeniable facts.

Contrary to common opinion, the amount of property now exempt, is comparatively small. In the State, the rating of this property is less than six per cent. of the total valuation of all real property (lands and buildings); in the city of Greater New York, it is less than five per cent. of the total valuation of all property. It is likewise somewhat surprising, in view of the numerous Catholic schools and hospitals, to learn that the larger exemption is enjoyed not by the Catholic, but by the Protestant institutions. Roughly speaking, Protestant institutions to the value of one hundred and fifty-eight million dollars, and Catholic institutions, assessed at ninety-eight million dollars, are exempted from taxation in the city of New York. Mr. Guthrie's main argument is that all this property "is devoted to the service of humanity and charity, without profit in any commercial sense, that they (the institutions) perform an essentially public function, and that they tend to advance the common welfare, peace and order of the community."

Confessedly there is much feeling at present against the continuance of this exemption. When not connected with religious bigotry, this feeling is based upon the false assumption that exemption means, ultimately, a higher tax-rate. Mr. Guthrie, however, shows clearly, first, that it would be a matter of some years before the State could assume the institutions now conducted by the voluntary associations, and next, that the State could not hope to maintain them with the economy characteristic of the private charity. The amount of public receipts now ceded through exemption is far less than the lowest estimate of the budget which would be required to found new institutions under State care. To refuse exemption would therefore increase, not lessen, the rate of taxation. Apart from this eminently practical consideration, to cripple the activities of charitable agencies which not only do a work which the State can not do efficiently, but exercise a salutary influence upon the entire community, would seem a decided violation of public policy.

The Last Stand

PUBLIC opinion is playing fast and loose in these uneasy days, with the ethical principles underlying the right of the State to declare war. War is not identified with murder, as the sentimentalists would have it, nor in itself is it a national blessing and a thing of glory. The State, if it has a right to exist, can not be denied just and necessary means of self-preservation. War is therefore a right, and sometimes a duty. But it is a duty not to be fulfilled, save when all other means of defense or redress have failed; a right to be held in reserve, even to the snapping-point of national honor.

As a people, our sense of honor has always been sufficiently delicate. There is no danger that by unworthy submission to unjust aggression, we shall be held the craven among the nations. But we have no illusions about war. We have had our share. For those that march forth we know that it means suffering and death, with a little, perhaps, of what the world calls glory; for war's innocent victims, the wives, mothers, children, who remain behind, dread and tears, and wounds unhealed even by the kindly ministry of time. This is a national consciousness. In these days of stress, let us not blind ourselves to our real creed. War, a right of the State, is our last, not our first means of national defense. Whoever would reverse the order, does not know what war means.

Theaters Old and New

WRONG-DOING has always had a prominent place in tragedy. Racine, Goethe, Shakespere, "Athalie," "Faust," "Macbeth" are only isolated instances, taken at random, of the universal instinct that has driven dramatists the world over, to portray sorrow as the consequence of sin. Comedy is apt to deteriorate and become demoralizing, but tragedy for the most part has exercised a distinctly beneficial influence on the life of nations. Nowhere, however, has its influence been so consciously sought and felt as in the old classic drama of the Greeks. The Athenian went through the Agora and round by the southern side of the Acropolis, and after paying his two obols climbed to his hard stone place in the Dionysiac theater, not merely as a passive participant in a religious ceremony, but in a mood much like that of a man who assists at what we call a mission.

He looked to have his soul harrowed by the spectacle of awful punishment meted out to evil; he expected nothing less than a painful purification of spirit by the spectacle of swift retribution following fast on crime; he was disappointed if he did not leave the theater, chastened and corrected and better for the lesson. The audience no less than the playwright was well aware of the cardinal principles on which the play had to be constructed. A light piece was added to ease the tension produced by the serious part of the performance; but no tragic writer might gain the prize who did not conform, and strictly, to the time-honored custom of exacting heroic penalties for colossal sins. Romance and the dropping of human tears did not fail to please, for the heart of Athens was like the heart of the world, brimming with sentiment; but the laurel wreath was reserved for the competitor who made great men sin greatly, and then had them inexorably overtaken by pitiless punishment. Whether or no the sinner might afterwards win his way through great penance to great happiness was a detail for which neither the Greek tragedian nor the Greek audience cared overmuch. Sin, heroic in its daring, and retribution not merely in the form of anguish of conscience, but in actual expiation, was their insistent theme. The Furies had to be present, if not always in person, at least in their effects.

But the Furies have ceased to be popular on the stage. Sin it is true still stalks across the boards, but it no longer trembles under the heavy hand of outraged Justice. It has grown defiant, it parades under the guise of "amiable weakness." Carefree and careless, it goes on dancing and sipping the sweets of life, and laughing at the prudes who know not joy. The present tendency of the play is to justify not condemn violations of God's law. Wrongdoing, where it is not altogether condoned, only too often is palliated and minimized. Happiness, according to some of the playwrights, not dire atonement, is the consequence of infractions of divine law. And the consequence is that the theater is falling from its high estate. It no longer furnishes a corrective of moral standards, and an antidote to the arguments of passion; it rather serves to further blind the moral sense and to inflame the human tendency to evil. Many are the unwary who are frequenting it to their own destruction. And yet we smile at the ancients and prate of progress!

I Know Just How You Feel

DO you? Then you have paid the price of sympathy. You know the difference between going through anything and experiencing it, a difference not manifestly evident to that applicant for a position as a teacher, who was asked, "Have you had any experience with children?" "Yes," replied the applicant complacently, "I have been a child." Shakespere made two stages for the acquisition of experience, its achieving and its perfecting.

> Experience is by industry achieved
> And perfected in the swift course of time.

The reason why most persons can not say, "I know just how you feel," is because they shrink from the industry necessary to gain experience and through experience sympathy. They hope to get experience as they get a gentle tan, with no activity and no subsequent pain. Thinking is always hard; reflection is commonly harder. To reflect is to look back and no one likes to look back. "Forward, forward" is the incessant impulse of curious, eager, greedy, human nature. "Forward to fresh fields and pastures new," urges the jaded and sated appetite. No one likes to look back, especially upon failures, disappointments, sorrows. Yet mistakes are the best school of experience and the most skilled makers of sympathy. A thousand dinners you live through; one attack of dyspepsia gives you experience. If you stub your toe, you will look back, you will reflect, you will compare and contrast, you will do a deal of hard thinking, you will exercise industry and achieve experience in the art of walking.

"All experience is an arch" says another wise writer. Why is it the laughter and games of childhood draw from you nothing but a deep, low, lion-like growl? Were you not once a child? Is it not because the arch of your experience displays to your reflections no larger expanse than a pin-hole does for the eye? Sloth dwarfs and narrows the arch of experience; the humiliation of failure makes the vista still smaller and when it comes to sympathy, which is altruistic experience, there is often no aperture at all open to the vision. To say "I know just how you feel," demands the disinterestedness of transferring your experience to another. When charity would take wings to itself and let the hard lessons "by industry achieved" bear their swift messages of sympathy to a suffering heart, it finds that where there ought to be an arch, there is often nothing but a solid wall. You have, no doubt, heard of a spite-fence, a barrier erected on one's property for the purpose of affording to a neighbor a somewhat limited horizon. Spite-fences are a reversal to barbarism. It is a sign of enlightenment and mutual confidence to have no fences at all. Now one reason why many do not say, "I know just how you feel," is the presence of spite-fences in the soul. If the neighbor is of another nationality, another state or city, another political party, another clique or family faction, then there are no hands across the barriers. Against those barriers, the charity which took wings in sympathy beats itself to destruction. Only one thing removes all such hindrances and that is death. There are no spite-fences around the grave-yard. The heart does not beat which will not pray over all the graves of all the dead. That heart is dead itself.

How comes it that one woman will see a single scene of poverty and devote her life to the poor; another will live in a hospital and be callous? A Damien will have such highly sensitized nerves that he feels sufferings five thousand miles away, and another will be a stone on the battlefield. Even the hard wood of the violin is said to grow mellow by harmony and to thrill with more delicate response as the time goes by. Sympathy for some is a sentimental shudder; for others it is a searing flame. There is one thing which makes all these sharp divisions and that is love. Love dissolves the stone from the heart and makes the callous hide as soft and tender as new-born flesh. Experience is the first payment you make for sympathy; you are the full owner of sympathy when you have love.

LITERATURE

The Catholic's Bookshelf

THE WORKS OF FATHER MATURIN*

ALTHOUGH it was as a preacher that Father Maturin was best known to the public, in no less a degree will he continue to be known and appreciated as a master of the spiritual life in the five books (Longmans) which comprise the sum of his literary activity. Those who knew him in life prized to the full the deep qualities of his personality, but it is evident, from the many reminiscences that have appeared since his heroic death, that he was misunderstood by a great many persons, and some of this misunderstanding has been transferred to his last and greatest book, "The Price of Unity."

Father Maturin was converted to the Faith in middle life, and the fixed habits and experiences of his earlier training had become indelibly impressed on his character and mind: as he says himself, all the more forcibly as he speaks from his own experience, "a man of forty can not begin again, and start with a clean slate." But, as time will show, his twenty-seven years in the Anglican ministry, of which he spent twenty-five as a Cowley Father, combined with the wider and fuller grasp of truth and the deeper penetration into the workings of the human soul which were his as a Catholic, give him a unique position among spiritual writers. He set before himself always to draw out that which was best in his hearers and readers. With non-Catholics he sought, after the pattern of St. Paul, so to work upon that little of the leaven of Catholic truth that was held by the individual as to draw the soul onward to the fulness of the whole of revealed truth. And to Catholics he dwelt upon the treasure of spiritual riches which is their possession, ever urging them on toward the fullest development of all their faculties for the greater glory of God.

The life of the soul is the same in all ages and under all conditions, but the journey on towards the City of God manifests itself in different ways to different temperaments: a condition which is not always clearly apparent to spiritual directors. By education and personality Father Maturin had a peculiar gift for guiding the Anglo-Saxon character along the way of the spiritual life. This, it may not be an impertinence to say, is the special characteristic of his spiritual writings. During his long ministry as a Cowley Father, in his work as director of souls among Catholic-minded Anglicans in England, South Africa and America, and later as a Catholic priest, both in this country and in England, Father Maturin had an experience with the spiritual needs of a people to whom reticence in the affairs of the soul is almost a counsel of perfection.

Nevertheless, there is a wonderful penetration and a putting aside of all that impedes an immediate application to the very root and fiber of the spiritual life, which carries its conviction of truth at once. This is very clear in two books written while Father Maturin was still an Anglican, "Practical Studies on the Parables" and "Some Principles and Practices of the Spiritual Life." In the first of these two books the writer makes a direct application of the Parables of Our Lord to the needs of the Christian soul. Beginning with the Parable of the Sower, he shows the working of grace, of natural and supernatural hindrances, and then proceeds to show the need of co-operation by the Christian who has set his face forward to walk in heavenly places. Having laid down the necessity of the effort which every Christian must make to do what is right and to keep from what is wrong, in "Some Principles and Practices of the Spiritual Life" Father Maturin expounds the positive works which lead to the attainment of holiness. They are contrition, mortification, the Christian motive or definite aim of the spiritual life, self-oblation or conformity to the will of God, prayer, recollection, correspondence to divine grace, and perseverance.

"Self-knowledge and Self-discipline" was written in 1905, after Father Maturin had become a Catholic. In this book the writer develops the Christian doctrine of mortification, under the aspect of knowledge of God and knowledge of self. Here again, Father Maturin insists upon the positive side of the spiritual life: not "thou shalt not," but "thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy might." In this positive act of loving comes the knowledge of God, and in the light of that knowledge there dawns the knowledge of self. And the picture he draws is not that of morbid negation, but the joyful giving of oneself in this service. "It is in the splendid energy of positive action that the morbid power of sin is to be overthrown." From this follows, naturally, the discipline of self as a preparation for the revelation of love.

"Laws of the Spiritual Life" is the last of Father Maturin's ascetical writings. In it he shows, both in the moral and spiritual sphere, the government of law. Throughout the variety of the lives of the Saints, the energetic zeal of St. Paul and the contemplative zeal of St. John; the humility of St. Francis contrasted with the humility of St. Ignatius Loyola, each strikingly dissimilar, yet all developed under the laws of the spiritual life: diversity bringing forth unity, and in the Beatitudes the writer finds a complete working out of these laws. Throughout the complexities of life he finds that the one law prevails for all who seek the Kingdom of Heaven. Poverty of spirit, hunger and thirst for justice, mercifulness and purity of heart, these laws are the guiding principles of that life, no matter what our worldly condition may be. "Fly from the position in which God has placed you and the duty He has given you to do, and you fail of the testing and development you can get there alone."

The last and most important work of Father Maturin and, it must be confessed, the least understood, "The Price of Unity," is addressed mainly to High Churchmen; yet not to them as such, but rather to those who stand at the parting of the ways. Not to those who are settled in their religious beliefs, but to the soul that stands wavering on the threshold of the home of truth. It is a book redolent of the spirit of Christian charity and gentleness. "I have never been able," writes Father Maturin, "to understand the attitude of mind of those who speak with bitterness, still less with ridicule, of that which once had been their religious home." However impossible he considered the claim of High Churchmen that their Church is a part of the Catholic Church, he had nothing but the kindliest memories and the greatest respect for the motives that inspired them. And in accordance with his appreciation of the tremendous matters at issue in this question of conversion, he urges others to be careful not to upset the faith of those who believe in what they have, but to develop that truth and help those who feel the instability of their position to look to where true peace and security alone may be found. It may be that the perplexities and difficulties set down in this book were the actual experiences of the writer himself; if this is so its value is beyond appraisal as a human document, the unbaring of a soul. For when conviction has been reached there is but one course to take.

*The third of a series of critical papers about books that should be in the educated Catholic's library.

> Therefore all side issues, even so grave a matter as the effect of the step he is contemplating upon the well-being of his soul, must for the moment be set aside. If a person is sure that he is convinced, sure that he can no longer honestly remain where he is, he must step forth alone, and say with Esther of old, "If I perish, I perish."

Not to the near-convert alone, but to the Catholic as well does "The Price of Unity" make its appeal. For if he who would draw near to the Vision of Unity and attain citizenship of the City set upon a Hill must know the price he will have to pay, so also does it become those who go up and down in the safe pastures of the Sheepfold to know at what a cost the wanderer gained the privileges they themselves so freely enjoy.

HENRY C. WATTS.

REVIEWS

The Christ of the Men of Art. By J. R. AITKEN. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $6.00.

It has been said that the delineation of Christ is the supreme test of artistic genius, and it is a fact that the degree in which they have met it largely classifies the rank of the great painters of the world. "The greatest and best of the men of art have been strangely drawn to Him; the spell of the Christ has been upon them, and they have given us from pencil and brush, some of our deepest thoughts of the Son of Man." Hence a book that reviews comprehensively the notable painters of all lands and ages who essayed to picture Christ in the various phases of His manifestations during His sojourn among men, must necessarily summarize, if not adequately appraise, all that is supremely great in the artistic achievements of the Christian era. Mr. Aitken's stately octavo volume of four hundred pages, including a color frontispiece and forty-eight photogravure and half-tone reproductions, comes as close to this difficult accomplishment as could be expected from a reverent and religious-minded student of wide reading and artistic temperament who is hampered by an ineradicable Protestant bias. This is surely a serious impediment in the appraisement of a department of art which is essentially Catholic in object, inspiration and authorship; for the pioneer artists of the Catacombs, the early Byzantines, the schools that grew around the churches and monasteries of Italy and Flanders and culminated in the Great Masters, the renowned painters of Spain and France and Germany who learned to spread on canvas some semblance of Divinity and "have shown us not only His hands and His feet, but His face and His heart," were all animated alike by Catholic faith, traditions and ideals.

Not only does Mr. Aitken's Protestant bias impel him to glorify Cranach, whom Luther perverted from a capable artist into an anti-papal cartoonist, to depreciate the Van Eycks and most of the Dutch and Flemish school except the Protestant Rembrandt, to include many moderns who merely robed and posed a countryman Hebraically and labeled him "Christ," and even to overestimate Dürer in the unfounded belief that that Catholic genius was a Lutheran, but, with characteristic Protestant vagueness of belief, he is not quite sure whether Christ was God or merely a man, and fancies that the Christian artists, even of the Catacombs, were in the same predicament. His occasional attempts to dissociate them from the Catholic dogmas and practices of to-day vitiate his otherwise illuminating and appreciative story of Christ in the art of the early centuries, and to some extent, in the Catholic art of the world; and a like bias appears in his sketches and citations, and in the bibliography, which though quite voluminous, excludes La Farge and most other Catholic writers on art. The reproductions are not always happy, nor as numerous as the text induces the desire of, but the text itself is comprehensive and stimulating, in excellent style, and, with the exceptions noted, generally adequate to the theme. The author's sincerity and capacity are manifest, and those who appreciate a book of this kind will less regard his limitations than the spirit which prompted the criterion: "Hearts count more than hand, and soul than touch; if the heart be not clean and the soul be not honest, the white and stainless Christ will not appear."

M. K.

America's Greatest Problem: The Negro. By R. W. SHUFELDT, M.D. Philadelphia: F. A. Davis Company. $2.50.

The Education of the Negro Prior to 1861. A History of the Education of the Colored People of the United States from the Beginning of Slavery to the Civil War. By C. G. WOODSON, Ph.D. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.00.

The Negro. By W. E. BURGHARDT DU BOIS, Ph.D. New York: Henry Holt & Co. $0.50.

Dr. Shufeldt prints, as the frontispiece of his book, a photograph of a Congo warrior and his wife attired with that disregard for the latest Parisian modes the climate of the Congo invites. The picture is typical of the contents of the volume. In spite of the fact that he signs himself "Major, Medical Corps, United States Army," the doctor approaches "America's greatest problem," not with the calm, scientific spirit of the impartial anthropological and sociological investigator he would have his readers believe him, but rather as an angry pro-slavery partisan of ante-bellum days. Entirely lacking the spiritual touch, and with a wholly carnal view, he describes the black man as an apelike monster with uncontrollable passions. Assuming that chastity depends on the physical elements in a man's composition, the doctor argues that the negro is unable to reach a white man's standard of purity. The contradiction of this hypothesis is shown in the edifying lives of thousands of Catholic negroes in Maryland and Louisiana, and the experience of hundreds of pastors in other sections of the South and all over the country.

Contact with the negro, the doctor imagines, would bring about the "complete rotting of the old Anglo-Saxon stock in this country." His remedy for this is to tell the negro we will "assist you to migrate to some other land, where you can build a civilization of your own, where your people can be made happy, prosperous and powerful, and attain a position in the world which they never can attain under Anglo-Saxon rule in America." The doctor is as inexact in his terms as he is unscientific in his method. He means "white" when he says "Anglo-Saxon," and really he ought to say Protestant, to be strictly correct in his fantastic assertions. If he would abandon such worthless authorities as the Ladies' Home Journal and the New York evening penny dreadfuls, and cite authoritative data, as Dr. Woodson and Dr. Du Bois do in their volumes, he would probably be forced to state with the latter that "the more we study the negro the more we realize that we are dealing with a normal human stock which, under reasonable conditions, has developed and will develop in the same lines as other men."

From Dr. Woodson's comprehensive testimony, gathered through a great variety of sources, he would see the proof of this, especially among the Latin races, at whom he sneers, and in the communities affected by the French Code Noir. To Catholics, to use the words of the recent report of the members of the hierarchy charged with the distribution of the funds contributed annually for work among the colored missions, the negro is not merely a problem but a fact in our life and in the life of the Church in the United States. Of this position of the Church Dr. Woodson makes frequent mention and pays admiring tribute. He cites it from "the injustice that caused the liberal-minded Jesuit, Alphonso Sandoval, to register the first protest against slavery in America," down to the end of the era that brought such a terrible culmination to the change of slavery from a patriarchal to an economic institution. In the working out of the problem of the amelioration of the colored race through that only sure means, the belief in the true Faith, substantial help may be had from Dr. Woodson's book, which shows their persistent strivings to be enlightened, and that of Dr. Du Bois, which is a short general statement and fair interpretation of the well-known facts in the history of the race. Apropos of the topic of which these three volumes treat, it is of interest to note that the first bishop of native American birth was a negro: Francis Xavier de Luna Victoria, consecrated Bishop of Panama in 1751. He was the son of a freed negro slave, a charcoal burner.

T. F. M.

Pragmatism and the Problem of the Idea. By JOHN T. DRISCOLL, S.T.L. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $1.50.

This is an excellent critical examination of certain phases of pragmatism, the philosophy of the pick and spade. The author has the rare faculty of pitching upon fundamental errors and exposing them simply and clearly. The chapters on Royce are worthy of special commendation. The criticism is keen, true and timely, for although Professor Royce's personal influence has waned considerably these last few years, yet the false ideas that he holds in common with so many others have worked havoc in the ethical and religious life of our day. Like a large number of modern thinkers, Royce tests religion by a metaphysical idealism, denies that Christ is the founder of Christianity, refuses to refer religious problems to Him for solution, and substitutes the community for God, making the former, not the latter, the origin and norm of religion. The commonwealth replaces God. This is precisely what has happened: the god of modern sociology, with its attempted secularization of charity, its contraceptives, birth control and what-not, is the State, and doctrines like Professor Royce's are accountable for this serious aberration. Father Driscoll is happy in his references. Kant, the father of modern immanence, might have been stressed a little more, and perhaps a word on Schleiermacher and Ritschl would not have been out of place. The influence of Protagoras is mentioned, but a sentence on Heraclitus, the author of Bergson's fundamental principle, would be fitting. The book makes interesting reading and is rich in suggestion for expansion and incursions into allied fields. The author has done a good work and is to be congratulated on his success.

R. H. T.

Poems of Émile Verhaeren. Translated by ALMA STRETTELL. New York: John Lane Company. $1.00.

Four volumes of Émile Verhaeren, "Les Villages Illusoires," "Les Heures Claires," "Les Apparus Dans Mes Chemins" and "La Multiple Splendeur," afford Miss Strettell splendid opportunities to display her talents as a translator and metrical artist. Even in the original, the poems are not easily mastered. They are frequently rugged to uncouthness, as obscure as certain passages of "Sordello." They defy the serenities of French verse. In theme and treatment, moreover, Victor Hugo is not more glaring in trope or color than the Belgian singer, nor Beaudelaire and Verlaine more cynically unconventional and outspoken. In these selections, however, we are not shocked by daring crudities of argument and expression. The harsher notes of a lyre frequently tingling with a cry of scepticism and sensuality have not been sounded. The translator has done her work well. The virile accents, the throbbing pulse and glow of the original have been preserved. Verhaeren has undeniable poetic gifts. His message, whatever it be, throbs with life. He trumpets it to the world with a full and brazen clangor which rouses the blood and compels a hearing. We catch in the present volume only a few bars, not the full gamut of his song. The reader is spared the Rabelaisian coarseness of "Les Flamandes," and is not harrowed by outbursts of sullen despair as, with all faith in God crumbling away, the poet staggers to the cheerless altars where Self and Nature are worshipped. The "St. George" and passages from "Les Heures Claires" cheer us even with a silvery note, decidedly welcome. They relieve the gloomy atmosphere of "Rain," "The Ferryman,' "The Grave Digger," etc. Verhaeren does not appeal to the noblest and the best of our nature. He looks down too much. Earth and the grosser things of earth loom too large on his canvas. The artist too often forgets God's unclouded heavens, the sunlight and the stars.

J. C. R.

The Curse of Adam. By P. M. NORTHCOTE, Ph.D. St. Louis: B. Herder. $0.75.

This is a good little book on a very big subject. In it are sketched with a rapid but sure touch some of the most fundamental of the mysteries of our Faith. Original sin and its consequences, Redemption and Grace, and the need of personal effort to participate in the riches of Christ's Atonement are the main topics that Father Northcote has treated. It is a book to be read by Catholics who find themselves bewildered by the present reaction against the supernatural, and may well be recommended to those who are groping their way toward the Faith but have as yet no very clear realization of the demands made on all who would take Revelation for their guide. The author has enlarged on the wounds to human nature which are enumerated in the Council of Trent, and this part of his task he has done well. His insistence, however, on the vitiation and debasement of the faculties themselves does not seem to be wise. It might have been better, if he wished to discuss the subject at all, to choose the more common and easier doctrine that the faculties themselves have not been impaired, except in so far as they have lost those preternatural and supernatural gifts which would have given the poise, harmony and control of the powers of soul and body that are now so painfully lacking. A little more care might also have been taken to explain the manner in which original sin is transmitted. To say that "the soul is contaminated with its birth-stain by the body it animates" is scarcely explicit enough. There are other places also where the author has been brief, somewhat at the expense of clearness. No treatise, however, on original sin will ever be wholly satisfactory, and it is a question of choice as to what points are most useful to develop.

J. H. F.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The June Month opens with a good paper by Father Sydney Smith on "The Kikuyu 'Statement'" recently made by the Archbishop of Canterbury. The author shows how Anglican prelates are making "difficulties in the mission field about a few questions of what they deem to be ecclesiastical order, which is, at all events, a comparatively minor matter, while at home they can condone the surrender by those whom they appoint to teach their people, of doctrines that appertain to the very root of all Christian belief." Father Pollen has another interesting chapter on Archpriest Blackwell, Father Thurston publishes some notes about certain practices observed in the Middle Ages for the relief of the departed, a timely article is made up from letters written by "French Jesuits at the Front," and there is the usual variety in the stories, verses and editorials.

Those who have read with interest Robert Dunn's vivid war letters in the New York Evening Post can find them gathered together in "Five Fronts" (Dodd, Mead, $1.25). He was with the English during their retirement from Mons, with the Austrians at Przemysl, with the Germans in Flanders and with the Russians in Bukowina. Mr. Dunn has little to say about "atrocities" but paints dark pictures of the present state of the countries the war has ravaged. He was more often near the firing line than "on" it, and of course saw only what the officers permitted him to see. While in the German trenches, this American war correspondent took two shots at the French and tries to defend the indefensible by saying that "the chance of hitting any one was about one in ten thousand," and that he was "subject to the orders and suggestions" of his hosts.

In "My Life Out of Prison" (Mitchell Kennerley, $1.50) Donald Lowrie has written a sequel to "My Life in Prison," a book that excited considerable discussion. He now tells of all the adventures he had since leaving San Quentin. He found employment at once on a San Francisco paper, then became a vaudeville "headliner," started lecturing on prison reform, and helped a number of "ex-cons" to begin all over again. The author does not believe that the State has a right to execute criminals and he holds erroneous opinions regarding the object of punishment. He pays a warm tribute to Warden McKenty's management of Eastern Penitentiary, Philadelphia, which Mr. Lowrie regards as in many respects a model prison.

"The Red Spy" (Duffy & Co., Dublin, $1.00) is a story of the eventful Land League days in Ireland by D. M. Lenihan, who has evidently been through them and is intimately acquainted with their parliamentary consequences, and also knows how to write. Whether he knows how to construct a plot of enthralling interest is not so clear, for his hero captures the heart and fortune of his American millionaire lady love more easily and rapidly than has been the wont of Irish parliamentarians, but the light he throws on the epoch-making Irish movement of the eighties is illuminating, and the story makes pleasing if not compelling reading.——H. H. Knibbs, the author of a "best seller" called "Overland Red," has now turned out another cowboy novel entitled "Sundown Slim" (Houghton, $1.35), from the name of its hero, a poetical "bo," whom the dark-eyed Anita succeeds in domesticating. Another woman in the story "goes white" in the approved British fashion and ranch slang abounds on nearly every page.

Here are three books published for German readers by the Volksvereinsverlag of M. Gladbach: In "Mütterlichkeit" (M. 1.20) Anton Heinen speaks a word of warning for the nations, lest the lessons taught by the war may all too soon be forgotten with the return of peace. His advice is directed to all those concerned in the education of girls. Woman's vocation, he holds, consists in being true under all circumstances of life to the instincts of motherhood, even though not actually a mother, and the duty of parents and of teachers is to foster these in the growing girl. It is ordinarily sufficient, he teaches, for the instructor to keep this main object in mind and indirectly to insist upon it, and to safeguard the child or pupil against all adverse influences. There is much that is wholesome and inspiring in the book, though the author does not seem to appreciate fully the work accomplished in the schools by our Catholic sisterhoods.——A study of the Monroe Doctrine by a German specialist in international law must naturally be of interest to Americans. In his latest volume, "Die Monroedoktrin" (40 Pf.), Dr. Hans Wehberg offers an amply documental historical presentation of the question. No moral judgment is passed by him. His conclusion, however, is that, while this doctrine might readily become a dangerous instrument in the hands of some other nation, Americans have accomplished, by means of it, much that is good and noble. He holds that, though serious blunders have occasionally been made and the way to imperialism at times laid open by the improper application of the Monroe Doctrine, it has been successful in preventing the American continent from becoming "the wrestling place for the jealousies of non-American Powers." Another timely volume by the same author is "Aegypten" (40 Pf.). It deals briefly with the constitution, government and economic conditions of Egypt, keeping the important international situation in the foreground. "Turkey's right, as such," he says, "still continues intact. Egypt remains a half-sovereign State, as before, even after the English declaration of a protectorate in 1914, which was merely an act of violence." Several important documents are added in an appendix, among them the Firman of 1892 and the English declaration.

Those who are contemplating a summer trip to New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward's Island, Cape Breton Island or Newfoundland would do well to take along a copy of Ruth Kedzie Wood's "The Tourist's Maritime Provinces" (Dodd, Mead, $1.25). The book's 440 pages are packed with all the information that a stranger visiting those parts of Canada could reasonably desire. Three good maps are provided and numerous illustrations. Particularly interesting is the chapter on the Miquelon Islands, France's sole possession now in North America.

"America to Japan" (Putnam, $1.25) contains a number of interesting papers, edited by Lindsay Russell and published under the auspices of the Japan Society of New York. The volume is well suited to give the reader a fair estimate of America's relations with our Pacific neighbor and, were the book widely read, there is no doubt that the lofty purpose of the Society in promoting peace and friendly relations between the two countries would be recognized.——In "Consignes de Guerre" (Paris Téqui, 3 fr. 50) Mgr. Tissier, Bishop of Chalons, has gathered together a series of instructions given by him both before and during the present war. The sermons are what may be called "occasional" and, whether in peace or war time, the bishop always shows himself the true shepherd of his flock. He takes a strong stand in defense of the liberty of the Church and religious education in France, inculcates true patriotism, and tenderly consoles those who have been most affected by the fortunes of war. Not the least touching is his New Year's letter to his beloved priests and seminarians who have been called to the defense of their country.

Father Cecil Gomez Rodeles, S.J., has published in Spanish an interesting account of the present and prospective contents of the "Monumenta Historica Societatis Jesu," that vast collection of documents bearing on the early history of the Jesuits which Father Vélez and others began to publish more than twenty years ago. From 1894 to 1901 appeared the six volumes of Father Polanco's valuable "Chronicon," containing the chief events in the Society's history up to the death of St. Ignatius in 1556. These were accompanied by four volumes of "Literæ Quadrimestres," consisting of periodical communications sent to the founder from the various houses of the Society. Five supplementary volumes of "Epistolæ Mixtæ," somewhat similar in character to the preceding, were published from 1898 to 1902 and the five volumes of the life, letters and "Spiritual Diary" of St. Francis Borgia began to appear in 1894. From 1898 to 1906 the "Epistolæ P. Hieronymi Nadal" were brought out, a critical edition of St. Francis Xavier's letters was published in 1899, and a second volume of "Scripta Varia," concerning the Apostle of the Indies is now being printed. A volume of "Monumenta Pædagogica" was published in 1902, and a book of the letters of Fathers Broet, Le Jay, Codure and Simon Rodriguez, and another containing 7,000 letters of St. Ignatius have also appeared. Add to these volumes two books of letters by Father Salmeron, a collection of James Laínez's writings and a biography of Father Bobadilla. Other volumes of "Monumenta Ignatiana," including extant matter relating to the "Spiritual Exercises," and a book of Blessed Peter Faber's literary remains are yet to be published. From the foregoing list of titles some idea may be had of what a great achievement the preparation of the "Monumenta Historica Societatis Jesu" is.

BOOKS RECEIVED

Chaminade College, Clayton, Mo.:
William Joseph Chaminade, Founder of the Society of Mary. Translated from the French of Rev. Henry Rousseau, S.M., by J. E. Garvin, S.M.

Duffield & Co., New York:
The Red Laugh. By Leonidas Andrieff. $1.00.

E. P. Dutton & Co., New York:
The Life of Paracelsus and the Substance of His Teachings. By Franz Hartmann. $2.00; The Movement Toward Catholic Reform in the Early Sixteenth Century. By George V. Jourdan. $2.50; The Laird of Glentyre. By E. M. Green. $1.25; Under Greek Skies. By Julia D. Dragoumis. $1.25; In Sunny Spain. By Katherine Lee Bates. $1.25; A Boy in Eirinn. By Padraic Colum. $1.25.

Ginn & Co., Boston:
Æsop's Fables. Edited by J. H. Stickney. $0.40; The Arabian Nights' Entertainments. Edited by Martha A. L. Lane. $0.50.

Harper & Bros., New York:
Bred of the Desert. By Marcus Horton. $1.30; The A-B-C of Good Form. By Anne Seymour. $0.50.

B. Herder, St. Louis:
Sermon Matter. By Rev. Ferreol Girardey, C.SS.R. $1.50; The Parish Hymnal. Compiled by Joseph Otten. $0.25; Luther. By Hartmann Grisar, S.J. Vol. IV. Translated by E. M. Lamond. $3.25; Als die Zeit erfüllt war. Das Evangelium des hl. Matthäus. Von Hermann J. Cladder, S.J. $1.15.

Henry Holt & Co., New York:
Home University Library: No. 95. Belgium. By R. C. K. Ensor. No. 96. A History of Philosophy. By Clement C. J. Webb. No. 97. Milton. By John Bailey. No. 98. Political Thought in England from Herbert Spencer to the Present Day. By Ernest Barker. $0.50 each.

Houghton, Mifflin Co., Boston:
The Riverside History of the United States: Vol. I. Beginnings of the American People. By Carl L. Becker. Vol. II. Union and Democracy. By Allen Johnson. Vol. III. Expansion and Conflict. By William E. Dodd. Vol. IV. The New Nation. By Frederic L. Paxson. $1.75 each; Writing an Advertisement. By S. Roland Hall. $1.00; The Untroubled Mind. By Herbert J. Hall. $0.75.

John Lane Co., New York:
Jaffery. By William J. Locke. $1.35.

Libreria Religiosa, Barcelona:
Tractatus de Christi Ecclesia. Auctore Joanne Muncunill, S.J.

Lothrop, Lee & Shepard Co., Boston:
The Sleepy-Time Stories. By Ruth O. Dyer. $1.00; The Heart of Uncle Terry. By Charles Clark Munn. $1.25; When I Was a Boy in Belgium. By Robert Jonckheere. $0.75.

The Macmillan Co., New York:
A Far Country. By Winston Churchill. $1.50; The Ideal Catholic Readers. By a Sister of St. Joseph. Primer. $0.30; First Reader. $0.30; Second Reader. $0.35.

John Murphy Co., Baltimore:
The Church in Many Lands. By Rev. J. J. Burke. $1.00.

G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York:
An Italian Dictionary. By Alfred Hoare. $12.00; Pieces of the Game. By Countess de Chambrun. $1.35; Edgar Chirrup. By Peggy Webling. $1.35; The Golden Legend: Lives of the Saints. Edited by G. V. O'Neill, S.J. $0.90; A Poet's Cabinet. Selected from the Works of George Lansing Raymond by Marion Mills Miller. $1.50.

EDUCATION

In the Matter of Spelling

IT was Huckleberry Finn who learned "to say the multiplication table up to six times seven is thirty-five,' but there he stuck. "I don't reckon I ever would get any further," he philosophized, "if I was to live forever. I don't take no stock in mathematics anyhow." Change the subject to spelling, and many among us can adopt Huck's report as a true statement of our own proficiency. We were not born to spell correctly; our horoscope presents heavenly bodies in malign conjunction; and a regard for the orthographical proprieties forces us to follow the practice of the college student reported by Professor O'Shea. "The writer will admit that his spelling is not up to standard," said this candid youth, "but when he has any literary work to do his trusty Webster is always beside him."

MOTOR-VOCAL, MOTOR-GRAPHIC AND DYNAMIC SPELLING

The pedagogy of spelling, like the art, is not simple. To revert to an early American method, Huckleberry Finn relates that "Miss Watson, a tolerable slim old maid" used to fetch her goggles, "and take a set at me with a spelling-book. She worked me middling hard for about an hour, and then the widow made her ease up." These data are somewhat scant, and the details relating to Miss Watson's physique and state of life, scarcely germane to the subject. But it would seem that Miss Watson held her unpromising pupil to be of the motor-vocal type, that is, he was a subject more readily responsive to, and retentive of, impressions first impinged upon his tympanum, than to impressions, virtually identical, received through the visual sense. Had Huckleberry been thought of the motor-graphic type, Miss Watson would have correctly put him to work, copying words from his spelling-book, and taking them subsequently from dictation. Had she asked him to write a composition, his spelling would have been termed "dynamic," and possibly his language as well. In any case she required work, a factor fairly common in the old, but not so common in the new, pedagogy. A combination of the primitive motor-vocal with the motor-graphic method, is much recommended by Provost Pepper of the University of Pennsylvania, and other authorities, who contrast the current cacography with the standards acknowledged in their boyhood days.

THEORIES

There is no lack of treatises on the pedagogy of spelling. We take a good deal of stock in the subject. Through the Psychological Review, one learned lady has given us an article "On the Analysis of the Memory Consciousness in Orthography" and the same Review has published monographs on "A Study of Lapses," and "The Relation Between Modes of Presentation and Retention." One of the best of recent general discussions is "The Child and His Spelling" by Cook and O'Shea. For the most part, however, the literature of the subject is confusing rather than helpful, both in theory and in suggested methods, and despite the renaissance of interest in spelling, or in the psychology of spelling, orthography is becoming a rare accomplishment. The college professor shudders at the atrocities committed by students fresh from the high school; the high school instructor asks sarcastically what new fad has displaced spelling in the grammar school; the grammar school teacher hints darkly, that the minds of her pupils were permanently warped during the unfortunate year passed in the first grade; and the business man, with the captain of finance, complains loudly that in the matter of spelling, the finished products of the grammar school, the high school, the college and the university, are equally absurd and impossible. Even the newspapers, and even AMERICA, occasionally exhibit traces of the common fault. Linotypers, however, are notoriously peccant in this matter.

RESULTS

An amusing account of an examination in spelling is given by Professor O'Shea. The class, taken at random, included seventy Wisconsin University freshmen, with thirty-nine seniors and thirty freshmen from a local high school. Here are a few of the maimed and mangled specimens submitted.

1. Awful, awfull, auful, awefull, auwfull, awfle, awfful, auffell, affull, offel, offul, offull.
2. Benefited, benefitted, benifited, benifitted, benifit, benefitied, benafated, benifetted, benefitting, benfitting, benfited, benififfted, binefited.
3. Sieve, seive, sive, ceive, siv, seeve, scive, siev, sceve, seieve, cib, shaney, shafe.

The same authority mentions that in a class of 237 university freshmen and sophomores, "Macaulay" was misspelled by 181. Fifty-one ways of missing the word were discovered. These varieties should furnish valuable hints and principles to our industrious committees on simplified spelling.

RULES AND THE YOUTHFUL MIND

To discuss but one aspect of this complex question, it may be suggested that too much insistence on rules has been the making of many an anarchical speller. To submit to a small, defenseless human, a rule which says that "in monosyllables and words accented on the last syllable, a final consonant after a single vowel doubles before a suffix beginning with a vowel (x, k, and y are never doubled) except when in the derivative the accent is thrown back from the last syllable of the primitive" ("The Normal Course in Spelling") is to accredit this recently-breeched creature with a mind akin to that of the Subtle Doctor.

Most confusing of all to the youthful mind, with its almost grubby insistence upon positive values, are rules which indicate what does not happen. A grammar of elementary Greek, once much in favor, contained a marvelous set of rules for the accent. The subject was opened by an excursus, dense to the point of impenetrability, upon oxytones, barytones, paroxytones, properoxytones, and some terrible things, now dimly and no doubt incorrectly recalled as paralipomenons. The author then dove to a lower depth, leaving the hapless urchins floating on the surface, to discourse upon the precise syllabic point where the accent was not found, and to tabulate a dictionary-like list of exceptions. Thus did he hit upon the admirable pedagogical expedient of presenting every phase of his subject in the light of a negative, or of an exception. Many teachers are like him, and most compilers of rules have taken him as a model. The expert psychologist, who may be depended upon to point an obvious moral once in a while, now tells us that the value of these rules is exceedingly doubtful. He can quote you figures for it too; so many freshmen shut up in a room at 80 degrees Fahrenheit, with an illustrated spelling-book; so many caged in a cellar, with a set of rules; and present his report in the most approved of modern argot.

MORE RULES

What are we going to do in this important matter? This is a question which one who has never taught spelling is admirably qualified to answer. Miss Watson's plan seems to possess many advantages, particularly when reenforced by the motor-graphic method. An old teacher, now with the Lord, used to dictate the following "Rules for Learning to Spell":

1. Look at the word; look at it hard. 2. Pronounce it. 3. Spell it aloud from the book a dozen times. 4. Write it neatly, using the book, twenty-five times. 5. Compose a sentence which contains it. 6. Repeat, repeat, repeat.

Of course this method is not infallible. But many of his pupils became excellent spellers, the pride of the country-side, competent to dispute a spelling with the schoolmaster and even with the Dictionary. P. L. B.

SOCIOLOGY

The Fatal Fondness for Food

"THIS Marchioness," ruminated Mr. Swiveller, folding his arms, and scowling fiercely, "is a very extraordinary person—surrounded by mysteries and unacquainted with the taste of beer." Obviously Mr. Swiveller was not only drunk, but fully as unacquainted with the legitimate claims of the human stomach as the Marchioness was with the taste of purl. Beer, forsooth! that is a perquisite of your plutocrat. Let the rest of us sing when we can get bread. Certainly the Marchioness had once seen a small piece of meat, two whole square inches of cold mutton, and at the bidding of Miss Sally Brass had even dined upon it; at one fell gulp, I am sorry to say. Yet it is plain that her meals were not ordered of a size to suit her stomach, for it is told that she was wont to creep out after dark for bits of biscuit and "sangwitches" left in the office, and to concoct wine from orange peelings and cold water.

TONY SPINELLI

The Marchioness lived and suffered, and finally was filled with food in the pages of great-hearted Dickens, whose lance was ever balanced to drive against cruelty. But Tony Spinelli is a very real person and he lives in New Jersey. When Wall Street is steady, Tony works eight hours a day for a corporation in which a tender-hearted philanthropic Foundation with a blanket charter, owns stock of par value of half a million dollars. In return for his best services, Tony's monthly share of the profits is about forty dollars. Tony's wife goes out to wash clothes occasionally, thereby raising the solvency of the family treasury to fifty dollars. When the bills come in at the end of the month, Tony gets out a stub pencil, and adds them up thus:

Grocer, $25.00; butcher, $10.78; baker, $8.30; coal, $2.50; clothing for self and five children, $10.00; insurance on self, $2.04; insurance on four children, $2.00. Total, $60.62. Deficit, $10.62.

Tony smokes a pipe now and then, but neither drinks nor chews. Two of his children go to church and school, but nowhere else. His wife, an industrious creature, is seen at early Mass on Sunday, but otherwise never leaves the house, except to "do" laundry work in private families. She can't do very much, because the three children at home are small enough to claim a good deal of her time. No item of rent appears in Tony's budget. Perhaps he is a "squatter" or owns a hut of his own. "I don't know what's the matter," Tony anxiously reported to an Investigating Committee, "I don't seem to get ahead. I always fall back. I couldn't pay all the bills last month."

SEVEN-CENT MEALS

The answer is easy. To begin with, Tony has availed himself of his inalienable right to marry, a shocking social crime. Then he and his family are too fond of food. For only seven persons, he allots the disproportionate sum of $44.08. How can the prodigal expect to "get ahead" when he squanders twenty-one whole cents a day on his meals? Ten dollars for clothing is a wrecking extravagance. Unless Tony can overcome his fondness for food and clothing, his only remedy is to withdraw to the woods, where clothes last a long time, and where in season, nuts and berries may be found. In the days of their abundance, Tony and his interesting family may emulate the squirrel in laying up stores for the winter.

While it is probably true that hundreds of thousands like Tony, are keeping just one jump ahead of starvation, the unanimous testimony of capitalists bears witness to the serious danger to our whole economic system, arising from excessive wages. Yet let us not lose our heads. The danger is remote; for these unselfish capitalists are keeping watch that the country take no harm. How thoroughly practical are the methods which they have adopted, is evident from the testimony given at a recent legislative hearing in Albany, by a nineteen-year-old shop girl:

> Girls getting six dollars a week and less, think it extravagant to spend fifteen cents for lunch. They spend instead, six cents for coffee and rolls. They walk miles to get to work in the morning and back home again at night. They go without lunch to pay for a new dress, and if they eat regularly, they don't get any new dresses.

Like Tony, this girl and her kind can not see the folly of investing money in food and clothing.

EXCESSIVE WAGES

Other interesting figures are given in the preliminary Report of the New York State Factory Investigating Committee for 1914: "Of fifteen thousand women and girls investigated, representing the candy, paper-box and shirt-making trades, over eight thousand get less than $6.50 a week in the busy season." Note the final phrase. A worker who gets six dollars a week, gets precisely six dollars a week, not necessarily three hundred and twelve dollars a year. Expenses continue during the slack seasons, but wages do not. In the candy trade, half the single women received less than $5.83 a week. To earn fifteen cents an hour, a hand dipper must cover 720 pieces of candy with chocolate, or one every five seconds, and the work must be done in an unsanitary room of refrigerator-like temperature. In the paper-box industry, more than ten thousand workers are employed in New York City; more than fifteen thousand throughout the State. A common rate for covering boxes with slips of paper is ten cents per hundred. If you can cover six thousand boxes in six days, your reward will be six dollars; but this will require you to maintain a daily average of two perfect boxes per minute, for a stretch of nearly nine hours. Canners receive, according to the Report, from seven to ten cents an hour. The weekly average wage for women was $4.53, but one woman who worked for ninety hours a week during the rush season, received the marvelous sum of $6.75. As to the department stores, 85 per cent. of the women in five and ten-cent stores, and 51 per cent. of the women in other stores received less than $7.00 a week.

LYING STATISTICS

Let us study two other sets of figures and we shall have done with statistics. Of a group of men and women investigated by the State Commission, the weekly wages for 13,000 were less than $5.00; for 34,000, less than $7.00; for 68,000, less than $10.00; and only 17,000 received $15.00 or more. Half the employees with a department-store experience of five years, are receiving less than $8.00 a week; and only half of those with ten years' experience are receiving a weekly wage of $10.00. In New York as elsewhere, a man's labor, or a woman's, seems to be "worth" precisely what the employer agrees to pay, and no more. Motives of human need on the one side, met by motives of human decency on the other, have, apparently, very little influence on the transaction.

The Federal Report on the Condition of Women and Child Wage Earners shows the dangerously high level which wages have reached in the cotton-mill industry. In the New England States, wages for men averaged from $5.00 to $5.59 for fifty hours' work; for women, from $6.00 to $6.99 for fifty-three hours' work. Three per cent. of the women earned less than $2.00 weekly; 25 per cent. less than $5.00; 40 per cent. less than $6.00. In the Southern States, wages for men averaged from $3.00 to $3.99 for fifty-three hours' work; for women, from $4.00 to $4.99 for fifty-four hours' work. Eleven per cent. of the women were earning less than $2.00 a week; 39 per cent. less than $4.00; 73 per cent. less than $6.00.

THE THOUGHT-CONTENT OF THE WORKER

We need not pause to point out the malign physical effects of this excessive work upon women, with its consequent furthering of race-degeneration. But it may be noted that the vast majority of these industrious persons are wondering, with Tony, why they "can't keep ahead." They forget that their retrogression is due to their own fatal weakness. The evidence is all but convincing, that if we are not to become a race of pain-racked paupers, we must teach the laboring classes to check this disastrous passion for food.

The best efforts of our trained social workers are continually being overthrown by the recurrence of this unnatural appetite. One is led to believe that the total thought-content of the average worker centers in food. "When I pay seven cents for lunch," remarked a shop-girl, "I'm extravagant." "Sometimes I just long for a good thirty-cent meal," wistfully confesses a six-dollar-a-week girl. "I get so tired of these cheap dinners that sometimes I'd rather not eat at all." "You see yourself," explains another, "the only thing left for me to economize on is food. I don't take any breakfast; experience showed me that was the easiest meal to do without." Reckless of the consequences of extravagance, a fourth shop-girl spends eight cents for breakfast on a glass of milk with a raw egg in it, and a few crackers. "It's healthy and it's inexpensive," comments the lavish creature. "Sometimes when I want a real treat, I get an orange for breakfast, but that doesn't happen often."

CAPUAN INDULGENCE

Connected with this root-passion is the inexplicable desire for clothes. "Yes, I've got clothes," complained an ungrateful working-girl, "but that's about all you can say of 'em. I don't know when I've had a dress just because I wanted it, or just because it was pretty." A young woman of twenty who is receiving $6.50 in a millinery-shop thus outlines her iniquity: "I buy my clothes with my lunches. I have coffee and rolls for breakfast, that's six cents; coffee and a sandwich for lunch, that's a dime; and a real good dinner for a quarter." Capuan indulgence, this. "But, of course, when I need clothes, it's different. Then I have one meal a day, or may be, two, until the bill is paid." The extent of this evil is brought out by the example of the foolish girl who sold her hair to buy a pair of shoes. Hair, she argued, grows; shoes do not, save in a rudimentary state upon the cow. Possibly too, she found it easier to cut her crown of glory than her scanty meals.

WHAT IS LABOR "WORTH"?

This is the era of good times and good wages. Who can doubt it after reading the reports of the Investigating Committees? Yet "underpaid, underfed, undersupplied with all that contributes to civilized life" is the description applied to whole classes of laborers by recent students of social economy. Compared with certain grades of "sweaters," Tony Spinelli, the textile worker, and the shop-girl, are highly-paid specialists. It is a question how long right order can abide in a civilization which tolerates such conditions. That a man should live by his labor is a principle vital to human society, and the society which makes this impossibile is a society maintained in violation of the natural law, a society headed for destruction. The claim to a living wage is based not upon charity, but strict justice; it is not a concession but a right. "There is a dictate of nature," wrote Leo XIII, "more imperious and more ancient than any bargain between man and man, that remuneration must be enough to support the wage-earner in reasonable and frugal comfort." Any contract which looks to less is of its nature, invalid. "If through necessity," continues the Pontiff, "or through fear of a worse evil, the workman accepts harder conditions because an employer or contractor will give him no better, he is a victim of fraud and injustice." Commenting upon "reasonable and frugal comfort," C. S. Devas, the English economist, holds that these things should be secured the worker by his wages: 1. The means of physical existence: 2. Practical possibility of marriage; 3. A separate home; 4. Insurance against sickness, old age and industrial accidents; 5. Some access to the treasures of literature, art and culture.

THE AMERICAN STANDARD

"The American standard of living," says Mr. John Mitchell, "should mean to the industrious worker, carpets, books, pictures and furniture to make the home bright, comfortable and attractive; an ample supply of clothing, suitable for winter and summer, and above all, a sufficient quantity of good wholesome, nourishing food at all times of the year." Apply this standard to Tony Spinelli and the underfed shop-girl, and see how far each falls below it. Even a brief study of the underpaid laborer, forced to give body and such soul as a life of grinding hardship has left him, to unremunerative toil, is sufficient to show the danger which threatens the very fabric of society, so long as the employer is allowed to proceed on the theory that labor is worth only what he chooses to pay and the workman agrees to accept. It is also enough to indicate why oppression of the poor is counted among the sins that cry to Heaven for vengeance.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

"He is like the Jesuit of fiction," says the London Times, "who has only one allegiance which nothing can destroy; and if he professes another, it is only so that he may better serve the former." It is to the credit of the Times that with age, it has learned the value of the saving clause. "He is like the Jesuit" would have been the plump and easy calumny of the Times in other days. The new mind of the Times is commended to the thoughtful consideration of Mr. William Dean Howells, whose recent calumnies against the Jesuits are not only offensive and hopelessly out of date, but as yet, unretracted.

Juvenile Courts and parents who supply them with cases, says the Sacred Heart Review, may be interested in Aunt Sally's method of raising boys. So well trained were they, that her mistress asked one day, "Aunt Sally, how did you raise your boys so well?" "Ah'll tell yo' Missus," answered Aunt Sally, "Ah raise 'em wif a barrel stave and Ah raise 'em frequent." There is much virtue, doubtless, in a barrel stave, all unsuspected of weakling parents, but its efficacy is not sovereign. A Chicago Juvenile Court judge holds that even if the barrel stave or its equivalent be religiously retained, it will profit little, if parents are persuaded that their whole duty is bound up in the infliction of corporal punishment. Good example and unwearying parental watchfulness are absolutely necessary in the training of a child. Neither Church nor School can do all; in fact, if parents are not what they should be, the combined efforts of both may easily be frustrated. One of the most serious faults in much modern social legislation is its tendency to shift the burden of responsibility from the parent to the community.

The New York Evening Post for June 5, contains an exceedingly interesting account of the famous Ebro Observatory at Tortosa in Spain. The astronomical observations at Tortosa are confined to the sun, photographs of which are taken on every available day. Three other departments, each in charge of a specialist, are devoted to the study of atmospheric electricity, meteorology, and terrestrial magnetism. At the request of the Government, this last-named department is engaged in the work of plotting a magnetic chart of all Spain. "Since 1910," reports the Post, "the Observatory has issued a regular monthly Bulletin, printed in two languages, Spanish and French, giving the numerical data of observations in heliophysics, meteorology and geophysics. The Observatory also publishes Iberica. What the Scientific American is for America, Cosmos for the French, and Nature for the English, Iberica is for the Spaniard. The necessity of a weekly scientific magazine, well illustrated and with up-to-date articles, was long ago felt by Spanish-speaking people, and the new periodical amply suplies this need. For the benefit of those benighted individuals who still quote White's "Warfare of Science with Theology," and who believe that the Catholic Church is irreconcilably set against the progress of all scientific knowledge, it may be remarked that this famous Observatory was founded, and is conducted, by members of that body which above all others is most hostile to enlightenment, the Society of Jesus. It will probably remain in their keeping until a revolution comes along to supply the American press with new copy, as did the Portuguese revolution, couched in high-sounding phrases, on the intellectual enslavement of the Spanish people under the domination of the Jesuits. Then after the new apostles of liberty have blown up the delicate instruments with dynamite, the ruins of the Observatory will remain, as an example in point, of the ultimate failure of all Jesuit enterprises. Thus is history made, at least in America.

The practice of the modern metropolitan daily apparently defines "news" as anything unfit, in the estimation of decent people, to print. A man or woman with a brief in favor of some shocking violation of the law of God or man, is sure to find an eager welcome from a press, which in many a convention, has proclaimed itself the guardian of public morality. A plea for vileness is, or used to be, something out of the ordinary; but even to-day, when properly garnished, it will make the crowd "sit up and take notice," and is therefore, good "news." Within the last few months, the pages of the New York newspapers, notably the Tribune, have been opened to the defense of unlimited divorce, race suicide, the I. W. W. excesses, and successive polygamy, or the trial marriage. A press of this kind is nothing less than an advocate of moral corruption. There are in every community men and women, morally weak, who find in its pages a ready justification for the aberrations to which they are inclined. Psychologists and physicians bear witness that persons of this class are strangely and powerfully influenced by a defense of wrong-doing, no matter how flimsy, when made publicly by apparently reputable persons. A more serious aspect of the matter is the baneful influence exercised upon the young. One of the most serious duties incumbent upon parents to-day is to keep these newspapers out of their homes. Perhaps this duty is even more imperative when there is question of the popular magazines. It is hard to see how the boy or girl allowed free choice in the matter of magazines and newspapers can escape moral shipwreck.

Rev. John E. Copus, S.J., founder and director of the Marquette University School of Journalism, died in Milwaukee, on June 12. Born in Guildford, England, in 1854, he was educated at Archbishop Abbot's School, and was received into the Church in 1876. He came to America that same year, and engaged in journalistic work in Ontario, and afterward in Detroit, where for some years he was commercial editor of the Detroit News. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1887. Father Copus was a frequent contributor to the magazines, was the author of "The Son of Siro," "Andros of Ephesus," with other novels, and of a number of books for boys.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XIII, No. 11
WHOLE No. 324

JUNE 26, 1915

PRICE 10 CENTS
$3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE
The War: Bulletin, June 15, p. m.-June 22, a. m. —Austro-German Successes—The Italian Campaign — Other Items. France: The Problem, Munitions—The Revival of Religion. Germany: Territorial Expansion — "Business as Usual." Great Britain: English Conservatism and the Munitions Bill—An Alleged Disorder. Ireland: Dissatisfaction with Government Policies. Mexico: Eternal Tangles 265-268

TOPICS OF INTEREST
The Young Man and the Navy—Thoughts on Heredity — Providence in Persecutions — The Folly of Eugenists—Italia Eterna.....269-275

COMMUNICATIONS
Dr. Guilday and the Magna Charta—For the Sake of Womanhood—One, not Many Clubs—Costly Educational Experiments—Funeral Offerings and Customs—Mrs. Nickleby and the Crozer Professor 275-277

EDITORIALS
"Ecclesia Anglicana Libera Sit"—Catholic Educational Convention—The Tribune and the Jesuit General—Starving Nations—Viscount Bryce and the War—Anthony Comstock—Mrs. Pankhurst in Paris—Because.. 278-281

LITERATURE
Mexico's Poet of the Home.
BOOK REVIEW: Pre-Reformation Scholars in Scotland in the XVIth Century—Alfred the Great—Some Textual Difficulties in Shakespeare—The Priesthood and Sacrifice of Our Lord Jesus Christ.. The Life of Our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, in Meditations — Memories and Milestones — Yale Yesterdays — A History of the Western Boundary of the Louisiana Purchase, 1819-1841—The Stewardship of Faith —The Protomartyr of Scotland: Father Francis of Aberdeen—The Venerable John Ogilvie, S.J.
BOOKS AND AUTHORS: The current Catholic Mind —"A Green Englishman and Other Stories of Canada" — "Rational Athletics for Boys" — "Waiting" — "France in Danger" — "Eye Witness's Narrative of the War" — "War's New Weapons"—"Reflections of a Non-Combatant"—"Alice and a Family"—"The Heart of Uncle Terry"—"Jaffrey"—"Sweet Doreen"....281-285

EDUCATION
The Woman's Education Exhibit.....285, 286

SOCIOLOGY
Catholic Women's League for Social and Civic Reform 286, 287

NOTE AND COMMENT
Authority of Courts in Family Difficulties—Seminaries in the United States for Foreign Missions—The Cost of Living—Man in the Relation to the State — Catholics and American Citizenship — Successful Catholic Orators — A Picture of the Jesuits from the Living Church—Death of Archbishop Langevin.....287, 288

CHRONICLE

The War.—Two successes, which though considerable are not of great importance, have been gained by the Allies during the week. The fighting north of Arras has been of a very severe character, and has resulted in an advance by the Allies on Souchez from three sides and in the capture of Le-Fond-de-Buval. In the Vosges, where the French have been at a standstill for many weeks, the town of Metzeral has been evacuated by the Germans who are said to have retired to within three miles of Munster, the defenses of which have already been bombarded by French guns. Near La Bassée the Germans claim to have repulsed a number of vigorous attacks by the British.

Bulletin, June 15, p. m.-June 22, a. m.

In the east there has been constant activity, with the Germans as a rule on the offensive, all along the line from the vicinity of Riga to Czernowitz. In Poland, however, especially in the Shavli district, and from the Niemen to the Rawka, there have been only artillery duels, with but little fighting by the infantry. The Germans apparently have been endeavoring to keep the Russians occupied with the defense of many points of the line in the hope of preventing reenforcements from being sent to Galicia.

Austro-German Successes

In Galicia the Austro-German armies have been very successful. The Russians who were reported last week as having been driven from Sieniawa and the river San, and consequently as having abandoned the hope of cutting the German communications with Cracow, have been again defeated and driven out of Galicia and forced to retreat beyond the river Tanew. At the same time three Teutonic armies have been moving east towards Lemberg. The Russian defense of Mosciska had retarded their advance, but with its fall early in the week, they recovered their momentum. The army operating south of the Polish border has seized the town of Rawa-Ruska and is now attacking Zolkiew and Janow. The army which was halted before Mosciska has advanced along the railroad and taken Grodek, and advanced nine miles further towards Lemberg driving the Russians from the hills with little difficulty. Still further south the Austrians have made progress along the north bank of the Dniester and have taken Kamorno. As a consequence the Austro-German lines run almost from the Polish border south to the Dniester and are menacing Lemberg at a distance of twelve miles on the northwest, nine on the east, and less than twenty on the southwest. The Russians are powerless to hold back the Austro-Germans. Lemberg, therefore, and perhaps Galicia will be evacuated in all probability in the very near future. Along the Dniester from Mikolaiow to the vicinity of Halicz the situation is practically unchanged. Further south, however, the Austrians have made great progress. Last week they were fighting from Stanislau to Kolomea and thence along the river Pruth. From this line they have forced the Russians to retire to the river Dniester. Petrograd reports that the Austrians who were invading Bessarabia have been repulsed.

In the Trentino the Italians have continued their slow advance up the Adige river and have captured the town of Mori, which is on the railroad between Riva and Rovereto. To the east of Bozen, they have crossed the frontier, taken Cortina, and occupied the Sasso di Stria peak and the Falzerago pass. In the Carnic Alps they have successfully bombarded Malborghetto. Along the Isonzo with the exception of further gains in the vicinity of Monte Nero they have accomplished nothing important. Tolmein is still holding out, and according to Vienna, all attacks aimed at Goritz especially at Plava have been repulsed. Italy claims further consolidation of positions on the east bank of the Isonzo. Having advanced south from Monfalcone to within nine miles of Triest, the Italians have been halted by vigorous Austrian resistance.

The Italian Campaign

The campaign in the Dardanelles is not making rapid progress. Except for the sinking of some transports by a British submarine, practically nothing has been reported of naval operations. Engagements on land, which have been costly to both sides have been announced, but as the names of places have been suppressed, the actual line of fighting is largely a matter of conjecture. Rumors are again active concerning the entrance of Rumania into the war on the side of the Allies, although it is generally believed that Russia's overwhelming defeat in Galicia has made such a step less likely than it was some time ago. In Greece, the protracted illness of the King is at present acting as a bar to further developments. The large majority gained by the war party in the recent elections would lead under normal conditions to the resignation of M. Gounaris and the Cabinet; and it is said that the King is almost certain, as soon as his health permits attention to public affairs, to ask M. Venezelos to form a new Cabinet. As M. Venezelos is committed to the expansion of Greece and to participation in hostilities, Greece's entrance into the war would follow naturally from his becoming the head of the Government. Reports from Athens, however, say that in all probability matters will rest as they are until Parliament meets as usual toward the end of July.

Other Items

France.—"War," General Castlenau has announced to the Government, "is now waged and must be waged, not by the shock of men, but by the shock of ammunition." The French press, together with a small but noisy section of the Opposition whose motives are not above suspicion, is now clamoring for more cannon and more ammunition, with as much insistence as Mr. Lloyd George. The need of reenforcements, however, is very real. At the outbreak of the war, the ammunition supplies for the three-inch field-guns were 1200 shells per gun, with a reserve of two hundred. Not many weeks were required to show the insufficiency of this supply. French arsenals and private factories are now producing about 170,000 shells daily; but the prodigality of the French army in ammunition almost exhausts the supply. These figures seem less exaggerated, when it is recalled that in the brief actions over a limited front near Souain in Champagne, the French fired more than 100,000 shells of large calibre. The greatly extended use of machine guns has also caused a scarcity of small arms ammunition. Fifty of these weapons firing at the rate of three hundred cartridges a minute, will use about a million every hour. The equipment of the French army, not providing for the reserve ammunition, calls for 300,000,000 cartridges.

The Problem, Munitions

Private letters written by Jesuits with the army, bear witness to the undoubted revival of religion among all classes. "Not a complaint, not a discordant note, and above all, none of those anti-religious demonstrations which were so painful in 1870," writes a chaplain in the North. "In 1870 at the sight of a soutane they would have cried out 'Les curés, sac au dos!' An enormous number have come to Confession." Retreats for the soldiers are fairly common, and more than once the soldier-priests "have brought an apostolate into villages where religion had almost died." "Mens' bodies are being horribly mutilated," writes Père Cavrois, now an airman and an officer in the English service, "but untold good is being done in their souls." One hospital chaplain reports that out of forty-five deaths within a certain period, only four were without the Sacraments, and of these four, two were German Lutherans. Many conversions have been recorded; "it is well to carry a bottle of clear water for baptisms" says a chaplain. Equally consoling are the stories of "second Communions," i. e., returns to the Sacraments for the first time since childhood. These "returns" often include officers with large numbers of their commands. These details are from Jesuit sources. What a record could be compiled from the relations of the secular clergy, of the still legally proscribed sons of Benedict, Dominic, Francis, and the other religious founders! The providence of God has drawn a blessing from the malice which inspired the anti-Catholic Military Law of 1889.

The Revival of Religion

Germany.—An editorial statement of considerable importance appears in the Frankfurter Zeitung of May 31. The question of the expansion of the Empire for the purpose of defense is certainly of very great importance; but it must be made subordinate to a question of even higher importance to Germany; "What is going to happen after the war?" It is unreasonable to believe, thinks the Zeitung, that any problem of world politics can be settled equitably or permanently, by recourse to armed force.

Territorial Expansion

Whoever sets the aims of Germany very high for the future will have to recognize that there would be little reason in a policy that sought to solve all problems of world politics by means of rifles, cannon and submarines. Gigantic as is Germany's strength against all its foes, it would nevertheless be a dangerous piece of foolishness if Germany, trusting only to its power, and without consideration of the other forces present in the world and the oppositions arising out of these, should pursue its aims as though it were alone in the world. The great statesman too, to whom present-day Germany owes its form, always aimed to apply blood and iron only so far as was absolutely necessary, and to make the fulfilment of the problems of the German people as easy as possible through his policies.

The Zeitung then proceeds to say that in so far as the annexation of foreign territory is necessary, either as a permanent military precaution or to bring Germany nearer to victory, "we must not set our hearts against it." But all conquest must be made with a clear understanding of its effect upon Germany's future foreign relations.

To make conquests merely to snatch as much territory as possible, is narrow and dangerous. It would be far more dangerous if it were to cause the solid coalition of States which have risen, up against us, and which under a policy that is at all wise will not be repeated, to keep together after the war. Certainly we do not want to rely upon good will and assurances of future friendship. That will never happen again. But neither do we wish to create relations that will necessarily and through times that can be foreseen, create for us invincible enmities.

"Business as Usual"

After ten months of war, writes a correspondent, the business of life goes on pretty much as usual in Berlin. Certainly neither famine, nor any reduction remotely approaching famine, can be seen in Germany. Recent reports, however, say that the Federal Council has declared void, all contracts calling for the delivery, after August 30, of wheat, barley, rye, oats, and crude sugar. The order indicates that these commodities are to remain under the control of the Government until the conclusion of the war. The problem of unemployment has been automatically solved, for there are now more "places" than there are men to fill them. Germany has a great reserve of useful women who are being employed to fill the posts left by the able-bodied men who have gone to the front. Many, by this time, perhaps the majority, of the tramway conductors are women; women are engaged as ticket-sellers in the subway, as elevator-attendants in the shops, and they are finding their way as clerks into the hotels and banks, and even into the munition factories. The Krupp workers now number considerably over one hundred thousand. Most of the work at present is on the manufacture of long range artillery. The production of the 42-centimetre gun, it is said, is but the prelude to the introduction in the near future of heavier guns of a far greater range.

Great Britain.—Not even the pressure of a great war can change the English national character. For good or for evil, it is conservative, and conservative it will doubtless remain, even when the penalty is national collapse. Yet it was an Irishman, Mr. John Dillon, who on the floor of Parliament voiced the national distrust of the proposal to introduce military methods into the munition factories. He did not believe, as the English people do not believe, that even the undoubted gravity of the present situation, could be invoked to justify ways and means which savored of "Prussianism." These might serve Prussia well, but England was not Prussia, and it was unwise to adopt methods which might liken her to Prussia. This speech evinces a true understanding of the temper of the English people. Jealous of the individual liberty held by them in a degree not enjoyed by other European people, Englishmen are quick to resent its abridgment, slow to subordinate it to the common welfare. They have never renounced it at the bidding of a government; on the other hand, with the danger apprehended, they have never hesitated to sink all personal differences to present an undivided front to the enemy. Yet it must be confessed that this result has been obtained, for the most part, only when the nation faced a crisis which seemed hardly distinguishable from defeat. No nation, perhaps, has been loved and served by its people with such prodigality; but a ministry bent on crimping personal liberty has never been successful. All this explains the disfavor with which the typical Englishman regards conscription and forced labor in the munition factories. A labor leader in Parliament expressed this English characteristic when he said that if the Government would let the worker know what was needed, the worker would endeavor to supply what was wanted, but the Government would get nothing by presenting a pistol at the head of the worker. Mr. Lloyd George, somewhat given to despotism, is wise in merely hinting at the "vastness of his powers"; he might have been wiser had he said nothing of them, for while his compatriots may be induced to give much, they will give but little under compulsion. At this writing the details of Mr. George's Munition Bill have not been published. According to the London Times, however, it is to be an ideal document, "based upon a volunteer scheme, imposing at the same time, upon the workingman, a restraint hitherto unknown." The Times thinks the bill will embrace the following provisions:

English Conservatism and the Munitions Bill

No compulsion; no military status; no semi-military discipline; a suspension, however, of trade-union rules which limit the employment of semi-skilled, unskilled and female labor and which restrict the output; prohibition on strikes and lock-outs. All disputes are to be settled by compulsory arbitration by three members of the existing bodies. The munitions department is to have the power to declare any munition factory a "controlled establishment," and employers' profits in such establishments are to be limited. Trade unions are to enroll volunteers from their ranks for work in "controlled establishments," wherever situated. A Munitions Court is to be set up to deal with offenses by the ordinary munitions worker, such as bad time, keeping a deliberate limit on the output, and bad work caused by drunkenness.

The Labor Unions, it is said, have declared that the Bill is a satisfactory compromise, but they will insist that any suspension of rules cease with the close of the war.

The Archbishop of York has submitted the report of the Commission appointed to investigate the matter of serious moral irregularities said to have been common in the recruiting camps during the early months of the war. The conclusion has been reached that "no evidence available justifies the belief that the conditions of war have resulted in any exceptional increase" in an evil which is not confined to England. The Commission bases its report upon inquiries made in sixty-two cities and counties. As the wild rumors set on foot by sensation-mongers are thus wholly discredited, the Commission holds that organization of Special Committees to deal with the alleged problem, is altogether unnecessary.

An Alleged Disorder

Ireland.—The declared intention of the Government to remove Ignatius O'Brien, a Home Ruler, from the Lord Chancellorship of Ireland and appoint Mr. Campbell, Sir E. Carson's chief lieutenant, in his place, has produced a marked change in the attitude of the Irish Party, nor has their hostility been softened by the alternative suggestion that another Carsonite lieutenant should be made Attorney-General. With Sir Edward Carson and F. E. Smith, the chief organizers of armed opposition to the Home Rule bill, holding guardianship of English law in the Cabinet, and another professed rebel against the law of the land controlling it in Ireland and also making the legal and official appointments which for some years were under the influence of the Irish Party, the future of Home Rule and of the Party is in jeopardy. Sveral Irish members have spoken openly against Mr. Asquith, impugning his good faith and rejoicing that they are freed from the leash that bound them to the support of measures injurious to Ireland and can now utter their real sentiments. The working of the Defence of the Realm Act seems quite in accord with the Government hostility to Irish aspiration. A large number of men in all parts of the country have been fined and imprisoned for uttering sentiments construed as unfavorable to recruiting, and a much larger number have been dismissed from Government employment or, if not employees, have been summarily ordered to leave their county or country for the same reason, but under no definite charge. Mr. J. L. Fawsitt, Secretary of the Cork Industrial Development Association, but also a prominent Irish Volunteer and Gaelic Leaguer, is one of many who were peremptorily ordered to leave the country in virtue of the Defence of the Realm Act, without charge of offence against it. While the whole force of Dublin Castle, vigorously directed by Sir Matthew Nathan, is turned to the suppression of the Irish Volunteers, who are pledged to defend Home Rule, the thirty thousand trained Carsonite recruits, who are pledged to oppose Home Rule, are still retained in Ireland. Despite the efforts of several members of the Irish Party, Nationalist recruiting has been meagre, and now that Irish members, dissatisfied with the Government's appointments, no longer advocate it, it has fallen off altogether. Meantime the Gaelic League is making unprecendented progress, and the Irish Unionist papers are complaining that its meetings are made the occasion of propagating anti-imperial ideas. The appointment of leading Ulsterites to prominent Cabinet and Castle positions has had the effect of provoking open opposition from the Irish papers whose Nationalist opinions were suppressed since the outbreak of the war.

Dissatisfaction with Government Policies

Mexico.—Affairs in this unhappy land are steadily growing worse. New complications arise daily and settlement of old difficulties is as far off as ever. The order given to Admiral Howard by our Government to land 300 marines and 300 bluejackets near Guaymas with a view to protecting from the Yaquis an American colony, some twenty miles from the coast, has aroused fresh hatred against the United States. The Villistas have "boosted" a new provisional President, Chaos, into office; the Carranzistas have begun to squabble with one another, and nothing permanent has come of President Wilson's warning to the warring factions to compose their difficulties. As noted before Carranza issued a manifesto to the Mexican people denying most of our President's allegations and bidding for recognition. Villa seems to have been more desirous of peace than the "First Chief." He sent Carranza a wire on President Wilson's declaration in substance as follows:

Eternal Tangles

AGUASCALIENTES, June 10, 1915.

General Venustiano Carranza,
Vera Cruz, Mexico:

In our opinion this declaration involves two perils, which may frustrate the ends of revolution and impair our sovereignty. First, the Cientificos, with any other group, might again enthrone themselves, with American assistance. Second, should the people not submit to this, the American Government might have recourse to armed intervention. In the face of these two imminent dangers, and without recognizing the right of the American Government to intervene in our affairs, we think that we should seek means that would permit the reunion and reorganization of the Constitutionalist Party, even though it be indispensable to make sacrifices of self-esteem. We believe also that this is what patriotism and the future welfare of our country require of us.

In such a sense, we propose to you that we take under consideration President Wilson's note, and that, if you are disposed, as we ourselves are, you advise us, so that we may discuss and agree at once upon the form and terms of procedure in the reorganization of the national constitutional Government. We have already placed ourselves in touch with the Chief of the Convention Government, as well as with the commanding General of the Army of the South.

In the hope that your action will be inspired for the good of the country, we remain, your obedient servants,

FRANCISCO VILLA,
M. DIAZ LOMBARDO,
In Charge of the Department of Foreign Affairs.

Villa also addressed a document to Washington which contained the following points: 1, he thanked Americans for their sympathy and expressed gratification that the United States claimed no right to take part in the solution of the internal difficulties of Mexico; 2, he blamed Carranza for the present muddle; 3, he denied that the safety of foreigners was not guaranteed; 4, he protested that education had been continued during the period of strife, courts established, mining laws amended, free coinage promulgated, agrarian and fishery laws put upon the basis of equity, and railroad, postal and telegraph service improved; 5, he denied any famine.

TOPICS OF INTEREST

The Young Man and the Navy*

TO the young man who is physically and mentally qualified for membership in its ranks, the navy of today offers excellent chances for improvement and advancement. Boys of from seventeen to eighteen years of age enlist until they are twenty-one, and those over eighteen for four years. While the nature of the service demands that the majority of recruits enter the navy as apprentice seamen or coal passers, special qualifications are always carefully considered by the recruiting officer, and their possessor can usually enlist in the branch where he can best use them. For instance, supposing that an applicant has had some office experience and can operate a typewriter, he may enlist in the clerical or yeoman branch and, after a course of instruction in the yeoman class, come forth in a few months, a full-fledged petty officer. In this rating a knowledge of stenography is desirable and, though not essential, leads to quick promotions.

In the same way a machinist, electrician, coppersmith, blacksmith, carpenter or plumber may enlist in the rating he is best qualified to fill, or be quickly promoted to it. Many ships carry printers, and some of the dreadnaughts have molders. Each ship has its own hospital corps, in which branch prospective pharmacists may find much valuable experience. All men in the service under twenty years of age are allowed to compete in the examinations for assistant paymaster, one of the most desirable positions in any service, from which the successful candidate may be promoted through the various grades to the position of pay director, which ranks with captain in the navy; the yeoman branch gives the best training for this examination. Yeoman may also take the examination for the recently created warrant rank of pay clerk; hospital stewards for pharmacists, and carpenters' mates, plumbers and ship fitters for carpenter; warrant officers after six years of service are given a commission and rank with ensigns.

The man who enlists as a coal passer may be promoted through the grades of fireman, first and second class oiler and water tender, to that of chief water tender, and chief machinist mate, may, upon examination, be warranted machinist, and upon the expiration of three years' service in this rank, may take the examination for a commission in the line of the navy.

So much for specialists. The average boy entering the navy, however, has his mind full of the handling of boats, the making of knots and splices and, above all, the manipulation of the heavy guns, and these, as well as signaling, come under the seaman branch. When a youngster leaves the training station to go aboard ship as an ordinary seaman, he can, by paying attention, become a seaman in a few months, from which he may be promoted to be a third class petty officer, either as coxswain, gunner's mate, or quartermaster. Assuming his age to be eighteen at the time of his enlistment, there is no reason why, by hard study and application, he can not gain a warrant as boatswain or gunner by the time he is twenty-six, and a commission as ensign when he is thirty years old.

In addition to the foregoing, by an order of the Secretary of the Navy, ten men are now selected annually from the enlisted personnel to be sent to the Naval Academy at Annapolis as midshipmen; selections are made by competitive examinations, which are confined to men under twenty-one years of age.

Apart from promotions the navy is full of opportunities for young men, and can be made the means of much physical and mental improvement. Regular hours, with plenty of sleep and rest, combined with the daily physical exercises and fresh air, make the best medicine in the world for the boy whose mother worries over his pallid cheeks and the dark rings under his eyes. Many a mother, indeed, who with fear and trembling saw her sickly or dissipated son go forth to join the navy, now freely gives her blessing to the service that in a few months, changed him into a robust, manly and sober lad.

Religion in the navy occupies pretty much the same place it does elsewhere, and religious toleration is found here in its finest and best form. The Irish-American Catholic boy works side by side with the Baptist youth of the southwest, and neither will know the creed of the other unless he happens to see him go to church. There are, of course, throughout the service small complements of Socialists and atheists, and a few who read the unspeakable Menace, but they usually learn to keep their tongues quiet. The bluejacket who has just come from the shower bath probably has in mind the letter he wishes to write home, and is not in a receptive state of mind to listen to denials of the existence of God, or to indiscriminate slanderers of innocent women, no matter what their creed.

Many ships carry chaplains, and aboard such ships divine service is held regularly on Sunday mornings, and is always attended by some. In warm weather "church is rigged" in the open air, and below decks as it grows colder. The Stars and Stripes are hung behind the altar, and the Union Jack draped over it. The "church flag," a white pennant with a blue cross, the only one ever placed over the Stars and Stripes, is hoisted on the flag staff, and the congregation kneels to worship God.

Catholic services draw a larger attendance than any other, a fact which many people fail to understand, as, although there are plenty of Catholics in the navy, they are scarcely in the majority; the reason, nevertheless, lies very close to the surface. The Protestant chaplain, kind though his intentions may be, can usually see things only from the viewpoint of a commissioned officer, and this makes far more for exclusiveness than popularity. On the other hand the Catholic priest, whose life work it is to offer sympathy to those in sorrow, and consolation to those in sin, mingles freely with the crew, encourages them to tell him of all their cares and woes, works with them, and is ever ready with a cheerful word. He is usually also a leader in hours of recreation, ready to referee a boxing bout or umpire a ball game, and above all things he is a fighter. The bluejacket likes to attend service when he knows that it is conducted by a real man.

*The thirty-fifth of a series of vocational articles.

The extensive foreign travel, that the man-o-war's man enjoys, broadens his mind and makes him a better citizen. By the time he can speak of Naples, Tokyo and Monte Video with the practised ennui that we use in speaking of New York and Chicago, he can usually see the folly of drifting in life and is determined to make something of himself. Education and temperance are the watchwords of the present-day navy. Schools have been established aboard all ships, and should a man wish to qualify for advancement in the navy, enter college, or prepare for some mercantile position or civil service appointments, the way is open to him and there is no lack of assistance or encouragement from his superiors. The day of the reckless, rollicking, drinking and hard swearing tar has gone, and nobody mourns his loss, unless it be the parasites and vampires of the underworld who preyed on him. His place is filled by the boy from Kansas or Indiana, who insists on showing that a sailor can be a scholar, a gentleman, a red-blooded man and a Christian, all at the same time. When the time comes he will show that the qualities that brought victory to his predecessor are alive and throbbing in his own heart, and that in its purer and more refined form the metal of the American sailor has lost none of its strength or elasticity. He is no saint, and has no desire to be placed on a pedestal. He is a plain unassuming young American, with all respect for proper authority and true worth but greeting snobbishness and affectation with a good, old-fashioned grin.

ROBERT CONROY.

Thoughts on Heredity*

THE mechanism of inheritance must either be physical, that is to say of the micromeristic kind or it must be non-physical, that is immaterial. This is what emerges from the discussion in the last article and, so far as science goes to-day, it must be admitted that neither of these explanations can be said to be accepted generally by men of science or proved—perhaps even capable of proof—by scientific methods. If we know little or nothing about the mechanism of inheritance can we and do we know anything about the laws under which it works or has it any laws? Or are its operations a mere chance-medley? It is hardly necessary to ask the latter question for chance-medley could not lead to regular operations, operations so regular that a court of law may act upon their evidence. Yes: we answer to the first question very lightly but without perhaps always thinking what that affirmative answer implies, a point to be considered in a moment. It may at once be said that we do now know a good deal about the laws under which inheritance works itself out and that knowledge, as most people are now aware, is due to the quiet and for a time forgotten labors of Johann Gregor Mendel, once Abbot of the Augustinian Abbey of Brünn, a prelate of that Church which loud-voiced ignoramuses are never tired of proclaiming to have been from the beginning even down to the present day the impassioned and deadly enemy of all scientific progress. Mendel saw that former workers at inheritance had been directing their attention to the tout ensemble of an individual or natural object; his idea was analytical in its nature, for he directed his attention to individual characteristics, such as stature or color or the like. And having thus directed his attention and confined his labors mainly to plants, since the study of generations of most animals is too lengthy a process for one man to carry out, he did in fact discover that there are very definite laws, capable even of numerical statement, under which inheritance acts. There is no space to explain or discuss them here: suffice it to say that there are such laws, as is now admitted by an overwhelming majority of the biologists of to-day. Mendel's facts were hidden in a somewhat obscure journal; they lay dormant, much to his annoyance, during his lifetime. Years after his death his papers were unearthed and his discoveries have been proclaimed as being as fundamental to biology as those of Newton and Dalton to other sciences.

There are then laws. That means one of two things, either that these laws arose by chance-medley or that someone enacted them. It seems impossible when one surveys the orderly operations of nature among which are those conducted under the laws known by the name of their discoverer, Mendel, it seems wholly impossible that these operations arose by chance-medley. To me, at any rate, any such explanation is wholly unthinkable. But, if it be an impossible explanation as I and many thousands, not to say millions, of other persons believe, then there is no other way out of it than that these operations must have been planned by someone, in other words that there must have been a Creator and Deviser of the world.

People hide from this explanation and one of the favorite sandbanks in which this particular kind of human ostrich hides its head is "Nature." "Nature does this," and "Nature does that," forgetting entirely the fact that "Nature" is a mere personification and means either chance-medley or a Creator according to the old dilemna. There is a very curious example of this inability or unwillingness to admit—perhaps even to understand—the force of this argument exhibited by those to whom one would suppose that it would come home with overpowering force, I mean, of course, the Mendelians.

*The last of a series of three articles.

The most learned of these and the most open-minded of men, hints in one place that though he does not think it necessary himself to believe it, yet it might at least be suggested that, if in a certain organism we find things so placed that a certain combination is bound to emerge in a certain generation, such a state of affairs might have been prearranged. Now if it was prearranged the awful fact emerges that there must have been an arranger, in other words a creative power. This explanation is taboo in certain circles. But one may reasonably ask what then? Is it really suggested that these orderly sets of occurrences may occur not once or twice only but thousands and thousands of times and this may all happen by chance? A very distant acquaintance with the mathematics of probability will show that this is a wholly untenable theory. We are generally answered by some purely verbal explanation like the personification of "Nature" already alluded to. Thus in the most recent discussion on inheritance in the last Presidential Address to the British Association, to which I have already alluded, the writer with whose explanation I have just been dealing states that he thinks it "unlikely" that the factors of inheritance are "in any simple or literal sense material particles," and proceeds thus, "I suspect rather that their properties depend on some phenomenon of arrangement." Now, in the first place, this is no explanation at all, for the mechanism of inheritance must be either material or immaterial. If there is a phenomenon of "arrangement" there must be something to be "arranged" and this something can hardly be other than material if it is to be "arranged" at all. But let that pass. What is far more important is to remember that if a thing is to be "arranged" there must be somebody to "arrange" it, for chance-medley can not "arrange" anything in an orderly manner or if it could do so once, can not be supposed capable of doing it a second time in a precisely similar manner, not to say capable of doing it countless thousands of times. Hence, though wild horses would not drag such an admission from many, we are irresistibly compelled to adopt the theory of a Creator and a Maintainer also of nature and its operations—so-called—if we are to escape from the absurdities involved in any other explanation. Thus there are very important and fundamental matters to be deduced from the very little which we know about inheritance just as there are from a hundred and one other lines of consideration related to this world and its contents. We do not know very much—it may fairly be said—we know nothing as to the vehicle of inheritance. We know a little but it is still a very little even in comparison with what we may yet come to know as the result of careful and long-continued experiment, about the laws of inheritance. What we do learn from our knowledge, such as it is, is the fact that we can give no intelligent or intelligible explanation of the facts brought before us except on the hypothesis of a Creator and Maintainer of all things.

BERTRAM C. A. WINDLE, M.D., SC.D., LL.D., F.R.S.

Providence in Persecutions

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Catholic men and women of my acquaintance have expressed wonder that such atrocities as have disgraced Mexico should have been permitted to take place. The case of those who may well be called the flower of Christ's Church is especially difficult to understand. Why did not Divine Providence intervene? An explanation of this point would be appreciated.

Hartford. WILLIAM FORBES.

TO the question thus proposed there is a twofold answer. Both philosophy and Faith have much to say on the subject. Neither the one nor the other perhaps will settle all difficulties, but each is quite sufficient to set at rest all doubts. The working of God's providence is too mysterious to be comprehended by any human mind. No one can even hope to understand fully the wonders of God's ways with men.

The philosophical answer to the question why God did not intervene to prevent the atrocities in Mexico is easier to formulate than to grasp. It simply comes to this: that such intervention was not necessary for the working out of God's plan for the universe. This much is certain, that God disposes all things, man no less than the lower creatures, so as to obtain the fixed, definite amount of glory He has in His eternal decree determined to obtain from the world. Having given man free will without making him impeccable, God had to reckon with the abuse of human liberty. His plan, therefore, including as it did, man's nature and his fall from grace, included also all the moral aberrations of all the ages, and therefore those of Mexico, not indeed as things willed by God, but positively reprobated and forbidden, and yet permitted. This permission was possible, because the divine wisdom and omnipotence enabled God to draw good out of evil, even out of moral evil of so shocking a nature as has recently disgraced Mexico. How this is accomplished one can not say. It may well be that the added intensity of the victims' love for God, and the generosity that Catholics of other nations have displayed toward the sufferers for God's sake, have gone far to make up the balance; and that what is still wanting will be supplied either by the final repentance of the evil-doers, or their glorification of divine justice by punishment in this life or the next. But no matter what may be the way in which the measure of God's glory is to be fulfilled by the Mexicans of to-day, its actual fulfilment is not a matter of doubt. That such is the case is clear from the very fact that God did not intervene.

But when all this is said, there still remains the great difficulty as to how the majesty and holiness of God can permit such sacrileges. And yet this problem is no different from the general question as to how it is possible for God to permit sin at all. The sins of Mexico are of a peculiarly harrowing kind, but the affront to God that they involve is that which is common to all sin. Why does God permit sin at all? The answer is one of the inscrutable judgments of divine wisdom. It implies a knowledge of the divine desire for the formal glory that only free agents, and therefore those capable of wrong. can give; an understanding of the harmony of the divine compassion with the divine justice; a realization of the divine power to get good out of evil, and by so doing to obtain the amount of glory that from all eternity it has been His fixed decree to obtain; and an appreciation of the wonderful simplicity of the divine act by which God can concur with the act itself, while not concurring with or approving but positively prohibiting its aberration. Before such questions it is safer and humbler to bow in silent awe, waiting the revelation of the Beatific Vision for their complete solution, hoping meanwhile for strength, if not to sound the mystery of sin, at least to keep free from its contamination.

The answer given us by revelation is more consoling. The spectacle of the oppression of the Church and the persecution of those who have devoted their lives to the divine service, is not a new one. That God should permit His friends to suffer so keenly and His work to be hampered so seriously has been a subject of wonderment since the days when the Apostles kept themselves in hiding "for fear of the Jews." And yet those who have faith, although they have found themselves perplexed, have not been taken by surprise. Even a cursory reading of the Gospels makes it plain that such must be the case. Christ, the Son of God so suffered, and "the servant is not greater than his master." Christians therefore are under no misapprehension as to what they may expect. Prospective followers of the Lord are warned, "If they have persecuted me, they will also persecute you." There is no doubt that the Sign of the Cross, which is our most familiar household practice, is not merely a comfort but an admonition to hold the soul in readiness for the coming of tribulation. Clouds are the natural setting of the Christian life. About this we have no delusions. History has only confirmed the grim reality of the Saviour's prediction.

The fact that the followers of Christ have been persecuted in the past, and must be prepared to be persecuted in the future is a commonplace of Catholic thought. From early childhood disabilities and sacrifices connected with the profession of the Faith impress the lesson on the mind; privations of many kinds, petty it may be but painful, inure the will to patience; by frequent trial the heart is trained to rejoice in being deemed worthy to suffer something for Christ; and so, gradually but surely, the Christian comes to realize the bitterness and the sweetness of that hatred of which the Master said, "Because you are not of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you." That it is so, is clear. Catholics never get far from the shadow of Calvary, they walk in a vale of tears. And all this happens, they are told, as a mark of special divine love, it is a sign of blessedness. "Blessed are they that suffer persecution for justice sake: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are ye when they shall revile you, and persecute you, and speak all that is evil against you, untruly, for my sake. Be glad and rejoice, for your reward is exceedingly great."

These words of divine wisdom are evidently verified in Mexico. The flower of the Church has suffered for justice sake. For them, undoubtedly, there is laid up a crown with the just Judge, who has treasured up every one of their sighs for its recompense. Their wrongs have been more bitter than death; to be absolutely faithful to Him into whose keeping they have given their lives has cost them dear indeed. They have been tried in the fire and not found wanting. Judged from a human standpoint they seem to have lost all, but viewed them with the eye of faith their loss appears to be gain. They have not feared those who can kill the body, and they have kept their faith and their purity unstained. Therefore they should rejoice and be glad, for their reward is exceeding great.

Why has God permitted the atrocities in Mexico? For the same reason that He has always permitted His friends to lay down their life for their Friend. Because He loves the white-robed army of martyrs and their unflinching testimony. Because He knew the temper of Mexican hearts, and found them ready and glad to give the supreme test of loyal affection. And if they did not all die for His sake, it was not because they refused, but rather because there are other martyrdoms than those which are wrought by the sword, martyrdoms, bloodless indeed, but heart-breaking. To lose all that is dear, and to live on in sorrow and want and seeming abandonment, and yet never to falter in faithfulness, never to slacken in trust, but to be steadfast and true, through all, and in spite of all, and above all: this surely is a witness no less eloquent than to give one's blood to stain the sand of the amphitheater. Will any one question that it is a great privilege for the Mexicans to be given the strength to do all this for Christ, or that untold glory must result to God from such love as theirs? The lot of the faithful and religious of Mexico is hard but glorious; painful for flesh and blood, but uplifting and ennobling for the spirit; and if it makes them sharers in the shame of the Cross, it also worketh an immense weight of eternal glory.

J. HARDING FISHER, S.J.

The Folly of the Eugenists

IT is a great danger to the State when sin becomes sanitary; it is of still greater danger when it attempts to become scientific. The last enormity is reached, as under Paganism it was reached, when sin becomes sacrosanct. It is of the very essence of Paganism before the Fall that the practices which have everywhere wrought more national havoc than a Thirty Years' War were forced upon the nation not merely as a sanitary bylaw or a scientific conclusion but as a religious cult.

Books, like the "Task of Social Hygiene," by Havelock Ellis, suggest in polysyllables that these nation-wrecking enormities have in them "the glorious freedom of a new religion." But for the moment the remnant of religion still left in the world is too alert to allow its sacred name to be set up as a sign over the shams that are being hawked in the world's streets. It is in the name of science and of sanitation that the devil is at present offering his wares. Here let me digress wisely on the devil.

A great number of us have personal reasons for believing in a personal devil. In other words, we look on it as certain that there is somewhere in the midst of things a person of great intelligence, but with a bad conscience; there are many others who look upon the devil as a useful personification; others, to whom he is a harmless metaphor. Let what I shall say of him be received by each class of thinker according to his thought.

To return to Satan. He plays two chief roles. He is a roaring lion. This is his most popular and least successful role. Any person of medium intelligence can avoid him when he hears him roar. His most successful role is that of a mild-eyed statesman and philanthropist. Milton's most astounding stroke of genius was to strip Satan of his anthropoid make-up and his roaring; and to make him a politician with a hunger for the social well-being of the other poor devils. It is whilst playing this complex and highly intelligent role of philanthropist or politician and scientific thinker that he succeeds in his chief victory not over the wicked, for these he has always with him, but over the good, for these can be capturned only by a show of good.

It is no reflection on the good intentions or the good name or even the good family of such as Mr. Ellis to suggest that they are doing the devil's own work in a most effective way. So earnestly does Satan desire the cooperation of the good, that whoever would find him in the world of to-day at his hottest, must not seek him in a hades of the damned but in some socially minded sub-committee of the self-elect.

If I, in my own insignificant name, accused such books as the "Task of Social Hygiene" of being the devil's hand-books I should be even as the thing accused. But it is in the name of the Decalogue—about which Mr. Bernard Shaw has some pretty denunciatory fireworks—that I venture to tell the truth.

There are no ends of truths in these books; just as there is no end of good drink in the poisoned posset. But a lie is all the more damnable when recommended by truth, and immorality all the more devastating when coated with ethics; as a scoundrel is all the more dangerous when bearing the testimonials of a gentleman.

Now what have we to say about this muck-heap and the man with the muck-rake? Much every way? No, very little any way; for the sufficient reason that while a Catholic paper must at times be as coarse as a major prophet, it can not be obscene. The list of ingredients in this muck-rake will be almost enough—and more than enough—for the reputation of a paper of the decent-minded.

Neo-Malthusianism. The advocacy of this makes Bradlaugh quite mid-Victorian:

> But when it became generally realized that it was possible to limit offspring without interfering with conjugal life a step of immense importance was achieved (The Task of Social Hygiene, p. 16). Nystrom believes that the time is coming when it will be considered the duty of the municipal authorities, if they have found by experience or have reason to suspect that children will be thrown upon the parish, to instruct the parents in methods of preventive conception (p. 26).

A charming function for Messieurs les Médicins and for Guardians of the Poor!

Motherhood without marriage—and divorce by mutual consent. "Why should there not be, as of old there was, a relationship which, while of less dignity than marriage and less exclusive in its demands, should yet permit a woman to enter into an honorable, open and legally recognised relationship with a man. . . . Its establishment in Sweden has apparently been satisfactory."

Now isn't that the devil? And, dear reader, are you not satisfied with Mesopotamia—I mean Sweden?

Race Suicide. I mean as a national, more than a personal, activity. The "Task of Social Hygiene" is entirely satisfied with this yearly slaughter of innocents, especially in France. It might be interesting to publish, as an appendix to the second edition, the findings of the French Parliamentary Commission of Enquiry into this falling birth-rate. Apparently France is not so enthusiastic as Mr. Ellis.

Eugenics!

Eugenic certificates—God 'a mercy on us!—are to be issued. Now, do for heaven's sake read this:

> Eugenic certificates would be issued by a suitably constituted authority to those candidates who chose to apply for them and were able to pass the necessary tests. Such certificates would imply an inquiry and examination into the ancestry of the candidate as well as into his own constitution, health, intelligence, and character. . . . Its chief distinction would be that its possession would be a kind of patent of natural nobility (pp. 202-203).

Is not that a "gem" too beautiful "to blush unseen"? Dear reader, which of these flawless pearls of humor do you fancy? What about "the suitably constituted authority"?

There are several other enormities, all rung with the solemnity of a major devil. Almost the greatest crime of the book is to quote—Shakespere! From what we know of that excellent gentleman, and of his attachment to the Ten Commandments, these social-hygiene folk would have met short shrift from the rapier of his pen.

The whole ethos of the book and others of the sort is summed up in one sentence, as all the scent of the rose is in one petal. "The superficially sympathetic man flings a coin to a beggar; the more deeply sympathetic man builds an almshouse for him; but, perhaps, the most radically sympathetic of all is the man who arranges that the beggar shall not be born." It seems almost a pity that these arrangements were lacking in the case of the writer of this book.

Many a bad book has its good points. The immoralities which this book advocates are recommended to us by the sacred names of Science and Progress. I own that I have been too often in market-places not to be uneasy at hearing them. But it is satisfactory to know that these modern and progressive views are recommended to us, in moments of truth-telling because they are pagan! Mr. Ellis also makes a telling point out of some sexual customs of the Papuans. Does Mr. Ellis not feel that he is on very unscientific ground when he calls these views modern and progressive, yet finds support from Paganism and the Papuans? He would be on a firmer footing, historically speaking, if he described them as to be as old as sin, and as intellectual as the devil.

VINCENT M'NABB, O.P.

Italia Æterna

WHEN the voice of Italy called for war, it was a cry that carried farther than to the courts of Vienna, or the council-halls of Berlin, or the willing listeners in the war-chambers of London and Paris and Petrograd. For the word that came from Rome as a signal to the Kingdom that its period of peace was about to join a Europe's yesterday, mobilized not only the uncounted thousands of Italian lovers of a national vision, but the countless thousands of American lovers of an Italy all their own. And no American has visited Italy but to love her, the most eternal thing in this mortal world.

To those who have been the guests of that southern land the news of embattled soldiery in far-flung line will revive tenderer thoughts, recollections fairer, and memories more serene. They will not hear of Italian success or Italian loss without thinking of what Italy has been for more than twenty-five hundred years. For no single word can be filled with a larger, fuller meaning than the word Italy. It means the splendor of dream and romance, it means glory golden as a sun's dawning, it means the world.

In the days of men, empires full many have stretched forth their arms, casting the mantle of purple over sea and continent, but none yet has so blended its power with its spell as to rival Rome. Republics have risen and fallen, commonwealths captained by dreamer and by sage, but none yet has equalled the thousand years of the soul of Venice. Masters of art and singers of song have lived under every sun, but can any one city claim at once a Dante and a Michelangelo, as Florence can? Souls all saintly have ever filled the winds of the world with a fair sweetness, but since the dawn-tide of Christianity what city has made the universal appeal that is Assisi's? There is but one Francis, calling to the world from the Umbrian valleys with a voice of faith and love; there is but one Michelangelo, the superman of the chisel and the brush; there is but a single Dante chanting in terza rima the three-fold mystery of the after-world; there is but one fairy Venice-isle dreaming of gallant doges and the woven wings of their argosies; there is but one hundred-heroed, eternal Rome. This is the meaning of Italy, or a little fragment of her meaning. To learn her full-flowing significance were a life's work; but it is worth a life.

You who have seen Italy with a sympathy for her mission and an insight to her fair soul must feel all this with a very peculiar appreciation. You are far away from her shores now, over here in your own homes, living your own lives in the presence of the familiar faces and the old scenes and the well-known and well-loved associations of your days. But Italy is still with you. That blessed angel Memory goes with you ever, whispering its message of sweet hours that have vanished, reviving the fragrance of roses dead. In the calm moments of a morning walk there often comes flashing into the soul the vision of the far-lands, in the silent shades of a cathedral chapel the idyls of yesterday will steal as a distraction into quiet meditations, in the surging hurly-burly of multitudes there will sometimes rise the gleam of fairyland. For you have seen Italy.

Do you not remember very lovingly that day when first you caught the outlines of the villaed hills of Naples, and came into the harbor with song before you and flowers in your path? Do you remember the moonlit bay, verily the most beautiful thing in the world? Do you remember the orange pergolas of Amalfi's convent, and the music of Sorrento, and the lonely peace of Paestum and Pompeii? And Rome, is Rome ever far from your thoughts? At any hour you can evoke the deathless dignity of the Colosseum, and the unconquered majesty of the Forum, and the living beauty of the unrivaled dome of the ages crowning the superb glory of Saint Peter's. And many a day will give you back the vision of the white-robed dweller of the Vatican raising his hand above you as he breathes the Benedicat vos.

You will see Assisi in your hour of ecstasy, and with a renewed joy will walk the roseate hills of Siena. Florence you will not forget, dear, wonderful Florence, dreaming of her Medici days beneath the hills of Fiesole. Pisa, Genoa, Bologna, they, too, will flit before your mind, and the dying glory of old Ravenna. Venice will oft times use her lamp of Aladdin, and in a flash will carry you back to the gondolas and the sunsets and the jeweled splendor of the one Saint Mark's. The Venetian towns and the cities of Lombardy will repeat their charm: Padua and Vicenza and Verona, and the myriad spires of Milan. And then Lake Como, the star-land, the flower-land, the promise of paradise. Can you forget a single hour of Italy?

The beauty of Italy and the glory of her world: you can not forget it, you can not describe it. Turn now to another of her splendors. Pass for a moment to a review of the Catholic Church that chose the Eternal City as its soul's abode, flashing forth from the old stronghold of the Cæsars the warm flame of the world's spiritual life. Count the two hundred and sixty-two pontiffs, from Peter to Benedict the Fifteenth, who have carried the colors of the Christ through the nineteen centuries. What would the world be without the lives of Leo the Great, Gregory the Great, Hildebrand? Count the martyrs that have taught the world how to die; count the saints that have taught the ages how to live. Estimate, even as faultily as you may, the civilization that has issued out from the heart of Rome and from the soul of all Italy, and the calculation is beyond your power of expression.

Scan again but a few of the names that illumine the pages that chronicle Italian learning and art: Cicero, Cæsar, Sallust, Livy, Virgil, Horace, Ovid, Juvenal, the Plinys, Quintilian, Marcus Aurelius, Boethius, Gregory the Great, Thomas of Aquin, Dante, Petrarch, Ariosto, Tasso; Giotto, Fra Angelico, Botticelli, Perugino, Giovanni Bellini, Raphael, Leonardo da Vinci, Titian, Correggio, Veronese, Tintoretto; Niccola Pisano, Ghiberti, Luca della Robbia, Donatello, Brunelleschi, Alberti, Bramante, Michelangelo; Palestrina, Rossini, Verdi. But you could count the names forever. Italy's roster of eminence is safely supreme. Proud she might be, and haughty, and scornful of the stranger within her gates, the barbarian from the uttermost parts of the earth. But her heart is too large for that, her soul is too finely attuned to the harmonies of life. And she opens the gates of her every city, and the doors of every palace and temple, and bids you feel that what she has is also yours. Is it a wonder that acquaintance becomes friendship, and friendship a vow of fealty to the end? "Your gods shall be my gods" you have told her, and the pledging is true for aye.

You have seen Italy. You have seen her bloom in glory like a flower of the world's first spring; you have seen her living canvases breathing with recreated souls; you have seen her cathedral naves filled with the dream processions of centuries passed away; you have felt the enchantment of her hills and plains; you have caught the spell of her lagooned isles; you have watched the sun sink goldenly into her blue lakes; you have heard the soft voice of her seas chanting its threnody of eternal tears. You have found roses, you have found song, you have found silence, the great, eloquent, soulful silence of Italy. The dawn-light breaking over the edge of the eastern world has given you the faith of the ages, the prismatic colors of eve have taught you a hope eternal, and in the peaceful night a fair love has streamed upon you from the summer stars, the flame-tipped arrows of God's own care.

And yet you do not understand the whole of Italy; death will greet you ere you fathom Rome alone. For Italy is not a mere land bounded by sea and Alpine height, she is not a mere geographical division on Europe's soil, she is not a mere country with ever so complex a history. From the historian's grasp she slips into the ken of the psychologist, and there she rests, responsive indeed, ever answering, but inexhaustible like the eternal soul she is. Italy is—Italy. But discover little as you may of her secret, you have even so found many things. You know that if ever you seek a balm for a desire denied, if ever you ask a love for a love unloved, if ever you would exchange a shadow for a sunbeam, a tear for a laugh, a pain for a joy, a withered heart for a soul untorn, your search will end in Italy; if you seek wisdom, all wisdom lies here; if you seek beauty, here you will find it waiting; if you seek truth, the path will lead you to the Italian land.

But it is war-time now; and perhaps those dream cities of the far-away will see fighting men where roses grew; perhaps the peace and calm of medieval streets will give way to battle cry and tumult; it may be that the Angelus bells in a hundred wondrous temples will be silenced in the roar of the sunset cannonade; and reveries of the days that have been are futile indeed in the face of shot and shell. But the conflict will not last forever; the throbbing life of this too full day will abate, the chant of war will yield to peace-song, and the truce of God will once again bind the nations of the earth. And then the lands across the seas will call to you once more, call for your comings with all the tongues of a new-morn tranquility, with the welcome of the days of old. Yet, if you are kin with the men and women whom the years have seen in the wanderland, you can turn away from every singing voice save one; you can say nay to every appealing rhythmic tone save one; but when that one song, the song of Italy, calls from across the seas of the world, you will obey the summons, even as a soldier answers the trumpet note, or a child its mother's word. For you will see her, fair Italy, clearly as you did in the yesterday, with her arms outstretched and a smile on her fresh young face; and she will be waiting for you, and longing for you, and loving you. And so, with her song in your heart, and her wondrous face forever in your vision, you will seek again her greeting and bask once more in the summer gladness of the good Italian days.

JOSEPH FRANCIS WICKHAM, M.A.

COMMUNICATIONS

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

Dr. Guilday and the Magna Charta

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In the Catholic Mind for June 8 there is an article by Dr. Guilday on the Magna Charta, which is referred to with approval in AMERICA for June 12, to which, as a lawyer trained in the school and the traditions of the Common Law of England, I wish to dissent, and especially to the passage on page 299, in which he says that:

> To the nation at large, it has but little value. The commercial classes and the common people received only indirectly the benefit of its clauses, for the reader will not find there the idea of taxation by the consent of the nation. Trial by jury for the common man is not one of its remedies, nor can the origin of representative government by Parliament be traced to its sentences. The habeas corpus is a later work of English statemanship.

In this opinion Dr. Guilday differs from all the lawyers of England and America, among whom it is only necessary to name Coke, Blackstone, Hallam and our own Sharswood, all noted for their learning and knowledge of the law. If there were nothing else in the Charter than the well-known clause: "No freeman shall be seized or imprisoned or dispossessed or outlawed or in any way destroyed, nor will we condemn him, nor will we commit him to prison, except by the legal judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land," the English-speaking peoples of the world would be indebted to the document for the civil liberty they enjoy. "The judgment of his peers" does not refer to a jury of each man's peers? "The law of the land" as Lord Coke says, means "due process of law." Arbitrary power frequently tried, sometimes successfully, to disregard these provisions, but always had to come back to them.

But the great benefit of this clause of the Charter was that it firmly established as a principle of the English judicial system the right of every man to a writ of habeas corpus. This is distinctly stated by Hallam in his "Constitutional History of England," Chap. 8, Part 2. And hence it is that lettres de cachet or similar processes never existed in England; an attempt at something similar was tried by the secretary's warrants against the infamous Wilkes, but were immediately held to be illegal. Further Lord Coke says that this clause prohibited torture, as a part of judicial procedure.

Dr. Guilday also says "the origin of representative government by Parliament can not be traced to its sentences." I beg leave to differ. The twelfth, thirteenth and fourteenth clauses of the Charter distinctly say that no "scutages or aids," i.e., taxes, shall be assessed except "by the Common Council of our Kingdom." The Doctor also says that the "commercial classes" are only indirectly benefited. On the contrary the Charter says that merchants may freely come and go, even beyond the Kingdom. In conclusion: in preference to Dr. Guilday's opinion I prefer to accept the unanimous judgment of the sages of the law, some of whom were almost contemporaries of the Great Charter, and it is a maxim of the law: Contemporanea expositio est optima et fortissima in lege.

Philadelphia. H. H.

For the Sake of Womanhood

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Will you allow me, as a mother, to express my heartfelt thanks in the name of womanhood and motherhood, to Father Blakely and Dr. Ryan for the splendid stand they took in the articles published in AMERICA for June 5. The evil they are combating so forcibly is one of the most appalling that menaces the world to-day, so shocking in fact that it ranks with infanticide and the divorce problem that is undermining the moral life of the nation. The articles can not but do much to prevent the spread of poisonous influences among Catholics, and it is to be regretted that they can not be given a wide circulation among Protestants as well. To think that a woman should act as secretary for a league that is doing its utmost to turn women from the observance of God's law! Catholic women at least, realizing as they do how low she and many others are trying to bring the standard of womanhood, should make every effort to keep it high, in the name and for the sake of that mother who long ago gave to a sinful world its Divine Redeemer, her Beloved Son.

Windsor, Vt. F. A. S. EVARTS.

One, not Many Clubs

To the Editor of AMERICA:

As many of your readers may already know, and as more of your Baltimore readers should know, the work of the Ozanam Association is being carried on in this city under the auspices of the St. Vincent De Paul Society. In the Settlement House here, considering our limitations we are doing fairly good work, but we are hampered by lack of funds and lack of cooperation. Cordial, heartfelt support of the work is wofully wanting. Here as elsewhere, diversification of effort and decentralization of endeavor stand in the way of a great good. The strength of unity is made apparent by the enforced contemplation of the weakness of division. Getting down to facts, I ask, what are we to do with the boy, or rather what are we to do for him? Locally Ozanam House has little to offer and the boy naturally seeks places where material advantages are greater and more alluring. There are, of course, exceptions, and it was one of the exceptions that roused me to write this in the hope, if it can be done in no other way, that either in Baltimore or elsewhere some other "certain rich man" might see and read and be moved to provide for our Catholic boys the things they long for; for which there is so great and pressing a need.

The exception is in his way quite an athlete, a fine one indeed considering his tremendous lack of advantage, and not a great many days ago he was talking about a Marathon race in which he had been entered as the representative of the St. J—— Athletic Association. He spoke longingly, wistfully and it was almost pitiful to realize the void in his life, a void that will soon, please God, be filled.

> Why, he said, why is it we Catholic boys have no place like the Y. M. C. A.? Why is it that Protestants have them and we have not? Why haven't we one institution where all the boys can go? Just think, here we have the Lyceum and the Athletic Association; four or five squares down the street in St. J—— parish there are four clubs; six squares up town there is that new one in St. A——; and then there is another in St. K——, and another in St. I——, and another in the C—— and another in St. P—— and another in S——. There are clubs in almost every parish. Why don't they all get together and have ONE good one. Not one of them is half so well equipped as the Y. M. C. A. Not one has a swimming pool, nor a "gym" that is really good. Why don't they spend the money on one place and have something worth while?

That was neither the time nor the place to explain that parish lines and parish traditions do more to prevent the erection of the really good place than any other influence or all other influences working together. The idea of keeping boys near home may be all well and good in some ways, but it does seem better to have a really good place away from home, for instance in the next parish, where all Catholic boys could go. Under the present scheme the home place is only half equipped, is not frequented by the boys. Parish lyceums which have for their object the encouragement of social intercourse between Catholic boys and girls are in a different class. They are in their way literary and dramatic societies, but once in a while boys want to be by themselves, and a parish lyceum is no place for basketball, or soccer, or the modified club life offered lavishly to our boys by those not of the fold. The boy who spoke to me actually hungered for such an institution; he longed for a place where he could go and find the things offered him in a building erected at a cost approximating $350,000, but he did not go. He yearned for those things, and he stayed away. Why? Because the men who ran the big building and its activities denied him a square deal and shut him out from full membership because and only because of his religion, and he was a man, every inch of him. But why, Catholic men, should that boy and others like him be called on to make the sacrifice, why should he have to be contented with second-rate gymnasiums, with poorly furnished and dimly lighted reading rooms, why should he read yesterday's paper and last month's magazine? With a little effort, and a slight yielding, we Catholics could do our duty and give our boys what they want, and what they need.

There is plenty of material and there should be ample support, but in the work parish lines must be forgotten, and all must join in united effort in the common cause of the Catholic boy. If for good reasons it is deemed inadvisable to close the parish club, and unify and centralize and crystallize the work, then must we look to the "certain rich man," who in the goodness of his heart and in the fullness of his love for the boys will give from his plenitude of this world's goods, and provide what it sometimes seems certain of our officials do not even want, albeit they loudly declaim against the inroads that are being made among our boys and young men, albeit they continually decry the chief cause of these deplorable conditions. When such an institution is established, it must be encouraged and furthered, not by word only, but actively and by deed, and to that end our pastors must lend their active efforts. It matters little whether or not as a consequence of the growth of what will eventually supplant the Y. M. C. A. in the hearts and minds of our boys, the parish club should fall. There may be a present loss, but it will be for the permanent and enduring good of the whole Church.

Weakness lies in disunion, and the strength of unity, which is the mainstay of the Church, should likewise be the mainstay of our efforts to hold in line those who will be the Church of the future, on whom reliance for the years to come must be placed. The boys who fall away or are seduced are obviously those most in need of moral influence and religious support; to draw them to that support and influence the counter attraction must be strong. In the consolidation of efforts for the boys lies the hope that the unity of Catholic action will herald the triumph of to-morrow.

Baltimore. MARK O. STRIVER, JR.

Costly Educational Experiments

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It has occurred to me that the Catholic Educational Convention might profitably devote some time to the consideration of certain educational experiments, which have made themselves unmistakably felt in secular schools and have already begun to affect our own schools. That the State in this country will follow the enlightened policy of England and Germany and grant subsidies to religious schools does not seem to be likely in any near future; that the grant if received would make up for the loss of liberty which would follow, is a debatable question. What then must Catholics do in the face of increasing budgets for the schools? They can oppose and should oppose costly experimentations. They should keep education democratic by simplifying and extending the facilities for elementary education. Specialized high schools and, above all, colleges supported by the State should be prevented by all possible means. Such schools are very costly; they are for a comparatively few; they are not for the poor because their children must labor. All this makes such schools for a special class and not for the whole people.

The number of elementary schools is not keeping pace with the increase of population. That fact should stop all experiments with older pupils and even with the very young until all who ought to have an education get the education they ought to have. Even elementary education must be watched. There are several tendencies cooperating to lengthen the grades below high school. In all education there is a continual shifting of the burdens of the higher grades upon the lower, there is an increasing complexity in the subjects taught and an insatiable demand for more time, finally there is the tendency in all schools to keep their pupils as long as possible. For these and other reasons pupils who once reached high school at eleven or twelve now do not arrive there until sixteen or seventeen. Our Catholic schools are following suit and so the large burden already upon our people is increased. In order to fill up the years thus added to elementary education either entirely new subjects or subjects hitherto proper to the high school are now taught in the last years of the grade schools. Can not the Catholic Educational Convention help us to take a stand against all this?

New York. D. F. P.

Funeral Offerings and Customs

To the Editor of AMERICA:

To one at least of your readers, much interested in the reform of our funeral offerings and customs, the statement, in the issue of June 12, by Joseph A. McNamee, that it was a nun in the "Convent of Mercy, Killarney, who first suggested, two years ago, that the pagan custom of using flowers at funerals should be discouraged," is a decided surprise. If the writer will refer to his file of AMERICA, page 40, in the issue of April 19, 1913, he will find an editorial that begins:

> We are pleased to note that the movement for the discontinuance at funerals of the presentation of flowers and wreaths, which are useless alike to the living and the dead and the substitution therefor of spiritual offerings is becoming widespread.

This was written more than two years ago, and in a place nearer home than Killarney. The writer of the editorial does not claim the idea as original, but he draws attention to the admirable custom in vogue among the Irish colonists in Argentina of having a novena of Masses, and Gregorian Masses, offered up for the dead, quoting several recently-published death notices to show how the idea was reduced to practice. The editorial continues:

> A long line of carriages will not speed the departed soul from Purgatory. . . . A long line of Rosaries would be more effective and one Mass is of more worth than the costliest of caskets. Poor and rich, according to their means, will better serve the souls of the dead and solace their own hearts by copying the Catholic example of the men of Argentina and refusing to associate worldly and unchristian customs with the sacred solemnities of death.

I know that in more than one of the dioceses of the West the sending of Mass memorial cards has been in vogue for several years. In Connecticut, and perhaps other New England States, there used to be a custom of taking the name-plate off the coffin before it was lowered into the grave. This sad memorial was then framed and hung up in the "company room," to proclaim like Ophelia's rosemary, "that's for remembrance."

New Haven. DE PROFUNDIS.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In a recent communication in AMERICA, it was stated that the first suggestion of discouraging the use of flowers at funerals came from a certain Sister Benedict some two years ago. It will interest your readers to know that the late Philip A. Kemper, a Catholic publisher of Dayton, Ohio, made the same suggestion at least twenty years ago. Even the detail of sending cards on which was noted the number of Masses friends intended to have offered for the soul of the deceased was included in the plan he advised.

Jersey City. A. F. BONDER.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Ignorance of liturgical propriety is perhaps excusable in a layman, though I doubt it, but when a priest goes so far as to quote a eulogium of Simon the high priest in defence of the pretty but wholly unliturgical custom of covering up the coffins of the holy dead with flowers, the average lay Catholic may well wonder what we are coming to.

"A Priest" need only have looked at the woodcuts in his Breviary and Missal to see that the hearse of the departed is always covered with the funeral pall, which is its proper covering. The profusion of flowers is a product of modern Protestantism, which having lost all belief in prayers for the dead, does its best to allay the harrowed feelings of the mourners. The funeral pall of the old Catholic days symbolized the waiting of the holy dead until the resurrection, the departure of the spirit and the leaving behind of that which had been the temple of the Holy Ghost. The presence of flowers does not symbolize this; at best they are a kind of salve to the sorrows of the mourners, and, as "A Priest" says, more often than not are a greater source of profit to the florist's business than to the holy souls.

Boston. WILLIAM PARR.

Mrs. Nickleby and the Crozer Professor

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I can not agree with "Relegatus" that "the 'Mrs. Nickleby and the Crozer Professor' article, in which Henry C. Vedder is taken to task by John Wiltbye, has done immeasurable harm to the cause it essayed to champion." His conclusion is the less admissible because in proof of it, he makes the statement that "the American mind has been trained to deal fairly with the irrelevant and that most of our fellow-citizens are quite ready to see the distinction between what is accidental and what is essential in matters of faith." In my opinion the American mind is ready to do so in everything else except matters of faith and religion. This is not a distinctive trait merely of the American mind, but of most minds outside the true Church of God. If this were not the case, there would be more of the essentials of Apostolic Christianity in the sects of to-day, and less satisfaction in mere accidentals. This is not my opinion only, but it is the opinion of many men who have spent their lives in religious instruction. Most men use more common sense in buying shoes than they do in choosing their religious beliefs or admitting accidentals or essentials in matters of faith.

Necedah, Wis. INQUIRER.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, JUNE 26, 1915

Entered as second-class matter, April 15, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Contributions for the Mexican fund may be sent direct to AMERICA.

"Ecclesia Anglicana Libera Sit"

THE first clause of the Magna Charta has during the past two weeks received much attention at the hands of Anglican apologists in support of their theory that the Church of England in 1215 was as independent of Rome as is its namesake in 1915. The contention is based on the opening words of the Charter which run: "The English Church [Church of England] shall be free, and shall hold its rights entire and its liberties unimpaired." To appreciate the passage rightly it is necessary to understand just exactly what is to be meant by Ecclesia Anglicana, and what by libera sit; to do this we must know what the thirteenth century framers of the Charter meant, not what twentieth century apologists read into it in the light of after events.

Ecclesia Anglicana, the English Church, meant nothing more than the Catholic Church in the two Provinces of Canterbury and York in which was included the kingdom of Wales. It was a geographic or national definition, and covered within its terms the personæ ecclesiæ or ecclesiastics from the Archbishop of Canterbury down to the most insignificant cleric who had just received the tonsure, and no others. For the laity as such were not included within the scope of this clause of the Charter.

The Ecclesia Anglicana, or, as the term denotes, the clergy, were to be free, and this is to be understood as touching the immunities of the Church in the two Provinces mentioned: it had no reference whatever to independence of Rome; actually it accentuated dependence upon Rome. It touched upon matters between the king and the clergy, the question of scutage, or payment of sums of money by prelates as vassals of the Crown as provision for a specified number of fighting men in the king's army, and it concerned the free election by chapters to bishoprics and benefices, without interference by the iniquitous congé d'élire, whereby the king was able to take the nomination into his own hands and thus nullify the right of election that was inherent in the chapters. The Great Charter did not make or claim to make the English Church independent of Rome; the confirmation of appointments to prelacies was in the hands of the Pope until the Act of Annates passed in 1532, regulated the appointment of bishops, by ordering that the king should issue a congé d'élire to the chapter of a vacant see, together with a "letter missive" compelling the choice of his nominee. The English Church had always had its national assemblies, just as the Council of Maynooth and the Plenary Council of Baltimore were national assemblies; but the national life of the Church neither then, nor now, meant independence of Rome, though supporters of the Anglican theory profess to see in later opposition to papal taxations a revolt against the authority of the Pope, or in Cardinal Stephen Langton's opposition to a political document of Innocent III a declaration of independence on the part of the English Church. (See Catholic Mind Vol. XIII, No. 11.)

The body known as the Church of England which claims continuity with Ecclesia Anglicana is not free. Its bishops are appointed by the royal congé d'élire; they must do homage for their spiritualities and temporalities which they receive from the king's hand; its clergy on ordination have to take the Oath of Allegiance, and its liturgy and official body of doctrines may receive neither revision nor addition except by Act of Parliament: and the same Parliament knows it, not as Ecclesia Anglicana, but as the "Protestant Reformed Religion as by Law Established." Thus is it wholly independent of Rome.

Catholic Educational Convention

DURING the last days of June the Catholic Educational Convention will hold its twelfth annual meeting at St. Paul. Every endeavor has been made to ensure a large and profitable gathering. We hope it will be highly successful. Though we would not prove prophets of ill, we can not but feel, judging at least from past experience, that the Convention is likely to receive far less attention than it deserves from the general Catholic educational public. It has long been a matter for remark and regret that Catholics as a body have shown very little interest in the various educational congresses that of late years have exercised a decided influence on our national and sectional ideal and practice. Except when invited to play a prominent part at such gatherings, Catholic educators as a rule have been conspicuous by their absence. That Catholic names have appeared on but few of the numerous committees that have had a nationwide prominence, is not only a reflection on our status in the world of letters, but has been a distinct loss to the country. Catholic thought could not but have had a beneficial effect on the deliberations of the men and women who, in spite of evident sincerity, were often groping their way in the dark. If we were not represented, the reason was simply that we had shown no interest in the general discussion of educational problems.

The same apathy has been noted with regard to exclusively Catholic conventions. They are not well enough attended. For years past every effort has been made by those in charge to make the meetings interesting and instructive. Papers have been read on subjects of vital importance by acknowledged masters, and ample opportunity has been provided for discussion. Gradually the field has been broadened, until to-day there is scarcely a department of school and college work that the convention does not consider. And yet no one can go from the non-Catholic conventions to our own without sighing, if not blushing, for the comparison. Something is wrong. The fault does not lie with the officials. At whose door is it to be laid?

The "Tribune" and the Jesuit General

"SHOULD the General of the Jesuits," explains the New York Tribune, "commit any act contrary to the laws of Switzerland, he could be expelled." This wise statement has all the objective truth of the multiplication table. "It is understood," continues the Tribune, following the lead of its foreign correspondent, "that the General has received a hint that he will be requested to leave, should he become concerned in any religious or political propaganda." This statement, too, may be news, but it is more. It is an insinuation that the General of the Jesuits will behave himself only upon the reception of governmental hints, enforced by governmental surveillance. The insinuation is justified, of course, by the open fact that for years the General of the Jesuits has been a notorious law-breaker in many European countries.

"Should the editor of the New York Tribune," explains the Berlin Tagesblatt, "commit any act contrary to the laws of Germany, he could be expelled. It is understood that the editor has received a hint that he will be requested to leave, should he become concerned in any religious or political propaganda." This paragraph was never used to mark the temporary stay of the editor of the Tribune in Berlin. But the first statement is certainly true, and the second might be. The unhappy editor, in the event of its publication, could enter no protest against either charge. But he might justly object to the insinuation.

Starving Nations

MISERY is supreme in a great part of the world. War, famine and pestilence are doing a deadly work, and nations are driven to a bitter and untimely end, in tears and despair. From Mexico and Poland especially rise the cries of the aged, and women and children, like a wail from the dying in the night. Gripping hunger is upon them and they lift their gaunt, white faces to heaven calling upon the God of pity to send them death, the angel of peace. The old are moaning their lives away; they are starving and there is no bread to break for them, and the lands are filled with weeping Rachels, whose children are not. The crucifixion of nations is enacted before our eyes and a million aye ten and more million people are crying to us from their crosses of pain: "We hunger and thirst!" This is a supreme hour for us, a day of grace in which to show Christ that the seed of His doctrine has not fallen upon stony hearts, but upon rich soil whence springs the divine flower of charity, the true test of a Christian.

The cry of Poland, Mexico and Belgium should constitute a special appeal to Catholics: for whatever may be said of the classes of these countries, the masses are Catholic. They have been true to the Faith; they have been guiltless of the crimes which precipitated this awful war by which an outraged God has delivered nations to their own counsels. They have not denied the Master, these simple folk. They have not flouted His standard, nor mocked His divinity, nor scorned His precepts. They labored in peace for their bread, and as they sang their song of content, war clouds formed of godlessness, broke over their heads and rained down upon them cruel and crushing misery. And now through no fault of their own, they are hungry unto death, and Christ has said, Whosoever shall give you to drink a cup of cold water in My name, because you belong to Me: amen I say to you, he shall not lose his reward.

Viscount Bryce and the War

VISCOUNT BRYCE has put his finger on an open sore. Viewing the "Great War" from a religious standpoint in the Laymen's Bulletin, a new London publication, he points to the lack of religion in the nations now at arms and asks the pertinent question, "If there had been a higher standard of Christian thought and action among ourselves and elsewhere in Christendom could these things have happened?" National life is but the reflection of the life of the individual, and in the body politic the strength or weakness of each member makes for the soundness or puniness of the whole. Christian principles have not molded international policies in these days of vaunted progress, for the men who have dictated these policies have left God out of the counting. How could they do otherwise? Their private lives and social relations were guided by man-made moral codes, and when they met in the council hall of nations they could not slough off their work-a-day principles and draw up an international policy framed on the Gospel code.

Viscount Bryce has sensed the disease. Religion has been divorced from national life, for it has been a stranger in the homes of the individuals that go to make up the nation. He also points to the right cure, the only cure, the Gospel of Christ. It has been the strongest moral force in history when men have not neglected or perverted its precepts. "It is the strongest moral force because it appeals to all men, not to those only who are fit to receive learning and philosophy. Further it has been and is strong because it appeals to the noblest and deepest parts of human nature." What are we to do about it? The Gospel must be applied to the facts of individual every-day life. "One must begin with one's own soul, denying each passion." Perfectly true. The Catholic Church has preached this to the rulers of nations and to the man in the street, year in and year out for twenty centuries. But the nations would not hearken. They knew more than the Church. Will the blood-lesson of the present day make them pause and heed?

Anthony Comstock

MR. ANTHONY COMSTOCK is said to be marked for destruction. For Mr. Comstock this is no new experience. Similar prophecies have been made of him a dozen times these last ten years. But Mr. Comstock survives to tell the public what he thinks of neo-Malthusians and similar foul birds, and, what perhaps is of greater consequence, to send one to jail occasionally.

Short-sighted, Mr. Comstock's methods may appear at times, even self-frustrating. This is only saying that like many a brave man and upright man, he is not infallible. But for forty years, despite the sneers of the "broad-minded," the blackjacks of thugs, and the amused indifference of the multitude, Mr Comstock has stood for the stern repression of public indecency. He has done more than adopt an attitude. Fire, acid, and prison-bars have been his useful helpers. Yet he is not a mere destroyer. In his many activities on behalf of neglected and ill-used children, and particularly in his insistence upon the sanctity of the home, and the necessity of religious education he has shown true constructive ability.

No doubt, Mr. Comstock's impartial energies are at times, "destructive of art." He will not admit for instance, that a back-room photographer, working with an eye on the police, is a Fra Angelico in his influence upon art; he does not think that ill-spelt pornography should be shelved with Aeschylus and Dante. On the contrary, he destroys the product and jails the producer. His malign influence is also felt by "business," the devil's business, proscribed, for instance, by the Mann Act and Section 1142, of the New York Penal Code. It is high time that Mr. Comstock be put in durance vile. Literature, business, art and the devil are unanimous in this opinion.

Mrs. Pankhurst in Paris

THE Maid of France was an excellent cook, as cooks were reckoned in those simple days. She was also skilled in farm work and the care of flocks; and such a mistress of spinning as to declare her willingness to compete in this useful art with any damsel in Rouen. Her voice was soft and low, "like a flute"; an excellent thing in a woman; "and when she spoke," declares a rough old soldier, "all her words raised a feeling of holiness in my heart." She avoids much or noisy company," writes the courtier de Boulainvilliers to the Duke of Milan, "and she speaks very little." The sentry often saw her on her knees far into the night; every morning when possible, she heard Mass and received Our Lord into her heart. She dearly loved little children, and at the head of her army, her gentle heart was often oppressed with homesickness. "Would that it pleased God my Creator," she said, "that I might leave my army and go back to my father and mother, and help them by taking care of their flocks with my brother and sister. How glad they would be to see me! But I am doing that which my Lord gave me to do." This saintly girl, the most womanly of women, moved through a rude camp like an angel of light, for on her heart, as on her banneret, she bore the device of her Crucified Saviour, with the legend, "Jhesus, Maria." '

Fresh from her triumph of assaulting bovine "bobbies," accosting irritable Prime Ministers, and attacking pillar-boxes with acid, Mrs. Emmeline Pankhurst leads a pilgrimage through the streets of Paris to adorn a statue of Joan of Arc with wreathes. This is a notable change of heart. Hitherto no contrast more striking than Blessed Joan and Mrs. Pankhurst could have been devised. The "votes for women" movement assumes a new aspect. Woman will lose nothing of the great gifts God has given her, when like Joan of Arc, she takes her place in public life in obedience to a divine call, and with the saving names of Jesus and Mary graven deep upon her heart.

Because!

IT is a venerable witticism, antedating the latest discovery of the earliest remains of man, that a woman's reason is "because." This revered and ancient remark has furnished countless occasions for cheap merriment on the part of shallow males since Mr. Pithecanthropus Erectus laid himself away for our scientific discussions. The laugher fails to note that his own philosophy is shallower than that which excites his laughter. When a woman says "because" in answer to your question "why," is it absence of all reason as Mr. Pith etc., thought, or may it not be the presence of various reasons, that has driven her to that last trench, "because," before the persistent attacks of your "why"?

"Because" may be a check to insistent curiosity; it may be the delicate shrinking of a timid reserve; it may be a jealous guarding of sacred personalities; most of all, it may be the hopeless acknowledgment of a vast and complicated assemblage of motives which baffle analysis and defy expression. If one may be speechless from having nothing to say; one may be speechless from awe, from bewilderment, from having too much to say. The most generous and chivalrous conclusion to draw from the brevity of a woman's "because" is not poverty or paucity of ideas but abundant richness of sympathy and instinct. While many a profoundly philosophic man is tracing his laborious way through a jungle of reasoning, a woman has winged her victorious flight to a successful conclusion, which is adequately voiced in the triumphant but mysterious "because."

Indeed your "because" is fraught with momentous consequences for time and for eternity. "Because" may be the herald of your principles of conduct or your motive of action. That word, like the magic formula in the fairy story, may throw open to view the hidden depths of character. Herod we know, "because of them that were at table he would not displease the daughter of Herodias." John whom Herod beheaded, we know, "because he must increase and I must decrease." Magdalen took her place among the saints "because she loved much." Joseph rose to loftier heights of sanctity "because he was a just man," and ruled himself accordingly. The principle, the motive, you choose to act upon, is more yours than your flesh and blood, your distinctive carriage, your looks or even your finger prints. These last may all be inherited or at all events you had little to do with the making of them. But that "because" which you finally and deliberately elect to act upon, is the product of your liberty, your free self, not simply flesh of your flesh, but soul of your soul, an output of your character and index to its nature. You know now why that good man made the answer he did when he was taxed with performing a certain onerous work solely for the reason that he knew a good drink would solace him in his labors. Pausing to differentiate his motives conscientiously, he denied the charge. "No, I did not do my hard work because of the drink," he stoutly maintained, "but all the same let me just impress it upon you that I wouldn't do it without the drink, either," he frankly added.

You may not be able to discriminate with such nicety as that, or through self-deception you may be keeping uppermost a display of respectable motives to prevent a guilty conscience from ascertaining whether the fruit below is as ripe and rosy as that on top. You feel, what is most true, that it is better to have right principles and wrong actions than wrong principles with right actions. A wrong act passes; a wrong principle persists. Men in all ages have been guilty of base actions, but it was wrong principles which have been responsible for Mahometanism and Mormonism. A robber may blow up a building; an Anarchist would blow up civilization and not be ashamed. Why did Christ love sinners and hate the world? Sinners had been guilty of wrong acts; they had not, like the world, surrendered themselves to false principles. On the day of General Judgment "because" will be the final arbiter of all mankind. "Amen I say to you, because you did it to one of these my least brethren, you did it unto Me."

LITERATURE

Mexico's Poet of the Home

THIS has been called the Poetical Age of Mexico. The nation seems to find its best literary expression in verse, much of which takes the form of war songs. The student who looks on Mexico from within sees singing poets marching before the warring armies and he reads in it things incomprehensible to the modern mind. The best-known and best-loved poet of Mexico is Juan de Dios Peza, the poet of the home, the Longfellow of Mexico. Unlike many other contemporaneous writers, he finds his themes in domestic life, many of his best-known poems being addressed to his own children. It is difficult to find a Mexican who will not smile affectionately at the name of Juan de Dios Peza and be able to quote a few lines from him. In humble, palm-thatched huts one sees on the shelf which holds the household treasures a gilt-bound copy of Peza, a bright-colored vase and a picture of the Virgin of Guadalupe. In time of peace it was a common thing to see a public reader in the shelter of a friendly doorway reading Peza to an interested audience of sandaled peons crouched around him, who gladly paid one or two of their hard-earned centavos for the privilege.

Peza was born in Mexico, on June 29, 1852. His companions relate that he wrote verse from early childhood. Endowed with a remarkable memory, he completed his primary studies and entered the National Preparatory School at the age of fifteen. Here he had the rare good fortune to have as instructors some of the most scholarly men Mexico has produced, and to have such associates among his fellow-students as Manuel Acuña and others. He owes more, however, to the fostering care of the headmaster, that philosopher and thinker, Ignacio Ramirez, than to any other. While he was still a mere lad Ramirez encouraged him to publish a small volume of poems to which Ramirez himself wrote the prologue. In it he says: "Hold fast, my young friend, to that which lifts you above all rivals when describing beauty, when lamenting a sorrow which has left invisible scars, or when draining from the chalice of memory the last drops of love."

Juan de Dios Peza is not only the first poet of Mexico, but he has the distinction of having introduced Mexican literature to Europe. He was sent to Spain in 1878, as the second secretary of the legation. Here his merits were recognized, he became associated with a coterie of the most scholarly young men of that period, and was much sought after in society. He was frequently called on to recite selections from Mexican writers in the most brilliant salôns of Madrid. Returning to Mexico, Peza devoted himself entirely to literary pursuits, producing in quick succession three plays, and a volume of poems. A well-known Mexican writer says of Peza: "He has made a white and perfumed nest where little children flutter for comfort." Among the best known of Peza's short poems are: "Bebe," "The Cross by the Road,' and "The First Step." Here is a translation of the latter poem:

Up and down to-day in the corridor,
And laughing aloud in glee,
You made your first steps, daughter mine,
Alone in the world and free.

Impatient already from that first flight,
Eager and daring and strong,
You struggle to run away from the care
That has held you safe so long.

Soon, soon you will forget the guiding hand
Where your baby fingers curled,

And the listening love that at your call
Would cross the width of the world.

We are happy to-day for that first step,
And yet a sigh I borrow,
For the unknown ways where your feet must go
To-morrow and to-morrow.

The American who is eager to understand the Mexican's national character would do well to read our neighbor's favorite poets and novelists. Peza is an excellent author to begin with. ELIZABETH CHANDLER HENDRIX.

REVIEWS

Pre-Reformation Scholars in Scotland in the XVIth Century: Their Writings and Public Services. By W. FORBES LEITH, S.J. Glasgow: James MacLehose & Sons. Six shillings.

To say that Father Leith has lifted the reproach of the Church in Scotland during the pre-Reformation period would be an impertinence: the reproach, such as it is, consists in a tradition of falsehood and scandal, at first deliberate, then eventually accepted as literal fact for want of better acquaintance with the truth. The writer of this book has chosen to occupy himself with a period of some sixty years, roughly from 1500 to 1560, when, if the intellectual life of Catholic Scotland had sunk to such a state of degradation as to give countenance to the dawn of the blessed Gospel light and godly learning which the Protestant Reformation is claimed to have ushered in, it would undeniably have been apparent. As the facts show, there is no evidence at all for the Protestant supposition. The Introduction, which gives in a general way the sum of the labors of Scottish churchmen, might suffice ordinarily to refute the accusation of intellectual decadence. But a bibliography of pre-Reformation writers, listing some sixty-seven names, presents a concise record of the literary activities of the Scottish clergy and some of their scholars on the eve of the Reformation. The titles of their works are given in full and the present location to which these works have been traced. The short biographical note appended to each writer gives an added value to the bibliography. Among these learned Scotsmen we find more than one Jesuit. A considerable number of the works tabulated are scattered in various libraries and museums of Europe, but many have been published under the auspices of different Text Societies.

If the light of learning had almost flickered out in Scotland, as we are told, how does it happen that during a period of twenty-two years, from 1513 to 1535, to be exact, more than eleven hundred Scottish churchmen proceeded to the degree of Master of Arts? This too in a day when there were no short cuts to scholarship! In many instances, as in the case of Father James Gordon, S.J., who died in Paris in 1621, the tradition of sound learning was carried on well over the Reformation period, and looking backward from 1603 to 1517 the University of Paris was ruled by no fewer than twelve Scottish Rectors. Enough has been shown to indicate the scope of Father Leith's work as an important factor in the better understanding of the actual condition of scholarship in Catholic Scotland during the sixteenth century, and as a valuable contribution to the history of the Church in that country. Several fine illustrations give an added interest to the volume, which, apart from its ecclesiastical character, forms an interesting chapter in the history of Scottish literature. H. C. W.

Alfred the Great. By BEATRICE ADELAIDE LEES. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

Miss Lees—we presume "Miss" is her proper designation—believes in "keeping up with the advance of historical and literary research." Without respect for anything but documents, she will not, for all that, let one of these pass without testing it thoroughly, like the Princess Ida, "in her own grand way." Take, for instance her discussion of the place and date of Alfred's birth. She begins with the "little town of Wantage," where, "as a modern statue in the market-square records, 'Alfred the Great, the West-Saxon King,' was born, 'A. D. 849.'" Then follows the testing:

> The only contemporary evidence for this accepted tradition is the opening of Asser's Life of Alfred, which has been copied by later chroniclers: In the year of our Lord's Incarnation 849, Alfred, King of the Anglo-Saxons was born in the royal 'vill' [villa regia] called Wanating, in the district called Berrvescire [Berkshire], which district is so called from the Berroc wood, where the box-tree grows most abundantly.

A purist might object that a statue can not be said to record an event which happened a thousand years before its erection; and a very mediocre historian knows that there is no tradition regarding Alfred's birth. There is Asser's categorical statement, and nothing else. But this is so clear and Asser's competency so evident, that one would think there were nothing more to be said. Not so Miss Lees, who comments on it thus: "Isolated as is this mention of Alfred's birthplace, there is no reason to doubt its truth." Of course not. Asser knew what he was saying. The author devotes considerable space to telling us how wrong we are on many points. For instance, Alfred did not learn to read out of the Psalter at his mother's knee, he did not penetrate Guthrum's camp disguised as a harper, he was not crowned in Rome, he did not pay Peter's Pence or send alms to the Indies, he was no blind papist, he did not die in 900, while as for the story of the cakes, it contains this glaring inconsistency that Alfred's host is now a swineherd, now a neatherd! The book is nicely padded out to about 500 pages with surveys of the state of Europe and of England before Alfred's day, a comparative view of Mohammedanism and Christianity, and digressions to a description of the Northmen's ships and their raids on France and in the Mediterranean. To conclude, the author was once tutor in Somerville College, Oxford, and seems anything but a Christian in the strict sense of the term.

H. W.

Some Textual Difficulties in Shakespeare. By CHARLES D. STEWART. New Haven: Yale University Press. $1.35.

This work is interesting in its chosen field, quite suggestive, and much of it sane and sound criticism. Upwards of fifty passages that have been bones of contention for editors are here examined. A good number of the lines are from plays of importance, and have long challenged the critics' cunning. The author wrests at the pen-point a meaning from the puzzling words: generally a sensible meaning often a convincing one, and the book emphasizes a new angle of attack. The author's first assumption is "the words as they stand are Shakespere's." Light is wanted? Seek it in Shakespere, in the context, in other plays, in his process of thought and in the drama's aim. But suppose the passage baffles us still? On the punctuation of the First Folio which is at times naive, if not weird, editors have always felt free to experiment, so Mr. Stewart, pepper-box in hand, does so too and, presto! there is more light.

When a hobby does good work there is a temptation to ride it hard. The discussion, for example, of the important "Macbeth" passage "Jump the life to come" seems to land him in the ditch. Bank and shoal may be different ideas, yet by "This bank and shoal of time" is surely meant but one thing, for the words do not conflict in sense. Also "The life to come" is plainly the life beyond the grave, despite the author's gratuitous denial. There is earlier reference to such a thought in Macbeth's remark about the witches, in Banquo's warning and in Lady Macbeth's appraisal of her husband. The attractive conceit about the banks and shoals has really gotten the bit between its teeth and run away with its rider. The discussion of the "As You Like It" passage on page 147, moreover, is confused in its philosophy, and inaccurate in its definition of terms. Of some at least of these solutions we shall look to see notice taken in future editions of the plays. A. P. M.

The Priesthood and Sacrifice of Our Lord Jesus Christ. By J. GRIMAL, S.M. Translated by M. J. KEYES, S.M. Philadelphia: John Joseph McVey. $1.75.

The Life of Our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, in Meditations. By MAURICE MESCHLER, S.J. Translated by Sister MARY MARGARET, O.S.B. Second Revised Edition. Two Volumes. $4.25.

The first of these valuable ascetical works is a translation of the third French edition of Pére Grimal's book, and the other two volumes, which were translated into English six years ago, have now been brought into conformity with the seventh and latest German edition of Father Meschler's best book. "The Priesthood and Sacrifice of Our Lord Jesus Christ" is written chiefly for priests and seminarians. Sacerdos est alter Christus is the keynote of the work. Under the general heads, Preparation, Realization, Heavenly Consummation and Eucharistic Prolongation the author proves from history, scripture and theology the eternal priesthood of Our Lord and holds Him before the reader as the source and model of priestly holiness. There is a gratifying scarcity of exclamation points in the book, and its practical lessons are not too lofty for use in this workaday world.

The most important alteration in the new edition of Father Meschler's work is his change of view regarding the question whether Judas retired from the Supper Room before or after receiving Holy Communion. The author now holds, with most commentators, that the wretched Apostle did not add a sacrilegious Communion to his other crimes. A short sketch of Father Meschler's career is also given. The volumes are more attractively made up than formerly, and the capable translator now has a name of her own. There are no meditation books on Our Lord's life superior to this one, for it is full of solid learning, its asceticism is taught by a holy and experienced director of souls, and the practical applications that abound make the volume a work of great value to priests who have sermons to write. W. D.

Memories and Milestones. By JOHN JAY CHAPMAN. New York: Moffat, Yard & Co. $1.25.

In his preface the author writes: "It is a good sign when young men keep journals and old men take to publishing reminiscences. It helps the general atmosphere of thought and enriches everyone a little. A belief in this kind of literary conversation must be my excuse for publishing the ensuing volume." If the reader does not subscribe to the same view, we can not promise him many hours of recreation or enjoyment in perusing this volume of essays. The appreciations of William James, Horace Furness, Henry Chapman, Mr. Brimmer, Mrs. Whitman, Charles Eliot Norton, Charles W. Eliot, Maria Weston Chapman, Julia Ward Howe and Alfred Collins will doubtless be welcomed by their immediate friends, but the volume will scarcely interest the general reader. And in order to interpret aright what would otherwise seem to be an excess of hero-worship, it will be well to bear in mind that, in many instances, the writer is merely recording the impressions left on him during his college-days at Harvard. Here and there, when he writes with the maturity born of age and experience, he reveals keen powers of analysis. A case in point is his estimate of Charles W. Eliot. Mr. Chapman believes that Eliot is neither a thinker nor an artist; he has not the point of view of a cultivated man, nor has he reverence for cultivation per se. He was merely a financier. As president of Harvard, his principle was: "Size first; the rest will follow." His elective system was a corollary of this axiom. His administration at Harvard was a splendid financial success, and to this he owes his ascendancy, even over those who were his peers in moral force, and intellectually his superiors. The paper on "Greek as a Pleasure" is suggestive, especially to teachers who are tempted to treat a Greek text as a mere peg on which to hang technical grammar, philology, history, mythology, etc., to the utter neglect of literary appreciation. Though many of the pages of "Memories and Milestones" do not rise above mediocrity, at times the author shows remarkable ability as a stylist. D. J. C.

Yale Yesterdays. By the late CLARENCE DEMING. Edited by Members of His Family. With a Foreword by HENRY WALCOTT FARNAM. New Haven: Yale University Press. $2.25.

This interesting book is made up of thirty papers originally contributed to the Yale Alumni Weekly by the late editor of the New Haven Morning News. It is the college of some fifty years ago that for the most part is the setting of this capable journalist's reminiscences. He records and describes the beginnings and progress of such venerable institutions as the "Fence," the "Wooden Spoon," the rows between "Town and Gown" and the 'Burial of Euclid." "Chapel," the author avers, was reckoned by most of the students "an arch foe and a weapon of discipline rather than a spiritual agency." Therefore the art of enjoying surreptitious naps was widely cultivated, and the monotony of the Calvinistic services was broken on one occasion by introducing a dog into the chapel and on another by setting free there a squawking rooster. Mr. Deming also relates with what glee the Yale boys drew up their coat collars and shivered when an out-of-town parson delivered a florid apostrophe to balmy spring one April Sunday while a blustering snowstorm was beating against the windows. Obviously the chapel was not considered a particularly sacred place. Of the numerous pranks the author recalls, perhaps the most ingenious was the effective silencing of the college bell by inverting it and filling it with water one cold winter's night. "Yale Yesterdays" contains entertaining recollections of old worthies like Professors Newton, Hadley and Loomis, Dr. Field, Ik Marvel and E. B. Mason, and there are twenty excellent illustrations in the book. W. D.

A History of the Western Boundary of the Louisiana Purchase, 1819-1841. By THOMAS W. MARSHALL. Berkeley: University of California Press. $1.75.

This is the first comprehensive study of the negotiation of the western boundary of the Louisiana Purchase viewed in its entirety. As the author confines himself to the topics immediately bearing on the policy of the United States Government, he has not dealt with the boundary question during the Spanish-French régime. The field covered extends from the treaty of 1819 to the survey of the Sabine line in 1841. The author acknowledges his indebtedness to those who in recent years have dealt with the diplomatic history of our southwestern frontier, yet he has by no means followed the beaten track of accepted theory. In the moot question of the reason of Wilkinson's betrayal of Burr, Mr. Marshall is of the opinion that Wilkinson while stationed on the western frontier sold his services to the Government of Spain. Nor does the author agree with the common theory of American historians that the claims to Texas were given up in exchange for Florida. He holds that the purchase of Florida was decided upon as early as 1818, and it was the Oregon territory that was the price of our waiving Texan claims. He unhesitatingly differs, too, from the opinion of many American historians regarding the sincerity of Andrew Jackson in relation to Texas. There are thirty good maps in the book, among them a large guide map, and one of the Pinchardo Boundary Commission hitherto unpublished. All who are interested in this chapter of American history will find Mr. Marshall's volume well worth their study. G. C. T.

The Stewardship of Faith. By KIRSOPP LAKE. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.50.

Dr. Kirsopp Lake, while Professor of the University of Leiden, did some excellent work on the subject of the New Testament text. He is not so scientific as Professor of Early Christian Literature in Harvard University. The present work is based on lectures given at the Lowell Institute in 1913. Dr. Lake's explanation of his title shows how far removed he is from our Catholic ideas, for faith is Luther's trust in Christ, and all Christians are stewards of faith in that they express their trust in Christ in one way or another. And so, "The Stewardship of Faith" is the multiform and manifold expression of the trust in Christ down the centuries. To the Catholic theologian faith is not trust at all, but an act of reason—the acceptance of a truth solely on the authority of God revealing. Dr. Lake makes profession of profound esteem for Catholic theology and has made some effort to understand it. This effort has been hindered by his use of Modernistic writers. These lectures show that one more Protestant professor of ecclesiastical science has gone hopelessly wrong in the way of Modernism. Religion is made to be a life and not a thing at a stand-still. Quite so; but religion is a life by its dynamic activity of grace in the soul, not by a process of evolution of doctrine. So far as its doctrines are concerned, the religion of Christ is one and never changing. The Church of Christ has no right to change His teaching to suit the changing times. The command was given for all times to teach the same set of doctrines—even to the end of the world. "Teach ye all nations . . . teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you. And, lo, I am with you all days, even to the consummation of the world" (Matt. xxviii, 20.). No Catholics, let us hope, attended the Lowell lectures of this Harvard professor who purposes utterly to destroy the Christianity of Jesus Christ. W. F. D.

The Protomartyr of Scotland: Father Francis of Aberdeen. By MATTHEW A. POWER, S. J. St. Louis: B. Herder. $0.45.

The Venerable John Ogilivie, S.J. A Sketch of His Life. By DANIEL CONWAY. London: Sands & Co. 6d.

The late religious history of England, Scotland and Ireland is a striking illustration of the aphorism that: "The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the Church." In Ireland, despite unheard-of efforts to root out the Faith, the people are still Catholic. In England the long and glorious line of martyrs heartened many a family to cling to Catholicism, either by flight to the Continent or by braving the fines and forfeitures at home and the countless disabilities of recusants. In Scotland the martyrs might be counted on one hand, with a finger or two left over, but the country at large was submerged in a deluge of Calvinism. The first of Scotland's martyrs is Father Francis, a Trinitarian Friar in Aberdeen. Almost nothing but the fact of his martyrdom is known. He was the victim of a mob's fury, was stabbed several times and his body cast into the flames of his burning church. The Venerable John Ogilvie, S.J., Scotland's last martyr, is better known, as he was formerly tried and executed for the Faith in Glasgow. Even before his trial he was subjected to the torture of loss of sleep for eight nights and nine successive days. Three hours intervened between his trial and execution. Father Francis died in 1559 and Father Ogilvie in 1614. These little books are useful biographies of the martyrs. P. J. D.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The promoters of the birth-control movement have of late been supplying the periodical and daily press with so many specious defenses of immoral practices that the contents of the Catholic Mind for June 22 should be a corrective for the wicked propaganda. Father Tierney's paper on "The Church and the Sex Problem," which opens the number, explains the only kind of sex hygiene that Catholics will tolerate being taught in the schools; then follows Father Blakely's well-reasoned attack on "Conscious Birth Restriction"; Dr. Ryan in an "Open Letter" approaches the same subject from another angle, and in the concluding paper Dr. O'Malley frankly expresses his opinion of "The Committee on Birth Control." This number of the Catholic Mind will prove of special value to clergymen, teachers, publicists and social workers.

S. Macnaughton's "A Green Englishman and Other Stories of Canada" (Dutton, $1.35) is an unusually good collection of tales. The discerning author records the changed outlook on life experienced by the men and women who come to the Dominion from the mother country, and makes his readers realize the optimistic, work-loving spirit of the Canadians. One or two of the volume's eight stories, however, are quite tragic, the effect of the long and silent winter on Hester Leach being particularly well described. But the dour Scot who is the central figure in "The Man Who Succeeded," the account of Peregrine's development into a dyed-in-the-wool Albertan, "The Kid's" adventures, and the prosperity that attended the jest of a merry groomsman are all happily-ending tales. The book is clean besides.

In "Rational Athletics for Boys" (Heath, $0.90) Frederick J. Reilly, Principal of Public School 33, Bronx, New York City, attacks the prevailing system of school athletics by which a few lads are "trained" for a "team" and the rest neglected. As an antidote he offers this manual of "rational athletics," which provides a system which all the children can follow and thus reap the benefits that come from healthy exercise. That the author has already achieved success is shown by the recorded results of his training in the increased chest-measurement, etc., of the pupils. Mr. Reilly also tells the flabby-muscled business man how to mend his ways. If the price of this little book were not so high, more school teachers would buy it.

"Waiting" is the latest effusion of the apostate Irish priest who, having married a Protestant evangelist in London, supports his establishment by fictional slander of the priesthood from which his conduct severed him. A grasping, tyrannical and vulgar priest, and an ideal schoolmaster who marries an ideal Protestant lady against the "Ne Temere" provisions, provide the dual motive of the book; the priest must be driven from the schools and Catholics be made free to marry as Protestants while retaining all their Catholic rights. The filling in is somewhat specious at first, as the author knows the details of Catholic life, but his hate grows with his pages, and he throws in such Protestant bits as "Catholics never read the Bible." As a part of the widespread propaganda to drive the priest from the marriage-altar and the school, the font and cradle of Christian life, the book has its significance, but its virulence is too obvious to have much influence anywhere, and its incidents, when they are possible, are so clearly untypical that in Ireland the "waiting" is likely to be indefinitely prolonged. Macmillan of London and Kennerley of New York are the publishers. The New York Macmillans, who repudiated another of the same author's libels that was also published by their London namesake, evidently declined to handle it.

Here are four recent volumes bearing on the war. With a cry of alarm as the title of his book, Paul Vergnet's "France in Danger" (Dutton, $1.00) two years ago called the attention of Frenchmen to a peril that he claimed was at their doors. In the light of present happenings many of his forecasts are remarkable. For some time, according to the writer, French national life had been threatened by a party of doctrinaires who were working for a Greater Germany. Beatrice Barstow is the capable translator of the book.——A British "Eye Witness's Narrative of the War" (Longmans, $0.75) will give those desirous of it an opportunity to review many of the Press Bureau despatches they read in the papers from last September till the end of March. The battles on the western front, from that of the Marne to Neuve Chapelle, are described without emotion, and the hard life of the trenches is vividly pictured.——"War's New Weapons" (Dodd, Mead, $1.50), according to Baron Hrolf von Dewitz, its author, is "an expert analysis in plain language of the weapons and methods used in the present great war." The chapters on aircraft and submarines are especially interesting. Both the Baron and Mr. Henry Maxim, who writes the preface, do some very plain talking when treating of America's unpreparedness.——M. D. Pétre's "Reflections of a Non-Combatant" (Longmans, $0.75) consist of nine papers giving an Englishwoman's rambling thoughts on the present conflict. She brings to the subject little that is fresh.

In "Alice and a Family" (Macmillan, $1.25) St. John G. Ervine has written a quaint and entertaining story of South London life. Alice herself is an amusing child who effectually carries out her promise to a dying wife to be a "little mother" to a number of children scarcely younger than herself. Her measures are rather Spartan in character, but are justified by results. Her greatest difficulty is with the father of the family, whom she has to bully a good deal before she brings him to time. In the end she marries him off to a sensible woman, and at the last page leaves the reader with the assurance that she stands in fair prospect of reaching that consummation herself.——"The Heart of Uncle Terry" (Lothrop, Lee & Shepherd Co., Boston, $1.25) is a story of the Maine woods by Charles Clark Munn. The theme of the sentimental part of the book, that life is a long series of illusions, though it takes up the greater portion of the dialogue, is weakly done. Of the different characters Uncle Terry is the most refreshing and has more sane philosophy than the younger people, Ollie and Vance, who hold the central position for the purpose, it would seem, of expounding their views on illusions. Adventures abound and there are good descriptive passages.

It is safe to predict that "Jaffery" (Lane, $1.35), William J. Locke's latest novel, will soon be high in the list of "best sellers." Given a fair and unconventional Balkan widow suddenly transplanted to London, a burly war correspondent, who is a heroically faithful friend and lover, an amiable young couple who delight in "managing," and we have actors and a setting that this clever author is sure to make interesting. With remarkable literary skill he keeps his readers smiling while he unfolds a tragic tale. Even Liosha, however, is out of place on that tramp steamer, and she would have to be virtuous indeed to come unscathed out of some of the situations into which the author puts her.——Clara Mulholland's story of "Sweet Doreen" (Herder, $1.10) brings in the familiar figure of the rack-renting Irish squire whom a fair maiden persuades to mend his ways. Those wide-eyed "Catholic kittens" have now found their way to Ballygorst!

EDUCATION

The Woman's Education Exhibit

THOSE who think that feminine education is a new phase of evolution or a novel development of human history would have received a severe shock had they accepted the invitation given by the Trustees of the New York Public Library to enjoy a private view of objects illustrating 2,000 years of feminine education. Happily the exhibit is to last several months, so all who wish can see it. The manuscripts, books, portraits and needlework on exhibition are from the library of George A. Plimpton, Esq., who thus commemorates the twenty-fifth anniversary of the opening of Barnard College, an institution of which he is now treasurer. Mr. Plimpton's collection proves conclusively that since Christianity has been able to exert a profound influence on mankind, representative churchmen have been promoting the thorough development of woman's mind.

ST. JEROME'S LETTER TO LAETA

The exhibit opens very appropriately with St. Jerome's letter to Laeta, in which he advises that Roman mother to put letters of various kinds into her daughter Paula's hands and to teach her the meaning of them. He adds the warning: "Take care that she does not conceive, in these early years, a dislike for study that may follow her into a more advanced age." St. Jerome realized that the child's education should not be made burdensome, and that tact and judgment are needed if the child is to be lured successfully along the path of learning. If it is thought that this is putting a modern significance into words of St. Jerome, not justified by the few simple phrases that he uses, recall that the Saint was familiar with the problems relating to the education of women, and that his friendship with Eustochium and Paula had made him appreciate the value of feminine education quite as well as any one in modern times.

ST. BONIFACE, ST. THECLA AND HROSWITHA

The next exhibit is a letter from St. Boniface, who was commissioned by Pope Gregory II to do for the Germans on the right bank of the Rhine what Augustine, at Pope Gregory the Great's behest, had done for the English. Though the work of Boniface was successful, he saw that educated women were needed to assist him in lifting the converted Germans to a high religious plane. His experience in England with communities of nuns had shown him how much their example and influence meant. St. Boniface was convinced, moreover, that children most readily imbibe the deep spirit of Christianity in religious schools. As a result of this letter, St. Thecla, illustrious in her day for sanctity and learning, went to his help and ever since has been looked upon as a coworker with St. Boniface in the conversion of Germany. Next is a copy of a fine old edition of the comedies written by Hroswitha, a nun of the tenth century, who lived in the Benedictine convent of Gandersheim along the Rhine. In a preface that Cardinal Newman might have written in the nineteenth century, or Monsignor Benson in the twentieth, Hroswitha says that her reason for composing these comedies is because many monks and nuns, to improve their literary style, are reading the plays of Terence. But his plays, far from making for edification, can scarcely fail to be a source of temptation. Accordingly Hroswitha, with the approval of her superiors, wrote comedies in order to furnish monks and nuns with reading that will be no less edifying than educative. Yet the tenth century has been called the darkest of the "dark ages."

THE "ANCREN RIWLE"

In the exhibit there is also an excellent copy of the Ancren Riwle, "The Anchoresses Rule," which was probably written for three Cistercian nuns by Richard Poore, Bishop of Salisbury. This volume is one of the most important documents in the history of the English language. Dr. Garnett, for many years keeper of the printed books in the British Museum, declares that this book "well deserves to be described as one of the most perfect models of simple, eloquent prose in our language." That remarkable volume, it is worthy of note, was written for women to read seven centuries ago.

LEARNED ENGLISH LADIES

Then there is the "Mirroure of Our Ladye of Syon," dating of the first half of the fifteenth century, recalling that gracious Bridgettine nunnery from which came the famous cope of Syon. The library catalogue of Syon shows, moreover, how broad were the intellectual interests of these medieval nuns. The ladies of the Renaissance are represented by Vittoria Colonna, and the ladies of the English Renaissance very properly by Isabella the Catholic, Catherine of Aragon and Mary Tudor, all three of whom did a great deal among English women of the early sixteenth century; Sir Thomas More and his daughter, Roger Ascham, Lady Jane Grey and Queen Elizabeth are, of course, represented. The charming, scholarly and beneficent Lady Margaret Beaufort, mother of King Henry VII, has a distinguished place in the exhibit. The inscription beneath her portrait chronicles that she founded professorships at Oxford and Cambridge, invited Erasmus to England, founded Christ College, Cambridge, and was the patron of Caxton and Wynkyn de Worde. All this interest in the development of woman's intellect came, be it remembered, before the so-called Reformation, reported to be the source of all intellectual progress in modern times. Lady Jane Grey, Roger Ascham and Queen Elizabeth seem to be products of that movement, but in reality they are not, for their education was secured under the still enduring influence of the older pre-Reformation conditions. After the Reformation, however, with the suppression of the monasteries and convents, woman's education received a serious set-back from which it is only beginning to recover in our time.

THE CANADIAN URSULINES

Some pictures of the old Quebec convents, which were the first institutions for the teaching of girls in this country, are interesting. The accompanying inscription runs:

> In 1639 Madame de la Peltrie founded the Ursuline Convent at Quebec and the Sisters took in Indian and French girls to instruct in religious and secular studies. This was the first institution for the instruction of girls founded in North America. By 1641 there were about fifty girls, French and Indian, at the school.

The series of pictures shows how intent was that distant generation on providing opportunities for feminine education; for though the convent was burned down twice in the course of some twenty-five years, it was restored each time on a larger and better scale. To many people this proof of the interest taken by French Catholics in the education of women, long before any attempt to educate the sex was made in English America ought to be enlightening. We are now learning, however, that under the Catholic Church, in both French and Spanish America, much ampler facilities for education were provided than in English America. The exhibit makes it clear that convents represented a refuge for women who wanted to live the intellectual and spiritual life rather than the domestic, and found in the cloister a haven of peace and devotion. The women who thus set themselves apart from the world have always been the teachers and the models of other women, and their holy lives have exerted a higher religious influence than any mere teaching of ethics could possibly effect.

JAMES J. WALSH, M.D., Ph.D.

SOCIOLOGY

Catholic Women's League for Social and Civic Reform

IT has been found in many great cities, especially those with a cosmopolitan population like New York, that there are certain aspects of social and civic work which, by their very nature and complexity, do not respond so intimately to the influence of the clergy and religious as to that of lay persons. This may be due in some remote degree to the fact that in the popular mind, even of Catholics, the clerical and religious states are in some fundamental way quite apart from the secular state, and consequently there has been prevented that fusion necessary to bring about a desired result. It will be granted that there are frequent instances, not of a spiritual nature, which respond more readily to the influence of, say, the doctor or nurse than to that of the priest or nun; there is of course no guiding principle in such matters. But conditions in life exist where the influence of the lay Catholic is more potent than that of the cleric or religious, and it is amongst such that the sphere of action of the League of Catholic Women for Social and Civic Reform is found. In other words the League stands for the solidification of the lay apostolate of Catholic women.

THE OBJECT OF THE LEAGUE

The work of the League is not political, nor is it directly charitable. Its purpose may be summed up as the promotion of social, civic and religious conditions by the federation of all Catholic women engaged in planning, financing, undertaking and executing such good works, whether devotional, charitable, educational or beneficiary, as are sanctioned by the Cardinal Archbishop of New York—for the activities of the League are, for the present, exercised in the archdiocese of New York. It will be seen that the prime object of the League is unification and co-operation. In pursuance of this object the League has representatives in the following organizations: the Municipal League, the Consumers League, the Child Labor Committee and the Woman's Department of the National Civic Federation.

In connection with the National Civic Federation the League has been able to co-operate with the Vacation War Relief Committee, and a workroom has been opened in which some thirty unemployed women have been given temporary work making garments of various kinds. Of the output of the workroom a part has been sent directly to Europe for the relief of war sufferers and the remainder has been distributed to the poor of New York. The report submitted at a recent meeting, the last of the season, shows that of the number of garments produced in the workroom which by arrangement are shared with the Vacation War Relief Committee the League received as its share 2784. Of these 750 were sent abroad for distribution among war sufferers, and the remaining 2034 have gone to the relief of the poor and necessitous of Greater New York through the medium of the various Catholic Sisterhoods and organizations that work among the needy. Notwithstanding generous donations in kind from benevolent persons in New York, the League is under the necessity of providing some seven hundred dollars each month to meet the expenditure of the workroom. The employment offered in the workroom is understood to be merely of a temporary nature, and the workers are paid an emergency wage, sufficient to ensure them the necessities of life. By means of the Employment Bureau permanent work is sought for the women in which they are placed immediately opportunity affords. During the past month permanent situations have been found for eight persons from the workroom.

WORK IN RECREATION CENTERS

Another direction in which the League operates is in Recreation Centers, and a vigorous attendance to this part of the work has been given by Miss Elizabeth Marbury. In connection with the Consumers League, the League has interested itself in the welfare of Catholic girls employed in department stores. This is a field in which the members may reasonably expect to do a maximum amount of social work. This work is one which commends itself very well to women whose time is at their own disposal, as being eminently suited to undertake the organization of recreation centers, clubs, holiday homes and other branches of social work, which up to the present have largely been in the hands of definitely Protestant or so-called non-sectarian organizations. That a work of this kind is badly needed is shown clearly by the fact that a considerable number of Catholic girls have sought membership in the Camp Fire Girls, which is under the auspices of the Young Women's Christian Association. A similar recreational organization is needed for our Catholic girls, especially for girls engaged in the monotonous daily round of a department store. The League is also working in connection with the reception of immigrants, and a member has been appointed to attend the Women's and Children's Courts in the interest of Catholics who unfortunately may find themselves there.

A CATHOLIC GIRLS' CAMP

The latest work undertaken by the League is one that is very much needed right here and now, one that we may hope to see taken up by Catholics in different parts of the country. The League has been given the use of two large bungalows at Belle Island, near Stamford, Connecticut, for the months of July and August, and a summer camp for women and girls will be conducted somewhat on the order of the summer camp organized by the Y. W. C. A. The idea is to give working girls from the city a free holiday for two weeks in ideal country surroundings, and arrangements have have been made to accommodate sixteen girls at a time. The first batch of sixteen will take up their quarters on July 1, returning to their homes on July 15, when the next batch will arrive. By this means it is hoped to give sixty-four girls in all two weeks of complete rest and change from their ordinary environment without their being at any expense. The bungalows are built right on the shore of the Sound, and the camp will be under the immediate charge of Mrs. Pitcher, a lady widely experienced in work among girls and women. The girls will be taught swimming and games, and long walks and study of nature will help to give them, for once in their lives at least, a wider outlook on life than they could ever gain from the drab life of the city, relieved perhaps by a day at Coney Island. The results of this summer camp will be watched with interest, and important data will be forthcoming for further ventures of the kind.

FUTURE PROSPECTS

The most prominent need of the League at the present time is for increased membership. True to its original object of being organized to look after existing charities and not to develop new ones, membership in the League implies no overlapping or division of interests. By a union of effort it becomes possible for Catholic women to exert considerable influence upon social and civic conditions, and representation in existing societies insures that the interests of Catholics are not to be put aside as of no account. There is room for homes or clubs, not institutions, for Catholic working girls, where for a sum commensurate with their income workers may live in agreeable and proper surroundings, without the constraint of multitudinous rules and observances which invite infraction at every turn. To inaugurate such a work there are no people more capable than women of the world who come from Catholic homes and have received their education in Catholic schools and colleges. A residential working girls' club, under lay care, has already been started in New York, having as one of its outstanding features an entire absence of petty regulations. It has, up to the present been successful. A work of this kind is but one branch of social activity in which the League might engage, given a sufficient membership and the necessary funds. For the work of the League and its development is entirely in the hands of Catholic women themselves. The central office of the League is at Room 901, 18 East Forty-first Street, New York City.

H. C. WATTS.

NOTE AND COMMENT

The Illinois Legislature is considering the passage of bills which provide penalties for those who contribute to the dependency or delinquency of children. An investigation shows that of 3,416 dependency petitions filed in a single year in Chicago, the majority were caused by the use of intoxicating liquors by parents. No one familiar with the daily calendar of the Children's Court can have failed to notice the number of instances in which a drunken father or a worthless mother is brought into the record. Little good can be accomplished by punishing the juvenile offender or putting him on probation if unfavorable domestic conditions are allowed to continue. The Illinois laws propose to "get at the parent" by bringing him within the speedier and more direct action of the Juvenile Court. The principle is good, and has already been incorporated in State laws and city ordinances. The only danger to be apprehended from legislation of this kind is that by providing excessive penalties, or by giving courts undue authority in family difficulties, it may defeat its own ends. Too often has this been the fate of social legislation, good in principle, but unwisely formulated.

Monsignor Laurentini, Secretary to the Propaganda, has recently expressed his great gratification over the progress of the seminaries for foreign missions recently established in the United States. In a recent interview with the Rev. Charles Friedrich, Procurator General of the Society of the Divine Word, which conducts one of these seminaries at Techny, Illinois, the Secretary said that it was imperative, if the foreign missions were to continue, that an interest in the work be fostered in America, and particularly in the United States. On account of the war, the foreign missions are suffering not only for lack of means, but for want of missionaries, and it is quite possible that because of the disturbed conditions which will continue long after peace is concluded, the European countries may never be able to resume their old place of preeminence in this work. "It is my conviction," said Mgr. Laurentini, "that the providence of God is now calling the Catholics of America to enter vigorously upon the field of foreign missions." Nor is there danger that the formation of American vocations for the missions will endanger the progress of the Church at home. The generosity, both personal and corporate, involved in this work, will draw down the richest blessings of Heaven upon the Church in America.

According to statistics just published by the "Department of Labor," the cost of living in the United States is higher now than it has ever been. For fifteen articles which are served on the table of the workingman in the United States, the average price for the year 1914 was two per cent. higher than that in 1913, and about five and a half per cent. higher than in 1912. In the words of a contemporary:

> The American workingman is now paying an average price of 102 for what he got in 1913 for 100 and in 1912 for 97.4 per cent. The statistics show that the cost of living has increased steadily for these fifteen articles since 1907, when the average price was only 81.9. In 1908 the average price jumped to 84.2, in 1909 to 88.6, in 1910 to 92.9, in 1911 to 91.9 and so on up to 102, the average price which the American workingman paid in 1914.

Some day our laborers will demand the reason "why" in a vigorous manner.

At the "Magna Charta" celebration of the New York Constitutional Convention, ex-Senator Root thus summed up two theories concerning man in the relation to the State:

> There are but two underlying theories of man in the social relation to the State.
>
> One is the theory of the ancient republic under which the State is the starting point from which rights are decided, and the individual holds rights only as a member of the State. That was the theory of Greece and Rome and the Italian republics.
>
> The other is the theory of the Great Charter, the Habeas Corpus Act, the Statute of Treasons, the Petition of Rights, the Bill of Rights, the Massachusetts Body of Liberties and the Declaration of Independence of the American Republic that the individual has inalienable rights of which no government may deprive him, but to secure which all government exists.

The speaker repudiated the first theory, noting that a logical conclusion from it would be that the State is not bound by the rules of morality which bind the individual. The ex-Senator is getting old fashioned, but he is right nevertheless.

In a pamphlet entitled "Roman Catholicism and American Citizenship," Amasa Thornton, a Congregationalist, gives some views on the public and Catholic schools that may be of interest to the Guardians of Liberty. In the course of a plea for a better feeling among Americans of all denominations he says:

> We send our little girl to a Catholic Parochial school and she talks to her mother and myself about what happens in the schoolroom. If there was anything like teaching disloyalty to our country's institutions and spirit, I would be certain to hear of it. She is taught that there is but one flag, that it is her duty to love the Stars and Stripes and all they stand for. She goes to a Congregational Sabbath School on Sunday and is distinctly Protestant. I send her to the Parochial school because I feel that the moral atmosphere there is safer and better to be in than the atmosphere of the public schools. I am as loyal to the American public school of my boyhood as any man of the United States. I have a board off the old red schoolhouse in which fifty-seven years ago I began to learn by A, B, C's, in my office, and I look at it with affection many times a day, but the public school of to-day lacks the spirit that hung around and pervaded the old red schoolhouse and is no longer so anchored in the great underlying fundamentals necessary to a correct development of the child, as it was once. Catholics should not be considered un-American because they wish their children to be trained in religion and morals when they are being educated. For the sake of my country I wish the moral and religious training applied by the Catholics in their Parochial schools would be largely applied in the public schools.

Mr. Thornton will never be President of the United States nor get a seat in the Cabinet for that matter.

The Detroit University Tamarack, after calling attention to the fact that in some States the students of Catholic colleges are not allowed to contest for the "National Peace Oratorical" prize, sums up the successes of Catholic students as follows:

> The first prize of the National Contest was awarded by unanimous decision to Mr. Wennerberg of Boston College. In the Massachusetts contest, first place was given to Mr. Wennerberg, second to Mr. Lane, Holy Cross, Worcester; in Pennsylvania, Mr. Clare Fenerty of St. Joseph's College, Philadelphia, won first place; in Maryland, Mr. Codd of Loyola College, Baltimore; in Wisconsin, Mr. Glenn McWilliams of Marquette University, Milwaukee; in Missouri, Mr. Thomas Goeke of St. Louis University, while in the Northwest, Gonzaga College, Spokane, won the honors over Montana University, Montana State College and the University of Idaho. No wonder some States exclude the students of Catholic Colleges from the contests.

The following paragraph, of deep and delicate spiritual import, is taken from the pages of the Living Church. That journal received it from one Abbé Volet, who, so far as he can be traced, is a voice merely:

> The work accomplished by the infernal society [the Society of Jesus] in the century since Pius VII reestablished it (after Clement XIV had so justly suppressed it) is no less abominable than that in earlier ages. They have made themselves masters of the Papacy; one owes to them the new dogmas of the Immaculate Conception, the Infallibility and the Universal Episcopate of the Pope, the heretical cult of the Sacred Heart, the canonization of Liguori, whose infamous moral teaching is their own; the general ultramontanization of all the Roman Catholic clergy; the general religious ignorance of all the faithful; the disfiguring of the old Catholic worship by a crowd of new devotions. In a word, they have shown themselves now, as before, the corruptors of the Church's faith, ethics and worship.

